> "Now, the first branch of this section declares the contract to be null and void: the second prevents the winner from bringing an action to recover the amount of the bet from the loser: and the third prevents the winner from suing the stakeholder. It certainly is true that the second branch is involved in the first; that is to say, that, if the section had stopped at the end of the first branch, it would have followed that no action could be brought to enforce a contract so declared to be void. But I apprehend there is nothing unusual in an Act of Parliament stating a legal consequence in this way."

Logically, it does not follow that because the second branch was not needed to prevent the success of an action to recover a bet, therefore the ambit of the second branch is limited to the case where the action would fail even apart from what the second branch says, for it would still be a possible view that the second branch also covers some actions which were not rendered void by the first limb. But I think Maule, J., did mean to express the view that the second limb was merely tautologous, and this is certainly the effect of Bramwell, L.J.'s observation in Diggle v. Higgs (4) where he roundly declares that the words of the second limb are unnecessary and might have been left out of the statute. These dicta, however, were not essential to the correctness of the decisions in which they occur, and it is to be observed that Cockburn, C.J., while concurring in the actual decision in Diggle v. Higgs (4), entertained a different opinion of the true construction of the section as a whole. Now that the question of the proper range of the second limb of s. 18 comes up as the direct issue for final decision the dicta to which I have referred must give way before the analysis and reasoning which Fletcher Moulton, L.J., first set on foot.

In the course of the argument before us hypothetic illustrations were put in which it was suggested that a "valuable thing" agreed by the loser of a bet to be given to the winner in consideration of the bet being treated as wiped out and no complaint being made of the failure to pay it promptly in cash might not be shown to be sued for as "won on a wager." If such a situation were to arise it would be for the judge of fact to decide whether this was or was not the case, but on the evidence in the present appeal it was plainly the sum won on wagering that it was sought to compel the appellant to pay. That, in my opinion, is a claim which under the second limb of s. 18 cannot be enforced by legal proceedings, notwithstanding the new agreement, and consequently the appeal, in my opinion, should succeed.

LORD GREENE: My Lords, section 18 of the Gaming Act, 1845, by its first branch makes gaming and wagering agreements null and void. Such contracts, therefore, are struck with invalidity at the outset, i.e., before the event contemplated by the wager has occurred. The appropriate consequence of this enactment would be relief before the event by way of declaration, and, perhaps, an order for delivery up of a written agreement as well as relief after the event by way of dismissal of an action to recover a sum won. The second branch is different. It is concerned with a state of affairs which can only arise after the event. What it prohibits is the bringing of any suit "for recovering any sum of money or valuable thing alleged to be won upon any wager." The first argument on behalf of the respondents is that the second branch merely repeats, in language appropriate to procedure, what has already been enacted as a matter of substantive law by the first branch and is in effect tautological. I am unable to accept this argument. I need not cite authority for the proposition that prima facie every word in an Act of Parliament must be given an effective meaning of its own. Whether or not the legislature in any given case has condescended to tautology is a question the answer to which depends on the language used, but, in the absence of an appropriate context, one statutory provision which is expressed in entirely different language from another, whether in the same or a different section, is not to be interpreted as repetitive or unnecessary. Here the language of the first branch is entirely different from the language of the second branch. Under the first branch the agreement is a nullity before the race is run. The second branch assumes the race to have been run and the bet to have been lost. It is true that the language of the second branch would prohibit the bringing of an action on a wager which had been won. To that extent I agree that it covers ground already adequately A covered by the first branch, but this is no justification for limiting the words of the second branch as suggested. They are quite general and when read in their ordinary meaning they extend to any action to recover money alleged to be won on a wager. A competent draftsman would have used very different words if all that he had been instructed to prohibit had been an action on a contract rendered null and void by the first branch.

B In support of the argument that the second branch is in effect tautological, reliance is placed on certain authorities of which I need only refer to two. In neither of them did the question with which we are concerned arise. In neither of them was its solution necessary to the decision. If the observations relied on are to be understood as intended to apply to such a case as the present they are dicta only and, in my opinion, incorrect. C These cases are Varney v. Hickman (3) and Diggle v. Higgs (4). Both were concerned with the third branch of the section which prohibits the bringing of an action to recover money deposited with a stakeholder to abide the event of a wager. In the former, the event had not happened and one of the parties sought to recover his deposit. In the latter, it had happened, but, the stakeholder not having yet paid over the money deposited, D the loser sought to recover his part of it from the stakeholder. In each case the plaintiff succeeded since the court construed the third branch as applying only to a claim against the stakeholder by the winner of the wager. In the former case MAULE, J., said (5 C.B. 280) :

> " . . . the second branch is involved in the first; that is to say, that, if the section had stopped at the end of the first branch, it would have followed E that no action could be brought to enforce a contract so declared to be void."

This appears to me to be no more than a statement that as regards the enforcement of contracts declared to be void by the first branch the second branch carried the matter no further. This is far from having the implication suggested on behalf of the respondents. The question is: Is the second branch confined to such actions or does it extend to other actions as well ? The language used makes F it, in my opinion, impossible to confine it in the manner suggested. I find myself in complete agreement with what was said on this topic by FLETCHER MOULTON, L.J., in Hyams v. Stuart King (1) ([1908 2 K.B. 713) :

> " It provides with complete generality that no action shall be brought to recover anything alleged to be won upon any wager, without in any G way limiting the application of the provision to the wagering contract itself."

In Diggle v. Higgs (4) BRAMWELL, L.J., said (3 Ex. D. 429) :

> " I only wish to add that the clause of s. 18, that ' no suit shall be brought for recovering money won upon a wager ' is unnecessary, and might have been left out of the statute ; it seems to me to be wholly superfluous."

H This dictum is, in my opinion, incorrect. On the construction of the section, therefore, I come to the conclusion that the second branch means what it says and is not confined to actions where the agreement sued on is the wagering agreement itself. As I shall hope presently to show the agreement here alleged, sued on and proved, is an agreement to pay money won on a wager. The promise which it is sought to enforce is a promise to pay that money and nothing else.

My Lords, much confusion appears to me to have arisen in this class of case through a failure to recognise that the question is not to be answered by finding a new consideration moving from the winner of the wager. Such a consideration from the point of view of contract law, apart from the Act, would indeed be sufficient to support a promise to pay unpaid bets, but the Act, as I interpret it, directs the court to look at the nature and true subject-matter of the promise given in exchange for that consideration by the loser. If that promise is one which the Act forbids the court to enforce, it matters not how new or how valuable the consideration moving from the promisee may be. An early example of this confusion is to be found in Bubb v. Yelverton (6). I am unable to accept, or indeed to follow, the reasoning of Lord Romilly, M.R., in that case. He says (L.R. 9 Eq. 474): " Here there was a perfectly good consideration quite ulterior to and independent of any racing debt." As a bald statement of the goodness of the consideration moving from the winner I can agree with this. If it means that the promise given by the loser in exchange for that consideration is " ulterior to " (whatever that may mean) " and independent of any racing debt " it is completely at variance with the facts as found. The bond on which the action was brought was given in part payment of wagering debts as appears without the possibility of doubt from the statement of facts. What was the promise but a promise secured by bond to pay a wagering debt ? I cannot see. The fact that the sum which the betting creditors were willing to accept was, as it seems, less than the full amount of the bets lost does not in the least affect its character. A sentence in the judgment, which is often quoted, appears to me, when it is analysed, to be of no assistance and indeed calculated to mislead. The Master of the Rolls said of the bond that it was given " not to pay racing debts, but to avoid the consequences of not having paid them." The best way of avoiding the consequences of not having paid racing debts is to pay them ; and the promise of the loser was merely a promise to do so. The fact that it was given to avoid the consequences of not having paid the debts cannot, as I see it, convert it into a promise of a different character. A method of avoiding a similar difficulty commended itself to the majority of the Court of Appeal in Hyams v. Stuart King (1) without, indeed (as Fletcher Moulton, L.J., pointed out), either any finding of the trial judge to support it, any pleading on which it could be based, any facts sufficient to raise it, or any argument of counsel advocating it. It consisted in saying that the promise of the loser was to pay not the bet but a " certain sum of money to avoid the consequences of not having paid the racing debts " (per Gorell Barnes, P. ([1908] 2 K.B. 702)) echoing the language of Lord Romilly, M.R., in Bubb v. Yelverton (6). Farwell, L.J., elaborated this theory. He said ([1908] 2 K.B. 728) :

> " Here the agreement sued on is an agreement to pay a sum of money in consideration of forbearance to post the defendant as a defaulter ; the sum of money may be equal to or less than the lost bet, but it is not payment of the bet . . ."

I pause here to call particular attention to the reason given by the learned Lord Justice. It is :

> " . . . because that [i.e., the bet] was payable on settling day . . . [the] money, which, though equal to the amount of the bet, is not in fact the bet, but is compensation for its non-payment . . ."

It appears to me that Fletcher Moulton, L.J., gave unanswerable grounds (which I do not delay to cite) for rejecting this reasoning. I only propose to add one sentence, viz., that, just as in the case of an ordinary debt paid after its due date, payment of a bet is no less payment of a bet because settling day is past and to say that the passing of settling day by some mysterious alchemy transmutes a promise (unenforceable by statute) to pay an unpaid debt into an innocent promise (unaffected by the statute) to pay an equivalent sum of money appears to me, with the utmost respect to the memory of Farwell, L.J., to shut one's eye to reality and to permit an unwarrantable evasion both of the language and of the spirit of the statute. The reasoning of GORELL BARNES, P., on this topic appears to me, to be inconsistent with the facts as stated by him. The only promise found was a promise to "pay every farthing that was owing"—a clearer promise to pay an unpaid bet, and nothing but an unpaid bet, I cannot myself imagine. Again, the promise (and the only promise) alleged by A the plaintiff is stated (ibid., 701) to be "a promise for good and fresh consideration to pay the balance claimed by him." What is this but a promise to pay the unpaid balance of the bets ? I cannot see. As Hyams v. Stuart King (1) is really the respondents' sheet anchor, I should, I think, add the statement that in the judgment of FARWELL, L.J., there is a similar inconsistency. He says (ibid., 725) the promise was "to pay the £108 10*s*. by instalments as soon

B as the firm got the money." The £108 10*s*. was the unpaid amount of the bet and nothing else. Again, he said (ibid.) that there was nothing illegal in the winner's agreement not to expose the loser "in consideration of the payment of amount lost."

In the present case, the promise sought to be enforced is alleged (as it was bound to be alleged if the pleading was to accord with the facts) to be a promise
C to pay unpaid bets. The agreement alleged is "an agreement between the plaintiffs and the defendant on Aug. 20, 1946." It is not disputed that the reference is to the appellant's letter of Aug. 20, 1946, which must be treated as incorporated in the pleading and must be construed in the light of the other documents directly or indirectly referred to in it. Those documents are the respondents' letter of Aug. 17, the appellant's letter of Aug. 15 and the order of D Tattersalls' committee made on July 22. It is unfortunate that this order was not produced at the trial. It was a relevant document for the purpose of construing the claim, and the learned trial judge should have insisted on its production. However, we have sufficient material to enable us to know what was the substance of its contents. These various documents make it, to my mind, clear beyond controversy that the promise sued on, as alleged in the E statement of claim, was a promise to pay the unpaid balance of a betting account in accordance with the committee's order subject to certain immaterial modifications which were agreed between the parties. As stated in para. 6 of the respondents' case, the order of the committee was an order to pay in the manner and at the times therein mentioned the bets outstanding on the account.

Counsel for the respondents put as his first argument the limited view which
F I have already rejected as to the meaning of the second branch of the section. Under this head he claimed that, even if the appellant's promise was to be regarded as a promise to pay unpaid bets, the second branch did not invalidate it. If he were wrong on this he submitted as an alternative argument the theory that was evolved in Bubb v. Yelverton (6) and Hyams v. Stuart King (1) that the promise was a promise to pay, not unpaid bets, but an amount equal to the G unpaid bets. He argued that the bets played no more than a historical role and formed no necessary part of the allegation on which the claim in the action was founded, that the word "alleged" in the second branch of the section means alleged as a material allegation, and that if the allegation in the pleading was an allegation of an agreement to pay the unpaid bets as such, that allegation was in that respect immaterial and could be ignored leaving the pleading to H be read as alleging a promise to pay a sum of money at large. Apart from the casual method of treating a pleading which this argument involves, I am quite unable to accept it. The obligation of honour to pay the bet was not a mere matter of history leading up to the promise sued on. It was, as I see it, the actual subject-matter, both in language and in substance, of the promise. Payment of the debt of honour was the only matter with which Tattersalls' committee—itself in this regard a court of honour and nothing more—was concerned. It was, as I have explained, the only thing which the committee ordered the appellant to discharge. I am unable to follow the reasoning which would transform this debt of honour into something else. I can find no evidence to support the view that any such transformation took place ; on the contrary all the evidence is the other way. Nor do I think that it would have been permissible for the respondents to re-cast their pleading by alleging an agreement not, as now pleaded, to pay the outstanding bets, but to pay a sum at large. No such amendment was asked for nor, in view of the only evidence in the case, could it have been granted. If enquiry is made when did such a transformation take place, the only answer suggested was that it took place in and by virtue of the order of the committee. I have already given my reasons for thinking that the order of the committee did nothing more than order the payment of the bets with which alone, as a court of honour, it was concerned.

My Lords, I do not myself feel any real doubt as to the meaning of the word " alleged " in the section. The context in which it occurs is concerned with the bringing of a suit, and in such a context I should expect the word " alleged " to mean, alleged for the purposes of the suit, i.e., alleged in the declaration in which the claim is set forth. In the year 1845 when the Gaming Act was passed, the rules of pleading were more strictly observed than they are to-day. Implicit in the second limb of the section is a direction to the court not to entertain a suit of the nature indicated ; a pleading based on the allegation mentioned was not only made demurrable, but the court of its own motion must decline to allow an action based on it to proceed. This, as it seems to me, makes it of vital importance to ascertain the nature of the agreement alleged. I agree that the word " alleged " must mean " alleged as a matter of material relevance," but in pleading an agreement it must always be material to allege the real consideration. A failure to prove it means either (1) that the action must fail or (2) that it can only succeed if the pleading is amended which, in an ordinary case, the court might properly allow. But in a case covered by this limb of the section, if, on the face of the pleading, the agreement alleged is an agreement not to pay the unpaid amount of a wager but to pay a sum at large, and if at the trial the only agreement proved is, in fact, an agreement to pay the unpaid amount of a wager, no amendment setting up the real agreement as proved would be permissible since it would convert the action into a prohibited suit. The action in such a case would, therefore, fail not because the section forbade it (since on the face of the pleading the allegation would have been an innocent one) but because the plaintiff had failed to prove the agreement alleged and was prevented by the section from amending his pleading so as to allege the agreement which was actually proved. If the two parties to a wagering agreement make a subsequent agreement by which for consideration the loser promises to pay his losses to the winner, that, and nothing else, is the agreement which must be pleaded. In such a case if the winner alleges instead an agreement to pay the sum at large, he will be alleging an agreement different to that which, in truth, was made, and his action will fail. Not only does the prohibition contained in the second branch of the section itself require the court to satisfy itself as to the true nature of the sum sued for, but the two allegations are quite different. This can be seen from the fact that, apart from the application of the Gaming Act, different defences would be open to the defendant. For example, where the agreement was to pay the amount lost on a wager, it would be a good defence that the wager was not in fact lost. No such defence would be relevant in an action on an agreement to pay a sum at large. I am unable to accept the view that the true nature of the agreement relied on is not a material allegation.

I must not be understood as suggesting that there can never be a case where a promise by a defaulting backer, given in consideration of a promise by the winner of the bet not to report the default, may be enforced. A promise in order to be obnoxious to the second branch of the section must be a promise to pay the bet, and the prohibition relates only to recovery of money or a valuable thing alleged to be lost. The question what the agreement really comes, to is a question for the tribunal of fact which will not be deceived by any specious attempt to conceal the real nature of the promise. If the loser in terms agrees (as was found by the majority in Hyams' case (1)) : "if you will refrain from reporting me, I promise to pay a sum of money equal to the amount of the bet A which I lost to you ", I have difficulty in thinking that a tribunal of fact would regard the promise as being anything but a promise to pay the bet. It would indeed be strange if the consequences of the section could be evaded by so patent and artificial a device. In the result, I am of opinion that this appeal should be allowed and that Bubb v. Yelverton (6) and Hyams v. Stuart King (1) should be overruled.

B LORD NORMAND : My Lords, this appeal from a judgment of the Court of Appeal, affirming a judgment of HALLETT, J., raises an interesting question on the law of betting in that it involves a re-consideration of Hyams v. Stuart King (1) and of certain earlier authorities on which the decision in that case was based. The respondents, a company carrying on business as bookmakers, sue the appellant who had had betting transactions on horse C racing and dog racing with them as the result of which he had by March, 1946, lost to them a sum of £3,835 12*s*. 6*d*. As he failed to pay, the respondents, in July, 1946, reported his default to the committee of Tattersalls. The committee after hearing evidence, ordered, on July 22, that the appellant should pay to the respondents the sum of £3,635 12*s*. 6*d*., being the sum held by the committee to have been lost on horse racing bets, by a payment of £635 12*s*. 6*d*. within D fourteen days, and the balance by means of thirty monthly instalments of £100 each. The committee refused to make an order in respect of £200 said to have been lost on dog racing over which Tattersalls exercised no control. The appellant failed to comply with the committee's order and on Aug. 15, 1946, he wrote the following letter to the respondents :

> E "I am sorry that I have not yet been able to comply with the order made against me by Messrs. Tattersalls but as my financial position at the moment is bad I have not been in a position to do so. The best I can do at the moment is to send you a post-dated cheque for Oct. 10 for £635 12*s*. 6*d*. and the rest as agreed by Tattersalls. If you cannot see your way clear to accept this offer, then I am afraid there is nothing else I can do."

F The respondents, on Aug. 17, replied as follows:

> "Re account—£3,835 12*s*. 6*d*.
> We have to acknowledge receipt of your letter of the 15th instant, in which you state that up to the present you have been unable to comply with the order of Tattersalls' committee of the 22nd ultimo. We note G your suggestion that you are prepared to forward to us a cheque for £635 12*s*. 6*d*. post-dated to Oct. 10, 1946, the balance of our account of £3,200 to be paid in monthly instalments of £100 as adjudicated by the committee of Tattersalls. We agree to your suggestion, and in consideration of your forwarding your cheque for £635 12*s*. 6*d*. post-dated to Oct. 10, 1946, and of the said cheque being honoured by the bank, and H in further consideration of the balance of our account of £3,200 being paid by instalments of £100 commencing November, 1946, and each subsequent month thereafter until our account is clear, we on our part will refrain from enforcing the order made by Tattersalls' committee on July 22, 1946."

On Aug. 20, 1946, the appellant accepted the offer contained in that letter by a letter in these terms :

> "With reference to your letter of the 17th inst. re account £3,835 12*s*. 6*d*.

> I am enclosing cheque for £635 12*s.* 6*d.* post-dated to Oct. 10 as agreed with instalments of £100 per month commencing in November to follow. Thanking you for your helpful consideration in this matter and assuring you that as soon as my financial position improves I shall do all I possibly can to settle this account as soon as possible . . ."

In their statement of claim for payment of instalments in arrear at the date of the writ, viz., Feb. 21, 1947, the respondents allege as its foundation the agreement of Aug. 20, by which is meant the agreement embodied in the letters of Aug. 17 and 20, 1946. From these facts it is clear that the contract which is the ground of action is not itself a betting contract, and that the consideration given by the respondents for the appellant's obligations under it was their refraining from enforcing the order made by Tattersalls' committee on July 22, 1946. This was a consideration the nature of which I should explain. A B

The functions and procedure of Tattersalls' committee are described in the judgment of Hallett, J., which may be supplemented by statements in the cases of the parties. It appears that it is open to anyone alleging that he has won a bet from another on horse racing, and that he has not been paid by the date of the settlement, to report the matter to Tattersalls' committee. The committee then holds an enquiry at which evidence may be taken, and decides C whether a bet has been lost and, if so, of what amount. It may then make a written order for payment on terms and by instalments. Up to this point that was the procedure followed in the present case. If the loser fails to make payments in compliance with the committee's direction, the next step is that the creditor may report the default to the committee and request it to send to the defaulter a letter described as "the usual ten day letter," calling on D the defaulter to comply with the committee's order within ten days, and stating that, if he fails to comply, the committee will report him to the stewards of the Jockey Club. If that is done, the automatic result is that the defaulter is warned off Newmarket Heath, and is thereby precluded from entering a horse for any race, or appearing on any race course, controlled by the stewards of the Jockey Club and, in effect, from placing any further bets on race horses. E He also incurs a serious social stigma. The whole procedure is, therefore, a means of compelling payment of lost bets by social sanctions.

The defence to the suit is that the claim is to recover a sum of money won on a wager within the meaning of s. 18 of the Gaming Act, 1845, and by this defence the appellant challenges the decision in Hyams' case (1) which the courts below have followed in construing s. 18. The section enacts that: F

> "All contracts or agreements, whether by parole or in writing, by way of gaming or wagering, shall be null and void; and no suit shall be brought or maintained in any court of law and equity for recovering any sum of money or valuable thing alleged to be won upon any wager, or which shall have been deposited in the hands of any person to abide the G event on which any wager shall have been made: Provided always, that this enactment shall not be deemed to apply to any subscription or contribution, or agreement to subscribe or contribute, for or towards any plate, prize, or sum of money to be awarded to the winner or winners of any lawful game, sport, pastime, or exercise."

The section divides into three branches. The first branch affects with nullity H all gaming and wagering contracts and agreements, but as I have said the contract which is the foundation of the suit is not a wagering contract. There had been wagering contracts between the parties, but the wagers had been lost and won before the formation of the contract on which this action is founded. It is, however, not on the first branch that the appellant bases his defence. He relies on the first part of the second branch, and his contention is that, the sum which he has contracted to pay, is a sum alleged in the claim to be won on a wager, and, therefore, that the suit falls within the express terms of the enactment. This contention does not in any way depend on an illegality or defect in the formation of the contract, and it is conceded that the contract was for a good and fresh consideration untainted with any illegality. The respondents' contentions are, first, that the sum which the appellant promised to pay is no longer money won on a wager, but is a sum of money at large due under a lawful and enforceable contract; and, second, that, even if the sum is to be regarded as a sum won on a wager, it is nevertheless recoverable, because the second branch of s. 18 is throughout concerned only with suits seeking to enforce the gaming and wagering contracts or agreements dealt with in the first branch.

It will be convenient before dealing with these contentions to take account of Hyams' case (1). The facts in that case were that betting transactions between the parties, who were bookmakers, resulted in the defendant giving a cheque to the plaintiff for the amount of bets lost to him. At the defendant's request the cheque was held over by the plaintiff and part of the amount of the cheque was paid by the defendant. Subsequently a new verbal agreement was come to by which the defendant promised to pay the balance in a few days in consideration of the plaintiff's holding over of the cheque for a further time and refraining from declaring the defendant a defaulter, and so injuring his business. The balance was not paid, and the plaintiff, therefore, issued a writ by the indorsement of which he claimed the balance due to him on account stated. At the trial the plaintiff was allowed to set up the fresh agreement and he was held entitled to recover. On appeal the majority of the court, Sir Gorell Barnes, P., and Farwell, L.J., affirmed the judgment. Fletcher Moulton, L.J., dissented. The ground of Sir Gorell Barnes' judgment is that, though the mere giving of time to pay that which cannot be enforced does not amount to consideration, the plaintiff's refraining to declare the defendant a defaulter was good and lawful consideration and that the new contract was a good and enforceable contract. He followed the earlier decisions of Bubb v. Yelverton (6) and Re Browne. Ex parte Martingell (8), to which I shall later make reference. Sir Gorell Barnes did not deal directly with the meaning and effect of the provision in s. 18 that no suit shall be brought or maintained in any court of law or equity for recovering any sum of money or valuable thing alleged to be won on any wager, but he cited it and I think that he regarded this provision as explicatory of the legal consequences of the enactment in the first branch of the section, and as limited in its scope to wagering contracts and agreements. Farwell, L.J., agreed with the President in the result, but in some respects his reasoning was different. He first disposed of an argument for the appellant that the use of extra-legal remedies, such as posting a defaulter in order to enforce payment of a debt of honour, savoured of blackmail. The learned Lord Justice rejected this argument on the unanswerable ground that no wrong is done if an aggrieved party makes use of the ordinary means allowed by society to compel the loser to pay his debt of honour. He then said that he regarded the lawfulness of the consideration moving from the plaintiff as the gist of the case. His reason was that a debt of honour, though of imperfect obligation, becomes enforceable, if another and distinct legal consideration can be established to support it. Thus the lawfulness of the new consideration alleged by the plaintiff became the crux of the case. If that consideration had been tainted with blackmail, the defendant's obligation would have been as unenforceable after the formation of the new contract as it was before it, but since it was free of all taint of illegality, the learned Lord Justice held that the defendant's obligation was perfected and enforceable. Though that is the ratio of his judgment, I must refer to some other observations not easily reconcilable with it. He said ([1908] 2 K.B. 728):

> "Here the agreement sued on is an agreement to pay a sum of money in consideration of forbearance to post the defendant as a defaulter; the sum of money may be equal to or less than the lost bet, but it is not payment of the bet, because that was payable on settling day, and non-payment on that day made the loser a defaulter and liable to be posted."

This is the only passage in the majority judgments which seems to be specifically directed to the argument that the suit was not maintainable because it was, A notwithstanding the fresh consideration, an attempt to recover a sum of money alleged to be won by a wager. Though that argument was not submitted by the defendant in Hyams' case (1), it was the basis of the dissenting judgment of FLETCHER MOULTON, L.J. On the facts he held that the promise sued on was a promise to pay the bet and nothing else or different, and that the real intention of the parties was that the bet should be paid. On the construction B of s. 18 he held that the provision that no suit shall be brought or maintained in any court of law or equity for recovering any sum alleged to be won on a wager was not in effect merely a repetition of, or explicatory of, the preceding enactment that all contracts or agreements, whether by parole or in writing, by way of gaming or wagering shall be null and void. He based this construction not only on the generality of the wording of the provision, but also on the C ground that it would be idle to enact that no suit shall be brought on a contract which the statute had already rendered void. In his consideration of the earlier authorities he expressed the opinion that the decision in Bubb v. Yelverton (6) in which LORD ROMILLY, M.R., upheld the validity of a bond given for a sum of money, admittedly in compromise for sums won on bets, had been influenced, first, by an argument based on the language of the Gaming Act, 1710, as D amended by the Gaming Act, 1835, s. 1, which seemed to place bonds in a special and peculiar position by reason that they are not named in the amending section, although they are named in the repealing section; and, second, by the fact that there would be a serious loss to the estate of the party who had made the bets if they were not paid or compromised. He added that these special circumstances did not, in his judgment, justify the decision. On the E other hand, he gave reasons for allowing that the decision in Re Browne. Ex parte Martingell (8) might be justified on its special circumstances. In that case bills to the amount of a betting debt were given in consideration of the withdrawal of a letter of complaint which had been sent to the committee of the defaulter's club, and BUCKLEY, J., held that these bills were not for the bet, but for a wholly new consideration and were valid. FLETCHER MOULTON, F L.J., said ([1908] 2 K.B. 721):

> "If this means that the judge found as a fact that the bills were not in payment of the bets, but were simply the price of the withdrawal of a letter of complaint that had actually been sent, there is ground for saying that the case had nothing to do with the laws against gaming and therefore G laid down no principle with regard to them."

He also considered that Goodson v. Baker (9) was wrongly decided. In that case there was no evidence of any fresh consideration since all that the bookmaker had done or promised was to extend the time for payment without agreeing to refrain from posting the loser as a defaulter.

The first issue to be decided is whether the sums sued for in the present H case and in Hyams' case (1) were moneys won on a wager. So far as Hyams' case (1) is concerned, there is, I think, no room for doubt. The sum sued for was in fact the balance due on a bookmaking account. The proposition that the money sued for was not the bet because the bet was payable on settling day, though it is supported by the high authority of FARWELL, L.J., is, if I may say so with respect, not maintainable. The payment of a sum due under a contract, though made after the due term, is nevertheless a payment in discharge of the debtor's obligation under the contract unless it contains special and exceptional terms. In the present case, the proceedings before Tattersalls' committee are a factor which was not present in Hyams' case (1), but the order of that committee created no new obligation. It was an order for the payment of the wagering debt, the same in amount and the same in character, and, in my opinion, the promise made in the contract alleged in the claim is

A a promise to pay money won on a wager or wagers, though the promise is new and the consideration for it is new. The terms of the contract expressly establish that the promise to pay is a promise to comply with the order of Tattersalls' committee subject to modifications of date, and that the sum to be paid is the balance of the bookmaking account, including the sums won on bets on dog racing which were not included in the order of Tattersalls' committee.
B I think, therefore, that the appellant has succeeded in showing that, in the literal meaning of the words, this is a suit for recovering sums alleged to be won on a wager. By averring the contract the respondents incorporated in their allegations its terms and these terms disclose that the sum promised was won by betting. The respondents' construction of s. 18 fails, in my opinion, to account for the words "recovering any sum of money or valuable thing alleged
C to be won upon any wager." It treats them as a periphrasis for "enforcing any such contract or agreement." On the other hand, the appellant's construction gives effect to the words according to their normal and ordinary meaning. The purpose of this part of s. 18 is not to strike a second and an unnecessary blow at contracts and agreements already stricken with nullity, but to strike at any suit for recovering money or valuables won by wagering. The language
D is appropriate for that purpose, and it is a purpose which is a logical sequel and reinforcement of the first branch of the section. The legislature cannot have been unmindful that a provision making gaming and wagering contracts and agreements null and void might be rendered nugatory by additional promises or covenants given or entered into for security or in satisfaction of money lost by gaming and wagering. The preamble to the Act of 1835 shows
E that such supplementary promises and covenants were familiar to Parliament.

In the debate the word "alleged" was much canvassed. In the present case it gives rise to no difficulty because, as has already been said, the respondents themselves alleged a contract from which it appears the sum sued for was won on a wager. My noble and learned friends LORD SIMON and LORD GREENE have explained in their speeches why the word "alleged" may have been
F inserted in the section by relating it to the rules of procedure which were in force in 1845. Under the old procedure the plaintiff failed in his claim if he alleged that the sum sued for was won on a wager, or if he alleged another ground of action but it was proved that the sum sued for was won on a wager. Under the present procedure the result will still be the same in either of the cases figured. Even so, there may yet be cases, of which Re Browne. Ex parte
G Martingell (8) is an example, in which a difficult question will have to be decided on the facts—whether the contract before the court is in truth a contract for the payment of a wagering debt or a contract in which the loser of a wagering debt has bound himself to pay a sum of money of a different character.

The respondents cited a series of authorities concerned with the second part of the second branch, that is, the provision that a sum of money deposited in H the hands of a person to abide the event on which any wager shall have been made is irrecoverable. It will be sufficient to refer to two of these cases. In Varney v. Hickman (3) it was held that the money deposited with a stakeholder can be recovered by a party repudiating the wager before the event on which it depended was determined. The ground of the decision was that the provision dealing with stakeholders was aimed at preventing the winner of a wager enforcing payment and was thus in line with the legal results of the first branch of the section ; but MAULE, J., referred also to the first part of the second branch and he said that it was involved in the first branch of the section and that if the section had stopped at the end of the first branch it would have followed that no action could be brought to enforce a contract so declared to be void. Cresswell, J., similarly said that the provision might be superfluous or it might have been enacted ex abundanti cautela. In Diggle v. Higgs (4) the plaintiff was held entitled to recover from a stakeholder, after the determination of the match, but before the money had been paid over to the winner. In that case Bramwell, L.J., gave it as his opinion (2 Ex. D. 429) A that the provision that " no suit shall be brought for recovering money won upon a wager " is unnecessary and might have been left out of the statute. These dicta on the meaning of the first part of the second branch of s. 18 are not essential to the conclusion, and the decisions do not, in my opinion, involve a construction by which the words " any sum of money . . . deposited in the hands of any person to abide the event on which any wager shall have been made," B become tautological or merely expository of the necessary legal consequences of the first branch of the section. These decisions, therefore, do not help the respondents, but the dicta which I have cited are weighty, coming as they do from judges of great eminence, and it is on them rather than on the decisions that the respondents rely. I think, however, that the construction of the words " no suit shall be brought for recovering any money or valuable thing alleged C to be won upon a wager " was not raised in the cited cases in such a way as to bring before the court the kind of question which has arisen in the present case, and that a decision of the appeal cannot safely be rested on the dicta. Hough v. Windus (5), also cited by the respondents, has little relevance to the case. It illustrates the familiar principle that the rule that that construction is to be preferred which gives meaning to each word of a written instrument D is not unbending but may yield to a more compelling rule where there is a conflict between them. In the case cited it was held that a statute should not be so construed as to give it a retrospective effect even if the result were that some word or words must be treated as superfluous.

A consideration of these authorities appears to me to leave unimpaired the ratio of the dissenting judgment in Hyams' case (1) that the first part of the E second branch of s. 18 provides with complete generality that no action shall be brought to recover anything alleged to be won on any wager, without in any way limiting the application of the provision to the wagering contract itself. I, therefore, reach the conclusion that the appeal should be allowed, that Hyams' case (1), Bubb v. Yelverton (6) and Goodson v. Baker (9) should be overruled, and that the dicta in Varney v. Hickman (3) and Diggle v. F Higgs (4) should be disapproved. The view taken in Bubb v. Yelverton (6) has prevailed for eighty years, but it cannot be said that it has been tacitly recognised by intervening legislation, or that obligations with a tract of future time have been undertaken on the faith of it. The lapse of time is not, therefore, a sufficient reason for refusing to give effect to what appears to be the true construction of the statute. G

Before parting from the appeal I would refer to the Scottish case, Robertson v. Balfour (10). I have no doubt that that case was rightly decided, but the common law of Scotland on gaming and wagering differs greatly from the common law of England. In Scotland it is settled law that wagering agreements, being sponsiones ludicrae, are matters with which the court ought not to occupy itself ; whereas by the common law of England the ordinary wagering H agreement dependent on the result of horse racing and similar events was enforceable by the courts. Apart from that vital difference, there is in Scotland no need for consideration to support and render enforceable obligations not under seal. Moreover, the Gaming Act, 1845, does not apply to Scotland. It is obvious, therefore, that neither the decision in Robertson v. Balfour (10) nor the dictum of Lord Mackay for which the case was cited can be of any assistance in the present case.

LORD OAKSEY : My Lords, in my opinion, Bubb v. Yelverton (6) and Hyams v. Stuart King (1) were rightly decided and this appeal should, therefore, be dismissed.

An agreement by way of wagering has never been illegal. By s. 18 of the Gaming Act, 1845, it was made null and void but not illegal. A legal nullity can have no legal effect. It creates no taint in money derived from it, but it is argued that the words which follow the declaration of nullity, " . . . and no suit shall be brought or maintained in any court of law and equity for recovering any sum of money or valuable thing alleged to be won upon any wager, or which shall have been deposited in the hands of any person to abide the event on which any wager shall have been made," make it impossible to enter into a binding legal contract in reference to the sum of money won under the wagering agreement. In my opinion, the words of the section have no such meaning. It cannot be denied that apart from the section it was perfectly legal for one person to enter into a contract which would be enforceable to pay any sum of money in consideration of a promise by another person to refrain from doing something which he was entitled to do. Now there is nothing illegal, or even defamatory, in making a truthful report to Tattersalls' committee, but its consequences may be very serious indeed to the bettor for he, and his horses, may be warned off Newmarket Heath and all race courses which are conducted under the Rules of Racing. How serious this result may be was exemplified in Bubb v. Yelverton (6), for as LORD ROMILLY, M.R., said (L.R. 9 Eq. 475):

> " He [the defaulter] was compelled to do so by the circumstance that Mr. Steel and Mr. Nicholls would have taken steps respecting him with the Jockey Club, which would not only have been exceedingly painful to him, but would besides have involved him in very serious and considerable pecuniary liabilities . . ."

In my opinion, it would require the clearest possible words in a statute to render such a contract unenforceable and to prevent a man who has done nothing illegal, but has merely been unable for the time being to pay a betting debt, from protecting himself from results which may be as disastrous to him financially as they may be socially. That, in my view, is the true way in which to consider the matter. Why cannot a man who cannot pay his betting debt protect himself by making a promise to pay for good consideration ? An action brought on such a promise is not, in my opinion, an action to recover the sum of money won on a wager, but an action to recover a sum of money due on a lawful contract. It is, in my view, begging the question to say that it is an action to recover a sum won on a wager because the sum of money due on the contract may be the same in amount as the sum won on the wager. Suppose the sum is different or suppose instead of a sum of money the contract is to hand over a motor car or some other " valuable thing," a racehorse for instance, in consideration of not being reported and having all the bettor's horses rendered valueless. Is the court to consider the amount of the consideration, and if it comes to the conclusion that the motor car or other valuable thing is of equal value with the amount of the bet refuse to enforce the contract ? In my opinion, the appellant's argument cannot be sustained unless it is held that no enforceable contract can be made by a defaulter which involves any part of the amount lost on the bet. The argument appears to be based on the Chancery doctrine of following trust moneys, notwithstanding that there is no reference to the doctrine, no fiduciary relationship between the parties and no legal taint in the money. If one turns to the words of the section, there appears to me to be no such provision. The part of the section in question is speaking in legal terminology—" suit," " recovering," " alleged." Such words, in my view, refer to the cause of action, and prohibit a suit the cause of which is the breach of an agreement by way of wager. In such an action it would be necessary for the plaintiff to allege the wager as the cause of action. In the present action it is not. The present action is to recover a sum of money due on an entirely different contract which apart from the suggested meaning of the section has all the characteristics of a legal contract. It is said that on this view this part of the section is tautologous, and that every word in a statute should be given a meaning. By many eminent judges this part of the section has been considered tautologous and such an objection is, in my view, nothing when compared with an interpretation which places a defaulter in the position to which I have alluded. Moreover, the appellant's construction gives no intelligible meaning to the word "alleged." It was suggested in the course of the argument that the word "alleged" was satisfied by the fact that the writ in the present case referred to the facts of the case, and included a reference to the account between the backer and the layer, but the question, is what does the word "alleged" mean in the section, and it appears to me that the allegations of the particular pleader in the present action have no bearing on that meaning. In my opinion, the word "alleged" means alleged by the plaintiff and necessarily alleged as material to the action of which the section is speaking. In the present case it was only material to allege the appellant's promise to pay in consideration of not being reported. It was quite irrelevant to allege that the sum promised to be paid had been promised to be paid on a previous occasion in a wager.

The law as I have stated it has stood since the year 1870, and the legislature has never seen fit to alter it. With the greatest respect to those of your Lordships who take a different view, I am of opinion that that is a very good reason for giving the same interpretation to words, which are at any rate so far ambiguous that they receive that interpretation from the MASTER OF THE ROLLS in 1870 and from the PRESIDENT of the Probate Division and FARWELL, L.J., in 1908. Since writing this opinion I have had the advantage of reading the opinions of the LORD CHANCELLOR and of LORD RADCLIFFE in print and I agree with their reasons.

LORD MACDERMOTT: My Lords, the main question raised in this appeal—and on the view I take it is unnecessary to go beyond it—is whether the action brought by the respondents against the appellant is struck at by s. 18 of the Gaming Act, 1845. Omitting the proviso which is not, in my opinion, of assistance in the determination of this question, the section may be regarded conveniently, though perhaps not very grammatically, as consisting of three parts or branches. Set out so as to mark this division it reads thus:

> "All contracts or agreements, whether by parole or in writing, by way of gaming or wagering, shall be null and void:
> and no suit shall be brought or maintained in any court of law and equity for recovering any sum of money or valuable thing alleged to be won upon any wager, > or which shall have been deposited in the hands of any person to abide the event on which any wager shall have been made:
> Provided . . ."

My Lords, it is plain that the present suit was not brought on any of the numerous wagers which were made between the parties and as the result of which the appellant had lost to the respondents by the month of April, 1946, the sum of £3,835 12*s*. 6*d*. The suit was brought instead on an agreement made in August, 1946, after the appellant had defaulted in this sum. By it the appellant undertook to give the respondents his cheque for £635 12*s*. 6*d*., post-dated to Oct. 10, 1946, and to pay the balance of their account by monthly instalments of £100 commencing in November of the same year. The respondents, on their part, agreed to payment as thus promised and in consideration therefor, as the learned trial judge has found, undertook to refrain from following up the procedure with Tattersalls which had then been commenced and which, if continued, would inevitably have led to the appellant being posted as a defaulter and warned off Newmarket Heath. It is also clear that the relevant wagers between the parties, though void under the first branch of the section, were not illegal. The August agreement stands on a somewhat different footing. The antecedent transactions were not such as to taint it with illegality, and it was not illegal in itself, but it lay outside the first branch of the section and A has not been avoided thereby. So much, indeed, was conceded on behalf of the appellant, but he contended, and it is the substance of his case, that the August agreement was for payment of the lost wagers and, accordingly, that the respondents' suit, based as it was on this agreement, was brought to recover money won on wagers and was, therefore, within the prohibition enacted by the second branch of s. 18. To this two answers were made. First of all it was B said that the suit was not brought to recover what had been won, and, secondly, that the second branch of the section only related to proceedings on foot of contracts or agreements declared to be void by the first branch and so had no applicability to the present case.

My Lords, the first of these answers ignores what is, to my mind, the plain import of almost every relevant document in the case. There is nothing C colourable or equivocal about the material provisions of the August agreement. The letters constituting it leave no room for doubt that the intention of the parties was that the betting debt should be discharged by means of the spaced payments therein detailed. This correspondence has already been examined and I need not go through it again. It can be sufficiently summarised by saying that on Aug. 17, 1946, the respondents D made it clear that they were prepared to take payment of their account for £3,835 12*s.* 6*d.* by a post-dated cheque for £635 12*s.* 6*d.*, with monthly instalments thereafter to clear the balance of £3,200, and that the appellant made it equally clear by his letter of Aug. 20, that he would make these payments in discharge of the respondents' account. His purpose is but emphasised in the assurance concluding this letter that " as soon as my E financial position improves I shall do all I possibly can to settle this account as soon as possible." The nature of the respondents' suit is equally unambiguous. The endorsement on the writ speaks for itself. It says:

> " The plaintiffs' claim is for the sum of £700 0*s.* 0*d.* instalments in arrear and payable by the defendant to the plaintiffs under an agreement between the plaintiffs and the defendant on Aug. 20, 1946."

F This is followed by particulars setting out the instalments, as agreed in the correspondence, in so far as they had accrued and remained unpaid up to the commencement of the proceedings. Now if one were to pause here and, looking only to the evidence, ask what the respondents sought to recover by this suit, I think the facts would admit of but one answer, namely, certain instalments of the amount of their betting account with the appellant. That, in the G absence of any other consideration, would settle this particular aspect of the case in the appellant's favour. It was, however, contended that the law justified a different conclusion, and I must refer briefly to two of the authorities cited in support of this proposition. In Bubb v. Yelverton (6) the claim in dispute was on a bond for £10,000 given to secure the second instalment of a sum payable by the Marquis of Hastings under an agreement made by him H with his betting creditors whereby the creditors agreed to accept the payments offered " in satisfaction of their claims " and, as I read the report, to abandon proceedings before the Jockey Club which would have led to the marquis being posted as a defaulter. Against the claim it was submitted, inter alia, that the proceeding was one to recover a debt due on a wager and so fell within the prohibition in s. 18. LORD ROMILLY, M.R., held in favour of the claimants and in the course of his judgment—I refer only to what is material to the point under discussion—he said, speaking of the bond (L.R. 9 Eq. 474):

> "It is impossible to read the evidence without seeing that it was given, not to pay racing debts, but to avoid the consequences of not having paid them."

This dictum was cited and applied by Buckley, J., in Re Browne. Ex parte Martingell (8). There the betting creditor, having sued unsuccessfully to recover £800, due in respect of bets which he had made and paid for and on behalf of the debtor, wrote complaining of the latter's conduct to the club A of which they were both members. Subsequently they reached an agreement whereby, in consideration of the creditor withdrawing his letter of complaint, the debtor paid £100 in cash and accepted four bills for £100 each in the creditor's favour. The debtor having become bankrupt, the creditor sought to prove in respect of the bills and, despite the contention that they were really given in satisfaction of the old debt of £800, and the concluding words B of s. 1 of the Gaming Act, 1892—the enactment on which the original action had foundered—which say, that "no action shall be brought or maintained to recover any such sum of money," the proof was allowed. Buckley, J., observed ([1904] 2 K.B. 135):

> "The bills were given for an altogether new consideration, which was not an illegal consideration. They were given, not to pay the gaming C debt, but, as Romilly, M.R., said in Bubb v. Yelverton (6), to avoid the consequences of not having paid it."

I turn now to the decision of the Court of Appeal in Hyams v. Stuart King (1), on this particular point. I need not recite its facts. In so far as material they are not to be distinguished from those of the present case and there can be D no doubt that, if the Court of Appeal was right, the appeal before your Lordships must fail. The majority judgments accept, I think without reservation, the distinction drawn by Lord Romilly in Bubb v. Yelverton (6). Farwell, L.J., indeed, seems to develop it somewhat for he says ([1908] 2 K.B. 728):

> ". . . the contract not to post . . . is sufficient to support a promise to pay money, which, though equal to the amount of the bet, is not in E fact the bet, but is compensation for its non-payment, and the action cannot be said to be brought for recovering any sum alleged to have been won on any wager within [the Gaming Act, 1845]."

My Lords, when default is made in payment of a debt of honour the defaulter may well find himself willing to confer, it may be by gift or contract, some advantage on the winner which he would not otherwise have thought of con- F ferring. In contracts made in such circumstances it does not, in my opinion, necessarily follow that the consideration moving from the loser will always be a "sum of money or valuable thing alleged to be won upon any wager" within the meaning of s. 18. In cases of doubt I think the court must look to the reality of the transaction and come to a finding as to what the true intention was. Where the promise is to pay money it will generally, I think, G be relevant to enquire whether the debt of honour is to be regarded as discharged by the payment, but the circumstances to be considered must, of course, depend on the facts of each instance. There is, however, neither need nor place for such an investigation where, as here, the terms of the agreement afford a plain answer, unless it can be said that the observations of Lord Romilly, which I have quoted above, mark a reliable criterion capable H of general application. In my opinion, they do not do so. They sound in motive, and the subtle distinction which they draw seems to me at variance with the well established principle that a man cannot modify the contractual intention to be deduced from his words or conduct by exposing what he had in the back of his mind. For this reason I doubt very much if Bubb v. Yelverton (6) and Re Browne. Ex parte Martingell (8) can be regarded as correctly decided even on their particular facts. But, however that may be, it follows, if I am right in the view expressed, that Hyams v. Stuart King (1) cannot be supported on the strength of these authorities, and without their aid it cannot be said that the new agreement on which the plaintiff in that case succeeded was such as, in itself, to justify the conclusion that the loser's promise was to pay, not the balance of the bet, but something different. In this connection I need only refer to two passages in the majority judgments which go to show how little room there was in the agreement as there established for the refinement introduced by Bubb v. Yelverton (6). SIR GORELL BARNES, P., describes ([1908] 2 K.B. 704) the consideration for the plaintiff's promise to give time and forbear to declare the defendants' defaulters as the undertaking of the defendants that:

> " . . . they [the defendants] would pay him [the plaintiff] on or before the expiration of that time the amount which both parties considered was due to the plaintiff in honour, though not by law."

FARWELL, L.J. (ibid., 725) speaks to the same effect in summarising the position thus:

> " A bet made by the plaintiff with the defendant's firm, and lost by the latter ; a cheque for £108 10*s*. 0*d*. sent in payment on Nov. 4, a request on Nov. 5 from the defendant's partner to the plaintiff, acted on by the plaintiff, to hold the cheque over and to refrain from publishing their default to other bookmakers, and a promise in consideration thereof to pay the £108 10*s*. 0*d*. by instalments as soon as the firm got the money."

For these reasons I am of opinion that the respondents' first submission fails and that what they sought to recover in this suit was in truth and in fact a part of their betting debt.

Now as to the respondents' second submission. Does the second branch of s. 18 apply to the enforcement of the August agreement as I have found it to be, or is it limited to suits brought on the wagering contract itself? In Hyams v. Stuart King (1) the point is barely touched on in the majority judgments, which I think must be taken as founded, in the main, on the absence of illegality and the Bubb v. Yelverton (6) line of authority. The dissenting judgment of FLETCHER MOULTON, L.J., takes the view urged on behalf of the appellant and deals with the matter at some length and more fully than it is dealt with in the earlier cases. These, however, contain dicta which clearly favour the respondents' contention that the second branch of the section is but a procedural echo of the first, reliance being placed in particular on the observations of MAULE, J., in Varney v. Hickman (3), and of LORD CAIRNS, L.C., and BRAMWELL, L.J., in Diggle v. Higgs (4). The question is entirely one of construction, and the following excerpts from two of the judgments just referred to will suffice to indicate the nature of the conflict of judicial opinion which must now be settled. In Diggle v. Higgs (4) LORD CAIRNS says (2 Ex. D. 427):

> " The section amounts to this : all contracts by way of gaming and wagering are null and void ; and then, dealing with those contracts, it says that no action shall be brought with respect to them : that is to say, all gaming contracts are void, and the winner of the game or wager shall not maintain a suit against his antagonist or the stakeholder. This construction makes one member of the section in unison with the other."

In Hyams v. Stuart King (1) FLETCHER MOULTON, L.J., puts it thus ([1908] 2 K.B. 713) in contrasting what I have called the first and second branches:

> " The language of the later provision is in my opinion much wider. It provides with complete generality that no action shall be brought to recover anything alleged to be won upon any wager, without in any way limiting the application of the provision to the wagering contract itself."

My Lords, the other sections of the Act of 1845 do not seem to me to give any assistance on the true meaning of s. 18. Nor have I been able to find much help in the legislative history of gaming and wagering. The enactments repealed by s. 15 of the Act of 1845 certainly formed a strict code and evince no obvious desire to let their prohibitions be evaded with the ease with which the first and second branches of s. 18 might be circumvented were the respondents' contentions to prevail. But, as Lord Watson said in Bradlaugh v. Clarke (11) (8 App. Cas. 380), it is "an extremely hazardous proceeding to refer to provisions which have been absolutely repealed, in order to ascertain what the legislature meant to enact in their room and stead," and I do not think any real weight can be attached to considerations of that kind. It is, however, legitimate and relevant to observe, for what it is worth, that in 1845 the legislature must be taken as aware of the practice of making agreements to pay wagering losses, for s. 3 of the statute 16 Chas. 2, c. 7, which is repealed by s. 15 of the Act of 1845, struck expressly at that very thing. The question for decision, therefore, hinges on the language of s. 18, and in particular on that of its second branch. So regarding it, I am unable to agree that either the second branch, or the third, is merely expository of the first. It may well be that the third only relates to the winner who seeks his winnings from the stakeholder. The point does not arise here and need not be further considered, but even if that be the case, I find it hard to see why the third branch should be regarded as but a legal consequence of the first. In the ordinary course the stakeholder is not sued on the wagering contract for he is not usually a party to it. He is sued for money had and received, and the avoidance of the wagering contract without more does not give him a good answer to a claim by the winner. This, to my mind, disposes of much of the reasoning underlying the dicta in Varney v. Hickman (3) and Diggle v. Higgs (4) relied on by the respondents. It does not, of course, conclude the matter so far as the second branch is concerned, but it may, I think fairly, be said to weaken the case for treating that branch as adding nothing to the substance of the enactment.

My Lords, had the words "alleged to be" been omitted from the second branch I confess I should have found difficulty in discerning a foothold for the respondents' contention. If the intention was merely to reflect the procedural consequences of making all wagering contracts void, I cannot but think that the natural way of effecting it would have been to add after the first branch some such sentence as—"and the same shall not be enforceable in any court of law or equity." The words used—I leave the "alleged to be" out of account for the moment—do not appear to me to be apt for this purpose as, in strictness, the expression "no suit shall be brought or maintained" confronts the would-be suitor with a higher obstacle than that which has to be met by one whose claim is defective only in that it is based on a transaction of no legal effect. On the other hand, the wording of the second branch—I again assume the omission referred to—does seem apt and effectual if the intention of the legislature was that this limb of the section should not only cover the transactions previously made void, but should reach beyond them so as to preclude resort to an obvious way round the earlier provision. What then is the effect of the words "alleged to be"? If, as the respondents contended, they mean "alleged by the plaintiff, as a necessary part of his case, to be" I think it must be admitted that they would lend force to what the respondents say as to the true construction of the section. In my opinion, however, this contention should be rejected. Whatever the true scope of the second branch may be, it must at least relate to suits brought on original wagering contracts declared void by the first branch, and I think it is quite impossible to accept the view that the legislature, having thus armed the loser with an effective defence by that branch, should proceed to make the second operate only if the winner himself chose to reveal the unenforceability of his claim. Were that the position, the second would not even declare the consequences of the first, or, so far as I can see, fit in with any understandable design. For this reason, if for no other, I think the word "alleged" must embrace allegations by a defendant as well as by a plaintiff; and, as the second branch, on this view, can hardly have been intended to depend on a A bare plea, I also think it must follow that "alleged" is used as meaning "properly alleged" or "alleged and proved or admitted." If such be the significance of the words "alleged to be" I see nothing in them to detract from the meaning I would, as already indicated, attribute to the second branch were they omitted.

For these reasons I share the view expressed by FLETCHER MOULTON, L.J., B in Hyams v. Stuart King (1) on the interpretation of the second branch of s. 18 and am, accordingly, of opinion that the respondents' second submission also fails. In the result, if I am right in the conclusions stated, the decision in Hyams v. Stuart King (1) cannot be supported and ought to be overruled. I think, therefore, that the appeal should be allowed and the respondents' claim dismissed.

C LORD RADCLIFFE: My Lords, I think that this appeal ought not to succeed. It succeeds if s. 18 of the Gaming Act, 1845, renders the respondents' action unmaintainable: it fails if that section, properly understood, has no application to the promise which the respondents' action seeks to enforce. The first thing to do is to see what the section provides. It falls, as I read it, into three parts. The first contains a declaration of substantive law to the D effect that contracts by way of gaming or wagering are to be null and void. The second relates to procedural or adjectival law and enacts that:

> ". . . no suit shall be brought or maintained in any court of law and equity for recovering any sum of money or valuable thing alleged to be won upon any wager, or which shall have been deposited in the hands of E any person to abide the event on which any wager shall have been made . . ."

The third part provides that "this enactment" is not to be deemed to apply to certain subscriptions or contributions or agreements therefor, the precise definition of which is not relevant. It is, indeed, possible that the second part of this section ought to be construed so as to render unenforceable at law a F contract to pay a sum of money which is not itself a wagering contract, but I confess that I should myself expect to find some compulsive indication that the legislature did so intend before I adopted this construction. Certainly I should approach a section so framed with the expectation that the second part did not go beyond the first and that it did not make a further contribution to the substantive law of contract by invalidating not merely contracts of G gaming or wagering, but other sorts of contract as well.

I have not been able to find in the section any such compulsive indication as would lead me to abandon this expectation. Indeed such indications as there are, slight in themselves, tend to support my original view as to the range of the section. The second, or procedural, part is introduced by the word "and"; the words "alleged to be won" are used to describe the sum H of money of which recovery by legal action is forbidden; the proviso refers to what has gone before as "this enactment." It may be true that, if the view that I have suggested is right, the first part of the section would have sufficed to procure the failure of actions to enforce gaming or wagering contracts, and that the second part would accordingly be tautologous in the sense that it was unnecessary. I hesitate to accept even the basis of the argument. The second part, being lex fori, might well apply to relieve our courts of the duty of adjudicating on foreign wagering contracts which by the ordinary rules of private international law would escape invalidation by the first part. But, if the second part is tautologous, be it so. Such instances of legislative abundance are not unknown. In fact, s. 1 of the Gaming Act, 1892, which ends with the words " and no action shall be brought or maintained to recover any such sum of money " contains what must be on any view just such a tautology. In this s. 18 the procedural consequence is not expressed so simply, but that is because the makers of the section were trying by one composite phrase to disable both the winner's action to enforce his contract against the loser and the winner's action to get the stakes out of the stakeholder's hands. By their language they have raised doubts as to the legislative intention, although these doubts, I think, belong more to the twentieth century than to that century in which the Act was passed. This is not the first occasion on which the range and effect of the second part of the section have been discussed, and the nineteenth century judges were, I think, unanimous in holding that it added nothing of substance to the first. I do not feel much weight in this argument for extending the operation of the second part of s. 18 of the Act of 1845 because it would otherwise be tautologous. That it did weigh with Fletcher Moulton, L.J., in his dissenting judgment in Hyams v. Stuart King (1) is plain (see [1908] 2 K.B. 713). I prefer the construction of the section which was adopted by Rolfe, Alderson and Parke, BB., in Moon v. Durden (2), by Maule, J., in Varney v. Hickman (3), and by Lord Cairns, L.C., and Bramwell, L.J., in Diggle v. Higgs (4). The words of Lord Cairns (2 Ex. D. 427) appear to me accurately to state the effect of the section:

> " The section amounts to this : all contracts by way of gaming and wagering are null and void ; and then, dealing with those contracts, it says that no action shall be brought with respect to them : that is to say, all gaming contracts are void, and the winner of the game or wager shall not maintain a suit against his antagonist or the stakeholder."

We were rightly reminded by counsel for the appellant that each of these observations was made in a case which dealt directly with wagering contracts and in which, therefore, the first part of the section itself avoided the contract. But the observations are general observations on the construction of the section, and, apart from that, the decisions themselves are significant in showing that a merely literal reading of the section has been rejected by the courts when the respective rights of depositor and stakeholder have been in issue.

It remains to apply s. 18 to the facts of this appeal. They are not in dispute. In any common parlance the appellant is being sued for payment of his betting debts, and in this, as in other cases on similar facts, I should expect to find the parties describing the promise which here is contained in the appellant's letter of Aug. 15 and 20, 1946, as a promise to pay the bets, but I do not think that common parlance must necessarily determine the parties' legal rights, since I think that the procedural part of s. 18 was directed to causes of action, not to common parlance. A bet is a transaction, not a piece of property. Money won on a betting transaction has no existence until paid. Nothing exists except the loser's promise to pay what he has lost, a promise which the statute has made unenforceable at law. Such was the appellant's promise to pay the respondents £3,835 12*s*. 6*d*. as the promise stood in July, 1946. When the committee of Tattersalls had dealt with the parties on July 22, 1946, the appellant had an obligation to pay £635 12*s*. 6*d*. within fourteen days and £3,000 by monthly instalments of £100. (I omit reference to the £200 lost on bets on dog racing, which the committee did not deal with). The committee's order was, of course, no more enforceable at law than the betting promise, but its obligations were evidently regarded by the parties as superseding that promise. The appellant's honour as a racing or betting man would have been intact had his payments observed no more than the dates which the committee required of him. No doubt, they were ordering the appellant to pay his bet or his betting debt, but, if we are to speak of unenforceable obligations as obligations at all, I think that an obligation to pay £3,635 presently is, and is regarded in business as being, substantially a different thing from an obligation to pay £635 within fourteen days and the balance of £3,000, without interest, by equal monthly instalments over the next two and a half years.

A In the racing world there are sanctions other than those which a law court can impose. The bargain that was made in August was, it is conceded, not a wagering contract. Nor do the facts of the appeal, as I understand them, allow us to say that the consideration then given by the respondents was "colourable," fictitious, or a device. That solution of the problem, which FLETCHER MOULTON, L.J., favoured, is not open to us. The contract, then, B was not anything other than a contract valid by English law, except so far as s. 18 has the effect of preventing an action being brought or maintained to recover the promised payment. The bargain consisted in the appellant undertaking to make such payments as were prescribed by the Tattersalls' order, subject to deferment of the initial payment, on the respondents' undertaking not to "enforce" the order according to its original terms. By refraining C from taking this action, which was within their power, they afforded the appellant what was good consideration for his promise. It was certainly what he wanted at the time. Its value is not measurable, nor is it relevant. Indeed, the appellant's argument, if I understand it, would be the same if the respondents instead of refraining from reporting him had taken some positive steps at his request such as finding a large sum of money to pay off a pressing creditor. D According to our law of contract, what had happened when these premises were exchanged in August? I think that we ought to say that a new contract had been made, not that a wagering contract, hitherto void, had received the support of a new consideration.

When the respondents sue to enforce this promise which the appellant made in August, 1946, they are not, as I see it, bringing or maintaining an action E to recover a sum of money alleged to be won on a wager within the meaning of s. 18. That is why I think that the appeal ought to fail. It is part of the history of the matter that £3,835 12*s.* 6*d.* was owing on betting transactions, but what the respondents seek to recover in this action is part of the sum of money promised to them for good consideration in August, 1946, and not the sum of money which they won from the appellant on their previous wagers F with him. Only if the promised sums have continuing identity—whatever that may mean—could one be the same as the other. The respondents cause of action is a new contract, in enforcing which it may be a natural, but is not a relevant, averment that the moneys promised represented previous betting debts, and if it is not essential to the recovery to allege that the sum was won on what was a wagering contract, I cannot think that it is in truth a sum of G money "alleged" to be so won within the meaning of the section.

Appeal allowed.

On Nov. 7, 1948, the contractual tenant of a dwelling-house to which the Rent Restrictions Acts applied died intestate, and on Nov. 18 the landlords served a notice to quit on the President of the Probate, Divorce and Admiralty Division of the High Court, in whom the tenancy was vested under the Administration of Estates Act, 1925, s. 9. A week later they started an action for possession against the sons of the deceased tenant who had continued to live in the house after the tenant's death. On Jan. 15, 1949, one of the sons obtained a grant of letters of administration, and he contended that by the doctrine of relation back the estate of the deceased tenant, including her contractual tenancy, was vested in him as from the date of her death, and, therefore, as he was a person deriving title under the original tenant, within the meaning of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, s. 12 (1) (f), he was entitled to the protection of the Rent Restrictions Acts.

HELD: the doctrine of relation back could be applied only to protect the estate from wrongful injury occurring in the interval between the death of an intestate and the grant of letters of administration and could not be applied so as to invalidate interests lawfully acquired in the interval or so as to give the administrator a title to something which had been extinguished in the interval without fault on the part of anyone; the contract of tenancy, which was vested in the President of the Probate, Divorce and Admiralty Division on the death of the tenant intestate, was validly terminated by the notice to quit served on the President on Nov. 18, 1948 (Smith v. Mather ([1948] 1 All E.R. 704), applied); and the doctrine of relation back could not be applied so as to include in the subsequent grant of letters of administration the tenancy which had been extinguished; and, therefore, the administrator was not a person deriving title under the original tenant within the meaning of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, s. 12 (1) (f), and he was not entitled to the protection of the Rent Restrictions Acts.

APPEAL by the landlords from an order of His Honour JUDGE CAREY EVANS, at Great Yarmouth County Court, dated Feb. 11, 1949.

After the death intestate of the contractual tenant of a dwelling-house which was within the scope of the Rent Restrictions Acts, the landlords served a notice to quit on the President of the Probate, Divorce and Admiralty Division of the High Court, in whom the tenancy was vested under the Administration of Estates Act, 1925, s. 9, and a week later they started an action for possession against the deceased tenant's sons who had continued to live in the house after the tenant's death. At the request of the defendants' solicitors, the county court judge adjourned the hearing of the case to enable one of the sons to take out a grant of letters of administration, and at the adjourned hearing, after the grant had been obtained, the learned judge held that by reason of the doctrine of relation back the deceased tenant's contractual tenancy from the date of her death was vested in the administrator, and, therefore, the administrator was the contractual tenant at the moment of the determination of the tenancy and, as such, was entitled to hold over as statutory tenant. The Court of Appeal now reversed his decision and held that the landlords were entitled to an order for possession. The facts appear in the judgment of BUCKNILL, L.J.

Stephen Chapman and Norman King for the landlords (the plaintiffs).

The defendants were not represented.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 25. The following judgments were read.

BUCKNILL, L.J. : This appeal raises an interesting question on the construction and application of the Administration of Estates Act, 1925, s. 9, which enacts:

> "Where a person dies intestate, his real and personal estate, until administration is granted in respect thereof, shall vest in the probate judge in the same manner and to the same extent as formerly in the case of personal estate it vested in the ordinary."

The section is included in pt. II of the Act, which is headed "Executors and Administrators." The Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, s. 162 (1), which replaced the Administration of Estates Act, 1925, s. 10 (which was repealed by the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, s. 226 (1) and sched. VI), enacts that in granting letters of administration the court shall have regard to the rights of all persons interested in the estate of the deceased person. The Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, s. 163 (1), which re-enacts the Administration of Estates Act, 1925, s. 16 (1) (also repealed by the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, s. 226 (1) and sched. VI), deals with the power of the court to grant administration of the estate of the deceased while legal proceedings are pending touching the validity of the will of a deceased, or for obtaining, recalling, or revoking any administration. By the Administration of Estates Act, 1925, s. 55 (xv):

> "'Probate judge' means the President of the Probate, Divorce and Admiralty Division of the High Court."

Schedule II to the Act repeals a large number of statutes, starting with the statute 13 Edw. I [Statute of Westminster the Second], c. 19 and c. 23. Section 9 of the Administration of Estates Act, 1925, was, in effect, a re-enactment of s. 19 of the Court of Probate Act, 1858 (which was repealed by s. 56 and sched. II of the Administration of Estates Act, 1925), except that s. 19 applied only to personal estate and effects. The learned editors of MORTIMER ON PROBATE LAW AND PRACTICE (2nd ed., 1927), p. 280, state that the jurisdiction which the ecclesiastical courts exercised over the effects of persons dying without a will rested on a very ancient foundation. In the early periods of legal history the ordinary had by common law the absolute disposal of the personal property of all intestates, but these powers were gradually abridged by Acts of Parliament. BLACKSTONE in his COMMENTARIES ON THE LAWS OF ENGLAND, book II, p. 496, states that the administrators " are only the officers of the ordinary, appointed by him in pursuance of " the statute 31 Edw. III, c. 11 [Administration on Intestacy, 1357], and that their title and authority were derived exclusively from the ecclesiastical judge by grants which are usually denominated letters of administration. Eventually, by the Court of Probate Act, 1857, s. 3, the jurisdiction of the ecclesiastical and all other courts to grant letters of administration was abolished and, by s. 4, the jurisdiction was transferred to the newly constituted Court of Probate.

The facts of this case are not in dispute. From about 1943 Mrs. Burgess lived at 121 Lichfield Road, Yarmouth, with her two sons under a contractual tenancy at a rental of 9*s*. 3*d*. a week including rates. On Nov. 7, 1948, Mrs. Burgess died intestate, and on Nov. 18 her landlords served a notice to quit on the President of the Probate, Divorce and Admiralty Division. Counsel for the defendants, Alfred and Clifford Burgess, the two sons of Mrs. Burgess, admitted that this was a valid determination on Nov. 27 of the contractual tenancy. A week later the landlords started this action for possession against the two sons, who continued to live in the home after their mother's death. The defendants by their defence claimed the protection of the Rent Restrictions Acts. On Jan. 6, 1949, the case came on for hearing before His Honour JUDGE CAREY EVANS. The solicitor for the defendants admitted that no grant of letters of administration had been applied for. After the defendant Alfred Burgess had given evidence, the case for the defendants had been closed, and Smith v. Mather (1) had been referred to, the solicitor for the defendants said that he desired an adjournment to enable the defendants, or one of them, to take out letters of administration. The learned judge's note is that:

> " . . . [the] adjournment was not opposed by solicitor for the plaintiff, though he will contend that the defendants have no defence even if letters of administration are granted."

The case was then adjourned to Feb. 10, when the defendants were represented by counsel. Letters of administration, dated Jan. 15, 1949, in favour of the defendant Clifford Burgess were produced, and the point was taken on behalf of the defendants that the doctrine of relation back applied, that the defendant Clifford Burgess was now in a position to show that he was a statutory tenant, and that no order for possession could be made. On the following day the learned judge gave a careful and reasoned judgment, and in the course of it he said that, as Mrs. Burgess was a contractual tenant at her death, neither defendant could claim a statutory tenancy under the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, s. 12 (1) (g), in accordance with the decision in Thynne v. Salmon (2). He pointed out that, if the contractual tenancy had been current at the date of the grant of administration, the administrator would be entitled to the benefit of the Acts because he came under s. 12 (1) (f) of the Act of 1920, which enacts that the expression " tenant " includes " any person from time to time deriving title under the original . . . tenant," and he was also residing in the house at all material times. He then dealt with the argument that when the letters of administration were granted on Jan. 15, 1949, no weekly tenancy existed which could vest in the administrator because it had been terminated by the notice to quit to the President of the Probate, Divorce and Admiralty Division, and no statutory tenancy had then vested in the President because he was not in possession of the premises.

To meet this argument, the learned judge applied the doctrine of "relation back," as expounded by LUXMOORE, L.J., in Ingall v. Moran (3), where the Lord Justice said ([1944] 1 All E.R. 101):

> "It is true that when a grant of administration is made the intestate's estate including all choses in action vests in the person to whom the grant is made, and the title thereto then relates back to the date of the intestate's death . . ."

The learned judge applied the doctrine, as embodied in that statement, to the present case and said that by that doctrine the deceased's estate (including her contractual tenancy from the time of her death) was vested in the administrator, and he held that, by reason of the doctrine of relation back, the administrator was the contractual tenant at the moment of the determination of the tenancy, and, as such, was entitled to hold over as statutory tenant. The judge said that his decision did not conflict with the decision in Smith v. Mather (1) because in that case there never was a grant of administration, and that the "fatal conflict" envisaged in Thynne v. Salmon (2) did not arise in this case because the President of the Probate, Divorce and Admiralty Division was the only person in whom the tenancy vested until the grant of administration, and as from the date of the grant by virtue of the doctrine of relation back the administrator alone is deemed in law to have been the person in whom the tenancy vested. In conclusion the learned judge said:

> "It is very important to interpret Smith v. Mather (1) in the light of the facts before the Court of Appeal, and to remember that they were not considering at all the effects of the doctrine of relation back."

The difficult problem before us, as I see it, raises the following questions. (a) Did the notice to quit terminate the tenancy on Nov. 27, 1948 ? If so, (b) Does the grant of administration on Jan. 15, 1949, coupled with the doctrine of relation back, bring to life the tenancy which had terminated on Nov. 27. (c) Does the doctrine of relation back put the administrator in the same position as the President when notice to quit was served on him, and, if so, what effect would the notice to quit on the administrator have in terminating the tenancy agreement ? There seems to be very little authority on the subject. In my opinion, the cases which deal with the doctrine of relation back do not have any such similarity to the facts of this case as to enable one to say that the principle contained in them should apply to this case. I think that on principle and historically the vesting of the estate in the President of the Probate, Divorce and Admiralty Division is a positive act with some legal substance. Normally the court, formerly composed of the probate judge, appoints a person or persons to deal with the property of the intestate through a grant of administration, but I see no reason why in a case of necessity the President should not have legal power to give directions about the property. If he cannot do so, no one can. That is why the property is vested in him. If the President's position is such as I have indicated, I think he must have the legal capacity to receive a valid notice to quit, and such notice, after the proper lapse of time, has full legal effect. If no grant of administration has been made, there is no person other than the President to whom the notice to quit can validly be given. At any date subsequent to the death of the intestate a grant of administration may be made. There is no time limit in this matter. If a grant made years after the death is to make invalid the notice to quit validly given to the President, confusion and uncertainty will prevail and injustice may be done to those who have acted on the assumption that the notice to quit given to the President had full legal effect.

In Smith v. Mather (1) the facts were similar to this case. The mother was the contractual tenant, and her son and daughter were living with her at the time of her death. The mother died intestate in October, 1946, and in December, 1946, the landlords served notice to quit on the President. No letters of administration were taken out at any time. The county court judge dismissed the landlords' action for possession, but on appeal the Court of Appeal held that the notice to the President was valid and that it was the proper procedure for giving effect to the landlords' right to determine the tenancy. The appeal was, therefore, allowed. It is quite true that the son or daughter did not think A of applying for letters of administration during the hearing of the case before the county court judge, but, surely, if they had done so and had succeeded in obtaining a grant, the grant must be taken of such property only as the intestate had at the time of the grant, and cannot be taken to include a right of property which had validly been extinguished or transferred. In argument in Mather's case (1) counsel for the defendants submitted that the rule laid B down in Thynne v. Salmon (2) did not apply because in that case a grant of administration had been made whereas in Mather's case (1) the fatal conflict as to liability for rent between two different persons did not arise inasmuch as the President would not become liable to pay rent when the contractual tenancy became vested in him under the Administration of Estates Act, 1925, s. 9. This argument in Smith v. Mather (1) was rejected by the Court of Appeal. C In his judgment Somervell, L.J., said ([1948] 1 All E.R. 705):

> " In circumstances such as the present . . . there must be a power in the landlord to bring the tenancy to an end by whatever notice is provided for in the agreement, and the proper procedure for doing that in the case of an intestacy is the procedure adopted in this case, namely, serving a notice to quit on the President of the Probate, Divorce and Admiralty D Division."

If, then, the notice terminates the contract, it seems to me that it would be unjust to hold that a subsequent grant of letters of administration brought the dead contract to life. The circumstances in which the grant was made in this case vividly illustrate the sort of injustice which the extension of the E doctrine to this kind of case might do. I think that the appeal should be allowed.

ASQUITH, L.J. : I agree. My Lord has recited the facts and I will not repeat them. The main grounds on which counsel for the landlords invited us to reverse the decision of the county court judge were the following. (i) The principle of " relation back," it was argued, has no application where F the asset, the administrator's title to which is sought to be antedated by its operation, has ceased to exist by the time when letters of administration are granted. For the title to relate back, it must be a title to something in esse at the date of the grant. A lease extinguished in the interval between the death and the grant (which I will call, for short, " the interval ") is, in this respect, in just the same position as a chattel lost or destroyed in the interval. G The title cannot effectively relate back, for it is a title to nothing. The doctrine of relation back cannot breathe new life into a corpse. (ii) The principle of relation back, it was further contended, only applies (to quote the language used in Williams on Executors and Administrators, 12th ed., vol. 1, pp. 409-411) " for particular purposes," and these, when analysed, turn out all to be connected with the protection or preservation of the estate H from wrongful injury in the interval. If in the interval the estate has been damnified by tortious acts on the part of anyone, or, in the case of leaseholds, by breaches of covenant, then the administrator, though appointed after the acts complained of, can sue in respect of them. The principle of relation back, however, does not apply outside the limits of the purpose which called it into being. Here it is not necessary to the protection of the estate to invoke it—ergo it cannot be invoked. (iii) Even where the principle is otherwise applicable, it cannot be so applied as to disturb interests lawfully acquired during the interval: Waring v. Dewberry (4). In the interval, in the present case, the landlords by a valid notice served on the President of the Probate, Divorce and Admiralty Division lawfully re-absorbed into their reversion the outstanding leasehold interest which had been vested in the deceased and thereafter in the President. They cannot now be divested of this. (iv) It was further argued that to hold that the title related back in such a case as the present might lead to inconvenient, if not intolerable, consequences. For instance, suppose that, after validly terminating the President's interest in the tenancy, as they did, the landlords re-entered and occupied the premises themselves, or re-let to a third person, and then, perhaps, years later, an administrator is appointed. If his title "relates back," the landlords or their new lessees have been trespassing for years and are liable for mesne profits accordingly, subject possibly to an offset of the rent for which the administrator would have been liable in respect of that period. Or suppose that the landlord, after re-entering, had sold the freehold to X, who had mortgaged it to Y or let it to Z. The application of the doctrine of relation back would create chaos in such a case. (v) Lastly, it is said that, assuming that all the above contentions fail, the trial below was in any event vitiated by the improper action of the county court judge in proposing and ordering an adjournment at a time when the defendants had no defence whatever, so as to allow them to try, by obtaining administration, to acquire one, and that, even if such action was not improper, its sequel, the grant of administration to one of the defendants, could not affect the issues which were raised on the pleadings and which alone the judge had to determine, viz., whether at the time of the plaint or joinder of issue the defendants had any defence.

The argument on the defendants' side followed these lines. (i) The principle of relation back vests any leasehold interest (such as the deceased woman's contractual tenancy) in the administrator as from the date of the death, so as to enable him to sue on the covenants, subject to his liability for the rents and profits, in respect of the interval: see R. v. Horsley (Inhabitants) (5) per LORD ELLENBOROUGH, C.J. (8 East, 410). (ii) Therefore, the administrator must be treated as having notionally acquired the title to this contractual tenancy on Nov. 7, 1948—at the instant when Mrs. Burgess died. (iii) If he had, the contractual tenancy could never have vested in the President, nor could any notice served on the President have had any effect on the rights of the parties. The administrator became contractual tenant, in contemplation of law, on Nov. 7, 1948, and nothing has happened since to bring his interest to an end. Subject to the next point, he has never had notice to quit and is still contractual tenant. (iv) Alternatively, if the notice to quit served on the President has any relevance or efficacy, this can only be because in such circumstances the President was the administrator's agent or representative to receive it, and because notice served on the President equals a notice served on him, the administrator. But if notice had been served on the administrator, the latter would have been converted from a contractual to a statutory tenant, enjoying the protection of the Rent Restrictions Acts, which he has done nothing to forfeit.

In my view, these arguments cannot prevail. The landlords are right, and the appeal should be allowed. It seems to me that there is much force in the contentions advanced for the landlords (a) that the doctrine of relation back must not be applied save to protect the estate from wrongful injury occurring in the interval (of which in this case there was none); (b) that a title cannot relate back if it is a title to something which has perished or been extinguished without fault or wrong on the part of anyone in the interval; (c) that the principle of relation back cannot be applied so as to invalidate interests lawfully acquired in the interval; and (d) that to apply it in circumstances such as those of the present case leaves the landlord, it may be for years, in a position of intolerable doubt as to his right, e.g., whether he can safely re-enter and deal with the property or not. These reasons seems to me to require that the appeal should be allowed, and I need to express no view as to the argument founded on the adjournment of the proceedings in the county court.

Re HOWLETT (deceased). HOWLETT v. HOWLETT.

[Chancery Division (Danckwerts, J.), July 6, 7, 8, 1949.]

Trustee—Occupation of trust property—Liability to account for rents and profits—Acquiescence by beneficiary—Application of Limitation Act, 1939 (c. 21), s. 19 (1) (b).

Limitation of Action—Trustee—Occupation of trust property by trustee—Liability to account for rents and profits—Application of period of limitation—Limitation Act, 1939 (c. 21), s. 19 (1) (b).

On Dec. 12, 1923, Mrs. H. died intestate possessed of a wharf in Kent which devolved according to the custom of gavelkind on her son, then an infant, subject to the life interest of her husband in one half of the rents and profits defeasible on his re-marriage. The husband, who was the administrator of Mrs. H.'s estate, occupied the wharf for his own purposes, and, although he re-married on Jan. 9, 1927, he continued so to occupy it until his death on Oct. 11, 1944. Until July, 1928, the son, who reached the age of 21 years on July 27, 1929, had lived with the husband without paying for his own maintenance, but at no time did he receive anything in respect of the rents and profits of the wharf, being unaware of his rights thereto during the husband's lifetime. The son now claimed against the husband's estate in respect of the rents and profits which ought to have been paid to him during the husband's lifetime, and he also claimed a sum representing the depreciation in value of the wharf owing to the husband's failure to repair.

Held: (i) the husband, having entered into occupation of the wharf, was bailiff for the son, and he could not divest himself of that character, although he was entitled to take credit for the maintenance of the son up to July, 1928.

(ii) as the son, though aware of the facts, was unaware that in consequence thereof he had beneficial rights in possession in the wharf during the husband's lifetime, he was not disentitled to relief by acquiescence.

Cockerell v. Cholmeley (1830) (1 Russ. & M. 418), applied.

(iii) as the husband had remained in possession of trust property for his own purposes, he could not be heard to say that he had not received any rents or profits in respect of it and, therefore, having made no payments of the trust moneys of any kind, the husband must be considered to have retained possession thereof, and the application of a period of limitation under the Limitation Act, 1939, was excluded by s. 19 (1) (b) of that Act.

(iv) although the husband, as trustee, was bound to see that the wharf did not fall into decay for want of repair, the effect of his liability in that regard was that the amount of the notional rents and profits for which his estate was now liable should be reduced by the proportion of the cost of repairs which would properly be payable out of the annual rents.

ACTION for (1) a declaration that William Henry Howlett, the plaintiff's father, was guilty of a breach of trust in retaining a certain wharf for his own use and benefit and in failing to repair the same ; (2) (a) a declaration that the said wharf ought (for the purposes of account) to have an annual value by way of occupation rent of £250 per annum set on it during the said occupation by William Henry Howlett, and (b) that the estate of the said William Henry Howlett (now deceased) should be charged with such value ; (3) an account of the rents and profits of the said wharf received by the said William Henry Howlett, deceased ; and (4) payment of £1,000 in respect of his failure to repair, and also payment of the amount found due to the plaintiff on taking such account, with interest. DANCKWERTS, J., made the declaration referred to as (1) above, and ordered the payment by the defendant (the administratrix of the estate of the said William Henry Howlett, deceased) to the plaintiff of £1,600 representing the occupation rent less an allowance in respect of the cost of repairs. The facts appear in the judgment and are summarised in the headnote.

C. Montgomery White, K.C., and E. Blanshard Stamp for the plaintiff, the son.

Cross, K.C., and G. D. Johnston for the defendant, the executrix of the will of William Henry Howlett, deceased, the plaintiff's father.

DANCKWERTS, J. : On Mar. 15, 1912, certain property at Gravesend on which a wharf was constructed was conveyed to Henry Rutland. On May 20, 1912, Henry Rutland conveyed the same property by way of gift to Ada Amelia Howlett, who was the wife of William Henry Howlett. On Dec. 12, 1923, Ada Amelia Howlett died intestate. She was survived by her husband, William Henry Howlett, and by her son, also called William Henry Howlett, who is the plaintiff. The property was held by the custom of gavelkind in the county of Kent, and under the law applicable thereto the husband got an interest in half the rents and profits until his death or re-marriage, and subject to that the son, who was the heir at law, was entitled to the property. On July 8, 1924, letters of administration of Mrs. Howlett's estate were granted to the husband. On Jan. 9, 1927, the husband re-married, and, accordingly, his interest ceased. He married the present defendant, Mrs. Maude Pauline Howlett. On July 27, 1929, the plaintiff attained the age of 21. The husband died on Oct. 11, 1944. There was a probate action which delayed matters in regard to the probate of his will, but while those proceedings were in progress, on Feb. 22, 1945, the plaintiff obtained letters of administration de bonis non of the estate of his mother, Mrs. Ada Amelia Howlett. On Dec. 4, 1945, an order was made in the Probate Division appointing Clement Bowlby Cawthorne to be administrator pendente lite of the husband's estate, and an order was made in pursuance of which he handed over the title deeds belonging to the property to the plaintiff. An order was made on June 16, 1948, for probate in solemn form of the husband's will, probate being granted to the defendant in this action. On Oct. 22, 1948, the writ in this action was issued.

The plaintiff says that his father, William Henry Howlett, having entered into possession of the property, was bailiff for him, the plaintiff, and became chargeable accordingly. In support of that proposition counsel for the plaintiff cited Re Hobbs (1), Wall v. Stanwick (2) and Howard v. Earl of Shrewsbury (3). Those authorities establish, I think, the following propositions. First, the husband was chargeable as bailiff for the plaintiff by reason of his occupation of the property. Secondly, the husband was entitled to take credit for the maintenance of his son so long as he resided with him. It appears that the son continued to reside with the husband until about July, 1928, i.e., for a period of about eighteen months after the re-marriage of the husband, and then he went to live with a sister, Mrs. Lincoln, and at various other places. Thirdly, having come into the position of bailiff for the plaintiff, the husband could not divest himself of the character in which he held the property. It was also submitted on behalf of the plaintiff that by virtue of the Land Transfer Act, 1897, s. 2, when the husband became the administrator of the estate of Mrs. Ada Amelia Howlett he became an express trustee for his son.

It was submitted to me by counsel for the defendant that he was only a bare trustee by virtue of that Act for the purpose of transferring the assets of the estate in due course, but I was not satisfied by this argument of counsel and it seems to me that the husband was in a position of trustee, apart from being in the character of bailiff for his son, by virtue of the Land Transfer Act, 1897, s. 2.

On Jan. 1, 1926, the legal estate in the property was vested in the husband in his capacity of administrator and the beneficial interests were divided between himself and his son. Accordingly, the Law of Property Act, 1925, sched. I, pt. IV, para. 1 (1), applied and made him a trustee for sale, possibly, on the statutory trusts which are contained in s. 35 of the same Act, but I think that makes no difference to the situation. It is quite possible that he merely continued to hold in the character of personal representative.

The defences, as I understood them, were in substance four. First, it was contended and pleaded that the plaintiff was disentitled to the relief claimed by virtue of his acquiescence, laches and delay. Secondly, there was the claim that in any case the husband, and, therefore, the defendant, was entitled to credit for maintenance of the plaintiff by the husband during the period during which the plaintiff resided with him. Thirdly, it was contended that there was no obligation on the husband to keep the wharf in repair. Fourthly, there was the defence based on the Limitation Act, 1939.

As regards the first defence—acquiescence, laches and delay—I was referred, on behalf of the plaintiff, to Cockerell v. Cholmeley (4) as authority for the proposition that to found a defence of acquiescence the party concerned against whom the plea is raised must not only know the facts but also the consequences. This seems to me to be substantially correct. The plaintiff gave evidence, and it was reasonably clear to me from his evidence that, while the plaintiff understood that on his father's death he would come into ownership of the wharf, he never understood his rights during his father's lifetime and evidently did not understand that his father was only entitled until his re-marriage A to half the rents and profits and that on his re-marriage he was then disentitled to receive them any longer. Accordingly, it seems to me that the defence of acquiescence fails, and I think counsel accepted that, in view of the evidence, he could not seriously press that defence.

As regards the question of maintenance, it appears to me that, if and so far as I hold that the defendant is accountable in respect of her husband's B occupation of the property in any respect during the period when the son lived with the husband, the husband is entitled to credit for a reasonable sum for maintenance, and, therefore, to that extent that defence will be available. As regards the question of keeping in repair, counsel for the plaintiff referred me to Re Hotchkys (5) where there is a proposition which in general terms is indisputable. It appears in the judgment of COTTON, L.J. He says (32 Ch.D. C 416):

> "In my opinion, in a case where trustees have property vested in them under circumstances like these, there is an obligation upon them, for the purpose of properly carrying out and performing their trust with regard to the property, to see that the property does not fall into decay from want of proper repair."

D The position of trustees in regard to their obligations as regards repair of trust property is far from clear and settled, in my view, and Re Hotchkys (5) is generally cited, I think, on the question how far repairs should fall on capital or on income. It does not follow that because trust property is kept in its proper state of repair the repairs necessarily come out of income. It may be that they ought to come out of the capital of the estate. Counsel for the E defendant contended that in any case the question only affected the amount of the occupation rent or notional rents and profits which might be charged against the husband, i.e., the trustee, and, in my opinion, there is a good deal to be said for that view. As regards the actual cost of repairing the property, which has fallen into a serious condition of decay, there was a great conflict between the evidence of the experts. However that may be, I do not propose F to decide the figure which would be needed to put this barge-repairing wharf back into the same state of repair as that in which it may have been when Mrs. Ada Amelia Howlett died or at any other date. On the view of the case which I propose to take it will not be necessary for me to decide that.

The fourth and last defence is based on the Limitation Act, 1939. Section 2 (2) provides:

> "An action for an account shall not be brought in respect of any matter which arose more than six years before the commencement of the action."

In the present case the writ was issued on Oct. 22, 1948. The husband died on Oct. 11, 1944, and, therefore, it is argued, under the Act the only period in respect of which a claim for an account can be made is limited to the period H between Oct. 22, 1942, and Oct. 11, 1944. However, the Limitation Act, 1939, s. 19, which is headed "Actions in respect of trust property . . ." provides:

> "(1) No period of limitation prescribed by this Act shall apply to an action by a beneficiary under a trust, being an action—(a) in respect of any fraud or fraudulent breach of trust to which the trustee was a party or privy; or (b) to recover from the trustee trust property or the proceeds thereof in the possession of the trustee, or previously received by the trustee and converted to his use. (2) Subject as aforesaid, an action > by a beneficiary to recover trust property or in respect of any breach of trust, not being an action for which a period of limitation is prescribed by any other provision of this Act, shall not be brought after the expiration of six years from the date on which the right of action accrued."

Counsel for the defendant based an argument on the express terms of s. 19 (1) (b) of the Act. He said that it had no application to any trust property or rents or profits which were not actually received by the trustee in question A and which the trustee had not, so far as the first part of the sub-section is concerned, in his possession at the date when the action was brought. He referred me to Thorne v. Heard (6), which was decided under the Trustee Act, 1888, s. 8. That section uses slightly different language from that employed in s. 19 (1) (b) of the Act of 1939. I do not know why the change was made when the Limitation Act, 1939, was passed, but the exception appearing in B s. 8 is:

> " . . . where the claim is founded upon any fraud . . . or is to recover trust property, or the proceeds thereof still retained by the trustee, or previously received by the trustee and converted to his use . . ."

Probably there is no substance in the difference, but there is that slight change C in the wording of the sub-section.

In support of his proposition, counsel pointed out that there was no evidence whatever of any receipt by the husband of any rent, and that seems plainly to be so on the evidence which was given in this case. He submitted that the section refers to an actual receipt, and not a notional receipt, of any trust funds, and for that he referred me to Thorne v. Heard (6) ([1894] 1 Ch. 606. D That was a case where mortgagees on selling property employed a solicitor to complete the transaction, and the solicitor received more money than was required for the discharge of the principal and interest and costs. Instead of accounting either to them or to the borrower, who would be entitled to any surplus, the solicitor put the money in his pocket. The mortgagees were primarily chargeable with the money which their solicitor had obtained, but they were E able to discharge themselves under the Trustee Act, 1888, because, although they had received the trust money, they did not still retain it and had not converted it to their own use. Accordingly, the exception in the Act of 1888 did not apply, and the mortgagees had a defence under the Act.

Counsel for the plaintiff in reply on this point, which seems to me to be very vital in the case, referred me to certain authorities. He said first of all that F the husband could not be heard to say he did not receive any rents as he was in occupation, and for that proposition he cited to me Toates v. Toates (7). I do not think that case helps me very much, because all it decided was that, for the purposes of the Statute of Limitations, under the Land Transfer Act, 1897 a personal representative is an express trustee. It did not affect the point which I have to decide. Counsel then submitted that a trustee cannot G be allowed to plead his own devastavit or set up his own wrong in his defence, and he referred me to Re Hyatt (8). That case again does not afford me any assistance, because it was decided before the Trustee Act, 1888, and so the precise point that I have to consider did not come to be dealt with in that case either.

I think, however, that there is force in the contention which counsel for the H plaintiff makes that a trustee who remains in occupation of trust property for his own purposes—and, undoubtedly, the husband did so remain in occupation in the present case—cannot be heard to say that he has not received any rents or profits in respect of the property. Having received, therefore, in theory rents and profits, because he is chargeable with an occupation rent, he cannot discharge himself unless he can show that he has paid moneys away, and, therefore, either discharge himself by proper payments, or, indeed, perhaps escape under the Limitation Act, 1939, having made improper payments. But here the husband, it seems, did not make any payments of any kind. He merely used the property for his own purposes, and I think the submission of counsel for the plaintiff is justified, that, having received the occupation rent for which he is chargeable, he must be considered as still having it in his own pocket at the material date, and therefore, cannot escape under the provisions of the Limitation Act, 1939.

[HIS LORDSHIP, therefore, found for the plaintiff, and, having considered the relevant factors, concluded that the amount with which the husband's estate should be chargeable was a proper occupation rent less the cost of repair in respect of the whole period during which he was in occupation, reduced by a reasonable sum for the maintenance of the plaintiff up to July, 1928. HIS LORDSHIP, accordingly, ordered the payment to the plaintiff out of the husband's estate of £1,600, as being the net amount for which the husband's executrix was accountable after allowing for the cost of repairs.]

Order accordingly. Subject to the payment by the plaintiff of the costs occasioned by an amendment to the writ, the plaintiff to have the costs.

[COURT OF CRIMINAL APPEAL (Lord Goddard, C.J., Oliver, Stable, Birkett and Slade, JJ.), July 25, 1949.]

Criminal Law—Appeal—Reference by Home Secretary—Consideration of fresh evidence—Criminal Appeal Act, 1907 (c. 23), s. 19 (a).

The appellant was convicted of receiving stolen goods, his defence, an alibi, having been rejected by the jury. His appeal against conviction, when first before the court, was dismissed on the ground that there was evidence before the jury on which they could properly have reached their verdict, and that the trial had been properly conducted. The Home Secretary later caused further inquiries to be made, which tended to establish the alibi set up by the appellant. He, therefore, referred the matter to the court under s. 19 of the Criminal Appeal Act, 1907, for further consideration.

HELD: different considerations applied when a case was referred to the court by the Home Secretary from those which applied when an appeal came before the court in the ordinary way. In the latter case the court would not usurp the function of the jury when the trial had been properly conducted, nor would it hear further evidence unless it were shown that the proposed witnesses had not been available to give evidence at the trial or that some point which could not have been foreseen arose on which the evidence would have been material, but the object of a reference to the court by the Home Secretary was to assist him in respect of the exercise of the royal prerogative, and any evidence could be considered which might achieve that object.

[FOR THE CRIMINAL APPEAL ACT, 1907 (c. 23), s. 19 (a), see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Vol. 4, p. 736].

REFERENCE by the Home Secretary to the Court of Criminal Appeal, under s. 19 of the Criminal Appeal Act, 1907.

The appellant was tried and convicted at the London Sessions on Oct. 20, 1948, of receiving and was sentenced to three years' penal servitude. His appeal against conviction was dismissed by the court, on Feb. 4, 1949, but on the present reference the court quashed the conviction and sentence. The facts appear in the judgment of the court delivered by Lord Goddard, C.J.

Melford Stevenson, K.C., and J. A. S. Toogood for the appellant.
Sebag Shaw and Paul Wrightson for the Crown.

LORD GODDARD, C.J., delivered the following judgment of the court. The appellant was charged with the crime of receiving. His defence, which was an alibi, was rejected by the jury and he was convicted in October, 1948. He appealed, and his appeal was heard and dismissed on Feb. 8, 1949.

The goods in question were stolen, and were moved in a lorry, which, it was said, the appellant was driving, at about 9.55 p.m. on Sept. 22, 1948. The lorry was stopped by two police officers who found the stolen property in it. They had ample opportunity of observing the men who were driving or were in the lorry. One of the men was immediately taken into custody and removed to the police car. The other remained in the driver's seat and a police officer got up beside him. On the way to the police station, to which he was ordered to drive the lorry, and when the lorry was going at a considerable pace, the driver opened the door of the lorry and jumped out. It is obvious that the two police officers, who gave evidence and had picked out the men at an identification parade, had an ample opportunity of seeing and recognising the man who was driving the lorry. They had no doubt that it was the appellant, and there is no suggestion that the officers were giving false evidence, nor is it questioned that they gave their evidence carefully and properly in the court below. The appellant's defence, if it were true, was the best possible defence—that it was a case of mistaken identity and that he had nothing whatever to do with the lorry that night. It is only fair to say that, when he was arrested, as he was very soon after this incident, no trace could be found on his body of any cut or scratch or bruise such as a man might have got in throwing himself out of a lorry, but that is by no means conclusive.

At the trial the question whether or not his alibi should be accepted must have turned very largely on the question whether he came back from hop-picking on Sept. 21 or on Sept. 22, the day on which the offence was committed. If he came back on Sept. 21, obviously he had every opportunity, in conjunction with his associates, of planning the crime and committing it. If he came back on Sept. 22, the chances that he was engaged in this particular crime were very much reduced. Indeed, it would be in the highest degree unlikely that he was engaged in this crime, because there is no doubt from the evidence of witnesses which was not challenged except as to whether they were speaking of an occasion on Sept. 21 or Sept. 22, that he was spending the evening with his young woman visiting various public houses, more particularly, The Ship, at Rotherhithe. He was seen in that public house by witnesses whose good faith was not challenged, at any rate up to just before 9.30 p.m. If he had not come back from the hop-picking until that day, and if he was with his young woman in these various public houses up to shortly before 9.30, it was most unlikely that he would be driving a lorry full of stolen goods about ten minutes to ten. A most material question, therefore, was whether he did come back from hop-picking on Sept. 21 or Sept. 22. The confusion which arose was probably due to his using some expression which indicated that he came back from the hop-picking on Sept. 21. A man may easily, especially when confronted with the police, make a mistake as to the date he returned being the 21st or the 22nd, but it is now clear that he returned on Sept. 22. When the case first came before this court, it was simply a case in which a man had been convicted by the verdict of a jury, there being evidence on both sides. This court is frequently asked to reverse verdicts in cases in which a jury have rejected an alibi, but this court cannot interfere in those cases in the ordinary way, because to do so would be to usurp the function of the jury. Where there is evidence on which a jury can act and there has been a proper direction to the jury this court cannot substitute itself for the jury and re-try the case. That is not our function. If we took any other attitude, it would strike at the very root of trial by jury.

Although we think this man's conviction must be quashed, there is no question but that he had a perfectly fair trial in the sense that evidence was taken on both sides. No improper questions were asked, a perfectly fair summing-up was given by the deputy chairman. He pointed out to the jury, as was his duty, the ample opportunity that the police officers had of satisfying themselves as to the identity of the driver. Mistakes are sometimes made by honest witnesses in cases of identity, and if this matter had been cleared up and it had been proved that the day on which the appellant came back was Sept. 22 and not Sept. 21, we cannot but think that a very different conclusion would have been come to by the jury. It may be that, there not being the same opportunities for investigation as might take place in other cases, all the people who could have thrown light on this case were not called. One of them, who might have been a most material witness in the appellant's favour—a member of Bermondsey Borough Council whose statement now is that he saw this man in company with his young woman in an omnibus about eleven o'clock, which would make it very unlikely that he had been engaged in this undertaking—had been seen but had not been called. When the case came before this court, the possibility of this man being a witness was vaguely referred to and the appellant did ask for further evidence to be called, but he gave no reason why these witnesses had not been called at the trial, nor do I now know why it was that the importance of establishing this date, the 21st or 22nd, had not been fully realised. But it is well established that this court will not hear further evidence unless it is shown that the proposed witnesses were not available at the trial, or that some point which could not have been foreseen arose at the trial on which the evidence would have been material. That was not suggested in this case.

When, however, the case comes before the court on a reference from the Home Secretary different considerations arise. Cases come before this court on such a reference because representations have been made to him that they are proper cases for the exercise of the royal prerogative. The Home Secretary has a much wider discretion than this court. He can hear and consider any evidence he likes which would influence him in considering whether or not he he should advise the exercise of the royal prerogative. In this case he caused further enquiry to be made, and, because of the enquiries which the police have made, this case has once more come before this court. The police are now satisfied that the appellant did not return from hop-picking until about 6.30 p.m. on Sept. 22, and that, therefore, he was not in London on Sept. 21. There is also before us a statement by Mr. Simmonds which counsel for the prosecution does not challenge, that at about eleven o'clock, he saw the appellant with his young woman in an omnibus. That would greatly reduce the possibility of his being the man who flung himself out of the lorry.

In these circumstances, the court feels that, if these facts had been before the jury, the probabilities are that they would have felt that the two police officers, whose good faith is not attacked but whose identification is attacked, were mistaken. Accordingly, we have come to the conclusion that the only safe thing to do is to act on the powers given to us and to say that we think that this conviction must be quashed.

Conviction quashed.

Mines—Coal mine—Compensation—Disposal of compensation as between freeholder and lessee—Effect of non-registration of interest and failure to make claim—Costs—Coal (Registration of Ownership) Act, 1937 (c. 56, s. 1 (3), sched. I, para. 1—Coal Act, 1938 (c. 52), s. 7 (3), s. 39, sched. III, pt. II and pt. IV, para. 6, para. 21 (6), para. 22 (1) (as amended by the Coal Act, 1943 (c. 38), s. 13).

The Coal Act, 1938, sched. III, pt. IV, para. 21, provides : " (6) . . . the compensation for a holding and the income thereof shall be held and disposed of in such manner as to confer on the existing owners whose interests are comprised in the holding, their personal representatives or assigns, the like benefits, so far as may be, as they would have had from their respective interests in the premises in which the holding subsisted if those premises had not been acquired by the commission."

On Oct. 21, 1740, the predecessors in title of M., the present freeholder, granted a mining lease for 200 years of certain areas known as C., A. and B. Between 1811 and 1880 leases were granted by M.'s predecessors in title of the said areas in plots for terms, some of 999 years and others of 9,999 years, without exception of minerals. On Feb. 16, 1909, a fresh mining lease was granted of C., A. and B. for the period which remained unexpired of the lease of 1740, but restricting more severely the rights of the mining lessees to let down the surface. On Feb. 17, 1927, a mining lease for forty years was granted in respect of A. and B. This originating summons raised the question of the proper distribution, as between the owner of the fee simple of C., A. and B. and the lessees and under-lessees thereof, of the compensation payable under the Coal Act, 1938, in respect of the vesting in the Coal Commission of all coal and coal mines in the areas C., A. and B., which together constituted one unit or holding,

Held : (i) the lessees and under-lessees were " existing owners whose interests are comprised in the holding " within the meaning of para. 21 (6), and the compensation was, therefore, to be held and disposed of so as to confer the like benefits as they would have had if the holding had not been acquired by the commission.

(ii) a fair division of the compensation attributable to each plot would be fifty per cent. to M., the freeholder, and fifty per cent. to the lessee, whose share where there was an underlease would be further sub-divided.

The Coal (Registration of Ownership) Act, 1937, s. 1 (1) directed the Board of Trade to establish a register for the purposes of recording certain particulars as to proprietary interests in coal and mines of coal. By s. 1 (3) : " Registrations under this Act shall be effected in respect of such proprietary interests . . . as are . . . to be treated as constituting units of separate ownership, and applications for registration must be made accordingly . . . " By para. 1 of sched. I to the Act : " (1) . . . each of the following proprietary interests . . . in coal hereditaments shall constitute a unit of separate ownership . . . (a) each freehold reversion (that is to say, in the case of all the coal and mines of coal that are comprised in a coal-mining lease derived immediately out of the fee simple and in the case of property and rights held in association with any such coal or mine, the interest therein of the estate owner in respect of the fee simple in the coal and mines together with the interests therein of all persons claiming under him) ; (b) each leasehold reversion (that is to say, in the case of all the coal and mines of coal that are comprised in a coal-mining lease that is an underlease and in the case of property and rights held in association with any such coal or mine, the interest therein of the estate owner in respect of the term of years out of which that underlease is immediately derived together with the interests therein of all persons claiming under him) ; (c) each freeholder in possession (that is to say, in the case of all the coal and mines of coal that are not comprised in any coal-mining lease and are in the legal ownership as respects the fee simple of the same estate owner and in the case of property and rights held in association with any such coal or mine, the interest therein of the estate owner in respect of the fee simple in the coal and mines together with the interests therein of all persons claiming under him). (2) In this paragraph the expression "person claiming under" means, in relation to a person referred to as claiming under the estate owner in respect of a fee simple, or under the estate owner in respect of a term of years, a person interested in respect of . . . . (d) an interest arising under a lease, other than a coal-mining lease, which is derived out of that fee simple or of that term of years, as the case may be, either immediately or by way of underlease derived out of a lease other than a coal-mining lease." The Coal Act, 1938, sched. III, pt. II, para. 6, provides: "In order for compensation to be payable under s. 6 of this Act in respect of a holding, an application for the registration under the Registration Act of particulars in respect thereof must have been made before the valuation date, or, if not so made, must be made within the period of six months beginning on that date." The Act of 1938 further provides by s. 7 : "(3) In order for compensation to be payable in respect of any holding, the requirements of sched. III to this Act as to—(a) the registration of particulars under the Coal (Registration of Ownership) Act, 1937 . . . and (b) the making of claims for compensation ; must be satisfied within the limits of time specified in that schedule."

M., the freeholder, had registered the holding under the Act of 1937 and made a claim for compensation, but S., the lessee of parts and underlessee of other parts of the holding, did not register particulars or make claim to compensation within the prescribed time.

HELD : providing particulars of the holding were registered and a claim to entitle him to share the compensation was made by some person who had a proprietary interest in the holding, the requirement of the Acts of 1937 and 1938 were satisfied, and there was no obligation on S. or other persons who might be interested to carry out those requirements, and S. was not, therefore, debarred from participating in the compensation payable in respect of the holding.

The Act of 1938, by sched. III, pt. IV, para. 22 (1) (as amended by the Coal Act, 1943, s. 13) provides : "Subject to the provisions of this paragraph and of s. 39 of this Act, the commission shall pay the costs reasonably incurred by any person—(a) in connection with the ascertainment of the person entitled to the compensation for a holding ; and . . . (c) . . . in connection with any application to the court that may be requisite for the purpose of determining the manner in which the compensation ought to be held and disposed of." Section 39 of the Act provides : "The provisions . . . with respect to the payment of costs by the commission . . . shall have effect subject to the following limitation, namely, that their liability shall not extend to costs incurred . . . that are occasioned by any proceedings for the determination of disputes between adverse claimants . . ." It was argued on the question of costs by the National Coal Board (the successors of the Coal Commission) that the present case was a dispute between adverse claimants.

HELD : although there were competing claims, this was not a case of adverse litigation because the position of the parties before the Coal Act, 1938, affected their interests was well known, and the questions arose on the proper construction of that Act.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS issued by the Public Trustee as trustee of the compensation moneys payable under the Coal Act, 1938, in respect of a holding within the meaning of the Coal (Registration of Ownership) Act, 1937, and the Act of 1938, to determine inter alia the questions whether (1) lessees and under-lessees of parts of the holding were entitled to share in the compensation moneys C with the freeholder, and, if so, how the moneys ought to be divided, (2) whether non-registration of an interest or failure to claim in conformity with the provisions of the Act of 1937 caused the loss of a right to share in the moneys, and (3) how the costs of the application ought to be borne.

DANCKWERTS, J., whose decision depended on the statutory provisions set out in the headnote, held that leaseholders were entitled to share equally with D the freeholder in the compensation moneys attributable to the appropriate area of the holding leased, but a leaseholder's moiety should be divided, where the land was subject to an underlease, between the lessee and the under-lessee in some manner to be decided; that failure to register did not defeat a claim to share in the compensation moneys, providing the holding was registered by someone having a registrable interest therein; and that the National Coal E Board must pay the costs.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 21. DANCKWERTS, J., read the following judgment. The questions raised by the originating summons in this case relate to the proper distribution of the compensation awarded under the provisions of the Coal G Act, 1938, in respect of a "holding," as defined by the Coal (Registration of Ownership) Act, 1937, and the Coal Act, 1938. The coal in question is under the surface of parts of the city of Manchester known as Collyhurst, Ancoats and Beswick, and the amount of the compensation is nearly £14,000. It is held by the Public Trustee, as trustee of the sum in question, by virtue of an appointment made by the Coal Commission on Nov. 10, 1942, in pursuance H of powers conferred by para. 18 of sched. III, pt. IV, to the Coal Act, 1938. The material date is Jan. 1, 1939, which is referred to in the Coal Act, 1938, as the "valuation date": [see s. 3 (2)]. The third defendant, Sir Oswald Mosley, claims to be the owner in fee simple of the holding which is the subject of the compensation. The first defendants, the lord mayor, aldermen and citizens of the city of Manchester, are lessees of some parts and under-lessees of other parts of the holding, and the defendant Mrs. Septima Holcroft Shawe is a lessee or under-lessee of other parts of the holding. The distinction between the Manchester Corporation and Mrs. Shawe is that Mrs. Shawe did not register particulars under the Coal (Registration of Ownership) Act, 1937 (hereinafter referred to as "the Registration Act, 1937"), but the Manchester Corporation did register such particulars.

The material leases were granted by the predecessors of Sir Oswald Mosley A between 1811 and 1880 without any exception of minerals and so the interest of Sir Oswald Mosley in the minerals in or under the surface of the property included in the leases passed to the lessees for the duration of the leasehold terms, which were for 999 years or, in some cases, for 9,999 years, at comparatively small rents. Certain mining leases of the holding or parts of it were granted by Sir Oswald Mosley or his predecessors. On Oct. 21, 1740, B a mining lease was granted in respect of the Collyhurst, Ancoats and Beswick areas for a term of 200 years. On Feb. 16, 1909, a fresh lease was granted of the same properties for the period which remained unexpired of the same term. This term of years was, therefore, due to expire in October, 1940. On Feb. 17, 1927, a mining lease for 40 years was granted in respect of the Ancoats and Beswick areas only. The lease of 1909 restricted the rights of the mining C lessees to let down the surface more severely than the lease of 1740 did. I mention this because counsel for Sir Oswald Mosley based an argument which he put forward on the submission that the mining lessees were not entitled to let down the surface. The matter is complicated by the fact that the surface is now covered with houses and is divided into some 500 plots and in many cases the present owners of the plots have not, so far, been ascertained.

D The Coal Act, 1938, s. 1, constituted the Coal Commission as a body corporate, and the Coal Commission, or their successors, the National Coal Board, are defendants in view of their possible liability for the costs of these proceedings. Under s. 3 (1) of the Act of 1938 the Coal Commission were to acquire the fee simple in all coal and mines of coal and other property and rights mentioned, and, by s. 3 (3), on the vesting date (which was July 1, 1942) all coal and mines of E coal as existing at that date were to vest in the commission > " . . . for a title comprising all interests then subsisting in any such coal or mine other than retained interests."

("Retained interests" are interests in coal or a mine of coal that arise under a coal-mining lease and are provided for by s. 5). By s. 3 (2), during the inter- F vening period between Jan. 1, 1939 (the valuation date), and July 1, 1942 (the vesting date), the coal and mines of coal are to be held as if all the existing owners thereof had, in respect of all their interests therein, other than retained interests, and with full capacity so to do, entered into a contract on the valuation date for the sale thereof to the commission at a price to be ascertained by valuation, with provision for completion of the contract on the vesting date. The G compensation is provided for by s. 6. It is an aggregate amount of £66,450,000, which is to be divided proportionately to the aggregate value of the coal hereditaments in each region between the "valuation regions" into which Great Britain was to be divided. The sums reached by such division were to be divided between the units comprised in each region which are described as "holdings." The sum which is the subject of the present proceedings is the H allocation to one unit or holding, and, in this particular case, the holding has been fortunate in that the allocation has been received on the footing of 24*s.* in the £ in respect of the valuation of the holding.

The questions which I have to determine concern the shares in which the sum received in respect of the holding ought to be divided between the various parties who had interests as freeholder, lessee or under-lessee, in the property contained in the holding, and include the question whether failure to register under the Coal (Registration of Ownership) Act, 1937, or to make a claim prevents any of the lessees or under-lessees from claiming a share. Section 7 of the Act of 1938, which bears the cross-heading, "Ascertainment and distribution of compensation," provides :

> "(1) The sums to be paid for compensation as aforesaid shall be ascertained by valuation, in accordance with the provisions of this section, of the interests, other than retained interests, that subsist at the valuation date in coal, mines of coal and acquired property and rights (in this Act referred to as 'acquired interests'). (2) The subject of each valuation shall be a unit (in this Act referred to as 'a holding') consisting of an acquired interest, or of a group of such interests, that is under the provisions of sched. III to this Act to constitute a unit for compensation purposes. (3) In order for compensation to be payable in respect of any holding, the requirements of sched. III to this Act as to (a) the registration of particulars under the Coal (Registration of Ownership) Act, 1937 (in this Act referred to as the 'Registration Act'); and (b) the making of claims for compensation : must be satisfied within the limits of time specified in that schedule. (4) The value of a holding shall be taken to be the amount which the holding might have been expected to realise if this Act had not been passed and the holding had been sold on the valuation date in the open market by the existing owners thereof, selling as willing vendors to a willing purchaser, under a contract providing for completion thereof on the vesting date, so however that, where a right to withdraw support is to vest in the commission with coal or a mine of coal in which a holding subsisted, it shall be valued as if each of the existing owners thereof, having power to grant that right to the purchaser for an interest corresponding to the existing owner's interest in the coal or mine, had agreed so to grant it in addition to any acquired rights in which the holding subsisted . . . (9) Subject as aforesaid, the compensation payable under s. 6 of this Act shall be ascertained and paid subject to and in accordance with the provisions of sched. III to this Act."

A B C D

Turning to pt. IV of sched. III to the Act, I find that para. 21 bears a cross-heading, "Disposal of compensation as between beneficial interests," and provides : E

> "(1) The compensation for a holding when paid by the commission to the person entitled to receive it from them, including any sum paid on account thereof under para. 19 or 20 of this schedule, and the income thereof, shall, in order to its being applied as compensation to the persons whose interests are comprised in the holding, be held and disposed of for the benefit of those persons, or their personal representatives or assigns, in accordance with the succeeding provisions of this paragraph." F

Paragraph 21 (2) deals with interests under a settlement, and was considered in Re Duke of Leeds (1), Re Blandy-Jenkins (2), and Williams v. Sharpe (3). The present case does not fall within that sub-paragraph or sub-paras. (3), (4) or (5). Sub-paragraph (6) appears to be material, and is in the following terms : G

> "Subject as aforesaid the compensation for a holding and the income thereof shall be held and disposed of in such manner as to confer on the existing owners whose interests are comprised in the holding, their personal representatives or assigns, the like benefits, so far as may be, as they would have had from their respective interests in the premises in which the holding subsisted if those premises had not been acquired by the commission." H

Section 44 of the Act (which is the interpretation section) contains the following material definitions :

> "'Claiming under' shall be construed, in relation to a person referred to as claiming under the estate owner in respect of the fee simple, or under > the estate owner in respect of a term of years, in any land, as referring to any person interested in that land in respect of . . . (d) a term of years under a lease, other than a coal mining lease, which is derived out of that fee simple or of that term of years, as the case may be (either immediately or by way of underlease derived out of a lease other than a coal mining lease), or an interest created out of such a term of years ; . . . 'Existing owners' A means, in relation to any coal or mine of coal, all persons who have at the valuation date an acquired interest therein ; . . . 'Lease' includes an underlease, or tenancy and an agreement for a lease, underlease, or tenancy . . ."

It is also necessary to refer to pt. I of sched. III to the Act, which by para. 1 deals with the acquired interests, or groups of such interests, which are to B constitute a unit for compensation purposes, and provides (in substance) that in the case of (a) each freehold reversion on a coal mining lease, (b) each leasehold reversion on a mining lease and (c) each freehold in possession, the unit for compensation purposes is to be the interest therein of the estate owner in respect of the fee simple or in respect of the term created by the lease out of which an underlease was derived, "together with the interests therein of all C persons claiming under him." There are similar provisions in the Coal (Registration of Ownership) Act, 1937, [see sched. I, pt. I, para. 1]. These can be more conveniently referred to when I deal with the question of registration and the making of a claim, but they assist me in reaching the conclusion at which I have arrived on this part of the case also.

Now, the position in the present case is that (at any rate for the purposes of D the present application) the interests to be dealt with are all legal estates. Sir Oswald Mosley had the legal fee simple and the lessees and under-lessees had legal terms of years. When the leases were granted between 1811 and 1880 the mining lease of 1740 was in existence, and if, and in so far as, an interest in the minerals included in that lease passed to the lessees it was a reversionary interest and they took subject to the terms of the mining lease. But the E reversion was very near the date of falling in on Jan. 1, 1939. Where the minerals had not been excepted from the leases, the title of Sir Oswald Mosley to grant the leases of 1909 and 1927 is open to question, but the lease of 1909, of course, did not extend the term granted by the lease of 1740. Apart from the question of any existing mining lease, the legal position appears to have been that the landlord could not work the minerals until the determination of F any long term of years, because he had parted with the minerals for that period, and the lessees or under-lessees could not work the minerals, because to do so would amount to waste.

Counsel for Sir Oswald Mosley contended (as I understood his argument) that the lessees had not any interest in the minerals, and that all they had was a cause of action against Sir Oswald Mosley or his predecessors for damages, G which (as they could not work the minerals) must be trifling, or a right not to have the surface let down, against which they were adequately protected by the provisions of the lease of 1909. Accordingly, he contended that the value of the interests of the lessees and under-lessees was nothing, or so small a sum that the maxim de minimis should apply, and he contended that this represented a practical view, which would have the advantage, of course, that the complica-H tions caused by the leases and underleases could be wholly disregarded. This argument seems to me to ignore the legal realities of the case. An interest in land or minerals is none the less an interest because it is reversionary, and on Jan. 1, 1939 (the valuation date) the reversion was very near becoming an interest in possession so far as the leases of 1740 and 1909 were concerned. If the lessees or under-lessees could not work the minerals, neither could Sir Oswald Mosley until the lessees' interest expired, unless some arrangement was come to. In my view, it is plain that the lessees and under-lessees are "existing owners whose interests are comprised in the holding" within the meaning of para. 21 (6) of sched. III to the Act, and, accordingly, the compensation is to be held and disposed of so as to confer on them the like benefits in accordance with the provisions of that paragraph.

I was referred by counsel for Manchester Corporation to a case concerning copyholds considered by the Railway and Canal Commission Court, Re Markham Main Colliery, Ltd. (4). This does seem to provide some basis of A comparison, because, though the minerals were vested in the lord of the manor, he could not, in fact, work them without the concurrence of the copyholders. The court divided the royalties in the proportion of two-thirds to the lord of the manor and one-third to the copyholders. It was claimed in that case that division in equal shares was usual in such cases. In the present case, I am not given any practical assistance from actual examples because Mr. Edwin Morgan, B who made affidavits in this case, though a mining engineer of experience, could not recollect ever having had a similar case in which the interests of freeholder and lessee were concerned in regard to the minerals. It seems to me that the lessees and under-lessees are entitled to share in the parts of the compensation in the present case which are properly referable to the plots in which they have an interest. The parties requested me to decide the respective shares of the C freeholder and the lessee in such parts, and, giving the best consideration that I can to the somewhat incalculable factors to be considered, my view is that a fair division would be fifty per cent. to the freeholder and fifty per cent. to the lessee. It was admitted that, on this footing, the lessee's share must be reduced by further division where there is an underlease of the property in question, and that I could not be expected to give a ruling as to the method of such D division on the information at present before me, as the situation must depend on the facts of each particular case. The position, therefore, as between lessee and under-lessee must be reserved.

Having decided this question of principle, I now have to decide whether lessees or under-lessees who have failed to register particulars in accordance with the Registration Act, 1937, or to make a claim, are now debarred from E sharing in the compensation paid. The Coal (Registration of Ownership) Act, 1937 (according to the preamble), was passed > ". . . to make provision for the ascertainment and registration of particulars as to proprietary interests in unworked coal and mines of coal" and certain associated matters, and was a necessary preliminary to the acquisition by the Coal Commission of the coal and mines under the Coal Act, 1938. F Section 1 provides:

> "(1) For the purpose of recording such particulars as are hereinafter mentioned as to proprietary interests that subsist in coal and mines of coal in Great Britain and in certain property and rights held in association therewith, the Board of Trade shall establish a register, to be called 'the G coal holdings register' . . . (3) Registrations under this Act shall be effected in respect of such proprietary interests or groups of proprietary interests as are, under the provisions of sched. I to this Act, to be treated as constituting units of separate ownership, and applications for registration must be made accordingly. Any such interest or group of interests is in this Act referred to as a 'holding'."

H

By s. 4, "proprietary interest" is defined as meaning:

> ". . . any interest in coal hereditaments with the exception of—(a) an interest arising under a coal-mining lease in coal hereditaments comprised therein that are not comprised in any underlease derived out of that lease; and (b) an interest arising by virtue of the grant of a right under the Mines (Working Facilities and Support) Act, 1923, either as originally enacted or as extended by s. 13 of the Mining Industry Act, 1926."

Paragraph (1) of sched. I to the Act of 1937 contains provisions similar to those enacted in pt. I of sched. III to the Coal Act, 1938, and a definition of " person claiming under " similar to the definition contained in s. 44 of that Act. Paragraph 1 provides :

> " (1) Subject to the provisions of para. 2 of this schedule, each of the following proprietary interests . . . in coal hereditaments shall constitute a unit of separate ownership for the purposes of this Act, namely :—(a) each freehold reversion (that is to say, in the case of all the coal and mines of coal that are comprised in a coal-mining lease derived immediately out of the fee simple and in the case of property and rights held in association with any such coal or mine, the interest therein of the estate owner in respect of the fee simple in the coal and mines together with the interests therein of all persons claiming under him) ; (b) each leasehold reversion (that is to say, in the case of all the coal and mines of coal that are comprised in a coal-mining lease that is an underlease and in the case of property and rights held in association with any such coal or mine, the interest therein of the estate owner in respect of the term of years out of which that underlease is immediately derived together with the interests therein of all persons claiming under him) ; (c) each freehold in possession (that is to say, in the case of all the coal and mines of coal that are not comprised in any coal-mining lease and are in the legal ownership as respects the fee simple of the same estate owner and in the case of property and rights held in association with any such coal or mine, the interest therein of the estate owner in respect of the fee simple in the coal and mines together with the interests therein of all persons claiming under him). (2) In this paragraph the expression ' person claiming under ' means, in relation to a person referred to as claiming under the estate owner in respect of a fee simple, or under the estate owner in respect of a term of years, a person interested in respect of . . . (d) an interest arising under a lease, other than a coal-mining lease, which is derived out of that fee simple or of that term of years, as the case may be, either immediately or by way of underlease derived out of a lease other than a coal-mining lease."

Paragraph 2 of sched. I provides for rules to be made by the Board of Trade for the consolidation or division of units. By para. 1 (1) of pt. I of sched. II to the Act of 1937 an application for the registration of particulars in respect of a holding must be in the prescribed form and supported by a statement and a statutory declaration, and sub-para. (2) provides :

> " An application for the registration of particulars in respect of a holding must be made by a person who has a proprietary interest that constitutes or is comprised in a holding."

Paragraph 5 (1) of the same schedule contains provisions for the payment by the commission of the costs reasonably incurred

> " . . . by the person by whom an application for the registration of particulars in respect of a holding is duly made in giving effect in relation to that holding to the provisions of pt. I of this schedule . . ."

with a proviso evidently designed to limit the liability of the commission to one set of costs in respect of each holding and to discourage a number of applications for registration in respect of the same holding. There is a similar provision in respect of the costs of valuation proceedings in the Coal Act, 1938, sched. III, para. 15. Paragraph 6 of the said sched. III provides :

> " In order for compensation to be payable under s. 6 of this Act in respect of a holding, an application for the registration under the Registra> tion Act of particulars in respect thereof must have been made before the valuation date, or, if not so made, must be made within the period of six months beginning on that date."

Finally, it will be remembered that the Coal Act, 1938, s. 7 (3), provides that in order for compensation to be payable in respect of any holding, the requirements of sched. III to the Act as to (a) the registration of particulars under the Coal (Registration of Ownership) Act, 1937, and (b) the making of claims for compensation, must be satisfied within the limits of time specified in that schedule.

It seems to me that, if particulars in respect of a holding are registered, and a claim is made, by some person who has a proprietary interest in the holding, the requirements of the Acts are satisfied, and there is no obligation on other persons who may be interested to carry out these requirements —indeed, the duplication or multiplication of proceedings in respect of these matters is discouraged. It is evident to my mind that the object of the Acts was to secure that particulars should be sent in of every holding so that a proper valuation of all the relevant holdings could be obtained, and the Coal Commission were not to be troubled with the claims of the various persons who might be interested in the sum of compensation awarded in respect of a holding when that sum had been duly ascertained. There appears to be nothing in either of the relevant Acts to deprive a person with an interest of his right to share in the compensation awarded by reason of his failure to register particulars or to make a claim, and in order to deprive a person of his interest it is necessary to find some statutory provision for such a confiscatory act. Counsel for Sir Oswald Mosley called my attention to the provisions of the Coal Act, 1938, s. 37, enabling the time for registration to be extended, and pointed out the inconveniences of an unlimited period during which claims to share in the sum awarded could still be made. As he said, there must be finality sometime. But this court is not unfamiliar with cases in which parties who might be interested in a fund fail to put in their claims, and the court frequently gives trustees liberty to distribute on the footing of the claims that are known so that they are absolved from the risk of further liability. It is a temptingly simple solution in the present case to exclude at once all those who have neither registered particulars nor made a claim, but, in my opinion, it is not authorised by the provisions of these Acts.

I am, therefore, prepared to make a declaration that lessees and under-lessees are entitled to share in the compensation, whether or not they have made applications in due time for registration of particulars of ownership under the Act of 1937, and I have expressed the opinion that fifty per cent. of the compensation is the appropriate share of the freeholder, and the remaining fifty per cent. should go either to the lessees, or be divided, in some manner to be ascertained, between the lessees and the under-lessees (where there are under-lessees), in each case by reference to the area of the properties in the holding which are relevant.

[There followed discussion as to costs.]

DANCKWERTS, J. : The question how the costs of the summons should be dealt with depends on certain provisions of the Coal Act, 1938. Paragraph 22 (1) of sched. III to that Act (which has been amended by the Coal Act, 1943, s. 13) provides :

> " Subject to the provisions of this paragraph and of s. 39 of this Act, the commission shall pay the costs reasonably incurred by any person (a) in connection with the ascertainment of the person entitled to the compensation for a holding ; and (b) in a case in which the compensation for a holding is paid into court . . . or (c) in a case in which the compensation is paid otherwise than as aforesaid, in connection with any application to the court that > may be requisite for the purpose of determining the manner in which the compensation ought to be held and disposed of."

It will be remembered that para. 21 (6) provides :

> "Subject as aforesaid the compensation for a holding and the income thereof shall be held and disposed of in such manner as to confer on the existing owners whose interests are comprised in the holding, their personal representatives or assigns, the like benefits, so far as may be, as they would have had from their respective interests in the premises in which the holding subsisted if those premises had not been acquired by the commission."

As has been pointed out by counsel for the National Coal Board (the successors of the Coal Commission), everything that is said in para. 22 is subject to the provisions of s. 39 of the Act, which provides :

> "The provisions of this Part of this Act and the provisions of the Registration Act with respect to the payment of costs by the commission (other than the provisions of s. 11 of this Act) shall have effect subject to the following limitation, namely, that their liability shall not extend to costs incurred after the date of the passing of this Act that are occasioned by any proceedings for the determination of disputes between adverse claimants, and in giving effect to the provisions of this section regard shall be had so far as practicable to the principles observed in giving effect to the corresponding provisions of s. 80 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845."

That section of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, contains very similar provisions about adverse litigation and has been often the subject of decisions of the court. Counsel for the National Coal Board referred me to Re Bareham (5), Re English (6), and Re Longworth (7), all showing the principles on which the provisions of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, have been applied in dealing with claims by parties to money which has been paid into court in respect of land taken compulsorily under the provisions of some special Act incorporating the provisions of s. 80 of that Act. It is well known that the promoters do not pay the costs which are occasioned by adverse litigation as construed in a case of that kind, but those cases do not, in my view, apply to the present case. Though it is quite true that there may be competing claims before the court in the present case, it is not, in my view, a case of adverse litigation. The application was not caused by the adverse claims because the position of the parties, before the Act affected their interests, was quite well known. The trouble has been caused by the obscurity of certain provisions of the Coal Act and questions as to the proper construction of those provisions. It seems to me, therefore, that this is a case in which the costs of the present application down to and including to-day ought to be paid by the National Coal Board.

Order accordingly.

KNAPP v. RAILWAY EXECUTIVE.

[Court of Appeal (Tucker, Singleton and Jenkins, L.JJ.), July 21, 22, 25, 1949.]

Railways—Level crossing—Gate not securely closed—Accident to engine driver—Accident partly due to negligence of motorist—Motorist liable for compensation to engine driver—Right to recover contribution from railway company—Statute 7 and 8 Vict. c. lxvii (Brighton and Chichester Railway Act, 1844), s. 274—Law Reform (Married Women and Tortfeasors) Act, 1935 (c. 30), s. 6 (1) (c). A

The statute 7 and 8 Vict. c. lxvii (the Brighton and Chichester Railway Act, 1844), was passed to enable the Brighton and Chichester Railway to be built, and, by s. 272, roads were not to be crossed on a level by the railway except as otherwise provided. Section 273 specified the roads which might be crossed at a level and by s. 274 : " . . . in all cases wheer the . . . railway shall cross any . . . public highway on a level the . . . company shall erect and at all times maintain good and sufficient gates on each side of such . . . public highway, where the . . . railway shall communicate therewith, and shall employ proper persons to open and shut such gates, so that the persons, carts, and carriages passing along such . . . public highway shall not be exposed to any danger or damage by the passing of any carriages or engines along the . . . railway ; and such gates shall be kept constantly closed across each end of such . . . highway, except during the time when horses, cattle, carts, or carriages passing along such . . . highway shall have to cross such railway ; and such gates shall be . . . so constructed as when closed across the end of such . . . public highway to fence in the railway, and prevent cattle or horses passing along the road from entering upon the railway while the gates are closed . . . Provided always, that it shall be lawful for the Lords of the Committee of Her Majesty's Privy Council appointed for Trade and Foreign Plantations, in any case in which they are satisfied that it will be more conducive to the public safety that the gates on any level crossing . . . should be kept closed across the railway, to order . . . that such gates should be kept so closed, instead of across the road . . . except when engines or carriages passing along the . . . railway shall have occasion to cross the . . . road, in the same manner . . . as above directed with respect to the gates being kept closed across the . . . road . . ." B C D E

The provisions of s. 274 applied to a level crossing on a public highway from Lancing to Worthing, and an Order had been made under the proviso to the section directing that the gates should be kept closed across the railway except when engines or carriages passing along the railway should have occasion to cross the road. On approaching the level crossing in a motor car the plaintiff found the gate closed across the road and stopped his car about a car's length away, but, owing to the hand-brake being in some way released, the car moved slowly down the slope towards the level crossing and struck the gate. The gate was not securely fixed across the road as it should have been, with the result that it swung back across the railway line and was struck by a train which was approaching at high speed, the driver of the train being injured. The driver brought an action against the plaintiff, alleging that his injuries were caused by the plaintiff's negligence in allowing his car to strike the gate of the level crossing. The action was settled for £400 and the plaintiff brought an action against the railway company under the Law Reform (Married Women and Tortfeasors) Act, 1935, s. 6 (1) (c), alleging that they had contributed to the accident by failing to keep the gate securely closed, in breach of their duty under s. 274 of the Act of 1844.

HELD: on a true construction of the Act of 1844, the whole purport of s. 274 was merely to protect the road-using public against danger from the railway, and the words "conducive to the public safety" in the proviso meant the safety of the public using the highway and did not include persons who might be travelling on the railway. Therefore, the benefit of the section could not be claimed by a driver employed by the railway A company, and, as the driver had no right of action under the section, the plaintiff was not entitled to contribution from the railway company under the Law Reform (Married Women and Tortfeasors) Act, 1935, s. 6 (1) (c).

D APPEAL by the defendants, the Railway Executive, from a judgment of LEWIS, J., at Lewes Assizes, dated Apr. 4, 1949.

On approaching a level crossing at which the gates were closed across the road to allow a train to pass, the plaintiff accidently let his motor car strike the gate, which was not securely fixed as it should have been under the statute 7 and 8 Vict. c. lxvii (the Brighton and Chichester Railway Act, 1844), s. 274. As a E result, the gate swung back across the railway and was struck by an approaching train. The driver of the train was injured, and an action brought by him against the plaintiff claiming damages for negligence was settled for £400. The plaintiff thereupon brought an action against the defendants under the Law Reform (Married Women and Tortfeasors) Act, 1935, s. 6 (1) (c), claiming indemnity or, alternatively, such contribution as the court thought just, on the ground that F the defendants, or their predecessors, the Southern Railway Co., were guilty of a breach of statutory duty in failing to keep the gate securely closed. LEWIS, J., held that responsibility for the accident was due partly to a breach of statutory duty on the part of the Southern Railway Co., and partly to negligence on the part of the plaintiff, and he ordered the defendants to pay four-fifths of the damage and the plaintiff to bear one-fifth. The Court of G Appeal now held that s. 274 of the Act of 1844 was intended for the benefit of the users of the highway and that the driver had no right of action under the section, and, therefore, the plaintiff was not entitled to contribution under s. 6 (1) (c) of the Act of 1935. The facts appear in the judgment of SINGLETON, L.J.

H Beney, K.C., and Neil Lawson for the Railway Executive.
Berryman, K.C., and Harold J. Brown for the plaintiff.

TUCKER, L.J.: I will ask SINGLETON, L.J., to deliver the first judgment.

SINGLETON, L.J.: A somewhat unusual accident happened at the level crossing at Lancing, Sussex, on July 23, 1947. Mr. Knapp, the plaintiff, was driving his Austin 7 h.p. motor car from Lancing to Worthing and he had to cross the level crossing at Lancing. Normally the gates are closed across the railway, but as he approached they were closed across the road, which indicated that a train was approaching. The plaintiff stopped his car about a car's length from the gates on his near side of the road. He remained there for an appreciable time, and then, in some way which was not explained, the hand-brake was released and the car commenced to move down the slope towards the gates on the crossing. The car, which moved very slowly, struck the gate on the near side and the gate moved some degree across the railway line. A train, coming at some speed, struck the gate and the driver of the train was injured. The driver brought an action against the plaintiff, alleging that he had sustained his injuries through the negligence of the plaintiff in driving his car against the gate of the level crossing or in allowing the car to strike it. That action was settled for £400 and £43 costs. The plaintiff then brought this action against the Railway Executive, alleging that they, or their predecessors, the Southern Railway Co., were guilty of a breach of statutory duty or of negligence, and claiming, under the Law Reform (Married Women and Tortfeasors) Act, 1935, s. 6, indemnity or, alternatively, contribution to such an extent as to the court should seem just.

The particulars of the breaches of duty and of negligence are set out in the statement of claim. Under the heading of "Breaches of statutory duty," the allegations are:

> "Failing to maintain good or sufficient gates across the said road; failing to maintain the said gates so as to fence the said railway; failing to keep the said gates closed to road traffic when a train was approaching."

The particulars of negligence are:

> "Failing to provide the gates of the said level crossing with any or any sufficient stops."

The other allegations in the particulars of negligence are directed to the gates and the closing of the gates rather than to individual negligence on the part of any employee of the railway company. The case was heard at the Lewes Assizes before Lewis, J., who, on Apr. 4, 1949, decided that the responsibility for the accident was due partly to a breach of statutory duty on the part of the Southern Railway Co., and partly to negligence on the part of the plaintiff. He ordered the defendants, as successors of the railway company, to pay four-fifths of the damage, and the plaintiff to bear one-fifth of it. Against that judgment the Railway Executive appeal.

As I have said, the level crossing gates are normally closed across the railway, and when a train is approaching a signalman turns a wheel which causes the gates to move across the highway from their normal position more or less at right-angles to the railway track. There are back-stops to prevent the gates going too far, and preceding those back-stops there are tumblers to prevent the gates, after striking the back-stops, from returning too far and on to the railway line. The back-stops and the tumblers should keep the gates in the proper closed position until the signalman moves them again. On the occasion in question the gate which the plaintiff's car struck had gone back over the tumblers so that, when it was struck by his motor car, there was nothing to stop it moving, and it went on into the track of the train which was approaching at a high speed. On the finding of the learned judge there was nothing wrong with the mechanism of the gates. He said that the device was as near perfection as could be contrived, and he added:

> "The only thing that can be said is that when the gates were swung back to an angle of ninety degrees so as to block the road, the gates came up against the back-stop with some force and bounced back clear of the tumbler, which was then, of course, not fixed, and the signalman did not observe that."

These general observations may be made. (i) The plaintiff relied in the action solely on breach of statutory duty by the railway company, and he did not allege personal negligence on the part of the signalman. (ii) The driver of the train had sued the plaintiff alone. If he had joined the Railway Executive as defendants and had alleged that the signalman was negligent, he would have been met by the defence of common employment. The case was conducted at Lewes on that basis. The pleadings were drawn, and the case was argued A in this court on that basis, but this morning counsel for the plaintiff pointed out to the court that everyone so far had overlooked the Employers' Liability Act, 1880, s. 1, which provides :

> " Where after the commencement of this Act personal injury is caused to a workman . . . (5) By reason of the negligence of any person in the service of the employer who has the charge or control of any signal, points, B locomotive engine, or train upon a railway, the workman, or in case the injury results in death, the legal personal representatives of the workman, and any persons entitled in case of death, shall have the same right of compensation and remedies against the employer as if the workman had not been a workman of nor in the service of the employer, nor engaged in his work."

C It does not seem to me necessary to consider that matter. The action by the driver of the train was not brought under the Employers' Liability Act, 1880, s. 1 (5), nor was the plaintiff's action, nor was that position ever considered in the course of the trial at Lewes. If there had been an action based on the Employers' Liability Act, 1880, there might have had to be considered the limit of time for the recovery of compensation set out in s. 4 of that Act, and D other considerations might have arisen. Although counsel for the plaintiff was right in bringing that matter to the notice of the court, it does not apply, so it seems to me, to this action in any degree. Again, if the driver had joined the railway company or the Railway Executive in his action as defendants and had alleged against them a breach of statutory duty, the same questions would have arisen for determination as fall to be determined on this appeal.

E The claim before LEWIS, J., was made under the Law Reform (Married Women and Tortfeasors) Act, 1935, s. 6, which provides:

> " (1) Where damage is suffered by any person as a result of a tort (whether a crime or not) . . . (c) any tortfeasor liable in respect of that damage may recover contribution from any other tortfeasor who is, or would if sued have been, liable in respect of the same damage, whether F as a joint tortfeasor or otherwise, so, however, that no person shall be entitled to recover contribution under this section from any person entitled to be indemnified by him in respect of the liability in respect of which the contribution is sought. (2) In any proceedings for contribution under this section the amount of the contribution recoverable from any person shall be such as may be found by the court to be just and equitable having G regard to the extent of that person's responsibility for the damage . . ."

It is clear from the provisions of this section that the plaintiff was not entitled to succeed in his action against the railway company unless the driver of the train could have done so.

The statement of claim shows that when this action was commenced the H case for the plaintiff was based on the Railway Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, s. 47. In reality the position is governed by the statute 7 and 8 Vict. c. lxvii, which is entitled:

> " An Act for making a railway from the Shoreham Branch of the London and Brighton Railway to Chichester."

That Act, which was passed in 1844—a year before the general Act—remains in force, and the statement of claim was amended accordingly. There is an important difference between those two Acts. Section 272 of 7 and 8 Vict.

c. lxvii provided that roads were not to be crossed on a level by the railway except as otherwise provided, and s. 273 provided that certain roads (of which this road was one) might be crossed on a level. It was under this section that the level crossing at which this accident happened was made. Section 274 provided what should be done where the railway was to cross any turnpike road or public highway on a level. The road which the plaintiff was using was a public highway leading from Lancing to Worthing, a highway existing A long before the railway was contemplated, and the provisions of s. 274 apply to that road. Section 274 reads:

> " And be it enacted, that in all cases where the said railway shall cross any turnpike road or public highway on a level the said company shall erect and at all times maintain good and sufficient gates on each side of such turnpike road or public highway, where the said railway shall communicate therewith, B and shall employ proper persons to open and shut such gates, so that the persons, carts, and carriages passing along such turnpike road or public highway shall not be exposed to any danger or damage by the passing of any carriages or engines along the said railway ; and such gates shall be kept constantly closed across each end of such turnpike road or public highway, except during the time when horses, cattle, C carts, or carriages passing along such turnpike road or public highway shall have to cross such railway ; and such gates shall be of such dimensions and so constructed as when closed across the end of such turnpike road or public highway to fence in the railway, and prevent cattle or horses passing along the road from entering upon the railway while the gates are closed ; D and the person intrusted with the care of such gates shall cause the same to be closed as soon as such horses, cattle, carts, or carriages shall have passed through the same, under a penalty of £5 for any default therein : Provided always, that it shall be lawful for the Lords of the Committee of Her Majesty's Privy Council appointed for Trade and Foreign Plantations, in any case in which they are satisfied that it will be more conducive to the public safety that the gates on any level crossing over E any such turnpike road or public highway should be kept closed across the railway, to order and direct that such gates should be kept so closed, instead of across the road, and in such last-mentioned case such gates shall be kept constantly closed across the railway, except when engines or carriages passing along the said railway shall have occasion to cross the said road, in the same manner and under the like penalty as above directed F with respect to the gates being kept closed across the said road . . ."

An order was made under the latter part of that section that the gates should be kept closed across the railway except when engines or carriages passing along the railway should have occasion to cross the road. Probably that was done because the railway traffic was not very heavy at that time and it was thought more conducive to public safety. G It is to be observed that the latter part of the section is not explicit as to what shall be done when the gates are across the road in such a case, but I assume, for the purposes of this judgment, that the requirements as to the gates apply in just the same way as if the normal position for them was across the road, as in the earlier part of the section.

The claim of the plaintiff against the Railway Executive was that the gate with which his car came into contact was not properly closed, and that, if it H had been, his slowly-moving small car would not have caused it to encroach on the railway track, and that in this way there was a breach of duty by the Railway Executive which contributed to the accident. The Railway Executive's answer to that was that the plaintiff was not entitled to succeed unless the driver had a claim against them, but the driver had no such claim for the simple reason that no duty under the section was owed to him, and, therefore, neither the plaintiff nor the driver could complain of any breach of duty under the section. There arises a question of the construction of s. 274 of the Act of 1844. On a matter of this kind decisions of the courts on other sections of other Acts of Parliament are not always helpful, but counsel for the Railway Executive drew the attention of the court to Buxton v. North Eastern Ry. Co. (1), where a question arose as to the liability of the railway company to a passenger who was injured through the train coming into contact with a bullock which had A got on to the line through a defective fence. The action was founded on the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, s. 68, which begins:

> "The company shall make and at all times thereafter maintain the following works for the accommodation of the owners and occupiers of lands adjoining the railway . . ."

At the trial, after a direction from KELLY, C.B., the jury found a verdict for B the plaintiff with £800 damages, but a rule was obtained to enter a non-suit, and on the hearing of that BLACKBURN, J., said (L.R. 3 Q.B. 553):

> "It is clear that by s. 68 such an obligation is created with regard to the owners and occupiers of adjoining lands, but the proviso shows that the obligation is created with reference to owners and occupiers only; C for it enacts that if a bargain be made with them, the company shall be freed from that liability. The obligation, therefore, as to their passengers, to fence, is not imposed on the company by that section; and it is consequently necessary to consider the nature and extent of the company's duty at common law."

LUSH, J., said (ibid., 554):

> D "It remains to consider whether his [the Chief Baron's] direction was correct. It is clear that he stated to the jury that if the company did not comply with the provisions of s. 68, they were guilty of a breach of duty towards the passengers. I think the Chief Baron was mistaken, and that the obligation imposed by s. 68 has nothing to do with the duty of a railway company towards their passengers; it exists solely between a E railway company and the owners and occupiers of the adjoining lands."

A new trial was ordered on other points arising in the case.

Counsel for the plaintiff referred us to the judgment of KELLY, C.B., in Gorris v. Scott (2), which is on quite a different subject, but in the course of it the learned Chief Baron used these words (L.R. 9 Exch. 128):

> F "The principle may be well illustrated by the case put in argument of a breach by a railway company of its duty to erect a gate on a level crossing, and to keep the gate closed except when the crossing is being actually and properly used. The object of the precaution is to prevent injury from being sustained through animals or vehicles being upon the line at unseasonable times; and if by reason of such a breach of duty, either in not G erecting the gate, or in not keeping it closed, a person attempts to cross with a carriage at an improper time, and injury ensues to a passenger, no doubt an action would lie against the railway company, because the intention of the legislature was that, by the erection of the gates and by their being kept closed individuals should be protected against accidents of this description."

H It is said that the learned Chief Baron must have been dealing with a case arising under the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, s. 47, but he did not so say, nor is it clear that he was referring to a case of a passenger in a train, and still less could he have had in mind the case of an employee of the railway company. It was submitted by counsel for the plaintiff that, if the protection extended to a passenger, it covered an engine driver. Furthermore, the Order as to the way in which the gates should normally be kept was made on the ground that it was "more conducive to the public safety," and counsel for the plaintiff submitted that that was the main consideration of the section, from which it was argued that it would be illogical to read the section as covering one class only, namely, the users of the highway.

Our attention was also called to the words of PHILLIMORE, J., in Parkinson v. Garstang and Knott End Ry. Co. (3), where he said ([1910] 1 K.B. 620):

> "But it is important to observe that it has been decided that the duty of the company under s. 47 [of the Act of 1845] is a duty to every member of the public, and that even if a straying animal or a straying child of tender years gets on to the railway, owing to the gates not being kept closed, the company are liable if injury occurs."

Assuming that that sentence expresses the law correctly, and that it would apply in the case of an employee of the railway company, nevertheless it provides no guide to the present case. The Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, s. 47, is in general terms. It begins:

> "If the railway cross any turnpike road or public carriage road on a level, the company shall erect and at all times maintain good and sufficient gates across such road, on each side of the railway, where the same shall communicate therewith, and shall employ proper persons to open and shut such gates . . ."

To arrive at a decision in the present case one must look at the Act of 1844 as a whole and then at the terms of s. 274. The purpose of the Act was the making of a railway, as its title shows. It went on to say that roads should not be crossed on a level except in certain specified cases, of which this crossing was one, and that in those cases provision as to gates, etc., must be made:

> " . . . so that the persons, carts, and carriages passing along such turnpike road or public highway shall not be exposed to any danger or damage by the passing of any carriages or engines along the said railway . . ."

To my mind, that shows quite clearly that the protection was intended to be for the users of the highway. The highway had been there from time immemorial, and, if the promoters wished to cross it on the level, they were to be allowed to do so only if they took proper precautions for the safety of the users of the highway. I do not think it can be said that the benefit of this section can be claimed by a driver employed by the railway company. The legislature was not concerned with that, in so far as s. 274 goes. In those days an employee was considered as undertaking the risks of his employment, including the risk of injury through negligence on the part of a fellow employee. The driver had no right of action against his employers under this section, and it follows that the plaintiff is not entitled to contribution. In my opinion, the appeal should be allowed.

JENKINS, L.J. : I agree. Having regard to the course taken by this litigation up to the present moment and to the form of the pleading and the argument before us, I think that the appeal must be regarded as turning simply on the question whether the engine driver was owed a statutory duty by the railway company under s. 274 of the private Act of 1844, 7 and 8 Vict. c. lxvii, in respect of a breach of which, arising when the plaintiff's car collided with the level crossing gate, the driver could have recovered damages from the railway company. As my Lord has said, the matter, therefore, resolves itself simply into a question of the true construction of s. 274 of the Act.

In considering actions in respect of breaches of statutory duty, two questions arise : (i) whether the plaintiff is a person to whom a statutory duty is owed ; and (ii) whether, if he is, the statute provides a remedy by way of penalty which was intended to be exhaustive. We have been referred in the course of the argument to some of the cases in which the imposition of a penalty by a section has been held, with other indications, to exclude any personal right of action on the part of some person aggrieved. That question does not arise here, because it is plain from the decision in Charman v. South Eastern Ry. Co. (4) that a section such as s. 274 of the Act of 1844, or the corresponding s. 47 of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, is not one of those where the remedy is limited to the recovery of a penalty. Accordingly, anyone to whom a duty is owed by the railway company under s. 274 who can show

A that he has suffered damage through a breach of that duty may recover damages, but first he must show that he is a person to whom a duty is owed. Reading s. 274 in the context provided by the other sections of the Act, it seems to me that it is reasonably plain that this is a section designed to protect the public against the railway and not the railway against the public. It is one of the conditions under which the railway company, for the purposes of
B its undertaking, is to be allowed to carry its lines across the public highway, and the legislature permits that to be done only on condition that proper precautions are taken by means of the gates prescribed by the section to ensure that members of the public using the highway, either themselves or their carriages or animals, and so forth, are not injured by the passage of trains. It seems to me clearly that that is the object and intention of the section,
C and the duties, whatever they may be, of the railway company to its servants and to persons with whom it contracts to carry them or their goods on the line is an entirely different matter. The first part of s. 274 of the Act of 1844 provides that the railway company:

> " . . . shall employ proper persons to open and shut such gates, so that the persons, carts and carriages passing along such turnpike road
> D or public highway shall not be exposed to any danger or damage by the passing of any carriages or engines along the said railway . . ."

In those words it seems to me that the section defines the class of person to whom the company owes a duty. If it had been intended to include passengers on the railway, or servants of the company driving or travelling on a train, the section inevitably would have gone on to add : " and so that carriages
E or engines passing along the railway shall not be exposed to any danger or damage by the passing of persons, carts and carriages along the turnpike road or public highway." In my judgment, the insertion of additional words of that kind into the section would be contrary to all the principles of construction. I think it is clear that no such words ought to be read into the section.

The conflict of interest with which the legislature is here dealing is clearly
F a conflict between the road-using public, on the one hand, and the railway company, on the other hand, and the whole purport of the section is to protect the road-using public against the railway company, it being assumed that the railway company, having got its power of running over the railway, will so manage its affairs that its traffic can proceed in safety. Counsel for the plaintiff placed some reliance on the expression " conducive to the public G safety " in the provisions dealing with the circumstances in which the normal routine with regard to keeping the gates shut across the road may be varied by substituting the routine of normally keeping the gates shut across the railway, but I think the words " public safety " there mean the safety of the public using the highway and do not include persons who may be travelling on the railway. I do not think persons travelling on the railway fall within the category of H " the public " for the purposes of this section. They are persons who have entered into contacts with the railway company to be conveyed as passengers, and it is not with their safety that the section is concerned.

I think that a close parallel is really to be found in s. 68 of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, which was dealt with in Buxton v. North Eastern Ry. Co. (1) to which SINGLETON, L.J., has referred. The language of the two sections is by no means exactly the same, but there is a close resemblance and I think that the principle which was applied in Buxton's case (1) is to be applied in considering s. 274 of the private Act of 1844. If I may add a word about Gorris v. Scott (2), I confess that on a first reading of the passage cited from the judgment of KELLY, C.B., (L.R. 9 Exch. 128), I was left under the impression that the hypothetical passenger, whom the learned Chief Baron assumed to be injured, was intended by him to be a passenger in a train. If the passage were so read, it would be an expression of a view directly contrary to the one which I have adopted. But when the A passage is looked at again, I agree that it is really quite plain that the hypothetical situation with which the Chief Baron was dealing there was the case of someone attempting to cross with a carriage, with passengers in the carriage, at an improper time, and that the injured person, whom he describes as a passenger, was intended by him to be a passenger in the carriage crossing the level crossing on the highway, and not a passenger in a railway carriage. B So read, the passage accords with the conclusion I have formed, viz., that a statutory duty is owed to the users of the road, who are the persons which the section is designed to protect, and not to the users of the railway, who, if injured by the negligence of the railway company, must pursue such remedies as they have on other grounds. For these reasons, I agree that the appeal should be allowed. C

TUCKER, L.J. : I agree with the interpretation which has been put on s. 274 of the Act of 1844 by my brethren, and I am strengthened in that conclusion by an examination of the Act as a whole. I can find no indication in it that it was designed for the protection or the benefit of passengers on the railway. I think that in interpreting this Act it is helpful to bear in mind D what was said by LORD CAIRNS, L.C. (2 Ex. D. 448) in Atkinson v. Newcastle Waterworks Co. (5):

> " I cannot but think that that must, to a great extent, depend on the purview of the legislature in the particular statute, and the language which they have there employed, and more especially when, as here, the Act with which the court have to deal is not an Act of public and general E policy, but is rather in the nature of a private legislative bargain with a body of undertakers as to the manner in which they will keep up certain public works."

In the present case we have arrived at a decision different from that to which the learned trial judge came, but, as so often happens, the case has been argued F on rather different lines from those on which it was dealt with in the court below. This point was clearly taken, but a number of other points were also taken and the authorities which were cited did not include any of those which have been cited to the court on the present occasion. Therefore, LEWIS, J., did not, I think, have his attention directed to s. 274 of the Act of 1844 to such an extent as we have had ours, nor did he have the benefit of considering G the authorities to which we have been referred, although it is perfectly true that none of those authorities is very directly in point. In dealing with this matter, after referring to the submissions that had been made by counsel for the Railway Executive, the learned judge said :

> " I venture to think that that is an argument to which I should not accede. One can think of all sorts of cases. If there are level crossing H gates which are not fastened but are across the highway and a slight gust of wind blows one gate across the line and causes a railway accident and damage to persons in the train, is it to be said that, because the duty of the Railway Executive in regard to level crossing gates is only to people using the highway, the Railway Executive would be absolved from liability, the only negligence being if they do not put up a proper gate ? I doubt it. I do not accede to the suggestion that this action is not maintainable in that the duty owed by the Railway Executive is not a duty to anybody in the train."

With regard to that, the submission that was made in the present case, and with which we agree, is that this section, which imposes an absolute obligation on the railway company, was not designed for the protection, and is not couched in language apt to include the protection, of passengers on the railway, but, A of course, it does not in the least follow, and there can be no doubt whatever, that, if a passenger in a railway train is injured by the improper manipulation of a gate at a level crossing, the Railway Executive would be liable either on the ground of the individual negligence of one of their servants or on the ground that their system was at fault, and it is difficult to envisage a case of the kind referred to by the learned judge in which the Railway Executive could escape B liability. Here we are dealing with quite a different matter, viz., the absolute obligation imposed under s. 274 of the Act of 1844. For the reasons stated, I agree that this appeal succeeds.

Appeal allowed with costs here and in the court below.

D [CHANCERY DIVISION (Harman, J.), July 11, 1949.]

Practice—Master's certificate—Discharge or variation after expiration of time limited—"Special circumstances"—Change of solicitors—Illness of solicitor's managing clerk—R.S.C., Ord. 55, r. 71.

By R.S.C., Ord. 55, r. 71 : "The judge may, if the special circumstances of the case require it, upon an application by motion or summons for the E purpose, direct a certificate to be discharged or varied at any time after the same has become binding on the parties."

In a partnership action an account was ordered and was referred to an official referee who gave his decision on Feb. 22, 1949, his certificate, which was treated as the master's certificate, being filed on Mar. 1, 1949. The plaintiff intended to apply for the certificate to be discharged or varied, F but failed to do so within the eight days allowed by R.S.C., Ord. 55, r. 70, for the reasons that on Feb. 7 he had changed his solicitors, the new solicitors were not in possession of all the papers until Feb. 24, and, just at that time, their managing clerk fell ill and was away from work for a fortnight. On Mar. 29, 1949, the plaintiff took out a summons asking for an extension of time to apply and for the discharge and variation of the official referee's G certificate. The summons was heard by the master on Apr. 12, but was dismissed on the ground that there were no special circumstances warranting an extension of time, and on May 11, an application by the plaintiff for the matter to be adjourned into court was refused by the master. The plaintiff thereupon brought a motion under R.S.C., Ord. 55, r. 71, on the ground that the change of solicitors and the illness of their managing H clerk were "special circumstances" within the meaning of the rule.

HELD : the change of solicitors did not constitute "special circumstances" within the meaning of R.S.C., Ord. 55, r. 71, and, although there might be some hardship in the illness of the managing clerk, mere hardship was insufficient to justify an application under R.S.C., Ord. 55, r. 71, and, therefore, the application must be refused.

Motion under R.S.C., Ord. 55, r. 71, to discharge or vary a certificate of the master filed on Mar. 1, 1949.

In a partnership action, an account, ordered on June 6, 1947, was referred to the official referee by an order dated June, 22, 1948. The official referee's B decision was given on Feb. 22, 1949, and his certificate, which was treated as the master's certificate, was filed on Mar. 1, 1949. The plaintiff intended to apply for the certificate to be varied or discharged, but he did not do so within the eight days allowed for that purpose by R.S.C., Ord. 55, r. 70, for the following reasons. On Feb. 5, 1949, he had changed his solicitors and notice of the change was filed on Feb. 7, but there was delay in forwarding the papers to the new C solicitors who were not in possession of them until Feb. 24. Meanwhile, on Feb. 22, a bill of costs amounting to £2,500 (untaxed) was sent by the original solicitors to the new solicitors and required several days' study, and at that time the managing clerk to the new solicitors who dealt with the matter was away from work for fourteen days owing to illness. As a result, the summons asking for an extension of time to apply and for the discharge and variation of the certificate D filed on Mar. 1, 1949, was not issued until Mar. 29, 1949. It was heard on Apr. 12, 1949, and was dismissed by the master on the ground that there were no special circumstances warranting an extension of time. Counsel for the plaintiff was in court at the time, and, therefore, he was unable to be present at the hearing before the master, but he was represented by a pupil. No request was made to the master at the hearing to adjourn the matter into court. The managing clerk to E the plaintiff's solicitors tried to remedy this omission on the following day, but he was told that the application must be made by counsel. The application was then made by counsel on May 3 when the master directed that it should be heard in the presence of the defendant's counsel. On May 11 the application was again made to the master in the presence of counsel for the defendant and it was refused. The plaintiff then brought this motion under R.S.C., F Ord. 55, r. 71, and Harman, J., dismissed it with costs.

Aronson, K.C., and L. Halpern for the plaintiff.
J. L. Arnold for the defendant.

HARMAN, J. : This is a motion to vary the master's certificate filed on Mar. 1, 1949, and is admittedly out of time. The question for consideration is G whether the special circumstances of the case bring it within R.S.C., Ord. 55, r. 71, which reads :

> " The judge may, if the special circumstances of the case require it, upon an application by motion or summons for the purpose, direct a certificate to be discharged or varied at any time after the same has become binding on the parties." H

[His Lordship reviewed the facts and continued :] On Apr. 12 the plaintiffs failed to follow the usual practice of asking the master to adjourn the matter into court, and the application did not come before the master until May 3 when he directed that it should be heard in the presence of the defendant's counsel. On May 11 the application was heard by the master in the presence of counsel for both parties, and was dismissed. I refuse to prejudice the plaintiff's application because of these delays, but a more formidable obstacle arises under R.S.C., Ord. 55, r. 71. Are there any special circumstances which would justify me in varying the order of the official referee? It is important that litigants should not be shut out from their rights, but it is equally important that a litigant who has obtained a judgment in his favour should not have it taken away from him except in very special circumstances. It is in the public interest that there should be an end of litigation. In Dunn v. Beausire (1) the Court of Appeal held that mere mistake and hardship were insufficient to justify an application under R.S.C., Ord. 55, r. 71. The question is whether there was here anything more than mere mistake and hardship. I have been referred to Briant v. Tebbut (2), Reeve v. Reeve (3), and Re Martin (4), and, finally, to Re Love (Gregory) & Co. (5), which is the high-water-mark of the plaintiff's case. In Re Love (Gregory) & Co. (5), however, the position was quite different from the position here, as in that case the application was made by a new liquidator in the winding-up of a company and the matter had never been considered inter partes whereas in the present case there has been a long hearing before the official referee. The special circumstances are said to be the change of solicitors and the illness of the managing clerk. The change of solicitors does not constitute "special circumstances," and, although there may be some hardship in the illness of the managing clerk, I have come to the conclusion that in the present case there are no special circumstances within the meaning of R.S.C., Ord. 55, r. 71. Accordingly, the motion will be dismissed with costs.

Motion dismissed with costs.

R. v. CENTRAL PROFESSIONAL COMMITTEE FOR OPTICIANS. Ex parte BROWN.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Oliver and Stable, JJ.), July 21, 22, 1949.]

National Health Service—Ophthalmic services—Ophthalmic optician—Qualification—Advisory committee—Duties and powers—Scope and method of investigation — National Health Service (Executive Council) Regulations, 1947 (S.R. & O., 1947, No. 889), reg. 19 (2).

By para. 19 (2) of the National Health Service (Executive Council) Regulations, 1947, it is provided: "The qualifications required by an ophthalmic optician for the purpose of Part IV of and sched. VII to the Act and these regulations shall be that . . . (c) he had been in practice as an ophthalmic optician, for fifteen out of the previous twenty years, including five years between Oct. 1, 1930, and Sept. 30, 1937, . . . and that he shall, to the satisfaction of the Minister, acting on the advice of a committee to be recognised by him for the purpose of approving such qualifications, have had adequate, including recent, experience as an ophthalmic optician."

In or about August, 1948, the applicant applied to the appropriate committee under the regulations to approve his professional qualifications so as to enable him to provide ophthalmic services under the National Health Service Act, 1946. There was some delay by the committee due, first, to an admitted misdirection by the Minister, and subsequently to inquiries which the committee caused to be made on its behalf by a local committee into such matters as the accommodation and equipment which the applicant could provide, and the nature of the records which he kept. After leave to move for mandamus was given by the court, the applicant was asked by the committee to attend a hospital for a test of his ability to carry out the duties of an ophthalmic optician. He refused this request. It was contended on his behalf that the delay of the committee in dealing with his application was equivalent to a refusal to do so.

HELD: that the duty of the committee under the regulations was not to sit and hold a judicial or semi-judicial enquiry, but to give advice to the Minister, and that, to perform that duty, they were entitled to obtain any information they desired in any manner they wished, including a practical test of an applicant's ability. The investigations which they caused to be made by a local committee were germane to their duty of finding out whether the applicant had adequate recent experience, and were not outside the ambit of the regulations. There was no delay amounting to a wilful refusal to deal with the application, and, further, the applicant's refusal to undergo the test requested by the committee was a compelling reason for the refusal of an order of mandamus.

MOTION for mandamus.

On May 17, 1947, the applicant obtained leave to apply for an order of mandamus directed to the Central Professional Committee for Opticians, requiring them to consider and determine an application for approval of his professional qualifications as an ophthalmic optician. The ground of the application was that there had been unreasonable delay amounting to a refusal to determine his application. The application was dismissed. The facts appear in the headnote and in the judgment of LORD GODDARD, C.J.

Caplan for the applicant.

Littman (H. L. Parker with him) for the respondents.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: In this case counsel for the applicant obtained leave to move for an order of mandamus directed to the Central Professional Committee for Opticians, requiring them to consider and determine an application for approval of professional qualifications to entitle the applicant to provide supplementary ophthalmic services. The grounds on which the relief was sought were (a) that the application was made to the committee in or about January, 1948; (b) that the applicant personally and by his agents, since the said application was made, had continually written to the committee requesting it to consider and determine the application; (c) that the committee had failed and continued to fail to consider and determine the application; and (d) that, because of the failure of the committee to consider and determine the application, the applicant had been, and continued to be, deprived of the chance of providing supplementary ophthalmic services under the National Health Service Act, 1946. I am satisfied that there has been no failure by the committee to consider the application. Although there may have been delay, there has certainly not been such delay or such conduct on the part of the committee as can amount to a refusal.

The matter arises under s. 41 of the National Health Service Act, 1946, and the regulations made thereunder. The scheme of the section is that, under the Act, certain supplementary services can be given, among them, ophthalmic services. In other words, insured persons can get their eyes tested by opticians and obtain spectacles from them. To enable this service to be provided, the Minister has made the National Health Service (Executive Council) Regulations, 1947, reg. 19 (2) of which provides:

> "The qualifications required by an ophthalmic optician for the purpose of Part IV of and sched. VII to the Act and these regulations shall be that (a) he was in possession of one of the following diplomas or certificates..."

There are then set out certain diplomas and certificates from bodies who the Minister recognises are competent to give diplomas. Then it is provided that a person who :

> "(b) . . . was immediately before the appointed day an optician on the list of the Ophthalmic Benefit Approved Committee constituted under the National Health Insurance Act, 1936" may be one of the people to be registered, and the last class of persons to be registered are those who :

> "(c) . . . had been in practice as an ophthalmic optician for fifteen out of the previous twenty years, including five years between Oct. 1, 1930, and Sept. 30, 1937."

There follows this clause, which applies to all these people :

> "and that he shall, to the satisfaction of the Minister acting on the advice of a committee to be recognised by him for the purpose of approving such qualifications, have had adequate, including recent, experience as an ophthalmic optician."

The duty, therefore, of a committee which the Minister has set up to advise him—we are concerned with the London Optical Committee in this case—is, among other things, to advise the Minister whether the applicant for registration has had adequate and recent experience as an ophthalmic optician. That means that if a person is reported on by this committee as qualified for registration, he will get on the register and be entitled to treat insured persons. It is, therefore, of the utmost importance that before the Minister allows an applicant to be put on the register, he should be satisfied that he is one to whom the welfare, so far as the eyes are concerned, of insured persons can safely be entrusted. Before the committee give their advice, therefore, it is desirable and necessary that they should make the fullest and most careful enquiry to satisfy themselves that the applicant has adequate and recent experience as an ophthalmic optician.

The London Optical Committee began work by asking a local optician committee to make some enquiries on their behalf. It seems to me that it was quite within their power to do so. Under the regulations, the committee are not to sit and hold a judicial or semi-judicial inquiry. They have to give advice to the Minister. Before they can give advice to the Minister they must satisfy themselves as to the sort of advice they are to give, and, in preparing themselves to give advice, they can seek what information they like and in any way they like. It is necessary to enable them to give proper and honest advice that they should satisfy themselves as to the adequacy of the experience of the ophthalmic optician who is the applicant, and it seems to me it is open to them to accept any advice or assistance they can get in coming to that conclusion.

One complaint that is made here is that the London Optical Committee were asked to enquire into the following questions : "What accommodation does the applicant provide ?" "What equipment has the applicant ? Give a list if possible." "What type of records does the applicant keep ? Are they adequate ?" "Can he satisfactorily undertake an ordinary routine eye examination ? (the applicant should be asked to carry this out on one of the persons visiting him)." Then there is a space for "Remarks." All those seem to be perfectly legitimate questions. They are matters of enquiry in determining whether the person has adequate and recent experience. It may be that he has no consulting room of his own, and that he has no equipment of his own. It is easy for him to explain that by saying, if it be the fact : "I have no consulting room of my own at the present time because I have always worked for an employer who provided the consulting room, but if I am put on the list I shall get a consulting room." It is also possible for him to say : "I have no equipment because I have always used my employer's equipment." That would be a satisfactory answer though the committee might want to be satisfied that, if he was put on this list, he would be able to provide himself with these things. Otherwise it would be impossible to say that he was a genuine practising ophthalmic optician.

In my opinion, the enquiries which the committee were endeavouring to carry out were germane to the duties which they had to perform, germane to the duty of finding out whether the applicant had adequate recent experience, and I cannot think that, in any of the questions they asked, they went outside the ambit of the regulations. It is true they might have done other things. It is true they might have written to the various referees whose names the applicant had given on his first application, but, because they might have done something else, it does not follow that what they did was wrong or was a cause of any unreasonable delay. In the circumstances we now know, there was nothing that can be attributed to the committee as a wilful delay that would amount to a refusal to get to work.

One compelling reason why this court should refuse an order for mandamus is that after leave was obtained from the court to move the committee wrote to the applicant's solicitor asking that he should go to the London Refraction Hospital so that they could give him an interview and a test. What better thing could the committee offer than that ? Having to satisfy themselves as to the applicant's experience, which means his capabilities, they said : "Come to this London Refraction Hospital and show us that you are capable of carrying out the duties of an ophthalmic optician." He refused to go, and said: "You have no right to examine me." I do not agree. I think the committee have every right in any case to examine anybody they like. If they want to find out whether a man has adequate experience, there is no better way than by his giving a practical demonstration to show that he has adequate experience. The applicant refused to go, and, therefore, he has no ground whatever for asking this court to issue a mandamus to the committee. In my opinion, the right order to make is that the motion be dismissed with costs, but, in view of the fact that no answer was sent to repeated letters, I feel that there was some ground for the applicant applying to the court. Therefore, I think that on the taxation of costs, he should be allowed to set off the costs which were incurred by him in making the application to the court.

OLIVER, J. : I agree. I think the committee have not only the right, but the very serious public duty, to make the closest investigation to ascertain that every applicant for a position on this list has had adequate, including recent, experience. Provided that the committee restricts its investigations to those points, I think they may make any enquiry they choose, including the invitation to an applicant to demonstrate. If they do so, I do not think that any criticism of their conduct is justified.

STABLE, J. : I agree, but, as this matter is of obvious public importance, I should like to add a few words to the judgments that have already been given. The Minister is entrusted with the duty of ensuring that opticians to whom insured persons resort under the National Health Service Act, 1946, are competent. Under the Act of Parliament the Minister has prescribed the qualifications for admission to the list. The regulations which have been referred to set out the various qualifications, and conclude: "and that he shall, to the satisfaction of the Minister acting on the advice of a committee to be recognised by him for the purpose of approving such qualifications, have had adequate, including recent, experience as an ophthalmic optician." It is important to point out that it is to the satisfaction of the Minister. I observe this statement in the letter that the applicant received from the Ministry of Health, dated Dec. 10, 1948 : "The responsibility for drawing up that list, involving as it does purely professional considerations, rests wholly with the Central Professional Committee for Opticians." It seems to me plain, however, that the only duty of the committee is to advise the Minister. It is not altogether easy to construe the words in the regulation which I have read, but, in my judgment, the proper meaning is that the applicant must show that he has adequate and recent experience, to the satisfaction of the Minister acting on the advice of the committee. The duty of the committee is this. In dealing with each case they must satisfy themselves that the applicant has got the qualification he claims to have. In the present case that does not arise because the applicant bases his application on the ground that he has been in practice as an ophthalmic optician for fifteen out of twenty years. He says : "I am entitled to come on this list, because, although I have not a professional qualification degree, I am a thoroughly competent man who has earned his bread and butter in that way for many years." The committee must satisfy themselves of that. I do not see how they can satisfy themselves that the applicant's experience is adequate unless they satisfy themselves that he has profited by the experience he has had. Therefore, it seems to me that it is the duty of the committee to subject an applicant, who bases his application on his competence as a practitioner, to some legitimate and suitable test.

In my opinion, the committee have to be careful to keep in mind precisely what is their function. It is, in my judgment, exactly as I have stated it. I do not want to say too much, but inasmuch as the applicant answered this question in full, if I had been investigating whether or not a man really had practised as an ophthalmic optician for a period of years, going back to 1911, I should have applied to the persons to whom he had referred in the application. It was, perhaps, a little unfortunate that this committee proceeded to investigate what accommodation and what equipment the applicant had got, more particularly as it is obvious from his application that he had never acted as a principal but had always been employed. A man may be a perfectly competent practitioner although he has not an expensive establishment where he sees his patients and not the necessary apparatus, which, he says, has been supplied by his employers. The applicant was mistaken in refusing to subject himself to the test. One hopes that all this time and money has not been wasted, and that the result of it will be that an early investigation will be made to ascertain whether the applicant really has the qualifications he claims he has got and, if he has, that he will be put on the register.

Motion dismissed.

[Court of Appeal (Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., Somervell and Denning, L.JJ.), July 26, 27, 1949.]

Rent Restriction—Possession—Dwelling-house required for employee—Certificate by county agricultural committee—Death of farm worker referred to in certificate—Another farm worker engaged—No new certificate obtained—Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions (Amendment) Act, 1933 (c. 32), sched. I, para. (g) (ii).

The plaintiffs, who were farmers, bought a cottage in which the defendant lived in the hope of installing one of their farm workers in it. They obtained from the county agricultural committee a certificate under para. (g) (ii) of sched. I to the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions (Amendment) Act, 1933, which stated that the "farm worker for whose occupation the cottage . . . is required is employed on work necessary for the proper working of the [plaintiffs'] agricultural holding." After the certificate had been granted this farm worker died, and the plaintiffs engaged another man who was ready to undertake the work if he could have possession of the cottage. The plaintiffs, without getting any further certificate, claimed possession of the cottage. The defendant contended that the certificate applied only to the farm worker who had died, but this objection was overruled by the county court judge who made an order for possession. On appeal, Held: the identity of the individual to be employed was not a material part of the certificate, the object of which was to certify that the landlord was in need of an agricultural worker of a particular type, and so the fact that the man who was about to do the work when the case came before the court was different from the man who was doing it when the certificate was granted did not deprive the certificate of its efficacy, and the county court judge was entitled to make an order for possession if satisfied that it was reasonable to do so.

Appeal by the defendant from an order of His Honour Judge Pratt, sitting at Exeter County Court, dated Apr. 4, 1949, granting the plaintiffs, who were farmers, possession of a cottage of which the defendant was the tenant. The plaintiffs had bought the cottage for one of their own farm workers. The Court of Appeal, after considering the defendant's objection to a certificate issued by the county agricultural committee, dismissed the appeal. The facts appear in the judgment of Denning, L.J.

Raeburn, K.C., and Pain for the defendant.
L. A. Blundell for the plaintiffs.

SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R.: I will ask Denning, L.J., to give the first judgment.

DENNING, L.J.: The plaintiffs are farmers in Devon and need a man to help them on the farm. As is usually the case, they cannot get a man unless they have a cottage for him, so, in 1947, they bought the cottage in which the defendant had been living for many years, hoping to get possession of it. Having engaged one Wicks, they applied to the county agricultural committee for a certificate under para. (g) (ii) of sched. I to the Rent and Mortgage Interest

Restrictions (Amendment) Act, 1933, and on Sept. 8, 1948, the committee gave a certificate in this form pursuant to the Defence (Agriculture and Fisheries) Regulations, 1939 (S.R. & O., 1939, No. 1303), as amended by S.R. & O., 1943, No. 582:

> "The executive committee hereby certifies that a general farmworker for whose occupation the cottage or dwelling-house at 3, Alexandra Terrace, Broadclyst, is required by F. Harris & Son, landlords, is employed on work necessary for the proper working of the agricultural holding known as South Whimple Farm, Honiton Clyst, near Exeter."

After that certificate had been given, however, Wicks died, and the plaintiff engaged another man in his place who was ready to undertake the work if he could get a cottage. Without getting any further certificate the plaintiffs applied to the county court judge for possession of the cottage, and the defendant objected that the certificate was inapplicable because it applied only to Wicks. The county court judge overruled the objection, and the defendant has appealed.

Counsel for the defendant conceded, as I think he was bound to do, that, if the certificate had been in the form, "is or is to be employed on work necessary for the proper working of the holding," it would be a good certificate applicable in that situation, but he says that as the words "is to be" were omitted it was an inapplicable certificate. The answer to this objection, it seems to me, is that the committee are not concerned with the identity of the individual who is to do the work. They are only concerned with whether the agricultural holding is in need of an agricultural worker of a particular kind. Once they are satisfied of the necessity, they give their certificate and it is then for the court to satisfy itself that such a worker is, or is to be, employed, that the house is reasonably required for him, and that it is reasonable to make an order for possession. That, I think, follows from the judgment of LORD GREENE, M.R., in Pickford v. Mace (1) ([1943] 2 All E.R. 321). The identity of the individual is, therefore, not a material part of the certificate, so the failure to insert the words "or is to be" is a failure on a matter which is immaterial. It is familiar law that a mistake in an immaterial part of a document does not affect its validity. A fortiori, a failure to provide for an unforeseen immateriality does not affect its validity. In my opinion, the decision of the county court judge was right, and the appeal must be dismissed.

SOMERVELL, L.J.: I agree. LORD GREENE, M.R., in Pickford v. Mace (1) summed up his conclusions in these words:

> "It is, therefore, for the county court judge to be satisfied on evidence in the ordinary way that the house is required for a person who is, or is to be, employed, and he has to be satisfied by the certificate as to the nature of the work on which that person is to be employed, and it matters not that when the certificate was obtained no person was in contemplation because it is sufficient when the farmer comes before the county court judge for him to prove that he has a person for whom the house is required and that the work on which he proposes to employ him is so-and-so."

In that case, at the time the certificate was given, no individual was in contemplation. In one sense the present case is different in that, at the time when the certificate was given, a general farm worker was doing the work, but the fact that the certificate was drawn up with regard to those circumstances does not, in my view, deprive it of its efficacy in satisfying the county court judge as to the nature of the work on which the person for whom the cottage is required is to be employed. For these reasons I think the appeal fails.

SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R.: I agree. As I follow Pickford v. Mace (1) the effectiveness of the certificate, which relates to the nature of the work to be done, is not affected by the circumstance that, at the time when the certificate was given, a particular man was doing the work, but had ceased to do it when the case came before the court, and some other individual was then about to do it. The work to be done remains the same, and the effect of the certificate was that that work was, within the terms of the paragraph, necessary for the proper working of the holding.

Appeal dismissed with costs. A

On Oct. 12, 1926, a dwelling-house to which the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1939, applied was let under a lease for 21 years at a yearly rent of £300. The lease contained a covenant against sub-letting without the written consent of the landlord. At the same date the premises were sub-let in breach of this covenant at a rent of £225 per annum. In 1943 the breach of covenant was waived and the sub-tenancy became lawful. On an application to fix the standard rent for the dwelling-house, D

HELD: on Sept. 1, 1939, the material date for the determination of the standard rent, the sub-tenant was not entitled to the protection of the Rent Acts because the premises had not been lawfully sub-let to him; the waiver in 1943 of the breach of covenant had no retro-active effect; and, therefore, in ascertaining the standard rent, the sub-tenancy had to be disregarded and the standard rent was the rent reserved in the head-lease, viz., £300. APPEAL by the landlords from a decision of His Honour JUDGE NEAL, sitting at Willesden County Court, dated Mar. 31, 1949.

An application was made by the tenant to determine the standard rent of a dwelling-house which was let on Sept. 1, 1939, at a rent of £300 per annum, and sub-let, in breach of covenant, at a rent of £225 per annum. In 1943 the breach of covenant was waived. The learned registrar fixed the rent at £300. On the tenant's appeal the county court judge varied the order and fixed the rent at £225. The Court of Appeal now allowed the landlords' appeal and restored the registrar's order. The facts appear in the judgment of SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R.

Heathcote-Williams, K.C., and Bibby-Trevor for the landlords.
Stranders for the tenant.

SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R.: This is an appeal by the landlords, the freehold owners of certain property, 7, Bank Parade, Edgware, against a decision of the learned county court judge, His Honour JUDGE NEAL, who fixed the standard rent of these premises at £225 per annum.

The matter originated in an application by the tenant, a Mrs. Coblentz (who is the widow, and, I assume, personal representative, of Mr. Coblentz hereafter mentioned, and who is the occupying tenant of the premises) under s. 11 of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1923. The county court registrar had found in favour of the landlords, fixing the standard rent at the higher figure for which they contended, £300, but his view was reversed by the county court judge. There is no doubt that the premises are within the ambit of the Rent Acts, and, to use the language of s. 12 (1) (a) of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, as amended by the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1939, sched. I, there is no doubt that the premises were let on Sept. 1, 1939, as a dwelling-house. There were, however, two lettings on that date, and the question which now arises is by reference to which of those two lettings ought the standard rent to be fixed.

The first material letting was by a lease by the predecessors in title of the landlords to a company known as W. White & Sons (Cricklewood) Ltd., dated Oct. 12, 1926. That lease was for 21 years, and the rent, which was progressive, was at all material times £300 per annum. By cl. 2 (8), of the lease it was provided:

> "That the lessees will not assign underlet or part with the possession of the premises or any part thereof or of these presents without the consent in writing of the lessor provided that such consent shall not be unreasonably withheld in the case of a respectable and responsible assignee or underlessee."

There was also the usual remedy of forfeiture and re-entry on breach of the covenants. That lease has now expired, and W. White & Sons (Cricklewood) Ltd., have taken no part in the present proceedings.

In 1934, the original lessors granted a licence in writing to White, Ltd., to sub-let the premises for one year only to Mr. Isaac Coblentz, the rent charged being £225 per annum. Mr. Coblentz remained in possession of the premises after the expiry of the year. It has been conceded in argument that the licence only authorised one year's letting so that thereafter the possession of Mr. Coblentz as tenant from year to year, and his possession on Sept. 1, 1939, was one which was not authorised or licensed by the lessors and constituted a breach of covenant on the part of the lessees, White, Ltd. On that date, therefore, unless there was some waiver on the part of the lessors, the sub-tenancy was not "lawful" within s. 5 (5), and s. 15 (3) of the Act of 1920, that is, to use the language used by MORTON, L.J., in Norman v. Simpson (1) ([1946] 1 All E.R. 76) by reason of the sub-letting the head landlord had, at the material date,

" a subsisting right of re-entry " in respect of the premises. The county court judge found that there had been a breach of covenant, but that a Mr. Cross, who succeeded the original lessors and from whom the present landlords derived title, in 1943 by his conduct waived his right of re-entry so that thereafter the sub-letting became, and was at the date of the determination of the lease of White, Ltd., and of the present proceedings, a lawful sub-letting within the two sub-sections to which I have referred.

Counsel for the tenant first took the point before us that there was no evidence on which could be justified the finding that there was a breach of covenant at the material date, namely, Sept. 1, 1939, and he said that this court ought to hold that the sub-letting to Mr. Coblentz on that date and at all material times was lawful. It is true that the learned county court judge stated that he suspected that the original lessors may well have known about Mr. Coblentz's tenancy at the time, but on the evidence and the admissions which were made before him and the learned registrar he reached the conclusion that there was a breach of covenant. It is, in my judgment, impossible for us to hold otherwise than in accordance with the findings of the learned county court judge.

Counsel for the landlords argued that the court cannot pay regard to what was at the material date, viz., Sept. 1, 1939, an unauthorised sub-letting, defeasible at the suit of the owners of the property, a sub-letting which, as we must assume from the finding, was unknown to the landlords and not binding on them. Counsel said that were it otherwise very strange results would follow—for example, notwithstanding that a landlord might have protected himself by a covenant against sub-letting without his consent, still the standard rent might be fixed at a figure contained in, and by reference to, a sub-letting of which he, at the material date, was entirely ignorant and which constituted a breach of the covenant contained in the lease. In that event it might happen that the rent which he (the landlord) was charging under the headlease might prove to be excessive so that he would be liable to satisfy a claim against him for recovery of the over-payment. On the other hand, counsel for the tenant has said that in contrast to s. 5 (5) and s. 15 (3) of the Act of 1920 there is no reference in s. 12 (1) (a) of the Act of 1920 to " lawfully " let. He says, and says truly, that on the evidence this was a bona fide letting at a genuine rent for the purpose of occupation. He says that the intention of the Act is to protect the occupying tenant from eviction and from increases of his rent, and that the intention of s. 12 (1) (a) in particular is to fix the standard rent by reference to the rent payable by the occupier. Counsel further says that, in any event the waiver in 1943 prevents the landlords now from asserting that the sub-tenancy to Coblentz on Sept. 1, 1939, was not a lawful sub-letting. Counsel for the landlords in the course of his argument at one time argued that the state of affairs as they were on Sept. 1, 1939, can in no circumstances be affected by events subsequent to that date. That is putting it far too high. Things might happen after that date as a result of which a landlord might well be estopped from asserting otherwise than that a tenancy existing on Sept. 1, 1939, was a lawful tenancy, and it is possible to imagine that had the facts in this case been more fully gone into such an estoppel might possibly have been raised, but we have to deal with this case on the facts as proved and as found by the learned county court judge.

The case is one of difficulty, but on the whole I have reached a conclusion favourable to the argument of counsel for the landlords. In the first place, it is to be noted that s. 12 (1) (a) appears to contemplate one letting. It simply refers to the rent at which the dwelling-house was let. Of course, the effect of the definition in para. (g) is that you have to read into para. (a) " sub-let" as well as " let " at the relevant date, but on the face of para. (a) as it stands I would not expect to find any reference to " lawfully " or " unlawfully " let. Secondly, some limitation must be placed on the words " was let " at the material date. For example—as has been held in this court—the letting must be a genuine letting. A transaction devised merely to create a standard rent of a particular figure would be disregarded for the purposes of this paragraph. Further, and more important, the letting must be a letting for the purposes of the Act. It has been a matter for decision in these courts that a letting of the dwelling-house furnished would not be effective for the purpose of para. (a) because such a letting would not be a letting for the purposes of the Act. It would be a letting outside the general scope of the Act. Thirdly, once you introduce into the picture the conception of the purposes of the Act, it seems to me vital to have in mind that it is not every sub-tenant whom the Act is designed to protect. It has been decided that by virtue of s. 5 (5) and s. 15 (3) of the Act of 1920 an occupying sub-tenant is protected and is entitled to remain in possession provided that at the relevant date—which prima facie would be when proceedings are started for possession—he can show that he is a lawful sub-tenant in the sense in which that term has been interpreted by MORTON, L.J., in Norman v. Simpson (1).

On Sept. 1, 1939, Mr. Coblentz was a sub-tenant not entitled to the protection of the Act. At that date he was, within the meaning of the Act, an unlawful sub-tenant. In my view, the fact that at a later stage the landlords waived their rights to re-enter cannot operate retrospectively to make Mr. Coblentz a lawful sub-tenant within the meaning of the Act on Sept. 1, 1939. Therefore, it seems to me to follow that, in considering what is the relevant rent, the sub-letting to Coblentz, cannot be regarded because it was not a sub-letting for the purpose of the Act any more than a letting or sub-letting furnished would be a letting for the purpose of the Act.

Considerable reliance was placed both here and below on Glossop v. Ashley (2) in which there were two competing lettings, both of which were within the scope of the Act and were for the purpose of the Act. In other words, the sub-tenancy was not in breach of covenant and, therefore, was not an unlawful sub-tenancy. The question was, to which of the competing lettings regard should be had for the purpose of determining the standard rent. This court held that regard must be paid to the sub-tenancy because the emphasis in the circumstances must be placed on the position of the occupier. BANKES, L.J., said ([1922] 1 K.B. 7):

> " . . . the standard rent is the rent which that tenant was paying at that date [Aug. 3, 1914] because he is the person whom the legislature was intending to protect when it fixed the standard rent."

SCRUTTON, L.J., observed (ibid., 8):

> " The object of the legislation was to protect the tenant in occupation and allow him to remain in possession as long as he pays the rent he was paying in August, 1914."

Finally, ATKIN, L.J., said (ibid., 10):

> " In my view it is the tenant's right that is protected, and when I consider s. 15 (3), and its obvious intention to secure the sub-tenant as far as possible in the position he would have occupied if his relation to his former landlord had continued, I cannot reconcile that sub-section with the argument for the appellants [the head landlords]."

As I read those passages the ratio in that case was that the sub-tenant was a person whom the Act was designed to protect, and, therefore, the rent he paid was to be regarded as the material rent for fixing the standard rent. Once, however, you arrive at the conclusion that the sub-tenant in occupation at the material date was not entitled to the protection of the Act the basis of the reasoning is destroyed. Glossop v. Ashley (2) is applicable only where you have two competing tenancies both of which are within the scope and protection of the Act as being lawful tenancies. That conclusion also answers another point raised in argument. It was said: "Assume that the sub-tenancy to Coblentz on Sept. 1, 1939, must be disregarded for the purpose of fixing the standard rent, nevertheless, Coblentz actually was in occupation. At the material date (Sept. 1, 1939) there was, therefore, no letting to an occupying tenant, and one must retrace one's steps beyond that date. If that is done, one arrives at the licensed sub-letting to Coblentz in 1934," and that was the A sub-letting at a rent of £225 a year. It seems to me, however, that an argument of that kind, which is based on the decision in Glossop v. Ashley (2), only comes into play when you have got competing lawful tenancies. In the present case, if the sub-tenancy is unlawful, one is left with a lawful tenancy by the landlords or their predecessors to Whites, Ltd., which was a letting which falls within the language of para. 12 (1) (a) as a letting of the premises as a dwelling-house. B In the circumstances, that is the letting by reference to which the standard rent ought to be fixed. The result is one which favours the landlord because it so happens, and it is by no means common, that the rent payable under the head lease is in excess of the rent payable under the underlease. It may very well be that the result in other cases would be the other way round, and would be favourable to the tenant. Those, however, are not considerations C which ought to influence the decision of the court. The question is what on the facts is the effect of the provision of para. (a) of s. 12 (1) of the Act of 1920, and I conclude, for the reasons I have stated, that the standard rent must be fixed by the letting at £300 per annum from the landlords' predecessor in title to White, Ltd.

SOMERVELL, L.J.: Although this appeal raises questions of some D nicety and we are disagreeing with the learned judge, there is nothing I can usefully add to the judgment which has been delivered by the Master of the Rolls, which completely expresses my own reasons in coming to the conclusion that this appeal succeeds.

DENNING, L.J.: Speaking generally, the Rent Restrictions Acts now in force have two primary objects. The first is to stabilise rents at the 1939 level; E the second, to protect occupiers from eviction. The first object is achieved by prescribing a "standard rent" which, in most cases, is the rent at which the house was let, on Sept. 1, 1939, to the occupying tenant: Glossop v. Ashley (2). The standard rent is the maximum which can be charged not only during any statutory tenancy of the house, but also during any contractual tenancy: Carter v. S.U. Carburettor Co. (3); Field v. Gover (4). It is not only the maximum F as between the occupying tenant and his immediate landlord, but also between a mesne tenant and his superior landlord: Carter v. S.U. Carburettor Co. (3). It is a maximum which binds not only the persons who were interested in the house on Sept. 1, 1939, but all those who acquire an interest after that date, and it is the sum which every tenant or sub-tenant can be required to pay if he stays in possession by virtue of the statute irrespective of any prior contractual G terms as to the amount: Phillips v. Copping (5); Regional Properties v. Oxley (6). By reason of those qualities the standard rent is said to operate in rem. This does not mean that a decision between two persons as to its quantum is a decision in rem which is binding on persons who were not parties to the decision, but it does mean that the correct amount is binding on all persons interested in the house, whenever and however their interest was acquired. H The second object is achieved by prohibiting the court from making any order for possession unless certain specified conditions are satisfied.

In the present case we have a head landlord, a mesne tenant, and a sub-tenant. So far as possession is concerned, the Act makes it clear that the only sub-tenants who are protected from eviction after the head tenancy comes to an end are sub-tenants to whom the premises have been lawfully sub-let: see s. 5 (5) and s. 15 (3) of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, but the Act is not so specific so far as the standard rent is concerned. In my opinion, the only sub-tenancies which can be regarded for the purpose of ascertaining the standard rent are lawful sub-tenancies, that is, sub-lettings which are not in breach of any term of the head lease. It is impossible to suppose that a mesne tenant could, by unlawfully sub-letting the house in August, 1939, saddle the landlord with a standard rent which was lower than the head rent. On discovery of the breach the head landlord could plainly forfeit the head lease and eject the unlawful sub-tenant. It cannot be supposed that, after strong action of that kind, he would, nevertheless, be bound by the figure contained in the unlawful sub-letting.

The difficult question is, however : What is the effect of the head landlord accepting rent after knowledge of the unlawful sub-letting ? So far as possession is concerned, it is clear that if the head landlord, during the subsistence of the contractual head lease, waives the forfeiture, the sub-letting thenceforward becomes a lawful sub-letting : Norman v. Simpson (1) ; Watson v. Saunders-Roe, Ltd. (7). The material date for determining whether it is unlawful for that purpose is the date of the determination of the contractual tenancy, but, so far as the standard rent is concerned, the material date is Sept. 1, 1939, and the lawfulness or unlawfulness of the sub-letting must be determined as at that date. As GODDARD, L.J., said in Field v. Gover (4) ([1944] 1 All E.R. 157), " the standard rent attaches from the moment when the house is brought under control." Take a case like the present where there was no waiver of the forfeiture until 1943. If an application had been made in 1941 to determine the standard rent the figure would have been £300. The head landlord would not be tied down to the figure contained in the unlawful sub-letting of which ex hypothesi he knew nothing. Suppose, then, after the waiver in 1943 another application was made to fix the standard rent, can it be supposed that the £300 would be replaced by £225 ? Clearly not. A subsequent waiver is, therefore, of no effect on the standard rent.

In the present case, on the facts found by the county court judge, the sub-tenancy which existed on Sept. 1, 1939, was unlawful. It is, therefore, to be disregarded for the purpose of ascertaining the standard rent. The only relevant letting at Sept. 1, 1939, was the letting at £300 a year, and that is, therefore, the standard rent. I agree the appeal should be allowed with costs.

Appeal allowed with costs.

Factory—Dangerous machinery—Evidence—Machine capable of causing injury—Injury suffered by operator—No presumption of danger—Factories Act, 1937 (c. 67), s. 14 (1).

A macaroni extruding machine consisted of a hopper with two hollow cylinders, in the lower of which was a rotating worm. Above this worm and between the two cylinders was a metal plate, intended as a guard, formed of two concentric rings. Dough, used in the manufacture of the macaroni, was fed into the hopper by the operator of the machine. It was not possible for the operator's fingers to touch the worm unless her hand was pushed through a space in the metal plate, which was not an easy thing to do. The operator, to dislodge some dough stuck on the side of the hopper, put her hand through the space in the metal plate while the worm was rotating and the tips of two of her fingers were cut off by the worm. On the hearing of an information under s. 14 (1) of the Factories Act, 1937, the magistrate found that the worm was not a dangerous part of the machinery, that the machine was securely fenced, and that the operator had not acted reasonably by inserting her hand while the worm was rotating as she could easily have switched off the motor or dislodged the dough with some implement. He accordingly dismissed the information. On appeal,

Held : the facts that the machine was capable of causing injury and that injury had happened to the operator was not conclusive proof that it was dangerous within s. 14 (1) of the Factories Act, 1937 ; the question whether the machine or any part of it was dangerous was one of degree, and, therefore, of fact ; there was abundant evidence on which the magistrate could reach his conclusion and he had not taken into account any facts which he ought not to have taken into account ; and, therefore, the appeal failed.

Case Stated by a Metropolitan magistrate.

At a court of summary jurisdiction sitting at North London magistrate's court on Nov. 30, 1948, an information was preferred by the appellant, an inspector of factories of the Ministry of Labour and National Service, charging the respondents as the occupiers of a factory within the meaning of the Factories Act, 1937, at 3-5, Brewery Road, N.7, in the metropolitan borough of Islington, with having, on Oct. 18, 1948, contravened the provisions of s. 14 (1) of the Act, thereby rendering themselves liable to a fine under s. 133, by failing to fence securely a dangerous part of certain machinery, viz., the worm of a macaroni extruding machine, in consequence of which one Agnes Crowder had suffered bodily injury. The information was heard on Dec. 20, 1948. The machine consisted of a hopper, comprising two hollow cylinders, the upper one being funnel shaped, 6¼ inches deep and five inches in diameter at the base, and the lower one attached to it being five inches deep. In a trough at the bottom of the lower cylinder was a rotating worm, and between the two cylinders was a metal plate comprising two concentric rings, respectively five and 1⅝ inches in diameter. The person attending the machine fed dough into the hopper and it fell on to the worm. It was difficult to put the whole hand through the plate, but Agnes Crowder sustained her injury in so doing while the worm was rotating in order to dislodge dough sticking to the side of the lower cylinder. The respondents contended that no person could reasonably have been expected to act in the way in which Agnes Crowder had acted, that the machine was not a dangerous machine, and that the rotating worm was securely fenced. The magistrate upheld these contentions and dismissed the information. The appellant appealed, and the Divisional Court now dismissed the appeal.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 27. LORD GODDARD, C.J., read the following judgment. This is a Case stated by a metropolitan magistrate before whom the respondents were charged as occupiers of a factory, with a contravention of s. 14 (1) of the Factories Act, 1937, in that a certain dangerous part of the machinery, namely, the worm of a macaroni extruding machine, was not securely fenced, and in consequence of this contravention one Agnes Crowder suffered bodily injury. The magistrate dismissed the information, holding that the machine was not a dangerous machine within the meaning of the Act, by which he clearly meant that the worm was not a dangerous part of the machinery. He held also that the machine was securely fenced, that the circumstances which in fact occurred immediately before the accident were such as the said Agnes Crowder could or should have reasonably expected to occur and that she did not act in a way in which anyone operating the machine might reasonably be expected to act.

The machine in question consisted of a hopper into which the dough used in the manufacture of macaroni was fed by the person who attended on the machine. The hopper consisted of two parts. The upper was funnel-shaped 6¼ inches deep and the lower part was five inches deep. In between the two parts was a circular metal plate which was thus five inches above the rotating worm which was at the bottom of the lower half of the hopper. The metal plate consisted of two concentric rings, the diameter of the outer ring being five inches and of the inner 1⅝ inches. It was possible for the fingers of the operator to pass through these spaces, and if a person only put his or her fingers through, then it is obvious they would not have come into contact with the worm. It was only possible for fingers to touch the worm if the hand was also pushed through this space in the plate, and, after inspection of the plate both by the learned magistrate and by this court, it is obvious that this was not an altogether easy thing to accomplish. When the machine is working, dough from time to time sticks to the side of the lower part of the hopper, and on the day when the accident happened the injured woman appears to have put her hand through the metal plate, which was intended as a guard, for the purpose of dislodging some dough while the worm was rotating, with the result that the extreme tips of two of her fingers were caught by the rotating worm and cut off, fortunately without injury to the bone. She had been working the machine for five weeks before the accident, and that machine had been used for three years without mishap, and no complaint had ever been made about it by any factory inspector who had visited the factory while it was installed. The magistrate considered that it was unreasonable of the young woman to attempt to dislodge the dough while the worm was rotating. She could without difficulty have switched off the motor or done nothing at all. He considered that it was unreasonable of her to attempt to dislodge the dough with her fingers while the worm was rotating and that she could without difficulty have dislodged the dough with a stick or any other implement. He does find that on other occasions the injured girl and other women employed at the premises had put their fingers through the open spaces of the plate to release dough adhering to the side of the hopper, but there is no finding either that the respondents knew of this or that any accident had ever happened in consequence.

Counsel for the appellant argued that the magistrate had no option but to find that this machine was dangerous. As I understood his submissions they were that, if the machine was one capable of causing injury and that injury did happen to a person who was employed to work on the machine and was injured while working it, that was conclusive. Counsel for the respondents, on the other hand, contended that whether or not a machine or a part of the machine was dangerous within the meaning of the section is a question of fact, and that the question could not be resolved merely by showing that it was possible for an accident to happen and that one did in fact happen. In the course of a careful argument, he submitted that recent cases in this court have departed from the earlier principles which had been laid down to guide courts in coming to a conclusion whether a machine was dangerous or not, and that in every case the magistrate had to make up his mind on the whole of the evidence whether the machine was in fact dangerous, and that in each case it was a question of degree.

The first case on which he relied was Hindle v. Birtwistle (1), in which WILLS, J., said ([1897] 1 Q.B. 195):

> "It seems to me that machinery or parts of machinery is and are dangerous if in the ordinary course of human affairs danger may be reasonably anticipated from the use of them without protection. No doubt it would be impossible to say that because an accident had happened once therefore the machinery was dangerous. On the other hand, it is equally out of the question to say that machinery cannot be dangerous unless it is so in the course of careful working. In considering whether machinery is dangerous, the contingency of carelessness on the part of the workman in charge of it, and the frequency with which that contingency is likely to arise, are matters that must be taken into consideration. It is entirely a question of degree."

R. S. WRIGHT, J., in concurring, also emphasised that it is a question of degree and of fact in all cases whether the tendency to fly out (it was a case of a flying shuttle) is a tendency to fly out often enough to satisfy a reasonable interpretation of the word "dangerous."

That case was expressly cited with approval in Lauder v. Barr and Stroud (2). The Court of Justiciary adopted exactly the same test, holding that it was a question of degree in each case. Accordingly, the law was laid down in the same way on both sides of the border. DU PARCQ, J., treated the matter in exactly the same way in Walker v. Bletchley Flettons, Ltd. (3) ([1937] 1 All E.R. 175, 6), where he said:

> ". . . . a part of machinery is dangerous if it is a possible cause of injury to anybody acting in a way in which a human being may be reasonably expected to act in circumstances which may be reasonably expected to occur . . . nobody expects human beings to be so extravagantly careless as to touch some part of the machine which it is not only not difficult to avoid, but which it is actually difficult to get near."

That seems to be very much the position in the present case, but that it is a question of fact is also clear from the decision of the Court of Appeal in Higgins v. Harrison (4), and that case is of particular value because it shows the considerations which a court should bear in mind, or, at least, some of them, when they have to decide when a machine is dangerous or not. The facts in Higgins v. Harrison (4), indeed, appear to me really to be indistinguishable from the present case. That was a case of a girl who put her hand into a machine while it was working. It is true that it was no part of her actual duty to do it. She had been told to clear up some capsules which she thought meant to clear up any that she could find anywhere, and seeing some in a machine which was in motion, she put her hand into it and suffered injury.

It is true that there is the distinction that in Higgins' case (4) the girl was not employed to work on the machine while in this case she was, but the girl was the servant of the employers and they owed a duty to her as an employee in a factory, and one of the duties that they owed was to fence dangerous parts of any machinery. SCRUTTON, L.J., said (25 B.W.C.C. 118):

> "The first question is, was the machine dangerous? I have looked A at the photographs; I have considered the way in which the girl usually worked the machine; I have considered the fact that on those four machines there had been no accident for sixteen years, although they were unfenced. I have considered the fact that the inspector of the government had frequently seen those machines and had never required them to be fenced, and I have come to the conclusion, having the same opportunity B of judging as the learned judge in the court below had . . . that that was not a dangerous machine. Of course it was dangerous if you went and put your hand into it; every machine is dangerous if you go and put your hand into it whilst it is working."

Later he said:

> C "She does not suggest that anybody told her to pick up that particular thing; the suggestion is that 'Nobody told me not to.' Nobody told her not to go and stand on her head in the middle of the machine, but it did not follow that, if she did so, the employer would be liable for negligence because he had not provided for that unexpected manoeuvre."

GREER, L.J.'s judgment was to the same effect. Now, it is perfectly true that D that judgment was given in a civil action and the case we are considering is a criminal prosecution, but where it is a case of the true construction of a section and of what in relation to a particular section it is necessary to prove to show a breach of the factory owner's obligations, in our opinion a judgment of the Court of Appeal is as binding on this court though we may be considering a criminal prosecution just as much as though we were trying a civil action. E To hold otherwise would be to make a serious inroad on the rule of stare decisis on which so much of English jurisprudence depends.

A good illustration of the second line of case to which counsel for the respondents referred is Sutherland v. Executors of James Mills, Ltd. (5). I think that case could well be supported on the ground that the facts were so overwhelming that it was difficult to see how any court could come to a F decision that the machine was not dangerous, but I am bound to say that I think some of the dicta in the case go beyond the decisions in the cases to which I have referred. Certainly the court refused to take into account certain matters which were considered as of importance by the court in Higgins v. Harrison (4), as, for instance, that no complaint had ever been made by a factory inspector. LORD HEWART, C.J., said ([1938] 1 All E.R. 285):

> G ". . . nor ought it to be necessary to point out that the burden is not shifted by the Factory and Workshop Act upon the factory inspector," and there have to my own knowledge been other cases, not all reported, in which the learned Lord Chief Justice refused to consider the fact that no complaint had ever been made by the factory inspector. That fact is, of course, H not conclusive, but, with all respect, it seems to be a point that ought to be taken into account, as indeed the Court of Appeal said in Higgins v. Harrison (4). After all, factory inspectors are not only trained experts, but are wholly independent officials. Their duty is to inspect factories and the machinery therein to see, among other things, that machines are adequately fenced. The fact that they have passed a machine not only once but on several occasions without comment or requiring anything to be done is at least some evidence that in the opinion of a duly qualified person no accident is reasonably likely to occur provided workpeople act in a way in which they may be reasonably expected to act.

Chasteney v. Michael Nairn & Co., Ltd. (6), was, again, a case in which there was no question that the machine was dangerous to workmen greasing it unless it was stopped. There was no sufficient fencing and the court held that merely to put up a notice saying that workmen were not to put their hands in the machinery while it was in motion was no answer in a case where the machine was undoubtedly dangerous and no one could really contend otherwise. In our opinion, it is important that we should re-affirm in no uncertain terms that in each case the magistrate is entitled to and must decide in the first place whether the machine or part of it is dangerous and that is a question of degree, and, therefore, of fact, in every case. The learned magistrate, who obviously bestowed considerable care on the case and inspected the machine for himself, has, as the case shows, taken into account all the matters which Higgins v. Harrison (4) said ought to be taken into account. He has in no way misdirected himself or considered matters which were immaterial or improper for arriving at a decision. To say, as counsel for the appellant was, I think, driven to say, that in these circumstances his decision was perverse is quite impossible. Indeed, I think I may say that, were we to come to a contrary decision to that at which he has arrived, it might well be said that the perversity is ours and not his. I am content to say that, in my opinion, this is a question of degree, and, therefore, of fact, that there was abundant evidence on which the magistrate could come to the conclusion at which he arrived, that he has not taken into account any facts which he ought not to have taken into account, and consequently this appeal should be dismissed.

OLIVER, J. : I agree, and I feel that I cannot usefully add a word to the judgment which has just been delivered.

STABLE, J. : I have had the opportunity of reading the judgment of the Lord Chief Justice with which I am in entire agreement. I wish to add a few words only to remove a possible ambiguity in the findings of the magistrate. The passages to which I refer are as follows:

> "(1) I was of opinion that the said machine was not a dangerous machine within the meaning of the said Act. (2) That the said machine was securely fenced within the meaning of the said Act."

The apparatus in question on the material date consisted of the hopper, the guard, and the rotating worm which my Lord has already described. As I understand it, the guard performed no function in the working of the machine and was there as a guard and nothing else. It appears to me that these findings may mean either that, even in the absence of the guard, the worm was not dangerous, or that the worm, situated as it was at the time of the accident beneath the guard, was not a dangerous part of the machine for the reason that though, without the guard, it would have been dangerous, the guard rendered it innocuous, or, in other words, a dangerous part of the machine was securely fenced.

To avoid any possible ambiguity in future cases, in my judgment, the proper approach where there is a machine with a guard is first to enquire whether in the absence of the guard any part of the machine could properly be described as dangerous. If the answer is "No," the adequacy or otherwise of the guard as a protection against a hypothetical but non-existent danger does not arise. It is only if the first question is answered in the affirmative that the second question arises, namely, Was the dangerous part securely fenced in accordance with the Act ? In the present case, if the magistrate had held that the worm in the absence of the guard was not dangerous, without expressing any concluded opinion on the point, I might have had some difficulty in supporting this finding. I do not think, however, that he intended to hold more than that the apparatus with the guard provided was safe in every part, or, in other words, that the dangerous part of the machine was securely fenced. If I am right in thinking that the latter is what he held, inasmuch as he applied, as my Lord has pointed out, the right tests and omitted none of the matters which he ought to have considered, for myself I should have been slow to interfere with his finding of fact. However, if it is within my province sitting in this court to say so, I go further and wish to express my entire agreement with it.

In expressing my conclusions I do not seek to detract in any way from the expressions of opinion in this and other courts emphasising the categorical nature of the duty and the high standard required. The Factories Act is there not merely to protect the careful, the vigilant, and the conscientious workman, but, human nature being what it is, also the careless, the indolent, the inadvertent, the weary, and even, perhaps, in some cases, the disobedient. The duty, as has been said, is not to fence "somewhat securely" but "securely," but there must be some limit placed on the word "securely," and a fence does not necessarily cease to be secure because by some act of perverted and deliberate ingenuity the guard can be forced or circumvented and the safeguards provided thereby rendered nugatory.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

OXFORD GROUP v. INLAND REVENUE COMMISSIONERS.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Tucker, Cohen and Singleton, L.JJ.), July 6, 7, 8, 28, 1949.]

Income Tax—Exemption—Charity—Oxford Group—"Advancement of Christian religion"—Support and development of group movement "in every way"—Income Tax Act, 1918 (c. 40), s. 37 (a) (b)—Finance Act, 1921 (c. 32), s. 30 (1) (a).

By s. 37 of the Income Tax Act, 1918, exemption from income tax is granted in respect of rents, interest, and other annual payments forming part of the income of a body of persons established for charitable purposes only, and by s. 30 (1) (a) of the Finance Act, 1921, exemption is granted in respect of lands owned and occupied by a charity.

The memorandum of association of the Oxford Group, a company limited by guarantee, set out the following as the objects of the company:— "3 (A) The advancement of the Christian religion, and, in particular, by the means and in accordance with the principles of the Oxford Group Movement, founded in or about the year 1921 by Frank Nathan Daniel Buchman. (B) The maintenance, support, development and assistance of the Oxford Group Movement in every way . . . (C) (9) To establish and support or aid in the establishment and support of any charitable or benevolent associations or institutions, and to subscribe or guarantee money for charitable or benevolent purposes in any way connected with the purposes of the association or calculated to further its objects. (10) To do all such other things as are incidental, or the association may think conducive, to the attainment of the above objects or any of them." The company sought exemption from income tax on the ground that it was a body of persons established for charitable purposes only. It was admitted by the Crown that, if object A of the objects clause of the company's memorandum of association stood alone, the company would be established for charitable purposes only.

Held : (i) the words in cl. 3 (B) of the memorandum of association, " the maintenance, support, development and assistance of the Oxford Group Movement in every way," extended beyond purely religious activities, permitted the company to engage in secular activities, and authorised the expenditure of its funds on matters which were not charitable, and, therefore, the company could not be said to be formed for charitable purposes only.

(ii) although a religious body might, without losing its religious character, engage in a number of subsidiary activities which were not purely religious, a trust which was so worded as to permit the expenditure of income by such a body in such subsidiary activities was not a good charitable trust.

(iii) the objects set forth in cl. 3 (C), paras. (9), (10), of the memorandum of association were not merely ancillary to the main objects expressed in sub-cll. (A) and (B), but themselves conferred powers on the company which were so wide that they could not be regarded as charitable.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 28. The following judgments were read.

TUCKER, L.J. : On Aug. 15, 1939, a company limited by guarantee called " The Oxford Group " was incorporated. In due course it applied to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue for exemption from income tax under s. 37 of the Income Tax Act, 1918, in respect of rents, interest and annual payments made under covenant and under s. 30 (1) (a) of the Finance Act, 1921, in respect of property owned and occupied by it. It is common ground that to obtain such exemption it was incumbent on the company to prove that it was a body of persons established for charitable purposes only. It is not disputed that, if it is such a body, its income was applied to such purposes only. The sole question for decision on this appeal is, therefore, whether, on the documents and oral evidence adduced before the Special Commissioners on the company's appeal from the refusal of the Commissioners of Inland Revenue to grant the exemption sought, it is proved that the company was established for charitable purposes only. The only charitable purpose relied on was the advancement of religion. The company's appeal was dismissed by the Special Commissioners whose decision was upheld by CROOM-JOHNSON, J. From this decision the company appeals to this court.

The question falls to be determined mainly, if not entirely, on the construction of the company's memorandum of association. Clauses 1, 2, and 3 (A) and (B) thereof read as follows:

> "(1) The name of the company (hereinafter called 'the Association') is 'The Oxford Group.' The association does not claim to possess any official connection with the University of Oxford or the Oxford Society. (2) The registered office of the association will be situate in England. (3) The objects for which the association is established are: (A) The advancement of the Christian religion, and, in particular, by the means and in accordance with the principles of the Oxford Group Movement, founded in or about the year 1921 by Frank Nathan Daniel Buchman. (B) The maintenance, support, development and assistance of the Oxford Group Movement in every way, and, in particular, (subject to the provisions of s. 14 of the Companies Act, 1929), by holding, administering and dealing with property, including all or any of the property which at the date of the incorporation of the association was held by trustees or nominees for the Oxford Group Movement."

It is conceded on behalf of the Crown that the object set out in cl. 3 (A) is a good charitable purpose. It is further common ground that the objects referred to in cl. 3 (A) and (B) are both "main" objects. There follow a number of other matters described as objects set out in cl. 3 (C) to which I need not refer at this stage.

It is, I think, clear that sub-cl. (B) of cl. 3 is designed to extend the objects beyond that contained in sub-cl. (A) and that the language employed has succeeded in doing so to a considerable degree. Before considering the effect of this sub-clause it will, perhaps, be convenient to set out what I understand to be the principles which we have to apply in such cases. The authorities on this matter and the kindred question of trusts for charitable purposes have recently been considered by this court in Ellis v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (1) and an analysis of them is to be found in our judgment in that case. I will, accordingly, content myself with stating what I conceive to be the principles to be deduced therefrom so far as material to the questions arising on this appeal. They are as follows: (i) The advancement of religion means the promotion of the spiritual teaching of a religious body and the maintenance of the spirit of the doctrines and observances on which it rests or in which it finds expression: see ROWLATT, J. (17 Tax Cas. 33), in Keren Kayemeth Le Jisroel, Ltd. v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (2), approved in the Court of Appeal. (ii) A religious body may, and usually does, engage in a number of subsidiary activities which are not purely religious, but it does not thereby lose its religious character and a trust in favour of such a body simpliciter is a good charitable trust, but the income can only be applied to those activities of the body which are purely religious. (iii) A trust which is so worded as to permit the income to be used by a religious body in activities which are not purely religious is not a good charitable trust. (iv) In the case of a company or other association, if the main object or objects are solely for the advancement of religion the mere fact that the company or association is given certain powers, even though described as objects which are purely ancillary to the main objects, will not prevent the company or association being regarded as a body formed for religious purposes only, but tax exemption will be confined to such parts of its income as are applied to its strictly religious activities. (v) Where one of the main objects of a company or association permits for its attainment of activities which are not purely religious then the company or association cannot be regarded for tax purposes as being a body formed for religious purposes only.

Applying these principles to this memorandum, it seems to me plain that the words "the maintenance, support, development and assistance of the Oxford Group Movement in every way" extend far beyond purely religious activities and permit or even require for their attainment activities which may be secular or political. For these reasons, assuming the "Oxford Group Movement"—as distinct from the company, "The Oxford Group"—to be a religious body whose aims and objects as shown by the documents and oral evidence are exclusively religious, none the less I think that sub-cl. (B) permits of the company engaging in purely secular activities in maintaining, supporting, developing and assisting this religious movement. I am, therefore, of opinion that the company with which we are concerned and which is known as "The Oxford Group" is not a body of persons formed for charitable purposes only, and that on this ground alone this appeal would fail. I have, however, had the advantage of reading the judgment which Cohen, L.J., is about to deliver, and I agree with him for the reasons he gives that para. (9) and (10) of sub-cl. (C) of cl. 3 of the memorandum produce the same result.

COHEN, L.J. : The question for decision on this appeal is whether the taxpayers, the Oxford Group, are entitled to exemption from income tax under s. 37 of the Income Tax Act, 1918, and s. 30 (1) (a) of the Finance Act, 1921. Section 37 provides, among other things, that exemption shall be granted from tax under sched. C in respect of any interest, annuities, dividends or shares of annuities, and from tax under sched. D in respect of any yearly interest or other annual payment forming part of the income of any body of persons or trusts established for charitable purposes only and so far as the same are applied to charitable purposes only. Section 30 (1) (a) of the Finance Act, 1921, confers a similar exemption in respect of income tax under sched. A in respect of lands, tenements, hereditaments and heritages owned and occupied by a charity with a limitation not material to the case before us. The taxpayers were incorporated on Aug. 15, 1939, under the Companies Act, 1929, exemption having been granted from using the word "limited" as part of their name pursuant to s. 18 of the Act.

The question before us is whether, on the true construction of the memorandum of association, the taxpayers can be said to have been established for charitable purposes only. If this point is decided in their favour, it is not disputed that the income in question was applied for the purposes for which they were established. Clause 3 of the memorandum of association defines the objects of the taxpayers. The clause is sub-divided into three main sub-divisions, (A), (B) and (C). Sub-clauses (A) and (B) have already been read by Tucker, L.J. It is clear, and, indeed, it is not disputed, that the objects here stated were the principal objects of the association. Sub-clause (C) describes the third object as "the exercise of all or any of the following powers." Then follow ten paragraphs. Some of them are plainly ancillary to the main objects stated under sub-cll. (A) and (B). Thus, under para. (1) the association may accept any gift of property, whether subject to any special trust or not, for any one or more of the objects of the association. Again, para. (8) is the ordinary investment clause enabling the moneys of the association not immediately required for its purpose to be invested in such investments, securities or property as might be thought fit, but so that moneys subject or representing property subject to the jurisdiction of the Chairty Commissioners for England and Wales should only be invested in such securities and with such sanction (if any) as may for the time being be prescribed by law. Indeed,

A I think it would be fair to say that, with the exception of paras. (3), (9) and (10), all the paragraphs of cl. 3 (C) might fairly be described as ancillary powers. Paragraphs (3), (9) and (10) give rise to more difficulties, and are in the following terms:

> "(3). To print and publish any newspapers, periodicals, books or leaflets that the association may think desirable for the promotion of its objects.
> B (9). To establish and support or aid in the establishment and support of any charitable or benevolent associations or institutions, and to subscribe or guarantee money for charitable or benevolent purposes in any way connected with the purposes of the association or calculated to further its objects. (10). To do all such other things as are incidental, or the association may think conducive, to the attainment of the above objects
> C or any of them."

Then follow two provisos which are not, I think, material to the point we have to decide. Clause 4 provides that the income and property of the association whencesoever derived should be applied solely towards the promotion of the objects of the association as set forth in the memorandum of association. I D do not think that anything turns on this clause as, whatever the word "objects" may refer to in cl. 3, in cl. 4 it clearly refers to all the objects of the association, including the exercise of the powers contained in cl. 3 (C). The only other provision of the memorandum of association that requires mention is cl. 9, which deals with what is to happen to the property of the association in the event of its winding-up and dissolution. Under that clause the property has
E to be transferred to some other institution or institutions having objects similar to the objects of the association and prohibiting in like manner the distribution of its income or property among its members, the institution or institutions to be determined by the members of the association at or before the time of dissolution, or, in default thereof, by a judge of the High Court of Justice having jurisdiction in regard to charitable funds. The clause ends
F with a provision that, if and so far as effect cannot be given to the previous provision in the clause, then the property is to go to some charitable object.

It will be observed that it is impossible to ascertain exactly what are the main objects of the association without enquiring into the means and principles of the Oxford Group Movement founded in or about the year 1921 by Dr. Buchman. The question whether that movement was charitable or not had
G arisen in 1939 when BENNETT, J., had to determine in Re Thackrah (3) whether a bequest to the secretary or other proper officer of the Oxford Group was a valid bequest. BENNETT, J., held that the bequest was invalid, and the commissioners regarded themselves as bound by the judge's conclusion in that case to find that the association was not established for charitable purposes only within the meaning of the Revenue Acts. When the matter came before
H CROOM-JOHNSON, J., he pointed out, and I respectfully agree with him, that the commissioners were wrong in holding that they were bound by BENNETT, J.'s decision as to the unincorporated body to reach a conclusion adverse to the association, an incorporated body. He said, and I adopt his words:

> "I think that BENNETT, J., was really concerned with a rather different problem, namely, as to whether there was really and truly in existence any such body as specified in the testatrix's will—with other questions—and neither the Crown nor the present association was before the court > or were parties to the decision. It is true that some observations of Bennett, J., were directed to the question whether the aim of the association could be regarded as directed towards the promotion of religion, but there was nothing in his decision which bound the Special Commissioners in the present case."

Croom-Johnson, J., however, affirmed the decision of the Special Commissioners on other grounds. He was not troubled, nor are we, over the construction of A cl. 3 (A), since it was common ground between the parties that, if (A) were the sole object of the association, it would be a trust for the advancement of religion, and, therefore, clearly charitable. As regards sub-cl. (B), the learned judge refers to the words, " the maintenance, support, development and assistance of the Oxford Group Movement in every way," and points out that these words—and I entirely agree with him—are very vague, and that the expression B " in every way " would enable the association to do almost anything they liked. He thought that they were so vague that it was impossible to say that the association was confined to means which related only to the advancement of the Christian religion. He did not, however, decide the case on that footing. He based his decision on paras. (9) and (10) of cl. 3 (C). As regards para. (9) he pointed to the decision in Chichester Diocesan Fund and Board of Finance C (Incorporated) v. Simpson (4), where a distinction was made between those objects which are charitable and those objects which are benevolent, the latter being held to be non-charitable. He pointed out that in para. (10) the door was pushed wide open for the association to do things which could not by any stretch of imagination be regarded as charitable, and he came to the conclusion that there was nothing in the paragraphs in question which justified any D finding that they were only ancillary to the main objects.

I have come to the conclusion that Croom-Johnson, J., was right in his conclusion based on the sub-clauses to which I have just referred, but as both points were fully argued before us I think it is right that I should express my conclusions on the construction and effect of sub-cl. (B) as well as on sub-cl. (C) of cl. 3 of the memorandum of association. To make my meaning clear I must E first point out that, while under sub-cl. (A) only those principles of the Oxford Group Movement can be applied and only those means of that movement can be used which tend to the advancement of the Christian religion, under sub-cl. (B), the association is authorised to maintain, support, develop and assist the Oxford Group Movement in every way. To appreciate the full extent of sub-cl. (B) it will be necessary to look at the evidence relating to that movement to see F whether or not it comprises any other objects than the advancement of the Christian religion.

It will be convenient, however, before turning to the evidence, to state what I understand as being the charitable object of " the advancement of religion." For that purpose I am content to base myself on some observations made in the court below and in this court in the leading case of Keren Kayemeth Le G Jisroel, Ltd. v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (2). In that case the main object of the association was stated to be " to purchase, take on lease or to exchange or otherwise acquire any land, forests, rights of possession and other rights, easements and other immovable property in . . . Palestine, Syria, or other parts of Turkey in Asia and the Peninsula of Sinai for the purpose of settling Jews on such lands." Then followed twenty-one specified objects and powers which H included, among other things, a power to acquire, construct and manage tramways, railways, etc., and to purchase and sell, work and develop mines and mining rights, but all the twenty-one such objects and powers were stated to be subject to a proviso that they were to be exercised only in such a way as should, in the opinion of the association, be conducive to the attainment of its primary object. Counsel sought to satisfy the court that since, as he said, the restoration of the Jews to Palestine was a religious object among the Jews and that was the main object of Keren Kayemeth, that association was established for charitable purposes only. Rowlatt, J., in the lower court had rejected that argument, saying (17 Tax Cas. 33):

> " . . . the promotion of religion means the promotion of the spiritual teaching of the religious body concerned and the maintenance of the spirit of the doctrines and observances . . . if a religion enjoins the pursuit of some ulterior aim in itself secular that is not the promotion of religion."

This court affirmed his decision, Lord Hanworth, M.R., saying ([1931] 2 K.B. 477):

> " It is sufficient to say that as to ' religion,' I agree with the observations of Rowlatt, J., on that head. The promotion of religion means the promotion of spiritual teaching in a wide sense, and the maintenance of the doctrines on which it rests, and the observances that serve to promote and manifest it—not merely a foundation or cause to which it can be related."

With this definition in mind, and remembering that we are concerned, not with what the association, or, indeed, the Oxford Group Movement, has done in the past, but with what the association is authorised by its memorandum to do, it seems to me inevitably to follow that sub-cl. (B) of cl. 3 authorises the expenditure of the funds of the association on activities which are not charitable. As my Lord has pointed out, a religious body may, without losing its religious character, engage in a number of subsidiary activities which are not purely religious, but a trust which permits the expenditure of income on such subsidiary activities is not a good charitable trust. In the present case, assuming the Oxford Group Movement to have been and to be a religious movement, it seems plain that sub-cl. (B) authorises the application of the association's income in furthering subsidiary activities not in themselves charitable, the pursuit of which would assist the Oxford Group Movement. I, therefore, agree with my Lord that it cannot be said that the association is a body of persons formed for charitable purposes only.

Having reached this conclusion it is unnecessary for me to review the evidence in detail or to express a concluded opinion on the question whether the Oxford Group Movement was itself a movement whose sole purpose was the advancement of religion. I must, however, say that the argument of counsel for the respondents that it was really a social movement founded on Christian ethics rather than a movement for the advancement of religion derives some support from the evidence. I would refer, in particular, to (i) the statement of the founder made in 1934, which is set out at the beginning of Mr. Thornton-Duesbery's pamphlet The Oxford Group—a brief account of its principles and growth ; (ii) to the account at p. 24 of that pamphlet of the " You can defend America Programme " ; (iii) to the account of the work done by its workers in solving strikes and industrial problems in America, which appears on p. 120 of Mr. Peter Howard's book Innocent Men ; and (iv) to the evidence given by Mr. Thornton-Duesbery and others as to the conferences the group hold to discuss industrial problems. Before parting with this branch of the case I would add that I derive some support for my conclusion from the observations of Lord Atkin in Farley v. Westminster Bank, Ltd. (5). In that case the question was as to the validity of a gift in a will to the vicars of two specified parishes for parish work. Their Lordships held the gift to be invalid, Lord Atkin saying ([1939] 3 All E.R. 492) in relation to the words " for parish work " :

> " They are words of definition, it is quite true, but I think that they were used for the very purpose of defining what the testatrix meant as the purpose for which the money was to be applied, and ' parish work ' seems to me to be of such vague import as to go far beyond the ordinary meaning > of charity, in this case in the sense of being a religious purpose. The expression covers the whole of the ordinary activities of the parish, some of which no doubt fall within the definition of religious purposes, and all of which no doubt are religious from the point of view of the person who is responsible for the spiritual care of the parish, in the sense that they are conducive, perhaps, to the moral and spiritual good of his congregation. However, that, I think, quite plainly is not enough ; and the words are A so wide that I am afraid that on no construction can they be brought within the limited meaning of ' charitable ' as used in the law."

Even if I had come to a different conclusion on this part of the case, I should have been of the opinion that Croom-Johnson, J., was right when he held that the objects set forth in paras. (9) and (10) were not merely ancillary to the main objects expressed in sub-cl. (A) and (B) of cl. 3 of the memorandum B of association.

Counsel for the appellants relied, in the main, on the substratum cases, for example, Re Amalgamated Syndicate (6). He said that where, as here, you have got no such provision as was found in Cotman v. Brougham (7), making each sub-clause of the objects clause a separate and independent main object, you must, when you have found the main object, construe the remainder as C ancillary thereto. Now, that may be true if you get no guidance from the various clauses themselves, but I think counsel for the Crown was right when he said that, although sub-cl. (C) is expressed to be only a collection of powers, the extent to which they must be construed as subsidiary to the main objects under sub-cll. (A) and (B) is defined in the sub-clauses themselves.

When I turn to para. (9) of sub-cl. (C) I find, first of all, that this paragraph D authorises the establishment and support of benevolent associations or institutions and the subscription of money for benevolent purposes. Prima facie this is not a charitable object, but it is said that the benevolent purposes must be connected with the purposes of the association and calculated to further its objects, and that, therefore, although prima facie non-charitable, it is ancillary to a charitable object and thus itself charitable. In this connection E counsel for the appellants relied on some observations of Lawrence, L.J., in Re Hood (8). In that case a testator, after reciting his belief in the universality of the Christian religion and that the remedy for all unrest and disorders of the body politic would be found in the application of Christian principles to all human relationships and also his belief that the drink traffic was one of the most subtle forces preventing the application of Christian principles, F declared it to be his wish that his estate and the income thereof should be applied in spreading the Christian principles before mentioned and in aiding all active steps to minimise and extinguish the drink traffic. This court held that the extinction of the drink traffic was in itself a charitable object, but Lawrence, L.J., said ([1931] 1 Ch. 252) that, even if he had taken a contrary view as to the drink traffic, he would think that the judge was right in holding G that the extinction of the drink traffic was not an independent additional object, but was merely introduced by the testator to point out one of the ways by which his main object could be attained and the trustees were only authorised to spend money in minimising and extinguishing the drink traffic in so far as they were thereby furthering the main purpose of the bequest which was the advancement of religion. I feel, however, a difficulty in reaching H a similar conclusion here, for the power given to apply money for benevolent purposes is not confined to benevolent purposes which further the advancement of religion, but to benevolent purposes in any way connected with the main object. I think an institution could be connected with the advancement of religion without being itself an institution for the advancement of religion.

Then, again, under para. (10) of sub-cl. (C), the association is empowered to do, not merely things which are incidental or conducive to the attainment of the main object, but also such things as the association may think conducive to it. In other words, the question which the court would have to decide, if any activity of the association was being challenged as being ultra vires, would be not whether, in the opinion of the court, the activity was conducive to the main object, but whether the association, in undertaking it, had thought it conducive. It seems to me that in this case the observations of Lawrence, L.J., in the Keren Kayemeth case (2), are directly in point. He said ([1931] 2 K.B. 482):

> "The company can exercise any or all of these powers whenever in its opinion such an exercise would be conducive to the attainment of the so-called primary object, which from a practical point of view means that it can exercise them whenever it is minded to do so, and whether such exercise is in fact conducive to the attainment of that object or not, as neither the court nor anyone else can control the company's opinion or otherwise interfere with the manner in which it chooses to carry out its objects. It would be difficult in any case to determine whether any particular enterprise undertaken by the company under its wide powers was or was not in fact conducive to the attainment of the primary object, but when the question whether it is or is not so conducive is left to the decision of the company itself I cannot avoid the conclusion that the objects mentioned in sub-cll. 2 to 22 can be carried out by the company just as freely as the object mentioned in sub-cl. 1, and that there is no substantial difference in degree between them."

The decision of the Privy Council in Dunne v. Bryne (9) reinforces my opinion that the inclusion of para. (10) of sub-cl. (C) makes it impossible to hold that the association was established for charitable purposes only. In that case a testator had bequeathed a legacy "to the Roman Catholic Archbishop of Brisbane and his successors to be used and expended wholly or in part as such Archbishop may judge most conducive to the good of religion in this diocese." The Board held the gift to be invalid. Lord Macnaghten, in giving the opinion of the Board, said ([1912] A.C. 410):

> "It can hardly be disputed that a thing may be 'conducive', and in particular circumstances 'most conducive', to the good of religion in a particular diocese or in a particular district without being charitable in the sense which the court attaches to the word, and indeed without being in itself in any sense religious."

Counsel for the appellants relied in particular on a passage from Lord Tomlin's speech in the Keren Kayemeth case (2) where he said ([1932] A.C. 658):

> "But, whether that be well founded or not, there are other reasons why it seems to me the argument must fail. There are a great number of objects in this memorandum. They are all expressed to be ancillary to the main object, and I well appreciate the argument which says that if you once find that the main object is charitable you cannot destroy the charitable character of the main object, because the ancillary powers, which are incidental to it, are, some of them, in themselves, not charitable. That argument may indeed be well founded, but when the question is whether the primary object is itself charitable, it is legitimate, in reaching a conclusion upon that head, to consider the effect of the incidental powers, and it may well be that the incidental powers are such as to indicate or give some indication that the primary object is not itself charitable."

I do not, however, understand the learned Lord to be laying down any general principle that, because you come to a conclusion that an object specified in one or more of the earlier sub-clauses is the primary object of the association, you are, therefore, bound to hold that the remaining objects are merely incidental. I think Lord Tomlin would have agreed with me when I said in Tennant Plays, Ltd. v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (10) that it is a matter of construction in each case. I think Lord Tomlin's observations were primarily directed to such powers as are contained in paras. (1), (2), (4), (5), (6), (7) and (8) of sub-cl. (C) of cl. 3 of the memorandum of association in this case, and I am unable to hold that such wide powers as are given in paras. (9) and (10) of sub-cl. (C) are merely ancillary to the main objects specified in sub-cll. (A) and (B). For these reasons I would dismiss the appeal.

Appeal dismissed.

Charity—Hospital—Gift of share of residue—Estate fully administered—Right to require transfer of funds—National Health Service Act, 1946 (c. 81), s. 60 (1), s. 79 (1).

On Dec. 18, 1901, the testator made a settlement on his daughter, B.G. and her issue, and it was declared that, if there should be no child or grandchild of the said B.G. who should attain a vested interest under the trusts therein declared, the trustees should stand possessed of the settlement funds upon trust for the testator, his executors or administrators. By his will, dated Feb. 17, 1904, the testator, who died on Nov. 12, 1906, after giving certain legacies, devised and bequeathed his real and personal estate to his trustees upon trust, after making provision for his wife, for his three daughters, M.A.W., E.A.C. and B.G., in equal shares and each share was settled. By cl. 21: "In case my said daughter B.G. shall die without having been married . . . my trustees shall stand possessed of her said share . . . and the income thereof or so much as shall not have been applied or disposed of . . . as to one equal half part of such share in trust for Owen's College Incorporated . . . and as to the other equal half part of such share in trust as to one third part thereof for the Manchester Children's Hospital Pendlebury Manchester as to one other third part thereof for the St. Mary's Hospital Oxford Road Manchester to be applicable in each case for the general purposes of such institutions" and as to the remaining one third part thereof to apply the same for providing public parks and recreation grounds within a prescribed area. The testator further declared that, in the event of the failure of all or any of the provisions of his will, the trustees should hold the property undisposed of in trust for Owen's College Incorporated. The testator's wife died on Mar. 29, 1910. B.G. died on Sept. 3, 1946, without having been married, and the settlement funds thereupon became part of the testator's residuary trust estate.

By pt. II of the National Health Service Act, 1946, which came into force on July 5, 1948, the Manchester Children's Hospital and St. Mary's Hospital became subject to the Act. The Manchester Children's Hospital was not designated as a teaching hospital and the Salford Hospital Management Committee (Group No. 12) was constituted to exercise functions with respect to the administration of hospitals in the area in which the Manchester Children's Hospital was situated. St. Mary's Hospital was designated as a teaching hospital and from July 5, 1948, its affairs were conducted by a board of governors. By s. 60 (1) of the Act : " Where property, other than property transferred to the Minister or to the board of governors of a teaching hospital or to a hospital management committee under s. 6 or s. 7 of this Act, is held on trust immediately before the appointed day, and the terms of the trust instrument authorise or require the trustees, whether immediately or in the future, to apply any part of the capital or income of the trust property for the purposes of any hospital to which s. 6 of this Act applies, the trust instrument shall be construed as authorising or, as the case may be, requiring the trustees to apply the trust property, to the like extent and at the like times, for the purpose of making payments, whether of capital or income—(a) in the case of a hospital designated as a teaching hospital or included in a group of hospitals so designated, to the board of governors of that teaching hospital ; (b) in the case of any other hospital, to the regional hospital board for the area in which the hospital is situated or to the hospital management committee for the hospital or for the group of hospitals in which it is comprised." By s. 79 (1) unless the context otherwise requires " property " includes rights.

On the death of B.G., the settlement trustees and the will trustees were the same persons, and, therefore, no transfer of the settlement funds had been made before July 5, 1948. It was contended by the committee and the board that the trustees were required to apply the capital and income of two one-sixth shares in the settled share of B.G. in the residuary trust estate and of two one-sixth shares in one-third of the settlement funds in making payments to the committee and the board respectively under s. 60 (1) of the Act. For the Attorney-General of the Duchy of Lancaster it was contended that the shares given to the two hospitals failed, and that, at any rate, s. 60 (1) of the Act did not apply to the shares in the settlement funds because on July 5, 1948, the settlement trustees held these funds on trust to pay them to the will trustees only.

HELD : the right of the will trustees to receive from the settlement trustees the whole of the settlement fund was a right which the will trustees could enforce by action to execute the trusts ; that right was " property " within s. 60 (1) ; the terms of the will required the trustees to apply the capital and income of the shares specified to the hospitals named, and, therefore, under s. 60 (1) two one-sixth shares in B.G.'s one-third settled share in the testator's residuary trust estate should be applied in making payments to the committee and the board, which were to apply the same, so far as practicable, for the general purposes of the Manchester Children's Hospital and St. Mary's Hospital respectively.

R. C. Seddon for the Attorney-General of the Duchy of Lancaster and the King's Attorney and Serjeant within the County Palatine of Lancaster.

SIR LEONARD STONE, V.-C. : On Sept. 3, 1946, Beatrice Gartside died without ever having been married, and, as a result, her one-third share in the residuary trust estate of her father, John Henry Gartside, who died on Nov. 12, 1906, became divisible among certain charities. The will of the testator is dated Feb. 17, 1904, and it is cl. 21 which is material in the events which have happened:

> "Clause 21 : In case my said daughter Beatrice Gartside shall die without having been married or if the trusts hereinbefore declared concerning her share in my residuary trust estate shall fail in manner hereinbefore mentioned concerning the shares of my other two daughters then and in such case my trustees shall stand possessed of her said share as well as any share or shares accruing or added thereto by virtue of the last preceding paragraph hereof and the income thereof or so much as shall not have been applied or disposed of under the trusts or powers herein contained or by law vested in my trustees as to one equal half part of such share in trust for the Owen's College Incorporated by the Owen's Extension College Manchester Act, 1870, and the Owen's College Act, 1871, to be applied by the governors of the said college in manner directed by the said Acts concerning donations accepted by the governors And as to the other equal half part of such share in trust as to one third part thereof for the Manchester Children's Hospital Pendlebury Manchester as to one other third part thereof for the St. Mary's Hospital Oxford Road Manchester to be applicable in each case for the general purposes of such institutions."

As to the remaining one third part thereof the testator directed that the same should be applied for providing public parks, recreation grounds and other open spaces as therein mentioned. I should also refer to cl. 22 which declares:

> " . . . if all and every or any of the provisions of this my will shall at any time fail so that there would be an intestacy as to my estate or to any portion thereof then such estate or such portion thereof as to which but for this present provision there would be an intestacy shall be held by my trustees in trust for the Owen's College Manchester to be applied by the governors of the said college in manner directed by the aforesaid Acts relating thereto concerning donations accepted by the governors and I declare that the receipt of the treasurer or other proper officer for the time being of any institution interested under this my will shall be a sufficient discharge to my trustees in respect of the sum of money so paid to them by my trustees."

The testator's estate was a large one, and consisted of many investments, some of which were very difficult to dispose of, and this resulted in an administration order being made by this court on Mar. 21, 1907.

By a settlement dated Dec. 18, 1901, made by the testator in favour of his said daughter and her issue it was declared that, if there should be no child or grandchild of his said daughter who should attain a vested interest, the trustees should stand possessed of the trust funds upon trust for the testator, his executors or administrators, so that on Sept. 3, 1946, the settlement funds became part of the testator's residuary trust fund and divided into three equal parts, one of such parts being subject to the same trusts as Beatrice A Gartside's share in the testator's residuary trust estate. There can be no doubt that the testator's estate has long since been administered and that the office of executor has ceased. In fact, new trustees have from time to time been appointed. That was the state of affairs on July 5, 1948, the appointed day within the meaning of the National Health Service Act, 1946, and the first question I have to determine is what happens to the two one-B sixth shares of Beatrice Gartside's settled share in the residuary trust estate which are held in trust for the Manchester Children's Hospital, Pendlebury, Manchester, and for St. Mary's Hospital, Oxford Road, Manchester. Both these hospitals on July 5, 1948, became subject to s. 6 of the Act, i.e., there was transferred to the Minister:

> " . . . all rights and liabilities to which any such governing body or C trustees were entitled or subject immediately before the appointed day, being rights and liabilities acquired or incurred solely for the purposes of managing any such premises or property as aforesaid or otherwise carrying on the business of the hospital or any part thereof, but not including any endowment within the meaning of the next following section or any rights or liabilities transferred under that section."

D The Manchester Children's Hospital is not a teaching hospital within the meaning of the Act and it is controlled by a committee of management. On the other hand, St. Mary's Hospital is a teaching hospital, and is, therefore, controlled by a board of governors. No one suggests that s. 7, which deals with the endowments of voluntary hospitals, has anything to do with this E case, and the question centres around s. 60 (1) of the Act which, omitting a parenthetical exception not material to this case, is as follows:

> " Where property . . . is held on trust immediately before the appointed day, and the terms of the trust instrument authorise or require the trustees, whether immediately or in the future, to apply any part of the capital or F income of the trust property for the purposes of any hospital to which s. 6 of this Act applies, the trust instrument shall be construed as authorising or, as the case may be, requiring the trustees to apply the trust property, to the like extent and at the like times, for the purposes of making payments, whether of capital or income—(a) in the case of a hospital designated as a teaching hospital or included in a group of G hospitals so designated, to the board of governors of that teaching hospital ; (b) in the case of any other hospital, to the regional hospital board for the area in which the hospital is situated or to the hospital management committee for the hospital or for the group of hospitals in which it is comprised."

Section 79, which is a definition clause and applies " unless the context other-H wise requires," defines " property " as including rights.

I ask myself the question whether the trustees of the testator's residuary trust estate held property, including rights, on trust immediately before July 5, 1948, and the terms of the trust instrument (the testator's will) required the trustees to apply any part of the capital or income of the trust property for the purposes of any hospital, and I feel no difficulty in giving an affirmative answer. The investments in the hands of the will trustees representing Beatrice Gartside's one-third share in the residuary trust funds are clearly property.

Nor should I have felt any difficulty with regard to the funds subject to the 1901 settlement which must be paid over by the settlement trustees to the will trustees. In fact, they are the same persons, but that is accidental and cannot affect the matter. On July 5, 1948, the will trustees had a right to receive the settlement funds and that right was held by them subject to the trusts of the testator's residuary trust estate.

Counsel for the Attorney-General of the Duchy of Lancaster and the King's Attorney and Serjeant within the County Palatine of Lancaster relies, however, on the recent decision of Harman, J., in Re Kellner's Will Trusts (1), and I have been provided with a shorthand transcript of the learned judge's judgment. The facts in that case were that the testatrix, who made her will on June 18, 1948, and died five days later, bequeathed a number of pecuniary legacies and devised and bequeathed all the rest of her property to her trustee on the statutory trusts for realisation and directed him to stand possessed of her residuary estate on trust to divide it equally between eight well-known charitable institutions, two parts going respectively to the Cancer Research Institute and the Royal Cancer Hospital (Free), Fulham Road. Probate of the will was not obtained until after the appointed day so that immediately before the appointed day there were not only no trustees who held property on any trusts but administration of the estate had not even commenced, and the learned judge, after referring to the definition of "property" in s. 79, said (p. 48, ante):

> "Now the rights of the residuary legatees are rights to have the estate of the testatrix administered according to law, either by the personal representatives or by the court, and on completion of the administration to have the balance remaining in the executor's hands distributed in due proportions. The residuary legatees, while the estate remains undistributed, have no right to any particular asset or item of property, but merely an equitable interest in the estate of the nature I have mentioned."

He goes on to hold that neither s. 7 of the Act, which deals with endowments, nor s. 6, which deals with certain limited interests, had any application. Turning to s. 60 he says (ibid., 49) :

> "The context of this section requires that the word 'property' should not here include rights, for that which is dealt with is something to be applied for the benefit of (among others) a board of governors. The rights vested in the board of governors here cannot be applied by someone else for their benefit. In this section, therefore, the expression 'the trust property' means the residue of the estate, and the question is whether the terms of the trust instrument (i.e., the will) require the trustees (i.e., the plaintiff) to apply a part of the capital for the purposes of the Cancer Hospital. In my judgment, this language is wholly inappropriate, and the section has nothing to do with the case."

I do not read that passage as laying down any general proposition. Harman, J., was dealing with an unadministered estate, and, in view of what he had already said with regard to the rights of residuary legatees in an unadministered estate, I am forced to the conclusion that it was those rights which he held to be excluded by the context from the definition of "property" in s. 79. If it be not so, I should, with the greatest deference to the learned judge, feel unable to follow the reasoning founded on finding within s. 60 a context which excludes all rights. But the position in the case before me is very different. The right of the will trustees to receive from the settlement trustees, subject only to the retention of their costs, charges and expenses, the whole of the settlement funds is a right which the will trustees could enforce by action to execute the settlement trusts. In my judgment, s. 60 is to be read from the point of view of the trustees. I think this is demonstrated by the terms of the section itself : " . . . where property is held on trust . . . and the terms of the trust instrument . . . require the trustees . . . to apply any part of the capital or income of the trust property "—and, I add, including rights—" for the purposes of any hospital . . ."

I shall, therefore, declare that, according to the true construction of the testator's will and in the events which have happened, a one-sixth share of Beatrice Gartside's one-third settled share in the testator's residuary trust estate shall be applied in making payments to the respondent committee who have been constituted to exercise the functions with regard to the administration of hospitals in the area in which the Manchester Children's Hospital is situated and that the other one-sixth share shall be applied for the purpose of making payments to the respondent board of governors constituted to exercise functions with respect to the group of hospitals which include St. Mary's Hospital. The respondent committee and the respondent board of governors are, so far as may be practicable, to apply any sums paid to them for the general purposes of the Manchester Children's Hospital and St. Mary's Hospital respectively.

Order accordingly.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Roxburgh, J.), July 27, 1949.]

Will—" Grandchildren "—Application of term to named persons not grandchildren.

In 1906 the testatrix married J.D., the former husband of her deceased sister who was survived by a son J.F.D. (a child of her marriage with J.D.), born in 1901. Of the testatrix's marriage with J.D. there was one child only, a daughter K.N.D. J.F.D. married E.M.D., and in the lifetime of the testatrix there were born two children of the marriage, N.M.D. and D.J.D. The testatrix's daughter K.N.D. remained a spinster. By her will, the testatrix provided : " (a) To my son J.F.D. the two large silver trophy cups . . . (b) To my grand-daughter N.M.D. my diamond ring with three large stones . . . (c) To my daughter-in-law E.M.D. my diamond ring with eight diamonds in it. I give and bequeath [certain property] on trust to pay the income . . . unto my said son J.F.D. during his life and from and after his death the . . . investments shall fall into . . . my residuary estate. I devise and bequeath all and singular my real and personal estate whatsoever and wheresoever not . . . otherwise specifically disposed of . . . on trust for such of my grandchildren as shall be living at my death and attain the age of 21 years or previously marry and if more than one in equal shares absolutely." The testatrix had no lawful grandchildren, and the question arose as to the construction of the residuary gift.

Held: the matter must be decided by reference to the language and context of the will and the consideration of the whole instrument; on the construction of the will as a whole the testatrix had chosen to use the word "grandchildren" in a sense peculiar to herself, but she had clearly indicated in her will that she employed it in reference to N.M.D. and D.J.D.; and, therefore, they were entitled under the residuary gift.

Adjourned Summons to determine whether, on the true construction of the will of the testatrix, a gift of residuary estate to "my grandchildren" was effective to pass the benefit thereof to the children of the son of the husband of the testatrix by a former wife. The testatrix had no lawful grandchildren. Roxburgh, J., held that the gift was so effective. The facts appear in the judgment and are summarised in the headnote.

F. B. Alcock for the plaintiff bank, trustee of the will of the testatrix.

Peter Foster for the first and second defendants, John Foster Davidson and Nora Margaret Davidson, the son and the granddaughter of the husband of the testatrix.

R. J. S. Thompson for the third defendant, Donald John Davidson, the grandson of the husband of the testatrix.

L. R. Norris for the fourth defendant, Kathleen Nora Davidson, the daughter of the testatrix.

ROXBURGH, J.: The testatrix anticipated by a year or so the enactment of legislation enabling persons to marry their deceased wives' sisters. Though domiciled in England, she went to Sweden in 1906 and there married one John Davidson. John Davidson had previously married the sister of the testatrix, and this sister had died on Feb. 14, 1902. Accordingly, the testatrix was John Davidson's deceased wife's sister. It seems almost certain that the legislation passed in 1907 validated that marriage, but in the circumstances that question is immaterial.

John Davidson had already had a child by the testatrix's sister then deceased, whose name was John Foster Davidson. He was aged about five years at the time of the marriage in 1906 and there was evidence that John Foster Davidson informed Mr. Stephens, manager of the Bournemouth branch of the trustee department of the plaintiff bank, that the testatrix acted in the place of a mother to him and always regarded him and spoke of him as her son to everybody she met. That evidence is only relevant, if admissible, as showing that A the testatrix in her will was not guilty of falsa demonstratio. The evidence is completely silent about the testatrix's own family. It is only that:

> " There was issue of the said marriage of the testatrix and the said John Davidson one child only namely the defendant Kathleen Nora Davidson who informs our solicitors . . . that she has never been married."

A good deal more is known about the matter than that, but it is not in evidence B and must, therefore, be disregarded for the purposes of my judgment. John Foster Davidson married. There is some reason for thinking that the name of his wife is Elsie Margaret Davidson, but I do not think the fact is proved, but it is proved that two children were born of his marriage before the death of the testatrix, namely, the defendants Nora Margaret Davidson and Donald John Davidson.

C By her will, the testatrix provided:

> " (a) To my son John Foster Davidson the two large silver trophy cups which were won by his father. (b) To my granddaughter Nora Margaret Davidson my diamond ring with three large stones and the single diamond ring. (c) To my daughter-in-law Elsie Margaret Davidson my diamond D ring with eight diamonds in it. I give and bequeath [certain property on trust for sale and] on trust to pay the income or interest arising from such investments unto my said son John Foster Davidson during his life and from and after his death the said investments shall fall into and the bank shall hold such investments on trusts hereinafter declared concerning my residuary estate . . . I devise and bequeath all and singular my real E and personal estate whatsoever and wheresoever not hereby or by any codicil hereto otherwise specifically disposed of unto the bank on trust for such of my grandchildren as shall be living at my death and attain the age of 21 years or previously marry and if more than one in equal shares absolutely."

She had no lawful grandchildren living at her death or at any time during F her life. The defendant Kathleen Nora Davidson, her only child, was and still is a spinster. The testatrix has plainly, not once but two or three times, put John Foster Davidson and his family into an artificial position of relationship to herself. He was not her son, but she so describes him twice in the will. Nora Margaret Davidson was not her granddaughter, but she so plainly describes her once in the will. Elsie Margaret Davidson was not her daughter-in-law, G for she had no daughter-in-law, and I have little doubt that Elsie Margaret Davidson was the wife of John, though that is not proved. There is no question in my mind of any mistake in the use of language. She knew perfectly well that John Foster Davidson was not her son, but she did not call him her son by inadvertence. She called him her son because she chose to describe him by that designation and she did it, in my judgment, deliberately. Equally H well she knew that Nora was not her granddaughter, but she did not use the phrase by inadvertence. She deliberately chose to describe Nora as standing in that relationship to her. Apart from authority, to which I will refer in a moment, it seems to me that the testatrix has used the phrase " grandchildren " in a sense peculiar to herself but one which she has plainly indicated in her will. It seems to me impossible to exclude from the class of grandchildren Nora Margaret Davidson, who is described as her granddaughter, being the daughter of the person described as her son, and it seems to me equally impossible to exclude the other child, being the child of the same John Foster Davidson, described as her son, who is a brother of Nora.

It is, however, submitted that there is authority which debars me from reaching this conclusion, and at one moment I thought that there was. This matter seems to have been the subject-matter of no little judicial skirmishing. The nature of this skirmishing is indicated by a passage in the judgment of Swinfen Eady, J., in Re Cozens (1). That case related to a different description of relationship, but that is immaterial for the present purpose. Swinfen Eady, J., said ([1903] 1 Ch. 142):

> "It was contended on the one hand that the cases of Smith v. Lidiard (2), Wells v. Wells (3), and Merrill v. Morton (4) establish the proposition that the fact that a great-niece or a wife's niece has been previously called a niece will not enlarge the meaning of the word 'niece' in another part of the will. It was contended on the other hand that these cases were overruled by Re Jodrell, Seale-Hayne v. Jodrell (5)—see Re Gue (6)—and that the rule now is that where a legatee has once been referred to by an inaccurate description in a will, the same description in all other parts of the will must be treated as including that person, and all others in the same degree of relationship. In the case of Re Jodrell (5), in the Court of Appeal, Lord Halsbury repudiated entirely the notion of laying down any canon of construction which was to extend beyond the particular instrument that he was called upon to give an interpretation to . . . I am of opinion that both the propositions contended for were too widely stated. There is not any hard and fast rule that a gift to nieces does not include a great-niece, where in another part of the same will a great-niece is described as a niece; nor, on the other hand, is there any hard and fast rule that, whenever a great-niece has once been referred to in a will as a niece, the expression 'niece' must in all other parts of the will be taken to include great-nieces. The true rule is to determine by the language and context of each will, including the consideration of the whole instrument and any evidence properly admissible, the meaning of the expressions contained in it, and the persons who are entitled to share in the benefits thereby conferred."

Swinfen Eady, J., had no power to overrule Wells v. Wells (3), still less Smith v. Lidiard (2), but it seems to me that he was deliberately declining to treat as obligatory a principle seemingly established by those cases.

The next judge to deal with this controversy was Sargant, J., in Re Green (7), and I think he must be treated as having agreed with Swinfen Eady, J., that no binding rule was laid down by Smith v. Lidiard (2) and Wells v. Wells (3), because he says ([1914] 1 Ch. 137):

> "There is a good deal of authority on the point, and the cases of Smith v. Lidiard (2) and Wells v. Wells (3) would be conclusive against the larger construction if I were bound by them as authorities. But I have been referred to Re Jodrell (5), which is said to amount to a negation of all authority in a case like this, and I take it that I am cast at large as regards the interpretation to be put on the words used and am not bound by any reported decision, although I think I may derive assistance from the authorities cited to me."

Sargant, J., as the sequel shows, found assistance from Smith v. Lidiard (2) and Wells v. Wells (3), but none from Re Jodrell (5).

Eve, J., considered the problem in Re Winn (8) where he is reported ([1916] W.N. 366) to have said that:

> "Three instances of the use in the earlier part of the will of the words 'my niece' were pointed out where the testator referred to his wife's niece, and two of these nieces were expressly included in the residuary devise. Upon that point there were two direct authorities which had been relied upon, Smith v. Lidiard (2) and Wells v. Wells (3), and the two learned judges who decided those cases expressed a clear and unqualified opinion that the mere fact that a testator had in the earlier part of his will attached to a legatee what was in fact a misdescription, did not operate to extend a residuary gift so as to include the class of persons so described in the earlier part of the will. Neither of these two cases had been overruled in Re Jodrell (5) and he was not going to be so presumptuous as to differ from the conclusions which Sir George Jessell, M.R., and Page-Wood, V.-C., had expressed. If those cases were to be overruled, it must be by some other court. His Lordship, therefore, held that the mere fact that the testator had described certain of his wife's nieces as 'my nieces' in the prior part of his will did not operate to bring all his wife's nephews and nieces within the residuary devise."

The position is, therefore, that two judges have thought themselves unfettered by authority on this matter and one has thought himself fettered. I prefer to go with the majority. I think the rule is correctly laid down by Swinfen Eady, J., in the passage which I have read ([1903] 1 Ch. 142):

> "The true rule is to determine by the language and context of each will, including the consideration of the whole instrument and any evidence properly admissible, the meaning of the expressions contained in it, and the persons who are entitled to share in the benefits thereby conferred."

There is no rule of construction which ought to induce a judge to depart from that principle or that line of approach. Accordingly, I feel free to reach the conclusion which I should have reached apart from all authority and which I have already stated.

[Court of Appeal (Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., Somervell and Denning, L.JJ.), July 15, 18, 22, 26, 1949.]

Income Tax—Settlement—Sums paid to settlor otherwise than as income—Body corporate connected with a settlement—Loans to settlor by body corporate—Payments made by company on behalf of settlor—Obligation of settlor to repay—Finance Act, 1938 (c. 46), s. 40 (3), (5) (a).

By the Finance Act, 1938, s. 40 (1), any capital sum paid, directly or indirectly, by trustees of a settlement to the settlor is to be treated as income of the settlor to the extent of the available income arising under the settlement. Section 40 further provides: "(3) For the purpose of this section, any capital sum paid to the settlor in any year of assessment by any body corporate connected with the settlement in that year shall be treated as having been paid by the trustees of the settlement in that year . . . (5) . . . in this section (a) the expression ‘ capital sum ’ means (i) any sum paid by way of loan or repayment of a loan ; and (ii) any other sum paid otherwise than as income, being a sum which is not paid for full consideration in money or money’s worth . . .”

On Mar. 31, 1939, P. made a settlement of a sum of money on his infant grandchildren, and on Apr. 25, 1939, the trustees of the settlement invested A the money in the purchase from P. or his nominees of the whole of the issued share capital, save one share, of a company of which P. was governing director and which was admitted to be a “ body corporate connected with the settlement ” within the meaning of s. 40 (3). P. had had for many years prior to the settlement, and continued to have after the date of of the settlement, an arrangement with the company whereby it paid various B accounts on his behalf, such as certain subscriptions, insurance, and tax, debiting his account in the company’s books with the sums so paid, and crediting his account with director’s fees and expenses due to him and payments which he made to the company in discharge of his indebtedness. In the tax years 1939-40 and 1940-41 the company made payments at P.’s request exceeding the available income of the settlement, and P.’s executors C (P. having since died) were assessed to surtax in respect of the amounts so paid. The question for the court was whether the sums paid by the company at P.’s request were capital sums within the meaning of s. 40 (5) (a), paid to the settlor within the meaning of s. 40 (3).

Held : having regard to the whole of pt. IV of the Act of 1938 and to para. 3 of pt. II of sched. III to the Act, the words “ paid to the settlor ” D in s. 40 (3) meant “ paid directly or indirectly to the settlor,” and the sums in question were, according to the ordinary use of language and according to the language of s. 40 (3) into which must be read the definition in s. 40 (5) (a) (i), “ paid by way of loan directly or indirectly to the settlor.”

Per curiam : the settlor’s promise or obligation to repay in full the E sums in question constituted full consideration in money or money’s worth, and, therefore, the sums were not within s. 40 (5) (a) (ii).

Cur. adv. vult.

July 26. SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R., read the following judgment. This appeal raises a question of the application of the Finance Act, 1938, s. 40, to certain sums paid at the request of the deceased, Mr. G. W. Potts, by a company known as G. W. Potts, Ltd., in the financial years ended

Apr. 5, 1940, and Apr. 5, 1941. If the section does apply to these payments, then it is conceded that Mr. Potts' estate is now liable for surtax for those years in respect of the payments. The figures have been agreed and, after appropriate "grossing up," the assessments are respectively for £50,583 and £5,470.

The material facts as found by the Special Commissioners and stated by them in the Special Case may be summarised as follows. In March, 1939, Mr. Potts executed a settlement in favour of his infant grandchildren in the sum of £150,000. The trustees of the settlement were a company known as Carron Trust, Ltd., a company wholly owned by the settlor. Shortly after the date of the settlement, namely on Apr. 25, 1939, the trustees applied the settled moneys in the purchase from Mr. Potts of the whole of the issued share capital, save one share, that is 49,999 shares, in the company, G. W. Potts, Ltd., above mentioned, which I shall hereinafter refer to as "the company." The settlor was at the time the sole governing director of the company and he continued in that capacity at all relevant dates after the date of the purchase. It is conceded that the company is and was "a body corporate connected with the settlement" within the meaning of s. 40 (3) of the Act of 1938. By cl. 3 (i) of its memorandum of association the company was given power, in what is now a common form, to make advances to directors and others. The memorandum of association also contained cl. 3 (w), the usual clause empowering the company to carry on any activities which might conveniently be carried on in connection with its principal business. In fact, for many years prior to the two years in question and during such two years the settlor had, in effect, a current account with the company, the company making on his behalf and at his request numerous payments of various kinds and crediting him in the account with the fees and expenses to which he was entitled as director. A copy of the account in the company's books, which is called the "G. W. Potts, Esq., director's account," for the years ended Dec. 30, 1939, and Dec. 28, 1940, is annexed to the Special Case. During the first of those two years the payments made included a considerable number of payments to charities, subscriptions to clubs, motor insurance, weekly cash payments to the settlor and others, and last, but by no means least, payments in respect of income tax and surtax amounting to £13,800 odd. In the second of the two years, which opened with a debit balance of £8,850, the tax payments amounted to approximately £28,800. There were also a number of cash payments, and at the end of the year the debit balance of the settlor was £32,570 1*s.* 3*d.*, which the settlor discharged by his cheque on Dec. 23, 1940.

In these circumstances the conclusion of the Special Commissioners was as follows, so far as is material:

> "In our opinion, the question whether the payments in question constitute sums paid by way of loan is a question to be decided on the facts proved before us . . . On the facts before us we hold that the sums paid by the company at Mr. Potts' request are sums paid by way of loan. If the company was called on to justify its action in making the said payments reliance would have to be placed upon cl. 3 (i) of the memorandum of association (power to lend money). We, therefore, hold that the said payments constitute capital sums, and we further hold that capital sums have been paid indirectly to Mr. Potts, the settlor. The payments by the company direct to (for example) the Inland Revenue Commissioners for surtax are in substance merely a convenient method which avoided the necessity of the company paying to Mr. Potts and Mr. Potts then paying the Inland Revenue Commissioners. The capital sums paid by the company must be treated as paid by the trustees of the settlement (see s. 40 (3)) because the company is a body corporate connected with the settlement (see s. 41 (4) (e))."

Counsel for the executors has directed some criticism to this conclusion. He has said that there is no justification for concluding that the payments were made pursuant to cl. 3 (i) of the memorandum of association. He says, accordingly, that the inference that the sums paid should be treated as loans (an inference based, he contended, on the supposed application of cl. 3 (i) of the memorandum of association) is unsupported by proper evidence and should be rejected. The various sums paid, according to counsel's contention, were admittedly sums paid at the request of Mr. Potts, but Mr. Potts' liability to reimburse the company was not for money lent, but it rested on the footing of a promise to pay implicit in the request, a real and substantial distinction to be found in the old forms of action and the old forms of pleading: see, for example, BULLEN AND LEAKE, 3rd ed., pp. 839-846. For reasons which later appear, I do not think these criticisms are valid, nor do I think that the solution of the problem rests on the assumption that the company did or did not make payments in exercise of the particular power in cl. 3 (i) of the memorandum of association. The real question on the appeal is, of course, whether on the facts as I have stated them the case is or is not caught by the provisions of s. 40 of the Act of 1938. If it is, the financial result to Mr. Potts' estate is, no doubt, severe. The claim may or may not have surprised the executors of Mr. Potts, but, as SINGLETON, J., pointed out, we are not concerned with considerations of that kind. I follow the learned judge in citing and bearing in mind these observations of LORD CAIRNS, in Partington v. Attorney-General (1) (L.R. 4 H.L. 122):

> ". . . as I understand the principle of all fiscal legislation, it is this: If the person sought to be taxed comes within the letter of the law he must be taxed, however great the hardship may appear to the judicial mind to be. On the other hand, if the Crown, seeking to recover the tax, cannot bring the subject within the letter of the law, the subject is free, however apparently within the spirit of the law the case might otherwise appear to be. In other words, if there be admissible, in any statute, what is called an equitable construction, certainly such a construction is not admissible in a taxing statute, where you can simply adhere to the words of the statute."

It is also not to be forgotten, as has been said in this court before, that, if the complexity and artificiality of taxing statutes are sometimes regarded as matters of comment and criticism, the blame should be laid not so much on Parliament and the Parliamentary draftsmen as on those private persons who have employed their ingenuity in divising elaborate schemes for avoiding taxes which would otherwise fall on them.

I now turn to the relevant parts of s. 40. Sub-section (1) opens as follows:

> "Any capital sum paid directly or indirectly in any relevant year of assessment by the trustees of a settlement to which this section applies to the settlor shall—(a) . . ."

to the extent there stated be treated as the income of the settlor. Section 40 further provides:

> "(3) For the purpose of this section, any capital sum paid to the settlor in any year of assessment by any body corporate connected with the settlement in that year shall be treated as having been paid by the trustees of the settlement in that year . . . (5) This section applies to any settlement wherever made and whether made before or after the commencement of this Act, and in this section (a) the expression 'capital sum' means (i) any sum paid by way of loan or repayment of a loan; and (ii) any other sum paid otherwise than as income, being a sum which is not paid for full consideration in money or money's worth . . .

The question, therefore, having regard to the concession in reference to the company already stated, is whether the sums paid were capital sums paid to the settlor within the meaning of sub-s. (3). The learned judge thought they were not. He thought that, whatever the effect of the definition of a capital sum, they were not paid to the settlor. He said:

> " Bearing in mind the words of LORD CAIRNS, to which I have referred, I do not regard the payments of surtax, or other payments to third parties through the current account, as payments made to the settlor. In making payments of this kind, the company was carrying out an old practice, and a practice which existed long before the settlement came into existence. It was not making payments to the settlor. The making of the payments for surtax caused a debit against Mr. Potts on the current account, and he paid that before the end of 1940. The position created was much the same as that of banker and customer. If a bank pays a subscription on a bankers' order when the customer already has an overdraft, the result is to increase the overdraft, but it is not a payment to the customer. It is rather a payment to someone else at the request of the customer or for his benefit. Section 40 (3) only deals with a capital sum paid to the settlor."

The learned judge, however, indicated his opinion, in case he should be wrong on his main conclusion, that the sums in question were not capital sums paid by way of loan within sub-s. (5) (a) (i), but would have fallen within sub-s. (5) (a) (ii). With all respect to the learned judge, I have formed on these matters a different opinion.

Counsel for the Crown's first point was that the formula " paid to the settlor " in sub-s. (3) must in its context be read as meaning " paid directly or indirectly to the settlor." I think, as I read his judgment, that on this point, the learned judge declined to read in the words " directly or indirectly " into sub-s. (3), though a decision on this point may not have been strictly necessary for his conclusion. In my opinion, however, counsel's argument on this point is correct. My first impression was, I confess, the other way. If there were no other context than that provided by sub-ss. (1) and (3), I should conclude that the omission of the words " directly or indirectly " within the latter was, notwithstanding the change in the construction of the sentence, deliberate, with the result that sub-s. (3) would be more limited in this respect than sub-s. (1). Nor do I think that reference to the definitions in sub-s. (5), which, of course, apply equally to sub-ss. (1) and (3), would be sufficient to tip the balance in favour of the Crown's argument, for the effect of the definition sub-section is that wherever you find the words " capital sum " in sub-ss. (1) or (3) you must read in the full definition supplied. This process does not seem to me necessarily to produce the result contended for by the Crown, but there are other indications. I think it is true to say, as counsel for the Crown put it, that direct and indirect payments are both species of the genus " payments to the settlor." In other words, the phrase " paid to the settlor " is one capable in itself of covering payments of both kinds. If it is to be limited to direct payments only, then the result seems to depend on the absence of the alternative formula in sub-s. (3) which is present in sub-s. (1).

Counsel for the Crown referred us to sub-s. (2) which provides:

> " For the purpose of the last foregoing sub-section, the amount of income available up to the end of any year shall, in relation to any capital sum paid as aforesaid, be taken to be the aggregate amount of income arising under the settlement in that year and any previous relevant year > which has not been distributed, less (a) the amount of any other capital sums paid to the settlor in any relevant year before that sum was paid . . ."

In the opening lines it is, of course, quite obvious that the words "paid as aforesaid" mean and cover payments both direct and indirect, but it is also equally manifest that the words "paid to the settlor" in para. (a) must mean payments both direct and indirect. Finally, counsel for the Crown referred to the language of para. 3 of pt. II of sched. III to the Act. This Part of the A schedule is related to a different taxing section—s. 38 in the same pt. IV of the Act. By that section the income arising under certain settlements is treated for tax purposes as income of the settlor. By sub-s. (7) (c) the section is applied to settlements made before Apr. 27, 1938, subject to the provisions of pt. II of sched. III. Paragraph 3 is as follows:

> "The foregoing provisions of this Part of this schedule shall not apply to any settlement if, in any year to which this Part of this schedule applies, any capital sum within the meaning of s. 40 of this Act has been paid to the settlor directly or indirectly by the trustees of the settlement or any body corporate connected with the settlement in that year."

It is plain from the final words of this paragraph that Parliament conceived C that for the purposes of s. 40 payments made to the settlor directly or indirectly by a body corporate connected with the settlement were no less liable to be caught by that section than payments made to the settlor directly or indirectly by the trustees of the settlement.

In my judgment, it is in the present case legitimate, in construing s. 40 (3), to have regard to the whole of pt. IV of the Act, including the schedule to which D I have referred. So to do does not seem to me to invoke any "equitable construction" within the meaning of Lord Cairns' words in the passage I have quoted in his speech. In my view, taking account of all the considerations to which I have alluded, the phrase "paid to the settlor" in sub-s. (3) must, on a fair interpretation, include payments to him both direct and indirect. This conclusion still leaves the question to which, as I have indicated, most E of the argument of counsel for the executors was directed, whether the payments here in question were paid to the settlor at all, whether direct or indirect. I confess that, if the question had to be determined apart from the definition sub-s. (5), I should feel much attracted to counsel's argument, but, in my judgment, the question cannot be so determined, and if the definition in sub-s. (5) (a) (i) is incorporated, as it must be, into the language of sub-s. (3), F then the question becomes: "Were the sums with which we are here concerned paid by the company by way of loan directly or indirectly to the settlor?" Though I think the expression "by way of" may in some contexts involve a somewhat wider meaning than the single word "as," I am prepared to assume that in the present case no material significance can be attached to them. Nevertheless, it seems to me that, on the facts of this case, the sums here in G question were—according to the ordinary use of language, no less than according to the language of the section—"paid by way of loan directly or indirectly to the settlor." It does not seem to me in such a context that any weight can be attached to the old distinction, reflected in the old forms of pleading, between money lent and money paid by request. Whether or not the company must be taken to have acted in exercise of its powers under cl. 3 (i) of the H memorandum of association, it is, I think, abundantly plain, as the Special Case found and as the judge below also stated, that the company acted for practical purposes exactly in the office of the settlor's banker. On Jan. 1, 1939, the account was in credit to the extent of £1,316 7*s*. 4*d*., but on Jan. 18, £1,350 7*s*. 4*d*. was transferred to the settlor's private banking account and thenceforward the settlor's account with the company was continuously overdrawn (that is, throughout the whole financial year 1939-40 and thereafter till Dec. 23, 1940). In the ordinary case of banker and customer, where the former gives credit to the latter by meeting the cheques from time to time drawn by the customer on the banker, the resulting overdraft is always regarded as money lent by the banker to the customer : see, for example, the language of LORD COZENS-HARDY, M.R., in Cuthbert v. Robarts, Lubbock & Co. (2), where he says ([1909] 2 Ch. 233):

> " If a customer draws a cheque for a sum in excess of the amount standing to the credit of his current account, it is really a request for a loan, and if the cheque is honoured the customer has borrowed money."

In the same way, as it seems to me, the various payments made by the company throughout the period in question ought fairly to be regarded as money paid directly or indirectly by way of loan to Mr. Potts within the meaning of the sub-section. The problem is, I think, largely one of first impression and I do not attempt to improve on my conclusion by elaboration. In my judgment, the Crown succeeds in showing that the sums for which it is sought to tax the settlor are within the scope of the section which the Crown invokes.

In the circumstances, it is strictly unnecessary for me to express an opinion on the scope of para. (ii) of the definition sub-s. (5) (a), but since the matter has been argued, my own view is that the sums in question do not fall within its ambit. Counsel for the Crown did not himself at all attempt to justify the view to which the learned judge felt himself inclined—that a promise to repay was not money or money's worth within the meaning of the paragraph because the last two words indicated goods or property. He sought rather to say that, in the absence of a charge for interest, that is a charge for the use of the sums advanced, there was no " full " consideration. I cannot for myself accept that argument. The formula " full consideration for money or money's worth " is common enough and is generally used to exclude, for example, the marriage consideration, but, in my view, the settlor's promise or obligation to repay in full the sums paid on his behalf constitutes full consideration in money or money's worth within the meaning of the paragraph in question. The result, however, in my judgment, is that the appeal succeeds.

SOMERVELL, L.J. : I agree that the appeal succeeds for the reasons which have been given by the MASTER OF THE ROLLS.

DENNING, L.J. : I also agree.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Oliver and Stable, JJ.), July 27, 1949.]

Street Traffic—Careless driving—Notice of intended prosecution—Specification of nature of alleged offence—" Offence against s. 12 of Road Traffic Act, 1930 " —Road Traffic Act, 1930 (c. 43), s. 12 (1), s. 21 (c). A

The respondent was charged with careless driving contrary to s. 12 (1) of the Road Traffic Act, 1930. In pursuance of s. 21 (c) of the Act a notice of intended prosecution had been served on him wherein it was stated : " . . . it is intended to institute proceedings against you for an offence against s. 12 of the Road Traffic Act, 1930, namely, that you did drive a motor car on the Cambridge-Linton Road, Babraham, at B approximately 4.25 p.m., on Saturday, Jan. 29, 1949." The words of s. 12 describing the offences thereunder, viz., driving " without due care and attention," or " without reasonable consideration for other persons using the road," were omitted from the notice, and the respondent objected that the notice was bad. The justices upheld his objection and dismissed the information. C

HELD (STABLE, J., dissenting) : that s. 21 (c) only required the nature of the alleged offence to be specified in the notice, and did not require the offence itself to be specified ; the notice informed the respondent that he was to be prosecuted for an offence against s. 12, and the only offence against that section was that compendiously known as " careless driving " ; and, therefore, the notice sufficiently complied with the requirements of the section. (1) Milner v. Allen, [1933] 1 K.B. 698 ; 102 L.J.K.B. 395 ; 149 L.T. 16 ; E 97 J.P. 111 ; Digest Supp.

CASE STATED by Cambridgeshire justices.

At a court of summary jurisdiction, sitting at Linton, an information preferred by the appellant, a police inspector, against the respondent that he drove a motor car on the Cambridge-Linton Road without due care and attention, F contrary to s. 12 (1) of the Road Traffic Act, 1930, was dismissed on Mar. 23, 1949. The justices, without hearing evidence, were of opinion that the notice of intended prosecution served on the respondent did not comply with the requirements of s. 21 (c) of the Act. The Divisional Court now held that the notice was sufficient, allowed the appeal, and remitted the case for the defence to be heard. The facts appear in the judgment of LORD GODDARD, C.J. G

R. E. Seaton for the appellant.

Baerlein for the respondent.

LORD GODDARD, C.J. : This is a Case stated by justices for the county of Cambridge before whom the respondent was charged with unlawfully driving a motor vehicle on the Cambridge-Linton Road without due care and H attention, contrary to the provisions of s. 12 (1) of the Road Traffic Act, 1930. It appears that the respondent's car was involved in an accident and that he was not warned at the time of an intended prosecution, and, therefore, the provisions of s. 21 (c) of the Act had to be complied with. These provisions are as follows:

> " Where a person is prosecuted for an offence under any of the provisions of this Part of this Act relating respectively to the maximum speed at > which motor vehicles may be driven, to reckless or dangerous driving and to careless driving he shall not be convicted unless either (a) he was warned at the time the offence was committed that the question of prosecuting him for an offence under some one or other of the provisions aforesaid would be taken into consideration ; or (b) within fourteen days of the commission of the offence a summons for the offence was served on him ;

> A or (c) within the said fourteen days a notice of the intended prosecution specifying the nature of the alleged offence and the time and place where it is alleged to have been committed was served on or sent by registered post to him . . ."

The object of that section has been explained by this court in Milner v.
B Allen (1), where the respondent was charged with careless driving and a notice had been served on him stating that he had been reported for the question of prosecution to be considered in respect of dangerous driving. When he was summoned only for the lesser offence he took the point that he had never been warned regarding the offence for which he was summoned nor had he been given a notice specifying the offence for which he was summoned. The court
C held that the notice was good since it sufficiently specified " the nature of the offence " which the respondent was alleged to have committed.

In considering whether a notice purported to be given under s. 21 is sufficient we ought to use a modicum of commonsense. In the present case the notice that was sent was in these terms:

> D " In pursuance of the provisions of s. 21 of the Road Traffic Act, 1930, I, the undersigned, do hereby give you notice that it is intended to institute proceedings against you for an offence against s. 12 of the Road Traffic Act, 1930, namely, that you did drive a motor car on the Cambridge-Linton Road, Babraham, at approximately 4.25 p.m. on Saturday, Jan. 29, 1949."

E The words "without due care and attention" or "without reasonable consideration for other persons using the road " were omitted from the notice, but it informed the respondent that he was going to be prosecuted for an offence under s. 12, and there is only one offence under that section, that is to say, the offence which is compendiously referred to in s. 21 as " careless driving." Section 21 uses that compendious expression because the marginal
F note to s. 12 is : " Careless driving."

In my opinion, this is a perfectly good notice because it calls the attention of the respondent, who was involved in an accident on that particular day, to the matter in such a way that he knows what he is to be prosecuted for. He could only be prosecuted for one of two offences, dangerous driving or careless driving, and when he is told that the alleged offence is under s. 12
G he can ascertain what is the offence under that section. I do not think that the justices came to the right conclusion. It is clear that the notice was adequate, because the section only requires the nature of the alleged offence to be specified, and the nature of the alleged offence here is careless driving, the only offence with which s. 12 deals. I do not think the case would have been arguable if the words " namely, that you did drive a motor car " had
H been left out, because then the notice would have read : " . . . it is intended to institute proceedings against you for an offence against s. 12 of the Road Traffic Act, 1930, on the Cambridge-Linton Road, Babraham, at approximately 4.25 p.m., on Saturday, Jan. 29, 1949." The omissions from the notice were a slip on the part of the person who drafted it, but I think it gave the respondent all the information as to what it was intended to prosecute him for, namely, an offence under s. 12. The objection to the notice, therefore, fails, and the case must go back to the justices to hear the defence, if any.

OLIVER, J. : I am of the same opinion. A notice under s. 21 (c) should not be considered as a formal document like a summons or a conviction. The object of the notice is to call the attention of the driver of the motor car to the time and circumstances in respect of which he may be charged so as to give him, as my Lord has said, an opportunity, in good time while memories are still fresh, to prepare his defence. This notice is carelessly drawn, but, in my opinion, it contains enough to satisfy the section. It says that it is intended to institute proceedings against the respondent for an offence under s. 12 of the Road Traffic Act, 1930, and the time and place are mentioned. I am much impressed with the language of s. 21 (c) which is not that the alleged offender is to have fourteen days' notice of an intended prosecution specifying the alleged offence, but that he is to have a notice "specifying the nature of the alleged offence." The reference to s. 12 in the notice in the present case, as my Lord has said, gives the respondent notice that he is going to be summoned either for driving a motor vehicle on a road without due care and attention or driving a motor vehicle on a road without reasonable consideration for other persons using the road. Those are two separate offences. In the descriptive note beside s. 12 they are summarised as "careless driving," and in s. 21 those two offences are grouped together under the head of "careless driving." That confirms me in the impression that the notice is sufficient if it merely alludes to the nature of the offence without setting out the offence in detail.

STABLE, J. : I am not surprised that the justices came to the conclusion that they did in this case, because it is the conclusion to which I should have come myself. In Milner v. Allen (1) the notice served on the respondent gave him adequate notice of the essential facts. It gave him sufficient notice of an intended prosecution and it specified the nature of the alleged offence and the time and place where it was alleged it had been committed. This is a criminal proceeding, and it is a condition precedent to a conviction that a notice of the intended prosecution specifying the nature of the alleged offence should be given within the prescribed time. In my judgment, a notice saying "it is intended to institute proceedings against you for an offence against s. 12 of the Road Traffic Act, 1930, namely,"—and I emphasise the word "namely"—"that you did drive a motor car on the Cambridge-Linton Road, Babraham, at 4.25 p.m. on Saturday, Jan. 29, 1949," is not only not a specification of the nature of the alleged offence, but is hopelessly misleading. I think that it is important today, having regard to the tremendous complication of the law—by statute, orders-in-council and rules and orders—that, when an Act of Parliament stipulates that the nature of the offence must be stated, it should be stated in terms which the ordinary layman can understand. I would only add that, in the finding of the justices, there is no reference to an accident having taken place. They refer to some incident, but what the incident was I do not know.

WRIGHT AND ANOTHER v. MACADAM.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Tucker, Singleton and Jenkins, L.JJ.), July 26, 27, 1949.]

Landlord and Tenant—Implied grant—Tenancy agreement—Right enjoyed with land at time of agreement—Coal shed—Shed being used by tenant, with landlord's permission, at date of agreement—Law of Property Act, 1925 (c. 20), s. 62 (1).

By the Law of Property Act, 1925, s. 62 (1): "A conveyance of land shall be deemed to include and shall by virtue of this Act operate to convey, with the land, all buildings, erections, fixtures . . . easements, rights, and advantages whatsoever, appertaining or reputed to appertain to the land, or any part thereof, or, at the time of conveyance, demised, occupied, or enjoyed with or reputed or known as part or parcel of or appurtenant to the land or any part thereof." By s. 62 (4) the section applies subject to a contrary intention expressed in the conveyance. By s. 205 (1) (ii) "conveyance" includes (inter alia) a lease and every other assurance of property or of an interest therein. By s. 205 (1) (ix) "land" includes (inter alia) "buildings or parts of buildings."

By a tenancy agreement dated Nov. 2, 1940, Mrs. W. became the tenant for one week of two rooms of a flat on the top floor of a house, and she remained in occupation as a statutory tenant until Aug. 28, 1943. With the permission of the landlord she used a shed in the garden for storing her coal. On Aug. 28, 1943, the landlord granted a new tenancy for one year of the top floor flat (including an extra room) to Mrs. W. and her daughter, and, at the expiration of the year, the tenants remained in occupation of the flat on the terms stated in the agreement. The agreement, which was under hand, contained no reference to the coal shed, but the tenants continued to use it, without payment, until 1947. In May, 1947, the landlord suggested that the tenants should pay 1*s.* 6*d.* a week for the use of the shed, but the tenants refused to do so. The landlord then denied the tenants' right to use the shed, but the tenants contended that they were entitled to do so under the Law of Property Act, 1925, s. 62 (1).

HELD: (i) as the letting under the document of Aug. 28, 1943, was for a term not exceeding three years, under the Law of Property Act, 1925, s. 52 (2) (d) and s. 54 (2), the document, though expressed as an agreement and though under hand only, passed to the tenants the legal estate in the property for the term contemplated, and, therefore, there was a "conveyance of land" within the meaning of s. 62 (1) and on the expiration of the term the tenants had held over on the same terms.

(ii) a right which is, in fact, enjoyed with property, even though enjoyed only by permission, passes on a conveyance of the property by virtue of the grant to be read into the conveyance under s. 62 (1), provided (a) that the right is one capable of being granted at law, i.e., was a right known to the law, and (b) that it is not merely a temporary right. In this case the right to use the coal shed to store such coal as might be required for the domestic purposes of the flat was a right which the law would recognise, and, as no limit had been set to the time during which the shed could continue to be used, it was not a merely temporary right, and, therefore, at the date of the letting on Aug. 28, 1943, the right to use the shed was a right enjoyed with the top floor flat within the meaning of s. 62 (1), and, as no contrary intention was expressed in the document of Aug. 28, 1943, the right must be regarded as having passed under that letting. That the right to use the coal shed was not appurtenant to the flat was immaterial, as s. 62 (1) applied not merely to rights or advantages appurtenant to the premises, but also to a right or advantage which had been, in fact, enjoyed with the premises.

(iii) the right to use the shed must be regarded as carrying with it the necessary means of access. A

(iv) assuming that there had been a later agreement to pay 1*s*. 6*d*. a week for the use of the shed, it would have been an agreement with no consideration to support it, because under s. 62 (1) the tenants became entitled to use the shed on Aug. 28, 1943.

Appeal by the landlord from an order of His Honour Deputy Judge Sir Norman Edgley, K.C., at Wandsworth County Court, dated Apr. 5, 1949.

The tenants of a top floor flat claimed (a) a declaration that their tenancy of the flat included the right to use a coal shed in the garden of the premises, (b) an injunction to restrain the landlord from trespassing or otherwise interfering with their lawful use of the shed, and (c) damages limited to £10. The tenants contended that they were entitled to the use of the shed under the Law of Property Act, 1925, s. 62 (1), but the county court judge held that s. 62 (1) did not apply as the right to use the shed was merely a temporary licence and was not a right or advantage appurtenant to the flat. The Court of Appeal now held that the right to use the shed was a right enjoyed with the flat at the time of the conveyance within the meaning of s. 62 (1) and, therefore, it was to be regarded as passing under the letting, and they allowed the appeal. The landlord had taken down the shed after the hearing before the county court judge, but the court did not think it right, in the circumstances of the case, to make a mandatory injunction compelling him to restore the shed, but they awarded the tenants £10 by way of damages. The facts appear in the judgment of Jenkins, L.J. F G H

Brundrit for the tenants.
Borders for the landlord.

TUCKER, L.J. : I will ask Jenkins, L.J., to deliver the first judgment in this case.

JENKINS, L.J. : This is an appeal by the plaintiffs, Mrs. and Miss Wright, who are mother and daughter, against a judgment of His Honour DEPUTY JUDGE SIR NORMAN EDGLEY, K.C., at Wandsworth County Court, dated Apr. 5, 1949, which decided, in effect, that the plaintiffs, as tenants of the top floor of No. 13, Mount Ararat Road, Richmond, in respect of which the defendant, Mr. Macadam, is the landlord, were not entitled to the use of a certain coal shed in the garden of those premises. Originally two rooms of the top floor flat in question, with the use of the bathroom and so forth, were let to Mrs. Wright alone for one week certain by a tenancy agreement dated Nov. 2, 1940. She remained in occupation after the expiration of that week on the same terms, as she was entitled to do by virtue of the Rent Restrictions Acts. According to her evidence, an arrangement was made with Mr. Macadam, the landlord, about the use of the disputed coal shed at the time when that tenancy agreement was entered into. The learned judge did not accept that version, but accepted the landlord's evidence, which was to the effect that he gave Mrs. Wright permission to use the coal shed, not at the time of the agreement, but early the next year, i.e., early in 1941. So far, therefore, the position was that Mrs. Wright was a statutory tenant of the two rooms on the top floor, and, by permission separately granted, was using the shed in the garden for the storage of her coal. That state of affairs continued until Aug. 28, 1943. On that date the landlord granted a new tenancy of the upper flat including an additional room, and this tenancy was granted, not to Mrs. Wright alone, but to both the plaintiffs, mother and daughter. The document is under hand only and the relevant part of it is contained in para. 1:

> "The landlord shall let and the tenants shall take all that top floor flat situate in 13, Mount Ararat Road, Richmond, in the county of Surrey together with the fixtures therewith for the term of one year commencing on Aug. 28, 1943, at an annual rental of £52 payable monthly in advance on the 28th of each month."

Since Aug. 28, 1943, the plaintiffs have remained in occupation of the flat on the terms stated in that agreement. For the present purpose the important point about it is that it contains no reference to the coal shed, nor any indication of intention one way or the other whether the mother and daughter, the tenants under this new letting, were to continue to enjoy the use of the coal shed. In fact, they did continue to use the coal shed until October, 1947, without charge. In May, 1947, the landlord made representations to Mrs. Wright to the effect that an extra 1*s*. 6*d*. a week ought to be paid for the use of the coal shed, to which proposal she purported to agree, but that arrangement was strenuously objected to by the daughter and the 1*s*. 6*d*. was never, in fact, paid. Matters seem to have come to a head about that in or about October, 1947, when the daughter recorded a decided objection to the arrangement that 1*s*. 6*d*. a week should be paid.

In the present litigation the tenants claimed an injunction to restrain the landlord from trespassing or otherwise interfering with their lawful use of the coal shed, a declaration that their tenancy of the flat included the right to use the coal shed, and damages limited to £10. I may mention that, as matters stand at present, the last of those claims appear to be the only relevant one inasmuch as we were informed in the course of the hearing that the landlord has, in fact, pulled down the coal shed. The question, therefore, is simply whether the plaintiffs, as tenants of the top floor flat at 13, Mount Ararat Road, were entitled to the use of the coal shed in question. It is argued for the tenants that they were so entitled by virtue of the Law of Property Act, 1925, s. 62, which replaces the Conveyancing Act, 1881, s. 6, and provides by statute the general words which it was formerly customary to insert in full in the parcels of conveyances and other dispositions of land. The tenants claim that this section covers the case. The landlord, on the other hand, claims that, although the coal shed was admittedly used, it was used under no sufficiently definite arrangement ; that it was used purely as a matter of personal licence and precariously ; and that the arrangement under which it was used could not be said to confer a right in any way appurtenant to the flat. but was an arrangement of a kind to which s. 62 of the Act of 1925 had no application. The learned judge decided the question in favour of the landlord, and his reasons are thus stated in a very short note of his judgment: A

> " Plaintiffs' suit dismissed with costs Scale B. (Defendant's evidence is accepted regarding the initial terms of the tenancy and the various interviews which took place. The question raised under the Law of Property Act, 1925, s. 62, decided in favour of the defendant. The right to use the coal shed was merely a temporary licence which might be withdrawn at any time and was in fact withdrawn. The evidence shows that this was never a right or advantage appurtenant to the flat, which on a previous occasion had actually been let without this advantage)." B

It is now necessary to refer to s. 62 of the Law of Property Act, 1925. The sub-sections bearing on this point are sub-sections (1) and (2). Sub-section (1) relates to " a conveyance of land." Sub-section (2) relates to " a conveyance of land, having houses or other buildings thereon." By the definition contained in s. 205 (1) (ii): C

> " ' Conveyance ' includes a mortgage, charge, lease, assent, vesting declaration . . . and every other assurance of property or of an interest therein . . ." D

It follows that the document of Aug. 28, 1943, if it is a lease within the meaning of that definition, is a " conveyance " for the purposes of s. 62. It will be remembered that the letting was for a term of one year only. I think it follows from the Law of Property Act, 1925, s. 52 (2) (d), read in conjunction with s. 54 (2) that this document, though expressed as an agreement, and though under hand only, is a " lease " within the meaning of the definition. E Section 52 provides:

> " (1) All conveyances of land or of any interest therein are void for the purpose of conveying or creating a legal estate unless made by deed. (2) This section does not apply to . . . (d) leases or tenancies or other assurances not required by law to be made in writing." F

Section 54 (1) lays down the general rule that interests in land created by parol shall have the force and effect of interests at will only. By s. 54 (2):

> " Nothing in the foregoing provisions of this Part of this Act shall affect the creation by parol of leases taking effect in possession for a term not exceeding three years (whether or not the lessee is given power to extend the term) at the best rent which can be reasonably obtained without taking a fine." G

The document here in question, therefore, was adequate to pass to the tenants the legal estate in the property for the term contemplated and since the expiration of that term they have been holding over on the same terms. Accordingly, s. 62 applies inasmuch as the transaction under consideration is a H " conveyance " within the meaning of the section. It is, moreover, a conveyance of land although it comprises only the upper floor of a house, inasmuch as the definition of " land " in s. 205 (1) (ix) provides that " land " includes, among other things, " buildings or parts of buildings."

This is, therefore, a conveyance of land within the meaning of s. 62 (1), and I think that is the appropriate sub-section rather than sub-s. (2), which deals with a conveyance of land " having houses or other buildings thereon." The relevant parts of both sub-sections are, however, for all purposes material to this case, the same. Section 62 (1) is in these terms:

> "A conveyance of land shall be deemed to include and shall by virtue of this Act operate to convey, with the land, all buildings, erections, fixtures, commons, hedges, ditches, fences, ways, waters, watercourses, liberties, privileges, easements, rights, and advantages whatsoever, apper- A taining or reputed to appertain to the land, or any part thereof, or, at the time of conveyance, demised, occupied, or enjoyed with or reputed or known as part or parcel of or appurtenant to the land or any part thereof."

By s. 62 (4) the section applies subject to a contrary intention expressed in B the conveyance.

The question in the present case, therefore, is whether the right to use the coal shed at the date of the letting of Aug. 28, 1943, was a liberty, privilege, easement, right or advantage appertaining, or reputed to appertain, to the land, or any part thereof, or, at the time of the conveyance, demised, occupied or enjoyed with the land—i.e., the flat—or any part thereof. It is enough for C the tenants' purposes if they can bring the right claimed within the widest part of s. 62 (1), i.e., if they can show that the right was at the time of the material letting demised, occupied or enjoyed with the flat or any part thereof. The predecessor of s. 62 of the Act of 1925, in the shape of s. 6 of the Act of 1881, has been the subject of a good deal of judicial discussion, and I think the effect of the cases can be thus summarised. First, the section is not D confined to rights which, as a matter of law, were so annexed or appurtenant to the property conveyed at the time of the conveyance as to make them actual legally enforceable rights. Thus, on the severance of a piece of land in common ownership, the quasi easements de facto enjoyed in respect of it by one part of the land over another will pass although, of course, as a matter of law, no man can have a right appendant or appurtenant to one part of his property E exercisable by him over the other part of his property. Secondly, the right, in order to pass, need not be one to which the owner or occupier for the time being of the land has had what may be described as a permanent title. A right enjoyed merely by permission is enough.

The leading authority for that proposition is International Tea Stores Co. v. Hobbs (1), a decision of FARWELL, J., as a judge of first instance. It was F a case in which the defendant, who owned two houses, let one of them for business purposes and there had been a practice of giving permission to the successive managers of the property let to pass and re-pass with their servants, and so forth, across a yard which was part of the property and remained in the defendant's occupation. The part of the property which had been let was later sold to the tenants, nothing being said in the conveyance G about the right of way. The purchasers claimed to exercise the right of way by virtue of s. 6 (2) of the Act of 1881. That claim was disputed, and the point was taken that it could not be a right which would pass under the implied general words inasmuch as it was only precariously enjoyed. The learned judge held that the fact that the way was permissive only was irrelevant for this purpose and that by virtue of s. 6 of the Act of 1881 the grant included H a corresponding right of way in fee simple. Dealing with the question of licence or permission, FARWELL, J., said ([1903] 2 Ch. 171):

> "Unless I am prepared to say that in no case can a tenant obtain under the Conveyancing Act, 1881, a right of way unless he has enjoyed it as of right, I must hold in this case that the fact of licence makes no difference. In all these cases the right of way must be either licensed or unlicensed. If it is unlicensed it would be at least as cogent an argument to say, 'True you went there, but it was precarious, because I could have > sent a man to stop you or stopped you myself any day.' If it is by licence, it is precarious of course in the sense that the licence, being ex hypothesi revocable, might be revoked at any time; but if there be degrees of precariousness, the latter is less precarious than the former. But, in my opinion, precariousness has nothing to do with this sort of case, where a privilege which is by its nature known to the law—namely, a right of way—has been in fact enjoyed. Lord Coleridge's argument [for the A defendant] was founded upon a misconception of a judgment of mine in Burrows v. Lang (2), where I was using the argument of precariousness to show that the right which was desired to be enjoyed there was one which was unknown to the law—namely, to take water if and whenever the defendant chose to put water into a particular pond; such a right does not exist at law; but a right of way is well known to the law." B

International Tea Stores Co. v. Hobbs (1) has been followed or cited with approval in subsequent cases, in particular, in Lewis v. Meredith (3), ([1913] 1 Ch. 579) where NEVILLE, J., said:

> "I come to the conclusion that at the date of the grant the water was being and had for a long time been used for the tan pit and the mason's C yard. Easement or right in the strict sense there could not be, for the common ownership precluded the acquisition of any right or easement by the occupiers, but International Tea Stores Co. v. Hobbs (1) shows that 'a right' permissive at the date of the grant may become a legal right upon the grant by force of the general words in s. 6 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881. From this point of view the circumstances under which the quasi right was D enjoyed become immaterial so long as it was actually enjoyed and was of a nature which could be granted, that is to say, a right known to the law: see Burrows v. Lang (2)."

Again, in White v. Williams (4), YOUNGER, L.J., cited with apparent approval the International Tea Stores case (1). The relevant passage in his judgment ([1922] 1 K.B. 740) is this: E

> "I doubt whether we can enter upon this question in view of the finding of the county court judge; but even if no more than an intermittent and temporary user had been exercised, the right would nevertheless in my opinion be included within these words in s. 6, because it is a right known to the law and, that being so, it matters not, so far as s. 6 of the Con- F veyancing Act is concerned, whether the user is continuous and permanent or permissive and precarious: International Tea Stores v. Hobbs (1)."

There is, therefore, ample authority for the proposition that a right in fact enjoyed with property will pass on a conveyance of the property by virtue of the grant to be read into it under s. 62 of the Act of 1925, even although down to the date of the conveyance the right was exercised by permission G only, and, therefore, was in that sense precarious.

The next proposition deducible from the cases is the one laid down in Burrows v. Lang (2), which has been referred to in some of the passages I have already read. It is that the right in question must be a right known to the law. In Burrows v. Lang (2) it was held that a so-called right to take, for the purposes of watering cattle, so much water, if any, as might happen to be left in an H artificial watercourse after the owner of the watercourse had taken what he required for his own purposes was not such a right. A certain amount of confusion has been introduced into the discussion on this aspect of the case by the circumstance that some of the learned judges have used the word "precarious" in describing rights of a kind unknown to the law, and, in particular, the expression was so used by FARWELL, J., in Burrows v. Lang (2), but in this context the precariousness enters into the character of the right as distinct from the title to the right. The right is precarious in the sense that, to take the example of the surplus water, there may be no water at all, and the right is in itself liable to be defeated in that way. It is necessary to keep clearly in mind the distinction between "precariousness" in the sense in which it is used in relation to quasi rights of that description, and precariousness of title as used in relation to a permissively exercised right. For the purposes of s. 62 it is only necessary that the right should be one capable of being granted at law, or, in other words, a right known to the law. If it is a right of that description, it matters not, as the International Tea Stores case (1) shows, that it has been, in fact, enjoyed by permission only. The reason for that is clear, for, on the assumption that the right is included or imported into the parcels of the conveyance by virtue of s. 62, the grant under the conveyance supplies what one may call the defect in title and substitutes a new title based on the grant.

There is one other point to be mentioned. A further exception has been recognised in cases in which there could in the circumstances of the case have been no expectation that the enjoyment of the right could be other than temporary. That exception was recognised by COTTON, L.J. (38 Ch.D. 307) in Birmingham, Dudley and District Banking Co. v. Ross (5). The learned lord justice was dealing with a situation of this kind. There had been a building scheme under which an area of land was to be developed and built up. Someone took a lease of one of the houses at a time when on the adjoining plot there were only old buildings of less height than those contemplated by the scheme, but it was well known that the intention was, and the building scheme demanded, that this plot should be built on to a greater height. The question for the court was whether the vendor of houses would be permitted a derogation from grant in building on the adjoining plot inasmuch as the effect of that would be to obscure to some extent the light enjoyed by the lessee of the building already erected next door. It was held in those circumstances, as one might expect, that there was no derogation from grant and there was no such enjoyment of the light over the vacant plot as would bring s. 6 of the Act of 1881 into operation. COTTON, L.J., said (38 Ch.D. 307):

> "Therefore, I think it could not be said that the light coming over that low building to these windows could be considered as enjoyed with it within the meaning of this section. The light did in fact at the time come over that building; but it came over it under such circumstances as to show that there could be no expectation of its continuance. It had not been enjoyed in fact for any long period; and in my opinion it was enjoyed under such circumstances, known to both parties, as could not make it light enjoyed within the meaning of that section."

The learned lord justice, I think, meant no more than that it was knowledge common to both parties that the existing building was going to be replaced by a higher one, and, that being so, the fortuitous access of extra light to the lessee's building while the scheme was being carried to completion could not be regarded as an enjoyment of light which would pass to the lessee a right to have it continued in the same degree.

I think those are all the cases to which I can usefully refer, and, applying the principles deducible from them to the present case, one finds, I think, this. First, on the evidence the coal-shed was used by Mrs. Wright by the permission of the landlord, but the International Tea Stores case (1) shows that that does not prevent s. 62 of the Act of 1925 from applying, because, permissive as the right may have been, it was, in fact, enjoyed. Next, the right was, as I understand it, a right to use the coal-shed in question for the purpose of storing such coal as might be required for the domestic purposes of the flat. In my judgment, that is a right or easement which the law will clearly recognise, and it is a right or easement of a kind which could readily be included in a lease or conveyance by the insertion of appropriate words in the parcels. This, therefore, is not a case in which a title to a right unknown to the law is claimed by virtue of s. 62. Nor is it a case in which it can be said to have been in the contemplation of the parties that the enjoyment of the right should be purely temporary. No limit was set as to the time during which the coal-shed could continue to be used. The landlord simply gave his permission, that permission was acted on, and the use of the coal-shed in fact continued until Aug. 28, 1943, and thereafter down to 1947. Therefore, applying to the facts of the present case the principles which seem to be deducible from the authorities, the conclusion to which I have come is that the right to use the coal-shed was, at the date of the letting of Aug. 28, 1943, a right enjoyed with the top floor flat within the meaning of s. 62 (1) of the Law of Property Act, 1925, with the result that (as no contrary intention was expressed in the document) the right in question must be regarded as having passed by virtue of that letting, just as it would have passed if it had been mentioned in express terms in cl. 1 which sets out the subject-matter of the lease.

Counsel for the landlord sought to rely on the fact that there was no precise evidence as to the mode in which the right was to be enjoyed. The particular point he took was that there was no evidence as to the means of access by which the tenants were to go to and from the coal-shed when they had occasion to put coal in or take coal out. In my judgment, that has no effect on the conclusion. The landlord admitted in his evidence that he gave permission for the coal-shed to be used, and he admitted that it was still being used in fact on Aug. 28, 1943. In my judgment, the right must be regarded as carrying with it the necessary means of access, and it must be assumed that at all times down to Aug. 28, 1943, Mrs. Wright enjoyed the use of the coal-shed together with the necessary access to it and from it.

Finally, there is the question of the 1*s.* 6*d.* per week. Counsel for the landlord suggested that there was evidence on which the court could hold that there was in 1947 a new agreement superseding any right which might previously have existed under which the tenants were to be entitled to use the coal-shed for a payment of 1*s.* 6*d.* a week. In my judgment, that contention cannot prevail for two reasons. First, the evidence is that the only agreement as to the payment of 1*s.* 6*d.* a week was made with Mrs. Wright and not with Miss Wright, and that Miss Wright, when apprised of it, expressed her dissent in no uncertain terms. It has not been shown to my satisfaction that Mrs. Wright was the agent of Miss Wright for this purpose. That would in itself be sufficient to dispose of this point, but, secondly, it seems to me that, on the footing that by virtue of s. 62 (1) the tenants became entitled on Aug. 28, 1943, to use the coal-shed, then the alleged agreement to pay 1*s.* 6*d.* a week would, even if otherwise free from objection, be an agreement to make a payment with no consideration to support it. Counsel for the landlord invited us to collect from the evidence indications that there was some consideration in the form of allowing the shed to be kept locked and so forth, but, in my judgment, there is no sufficiently clear evidence to show that there was really any such consideration.

For these reasons I am of opinion that the learned judge came to a wrong conclusion when he held that s. 62 of the Law of Property Act, 1925, had no application. He said that the right to use the coal-shed was merely a temporary right. That, as I have said, is no sufficient ground for excluding the operation of s. 62, having regard to the principle laid down in the International Tea Stores case (1). Further, he said that this was never a right or advantage appurtenant to the flat, but it is not only rights or advantages that are appurtenant to given premises that pass under s. 62. It is enough, as I have already said, that the right or advantage should, in fact, be enjoyed with the premises.

Accordingly, it seems to me that the learned judge was wrong in excluding the operation of s. 62. It is plain, however, that he did not have the assistance of nearly so full an argument as has been presented to us in this court, and, that being so, it is not surprising that in this rather difficult case he came to a conclusion different from mine. For these reasons I would allow the appeal and direct that, inasmuch as the coal-shed is now no longer in existence, judgment should be entered for the tenants for the sum of damages claimed.

TUCKER, L.J.: On Aug. 28, 1943, the landlord and the tenants thought it would be desirable to put into writing in a more formal manner their legal position with regard to the tenancy of this top floor flat which Mrs. Wright had previously held as a weekly tenant under an informal agreement. I have no doubt that when they entered into this agreement, which is quite a full one, setting out ten sub-clauses showing the tenant's liability, they thought that they were satisfactorily putting down their rights in black and white and regulating their position, but they were apparently unaware of s. 62 of the Law of Property Act, 1925, and the result is that, having got at loggerheads with each other, they have embarked on litigation in the county court and now find themselves in the Court of Appeal, where the case has taken a day to hear and a substantial number of authorities have been cited to help us to elucidate this problem. During the argument I had felt some difficulty in reconciling International Tea Stores Co. v. Hobbs (1) and Burrows v. Lang (2), but I find myself in complete agreement with the analysis of the cases which has been made by JENKINS, L.J., and of the principles to be extracted from them, and as to the meaning of the word "precarious." We are told that the landlord, since the hearing before the county court judge, has taken down the shed. I do not think it would be right in a case of this kind—rather a trivial sort of quarrel—to make a mandatory injunction compelling him to restore it. If he had, in fact, taken down the shed before the hearing in the county court, the position might have been very different, but he succeeded in the county court and he took down the shed. It is quite true that he did it at his peril, but I think that in the circumstances of this case justice will be done by awarding the tenants the sum of £10 by way of damages.

SINGLETON, L.J.: I agree.

INDUSTRIES & GENERAL MORTGAGE CO., LTD. v. LEWIS.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Slade, J.), June 29, 30, July 8, 11, 1949.]

Commission—Secret commission—"Bribe"—Payment to agent—Presumption of corrupt motive—Presumption of damage—Measure of damages—Loan procured by company—Fee shared with borrower's agent.

When arranging with the plaintiff company to obtain a loan for the defendant, one V. stipulated that he should be paid half the procuration fee which the defendant would be charged for the company's services. The company knew that V. was to receive from the defendant a share of the profits on the re-sale of property to be purchased with the money lent and that he was acting as agent for the defendant, but they had no dishonest intention to cause him to persuade the defendant to accept the rate of commission demanded or to urge the defendant to act disadvantageously to his own interest. Neither V. nor the company informed the defendant of the payment to V.

HELD: for the purposes of the civil law a "bribe" meant nothing more than the payment of a secret commission and proof of a corrupt motive on the part of the payer was unnecessary; once it was established that one party to a contract had made a secret payment to the agent of the other party the law would presume that he had acted corruptly, that A the agent had been influenced by the payment to the detriment of his principal, and that the principal had suffered damage at least to the amount of the bribe; in the present case the payment by the plaintiffs to V. constituted a bribe and its amount was recoverable by the defendant from the plaintiffs as damages or money had and received.

ACTION by the plaintiffs for commission claimed to be due under a contract, and counterclaim by the defendant for damages alleged to be due in respect D of the payment of a secret commission and for money had and received.

The defendant, Mr. Cecil Lewis, an estate agent and surveyor, was concerned on behalf of others in the purchase of a leasehold interest in property at 61 to 65 Conduit Street, London, W.1. He was introduced to the property through a Mr. Vermont, to whom for his services he had promised a share in the profits on the re-sale of the property. On the defendant's instructions E Mr. Vermont approached the plaintiffs with a view to their obtaining for the defendant a loan of £45,000 or £50,000 for a short period in connection with the completion of the purchase. Mr. Vermont informed the plaintiffs' manager, Mr. Vagliano, that he was personally interested in the property, having been promised a portion of the profits on its re-sale. He also obtained from Mr. Vagliano a promise of half the fee or commission of one per cent. on the amount F advanced which the plaintiffs would require from the defendant for introducing to him the lender of the money. At no time did he or Mr. Vagliano tell the defendant of this arrangement for sharing the commission and it first came to the defendant's knowledge during the trial. Following the interview the plaintiffs wrote to the defendant that they had arranged a temporary loan on the property for from three to six months, subject to conditions and survey, G their procuration fee to be £1 per cent. of the amount advanced. The defendant sent a letter to Mr. Vermont, who passed it to the plaintiffs, accepting the terms, "it being understood that no fee is payable unless the business is actually completed," and confirming that the defendant would reserve a similar fee for the plaintiffs "on any other business transacted through the same source." On learning that the lenders introduced by the plaintiffs refused H to lend the money for more than three months, the defendant wrote to the plaintiffs suggesting a reduction in their fees since the loan was limited to the shorter period, the full amount to become payable if the loan was converted into a permanent or annual mortgage. At the defendant's request Mr. Vermont interviewed Mr. Vagliano and offered, if the plaintiffs agreed to halve their fee, to accept one third of the reduced fee as his share, receiving two thirds of the balance if the full fee subsequently became payable. Mr. Vagliano agreed, but later he wrote to the defendant about the interview: "Mr. Vermont, however, bearing in mind no doubt that he is also interested in the sale of the property, has made a suggestion to us which we very much appreciate and which will result in the fee payable by you being less if the period is only three months. No doubt, Mr. Vermont will acquaint you with his proposal." Mr. Vermont told the defendant that Mr. Vagliano had agreed to the terms of his letter suggesting a reduced commission, but did not specify the reduced rate. On Mar. 24, 1948, the defendant's father entered into an agreement, the defendant acting as guarantor, for a loan on mortgage of £45,000 for three months from the lenders introduced by the plaintiffs. The period of the loan was later extended by mutual agreement for one month, but the sum was not repaid by the defendant until Nov. 30, 1948, more than eight months after the loan. On the day following the signing of the agreement for the loan, the plaintiffs wrote to the defendant enclosing an account for a fee at one half per cent. on £45,000, viz., £225, and pointing out that "the full agreed rate of one per cent. shall only be charged if the loan is extended to six months or any longer period . . ." The defendant paid the £225, and the plaintiffs paid Mr. Vermont £75 out of it. On a claim by the plaintiffs for payment of the balance of the commission alleged to be due to them by reason of the delay in repayment, SLADE, J., found that there was a valid and binding contract between the plaintiffs and the defendant for the payment of remuneration to the plaintiffs for their services, but that the parties were never ad idem as to how the amount of the remuneration should be determined. The law, therefore, implied a contract to pay a reasonable remuneration, which he assessed at £150. He found further that Mr. Vermont was at all material times acting as the defendant's agent, that Mr. Vagliano knew that he was so acting, and that the plaintiffs were not acting as the defendant's agents in putting him in touch with the lenders. He also found that Mr. Vagliano did not agree to pay Mr. Vermont the £75 with the dishonest intention of causing Mr. Vermont to persuade the defendant to accept the commission demanded by the plaintiffs or of persuading him to urge the defendant to act in any way disadvantageously to the defendant's own interest, but he held that, the motive behind the payment being immaterial, the payment constituted a bribe and was recoverable by the defendant from the plaintiffs on the counterclaim.

Neil Lawson for the plaintiffs.
Lloyd-Jones, K.C. and Vester for the defendants.

SLADE, J. stated the facts, found for the plaintiffs on their claim for £150, and continued with regard to the counterclaim: A large number of authorities have been cited. Sometimes the words "secret commission" are used, sometimes "surreptitious payment," and sometimes "bribe." For the purposes of the civil law a bribe means the payment of a secret commission, which only means (i) that the person making the payment makes it to the agent of the other person with whom he is dealing; (ii) that he makes it to that person knowing that that person is acting as the agent of the other person with whom he is dealing; and (iii) that he fails to disclose to the other person with whom he is dealing that he has made that payment to the person whom he knows to be the other person's agent. Those three are the only elements necessary to constitute the payment of a secret commission or bribe for civil purposes. I emphasise "civil purposes" because the Prevention of Corruption Act, 1906, s. 1 (1), introduces the adverb "corruptly," and, except in the cases provided for in s. 2 of the amending Act of 1916, the onus is put on the prosecution of showing that the payment has been made corruptly. I hold that proof of corruptness or corrupt motive is unnecessary in a civil action, and my authority is the decision of the Court of Appeal in Hovenden and Sons v. Millhoff (1) where the plaintiffs carried on business as hairdressers' sundrymen and the defendant was a member of a firm of wholesale tobacconists. That firm was dissolved and the defendant carried on the business thereafter alone. For the purpose of purchasing cigars and cigarettes the plaintiffs employed buyers on whose judgment they relied and to whom they paid salaries and bonuses in proportion to their profits, and it was the duty of these buyers to order and to obtain for the plaintiffs the necessary supply of cigars and cigarettes for use in their business on the best trade terms. From 1886 to 1889 the defendant had supplied the plaintiffs with large quantities of cigars and cigarettes for which the plaintiffs had paid upwards of £28,000. In 1889 the plaintiffs discovered that regularly, both at Christmas and Midsummer, during the whole period of their connection with the defendant, he or his firm had made gifts of money in the nature of bribes to the buyers employed by the plaintiffs which were calculated as amounting in all to about 2½ per cent. on the invoice price of the goods sold and delivered. On making this discovery, the plaintiffs commenced an action alleging conspiracy between the defendant and the plaintiffs' buyers to defraud the plaintiffs and they also claimed the money which the plaintiffs' buyers had received from the defendant as money had and received to the plaintiffs' use. The jury negatived the allegation of conspiracy, and GRANTHAM, J., gave judgment for the plaintiffs for one farthing damages. The third answer of the jury was that the payments made to the plaintiffs' buyers by the defendant or his firm had an effect on the minds of the buyers in favour of the defendant. Although the learned judge assessed the damages at one farthing, he formed the conclusion that the action had been substantially one of conspiracy and as that had been disproved he gave judgment for the defendant and the plaintiffs appealed. The appeal proceeded solely on the cause of action for money had and received. I emphasise that because, conspiracy having been negatived by the jury, the arguments and the ratio decidendi of the judgments in the Court of Appeal could have proceeded only on the footing that no charge of fraud had been sustained. ROMER, L.J., in his judgment, said (83 L.T. 43):

> "It may, therefore, be well to point out what is a bribe in the eyes of the law. Without attempting an exhaustive definition I may say that the following is one statement of what constitutes a bribe. If a gift be made to a confidential agent with the view of inducing the agent to act in favour of the donor in relation to transactions between the donor and the agent's principal and that gift is secret as between the donor and the agent—that is to say, without the knowledge and consent of the principal—then the gift is a bribe in the view of the law."

I emphasise the learned judge's words: "If a gift be made to a confidential agent with the view of inducing the agent" because counsel for the plaintiffs rightly emphasised those words. ROMER, L.J., proceeds (ibid.):

> "If a bribe be once established to the court's satisfaction, then certain rules apply. Amongst them the following are now established, and, in my opinion, rightly established, in the interests of morality with the view of discouraging the practice of bribery. First, the court will not inquire into the donor's motive in giving the bribe, nor allow evidence to be gone into as to the motive."

In other words, the learned judge is saying that once the bribe is established, there is an irrebuttable presumption that it was given with an intention to induce the agent to act favourably to the payer and, thereafter, unfavourably to the principal. ROMER, L.J., continues:

> "Secondly, the court will presume in favour of the principal, and as against the briber and the agent bribed, that the agent was influenced by the bribe; and this presumption is irrebuttable."

That means that the motive of the donor in making the payment to the agent or donee is conclusively presumed against the person who makes the payment, and, secondly, it is conclusively proved against the person making the payment that the donee is affected and influenced by the payment. The lord justice goes on :

> " Thirdly, if the agent be a confidential buyer of goods for his principal from the briber, the court will assume as against the briber that the true price of the goods as between him and the purchaser must be taken to be less than the price paid to, or charged by, the vendor by, at any rate, the amount or value of the bribe."

That is to say, it must be presumed that the price is loaded as against the purchaser at least by the amount of the bribe. Counsel for the plaintiffs says : " Yes, but earlier the learned judge has said that if a gift be made to a confidential agent with a view to inducing him, it is a bribe, and, therefore, in using the later language and referring to bribes the learned judge is in effect saying : ' I am using these later presumptions in cases where a bribe has been established and I have already defined a bribe as being only something which has been established as being paid with a certain motive ' ". That, of course, would tear up the whole of the learned judge's observations because he says lower down that the courts will not receive evidence as to what is the motive of the person making the payment. The motive will be conclusively inferred against him. The Court of Appeal allowed the appeal and for the verdict of one farthing they substituted the amount of the bribe.

In the only other authority to which I desire to refer, Re A Debtor (2) (No. 229 of 1927), the appellant employed a moneylender's tout to put him in touch with a moneylender who was prepared to advance money on the security only of a promissory note. The borrower paid the tout a small sum for his services. The tout took the borrower to the moneylender who advanced a sum of £60 on a promissory note for a much larger sum, and the moneylender, without disclosing the fact to the borrower, also handed to the tout a percentage of the amount of cash actually advanced, so that the moneylender's tout had accepted payment both from the borrower and from the lender. The borrower failed to repay the promissory note in accordance with its terms and the moneylender obtained judgment in default of either appearance or defence, served a bankruptcy notice, and after the appropriate period of seven days had elapsed presented a bankruptcy petition on which the registrar made a receiving order. It then came to the knowledge of the borrower that the moneylender's tout had received this payment from the moneylender. He appealed to the Court of Appeal, alleging that the contract was at least voidable, if not void, and that, as it was a bankruptcy matter, the judgment was one which the Court of Appeal was entitled to go behind. The court discharged the receiving order and dismissed the petition. Dealing with the finding of fact of the learned registrar, SCRUTTON, L.J., said ([1927] 2 Ch. 376) :

> " The registrar said that though Latter was no doubt the agent of the debtor he was not satisfied that he was acting in the transaction solely as the debtor's agent. Nor was he satisfied that in the circumstances Latter acted corruptly in accepting the commission of 7½ per cent. from the petitioning creditor [the moneylender]. That conclusion of the registrar is a very dangerous one to the commercial world and to commercial morality. A man who is the agent of A in a transaction between A and B, and who also acts secretly for B in the same transaction, is presumed to act corruptly. Common law authorities require the court to hold that that is a corrupt practice, and, in my opinion, the court ought to presume fraud in such circumstances. It seems to me a dangerous thing to allow a man to say : 'Although you did not know it, I was also agent for the other party'."

I most respectfully concur in that portion of the judgment of that very learned judge and for the purposes of a civil action, where you have two parties to a contract introduced by an agent of one of them, once it is established that one of the parties to a contract makes a secret payment to the person whom he knows to be the agent of the other, the law will presume against him that he has acted corruptly, that the agent has been influenced by the payment to the detriment of his principal, and that the principal, the defendant in this case, has suffered damage to at least the amount of the bribe.

The holder of a " C " licence under the Road and Rail Traffic Act, 1933, was charged under s. 16 (1) of that Act with having failed to keep a current record of a journey in respect of an authorised vehicle. The driver was charged under the Goods Vehicles (Keeping of Records) Regulations, 1935 (S.R. & O., 1935, No. 314), reg. 8, with having failed to carry such a record. By reg. 6 (3) (a) the driver or holder of a licence in respect of a vehicle " used in the business of agriculture," is, in general, exempt from the duty of keeping or causing to be kept such records. When the vehicle was stopped by the police, it was carrying vegetables, the produce of the licence-holder, for sale by retail.

Held : the vehicle was being " used in the business of agriculture " and the licence-holder and driver were, therefore, excused from keeping or carrying records.

Case Stated by Sussex justices.

At a court of summary jurisdiction sitting at Petworth, Sussex, informations were preferred by the respondent, a superintendent of police, (i) under the Road and Rail Traffic Act, 1933, s. 16 (1), against the appellant, G. E. L. Manley, as the holder of a " C " licence in respect of a utility motor car, and (ii) under the Goods Vehicles (Keeping of Records) Regulations, 1935, reg. 8, against the defendant, Dorothy Manley, as the driver of the vehicle on a road in the parish of Pulborough, charging the appellants with having on Feb. 2, 1949, respectively unlawfully failed to keep and unlawfully failed to carry a current record of a journey of the vehicle. The informations were heard on Feb. 18, 1949, when the appellants contended that by virtue of the Goods Vehicles (Keeping of Records) Regulations, 1935, reg. 6 (3) (a), it was not necessary for such a record to be kept since the vehicle was being used in the business of agriculture within a radius of 25 miles from the place where it was usually kept. The prosecutor contended that the vehicle was being used for marketing or retailing goods and not in the business of agriculture. The justices convicted the defendants and fined them £1 each. The defendants appealed and the Divisional Court allowed the appeal, holding that the sale of farm produce was part of the business of agriculture.

Cussen for the appellants.
Harold Brown for the respondent.

LORD GODDARD, C.J. : These are two Cases stated by Sussex justices, sitting at Petworth, before whom the appellants, a husband and wife, were summoned, the charge against the wife being that she, " being the driver of an authorised vehicle, to wit, a utility motor car . . . on a road there, did unlawfully fail to carry a current record," and that against the husband being that he, as the licence-holder, failed to cause such a record to be kept contrary to the Goods Vehicles (Keeping of Records) Regulations, 1935 (S.R. & O., 1935, No. 314), reg. 8, and the Road and Rail Traffic Act, 1933, s. 16 (1) respectively.

Regulation 6 (1) provides :

> " Subject as hereinafter provided in this regulation and in reg. 7 hereof, every driver shall keep and every holder of a licence shall cause to be kept a current record divided into periods of 24 consecutive hours which shall give in respect of each such period during which or during any part of which the driver was employed in driving the information prescribed."

By reg. 6 (3) (a) it is provided :

> " In the case of a vehicle used in the business of agriculture it shall not be necessary for the driver or the holder of a licence to keep or cause to be kept the records prescribed by these regulations, except in the case of journeys during the course of which the vehicle is used outside a radius of 25 miles from the place where the vehicle is usually kept."

The second appellant has a farm on which he grows, among other things, vegetables. When his vehicle, driven by his wife, was stopped, green vegetables were found in it which had been grown on the farm and were being taken to the " Swan " Hotel, Pulborough, for sale. The justices were referred to Fillingham & Sons v. Hall (1), an unreported case quoted in STONE'S JUSTICES MANUAL, which says :

> " Agriculture does not include selling and distributing milk by retail."

We have not had the advantage of seeing a report of that case, but it seems to me that a farmer is using his vehicle in the business of agriculture if he is taking the produce grown on his farm for sale, because that is the only way he can carry on the business of agriculture. The section says, not " used in agriculture," but "used in the business of agriculture," that is to say, in the business of a farmer. There is nothing more akin and appurtenant to the business of a farmer than selling the produce which he grows on the farm.

Counsel for the respondent has contended that if the second appellant had been taking the goods to market she would have been within the exception. I cannot see how it can make any difference if, instead of going to the market, a person goes to a particular customer. He goes to market to find customers. If he has A already found a customer, it seems to me he is still using the vehicle in his business of agriculture.

The case is not altogether without reported authority. In Flatman v. Poole, Flatman v. Oatey (2) Lord Hewart, C.J., said ([1937] 1 All E.R. 496) :

> "The meaning of the exception is perfectly obvious. The purpose of those records is to prevent, on the one hand, or, if that is not possible, B to facilitate, the punishment of persons who employ or use motor vehicles upon the highway for such a continuous stretch of hours as to prevent the drivers from having suitable opportunity of rest, and thereby to imperil the safety of persons on the highway. To suppose that such regulations would be applicable to vehicles used in the business of agriculture is sufficiently fantastic. But here they are expressly exempted." C

In that case, the vehicle was loaded with agricultural implements and furniture in order that they might be moved from one farm to another. If that is the business of agriculture, I cannot see why the taking of agricultural produce for sale is not an a fortiori case. It might have been said there that the farmer was nothing more than a removal contractor, removing goods and furniture from one farm to another, which was not carrying on agriculture, but he had been D carrying on business at one farm and he wanted to carry it on at another.

If it had been desired to say that a vehicle was not to be considered as being used in the business of agriculture if the immediate purpose of its use was selling farm produce retail, the regulation could have said so, but it did not do so. The case is singularly like London County Council v. Lee (3) decided under the Locomotives Act, 1898. The headnote says ([1914] 3 K.B. 255) : E

> "By s. 17, the expression 'agricultural locomotive' includes any locomotive the property of one or more owners or occupiers of agricultural land employed solely 'for the purposes of their farms' and not let out on hire."

The locomotive in that case was drawing to market trolleys with produce in- F tended for sale, and the locomotive was held to be employed for the purpose of a farm. In my opinion, on the true construction of this regulation, a farmer who is using his vehicle to take produce grown on the farm to a customer is within the exception and that is so whether the customer is buying wholesale to sell again or buying retail for his own consumption. For these reasons, I think the appeal should be allowed. G

Indemnity—Tenancy agreement—Indemnity by tenant—Loss "which but for A the tenancy . . . would not have arisen"—Premises adjacent to railway—Fire caused by locomotive—Damage to goods—Applicability of indemnity clause.

Goods stored in a railway warehouse let to a tenant were damaged by fire and the tenant brought an action against the Railway Executive alleging that the accident was due to their negligence because a spark or
B other combustible material ejected from their railway engine had caused the fire. The Railway Executive set up a clause in the tenancy agreement providing that : "The tenant shall be responsible for and shall release and indemnify the company and their servants and agents from and against all liability for personal injury (whether fatal or otherwise) loss of or damage to property and any other loss damage costs and expenses
C however caused or incurred (whether by the act or neglect of the company or their servants or agents or not) which but for the tenancy hereby created or anything done pursuant to the provisions hereof would not have arisen."

HELD : the words "which but for the tenancy hereby created . . . would not have arisen" were confined to liabilities which arose by
D reason of the relationship of landlord and tenant ; the fact that the tenant was occupying the warehouse under an agreement from the Railway Executive was immaterial to the allegation in the present case of negligence; and the tenant, therefore, could not be called on to release or indemnify the Railway Executive in the event of negligence being established.

INTERLOCUTORY APPEAL by the defendants from a decision of STREATFEILD, J., F dated June 23, 1949.

On the trial of a preliminary issue in an action for damages for negligence, or, alternatively, for damages on the ground that the defendants, the Railway Executive, had brought fire on to their property and allowed it to escape on to the plaintiffs' adjoining property and their goods, the plaintiffs alleged that their goods, which were stored in a warehouse adjacent to the railway, had
G been damaged by fire through the negligence of the defendants. The defendants contended that, even if this were proved, they were entitled to be released and indemnified from and against all liability by the first plaintiff, who was the tenant of the warehouse, by virtue of a clause in the tenancy agreement. STREATFEILD, J. held that the clause did not relieve the defendants from liability. The Court of Appeal upheld this decision and dismissed the appeal.

H Beney, K.C., and Felix Denny for the plaintiffs.
Gardiner, K.C., and Douglas Lowe for the defendants.

SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R. : This appeal has raised a question of considerable difficulty, but, on the whole, I have come to the conclusion that the appeal should not succeed.

The clause to be construed is in an agreement, dated June 13, 1939, between the predecessors in title of the defendants, the Railway Executive, and the first plaintiffs. The purpose of the agreement was to grant a tenancy of a warehouse situated in the middle of a number of railway sidings and railway properties near Grantham. Counsel for the defendants has pointed out with justice that the agreement is one in which the railway company undertook the minimum of obligation. He has said that, fairly read, the inference one should draw from the agreement is something to this effect : " We are not anxious to let this warehouse. If we do, you may have it fairly cheaply, but A we must not be exposed to any kind of risk or liability for which, if we had left it empty, we should not have been liable." I think that, on a general view of the sense of the agreement, counsel is justified in giving it that effect. Clause 10 of the agreement is in these terms :

> " The tenant shall be responsible for and shall release and indemnify the company and their servants and agents from and against all liability B > for personal injury (whether fatal or otherwise) loss of or damage to property and any other loss damage costs and expenses however caused or incurred (whether by the act or neglect of the company or their servants or agents or not) which but for the tenancy hereby created or anything done pursuant to the provisions hereof would not have arisen."

The argument of counsel for the defendants is to the effect that these words must be construed to mean what they say, and that they were intended to throw the widest possible obligation for indemnity and release on the tenants. The real question, however, turns on the meaning to be given to the last two lines : " which but for the tenancy hereby created or anything done pursuant to the provisions hereof would not have arisen." It is plain that it is those D words which give the real content to the clause as a whole. Without them the clause would have been of such wide import as could not possibly have been intended in a document of this sort. The last two lines define the scope of the obligation.

It is to be noted that there are two categories of liability, namely, liability which would not have arisen " but for the tenancy hereby created " and E liability which would not have arisen but for " anything done pursuant to the provisions hereof," and it is necessary, if possible, to give proper effect to both branches of the clause. So far as the latter is concerned, " anything done pursuant to the provisions hereof," it is not difficult to see the kind of thing which is contemplated. A number of clauses have been referred to, for example, cl. 4, which carries with it at least the implication that the defendants will F take goods in and out of the warehouse ; cl. 6, which refers to certain regulations ; cl. 8, which refers to the defendants' right to retain possession of goods for the purpose of securing their own charges ; and, finally—and this is for illustrative purposes the most important clause—cl. 9, whereby the defendants reserve the right to carry pipes, cables and wires, etc., over the premises. To give an example, I think that the words which I am seeking to construe G in cl. 10 would cover any cause of action the tenants might have by reason of some negligent act which the defendants did in the exercise of their powers under cl. 9 to carry pipes and the like over the premises. These latter words, therefore, appear to me to have a fairly clear and at the same time precise content.

The difficulty is the exact extent of the former words, " the tenancy hereby H created." I am not satisfied that it is right to treat these words as in some way qualified or limited by the words which follow. I think they mean something different from what is meant by " anything done pursuant to the provisions hereof." Counsel for the defendants says they mean " which but for the existence of the tenancy hereby created would not have arisen." I agree with counsel that the kind of damage which has been suffered in the present case may well have been the sort of thing against which the defendants were anxious to protect themselves. It appears that a steam engine, while proceeding along the defendants' lines, emitted sparks which set fire to property in the first plaintiff's warehouse and did considerable damage. The allegation in the statement of claim is that the defendants were negligent either in that their engine was unsafe or because for other reasons sparks were emitted from it.

Although it may have been the defendants' intention to protect themselves A from possible claims of that character, the difficulty I have found in considering this clause is that the parties, not being willing to be explicit in their language or to confine themselves to damage of this kind, have evolved a form of words which, if counsel's construction of the material words "but for the tenancy hereby created" is right, seems to me to have most remarkable, if not extravagant, results. "The tenant . . . shall . . . indemnify the company . . . B against all liability for personal injury . . . which but for the tenancy hereby created . . . would not have arisen." What is the meaning of that? Counsel for the plaintiffs has taken the example of a customer of the first plaintiffs, who sets forth from London for the express purpose of visiting the first plaintiffs at their warehouse, and owing to the negligence of the defendants the customer is injured in an accident between Kings Cross and Grantham. Is such a case C covered? Counsel for the defendants may well say: "Everthing is covered assuming such a case can be proved." But if it is covered—and I would agree with the argument that, reading "but for the tenancy hereby created" as equivalent to "but for the existence of the tenancy," it would be covered—then the clause has a scope which I regard as too vague and too extravagant to be supported if a narrower construction presents itself and can be adopted D with equal justice to the language.

There is an alternative construction equally available on the language, namely, that the words "which but for the tenancy hereby created would not have arisen" mean, and are confined to, liabilities which only arise by reason of the relationship of landlord and tenant which this document creates. On that construction, a proper test would be, on any given claim: Is the fact that E the first plaintiffs are the tenants of the defendants under the agreement of June 13, 1939, a necessary or material allegation? If that test be applied in the present case, the answer would be: "No." Examples again have been given of the kind of case that, on this view, would be covered in possible claims against the defendants under implied covenants for quiet enjoyment and so on, but limiting the liability to that which is really related to the relationship F of landlord and tenant which the agreement creates.

Because of the extravagant result which the former view involves, I think that the latter construction is the one which the court ought to adopt. We are presented with two alternative readings of this document and the reading which one should adopt is to be determined, among other things, by a consideration of the fact that the defendants put forward the document. They G have put forward a clause which is by no means free from obscurity and have contended that, on the view for which they argued, it has a remarkably, if not an extravagantly, wide scope, and I think that the rule contra proferentem should be applied and that the result is that the present claim is not one which obliges the first plaintiffs to give to the defendants a release and an indemnity.

I have dealt with the point of construction to some extent rather differently H from the way in which the learned judge below approached it. I think that, after considering certain causes, he was persuaded that the tenancy must be the causa causans. For my part, I have avoided involving myself in that matter. I do not refer to the authorities which have been mentioned, not out of any disrespect to counsel or to the learned judge below, but on the principle, which I think both counsel accepted, that on a matter of construction of this kind other cases provide a very uncertain guide and each document must be construed according to its own terms. If I have arrived by a rather different route, I have reached the same goal which the learned judge reached, and for the reasons which I have stated I feel that the appeal fails and should be dismissed.

SOMERVELL, L.J. : I agree that the appeal fails for the reasons which have been given by the Master of the Rolls.

DENNING, L.J. : I agree. I would only like to give one illustration of the extraordinary consequences to which the interpretation of counsel for the defendants would lead if it were right. So far as I can see, it would mean that if the defendants negligently or recklessly set fire to goods in the warehouse so that, not only the goods in it but also the warehouse itself and adjoining property was destroyed, then not only would the first plaintiffs be unable to recover the damage to their own goods, but they would also be bound to indemnify the defendants against the cost of rebuilding their own warehouse and against their liability to any other persons whose property had been destroyed by their fault. I need hardly say that a construction which leads to those consequences ought not to be adopted unless the words are so plain that there is no doubt about their meaning. This clause is not so plain as that. The words " but for " may denote a cause, or they may be so wide as to include a remote circumstance, and the more reasonable construction here is to limit them to causes properly so called. The last two lines should be read, therefore, as saying : " which has arisen by reason of the tenancy hereby created or anything done pursuant to the provisions hereof." If the wide construction contended for were correct, there would be a serious question whether a contract in such wide terms would be enforced by the courts. There are many provisions in the Railway Acts which restrict the freedom of contract of railway companies. There are provisions which specify their responsibility in respect of the construction of their engines and the maintenance and carrying on of their works and make them liable to compensate people who are damaged. There are provisions which make them liable for injury done in the receiving and delivery of goods, and so forth. Above all, there is the vigilance of the common law which, while allowing freedom of contract, watches to see that it is not abused. It would, therefore, be a very serious question whether the defendants are free to exempt themselves in the wide terms which are here contended for. It seems to me preferable that a limited construction should be put on the clause so that it should be valid, and I agree the appeal should be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

[Court of Appeal (Bucknill, Cohen and Asquith, L.JJ.), July 27, 1949.]

Agency—Estate agent—Commission—Contract to pay commission on introduction of " person able ready and willing to purchase "—Option to purchase property given to third party before introduction—Agent not notified of withdrawal of property from market.

The defendant, a married woman, instructed various estate agents to find a purchaser of property of which her husband was owner and, in the case of one firm of agents (the plaintiffs), she signed an agreement to pay them commission in the event of their introducing to her " a person able ready and willing to purchase the property " for £2,500. One of the other firms of estate agents introduced one E., a prospective purchaser who was willing to buy and to whom the defendant gave an option to purchase the property within 24 hours. The defendant did not withdraw the property from the plaintiffs, and before an agreement to sell to E. was concluded, the plaintiffs introduced a person able, ready and willing to purchase the property, but the owner sold to E. for £2,700.

A HELD : the plaintiffs were entitled to commission on £2,500.

Per COHEN, L.J. : Counsel for the plaintiffs admits that some limitation must be implied, and he says that there are three events in which, notwithstanding the introduction, commission would not be payable. The first is if before introduction the authority is withdrawn ; the second is if before introduction the property has already been sold ; and the third is if before B introduction the owner has entered into a binding contract to sell to somebody else. In the present case the learned judge has introduced a fourth limitation, namely, if at the time of the introduction the property is not for sale because the owner withdraws it by reason of some arrangement, not binding in law, but binding morally or as a matter of business [a view which the court rejected].

E APPEAL by the plaintiffs from a judgment of His Honour JUDGE NEAL, sitting at Willesden County Court, dated April 8, 1949, whereby he dismissed the plaintiffs' claim for commission.

The plaintiffs, estate agents, had, in pursuance of a contract, introduced to the defendant a prospective purchaser of property belonging to her husband which her husband had authorised her to sell, but, unknown to the plaintiffs, F the defendant had already granted an option to purchase to another person, to whom the property was eventually sold. The learned county court judge held that a term must be implied in the agreement between the defendant and the plaintiffs that, if the property was not for sale because the defendant had withdrawn it by reason of some arrangement to which she was morally, or as a matter of business, bound, commission would not be payable to the plaintiffs. The G Court of Appeal reversed his decision, holding that no such term could be implied. The facts appear in the judgment of BUCKNILL, L.J.

Geoffrey Howard for the plaintiffs.
G. R. F. Morris for the defendant.

BUCKNILL, L.J. : This is an appeal from a judgment of His Honour H JUDGE NEAL in favour of the defendant in a claim brought by the plaintiffs, Nelson & Co., for the sum of £70 to which they say they are entitled by way of commission. The case is one of some importance and illustrates the saying that hard cases tend to make bad law, but I think that the words of the contract are plain and that the defendant is liable to pay under the terms of it.

The husband of the defendant owned a bungalow, 93 Barnhill Road, Wembley Park, and, being minded to sell it, was in treaty to buy a house elsewhere. The judge has accepted the evidence of the defendant and the evidence of a Mr.

Christelow where their evidence conflicts with the evidence of the witnesses for the plaintiffs, and I take the defendant's evidence accordingly. She said that she had been to various firms for the purpose of selling this bungalow. On these occasions she did not sign any forms. I understand that to mean that she had instructed these agents on the usual terms that they would obtain a commission if they introduced a purchaser. When she got to the plaintiffs' place of business she did sign a form, the material particulars of which are as follows. After giving the address of the property, and the price, £2,500, the form contains this paragraph :

> "I hereby instruct Messrs. E. P. Nelson & Co. to offer for sale the property described above on the understanding that in the event of Messrs. E. P. Nelson & Co. introducing to me a person able ready and willing to purchase the property on the terms indicated above, or on terms subsequently authorised by me, I will pay them immediately upon such introduction commission in accordance with the terms and conditions as specified in the Scale of Professional Charges of the Auctioneers' and Estate Agents' Institute of the United Kingdom, an extract of which scale is given overleaf and which I have carefully read."

The extract simply says :

> "Private Treaty. Negotiating a sale by private contract; or introducing a person able, ready and willing to purchase on terms authorised by the vendor . . ."

and it sets out the percentages.

Another agent to whom the house had been entrusted was Messrs. Cowdrey, & Co., and on the day following the signing of the contract with the plaintiffs a Mr. Emile, sent by Cowdrey & Co., came to the bungalow and said he would like to buy it. He then went back to Cowdrey's, saw Mr. Christelow, and said he wished to purchase the property but had not got the full ten per cent. deposit. He made a preliminary deposit of £5. Mr. Christelow said that he then got into communication with the defendant and on Mr. Emile's behalf asked for an option on the property for 24 hours at a higher figure than that asked by the defendant, and the defendant agreed to give Mr. Emile the option as requested. After Mr. Emile had been to the bungalow, a Mrs. Payne arrived, having been sent by the plaintiffs. She liked the bungalow, but said she wished her husband to see it, but he could not come until the next day and asked the defendant to keep it for them. The defendant said she could not do so, as it might be sold before they had reached a decision. Mrs. Payne then went away, but she returned in the afternoon with her husband. The defendant then said that the house was sold, that she had given an option on it, and that a deposit had been paid. Eventually, the house was sold to Mr. Emile for £2,700.

Counsel for the plaintiffs agreed that to give this contract business efficacy certain implied terms must be inserted. The first was that the contract would not continue in force if, before the plaintiffs introduced the person able and willing to buy, the authority had been withdrawn by the defendant. That is a sensible implied term, because it would effectively prevent any risk of having to pay a double commission. If the defendant had studied the rather stringent terms to which she put her signature, she could have saved all this trouble by simply telephoning to the plaintiffs and saying : "We have got a man who is going to buy the bungalow. Do not send anybody round to see it." Another term which, it is admitted, must be implied was that the contract would not apply if the property had already been sold before the able and willing person had been introduced. The learned judge, instead of limiting the implied term to an actual sale, has gone beyond that and said, in effect, that the contract would not apply if the property had been taken off the market—not legally, but in a business sense. With due respect to the learned judge, I do not understand those words. Either the bungalow had been sold or it had not. It is clear that it had not been sold at the time when Mr. and Mrs. Payne arrived, and, as it had not been sold, the contract was still in existence.

That being so, it seems to me that these terms are perfectly plain. It is not disputed that Mr. Payne was a man able, ready and willing to purchase the property. The property was not, in fact, sold at the time when his wife came to see it, and, therefore the defendant is liable. I need not refer to the various cases which have been drawn to our attention in the course of the argument except to point out that in no less than three cases, Giddys v. Horsfall (1), Bennett and Partners v. Millett (2) and Dennis Reed, Ltd. v. Nicholls (3), a contract in its essentials similar to this has been before the courts and in each case the defendant has been held to be liable to pay the commission although the person introduced has not purchased the property. For these reasons, in my judgment, this appeal should be allowed.

COHEN, L.J. : I am of the same opinion. The merits of this case are all with the defendant, but the argument of counsel for the plaintiffs has convinced me that they are entitled to succeed.

In Luxor (Eastbourne), Ltd. v. Cooper (4), to which we were referred, it was pointed out by LORD SIMON, L.C. ([1941] 1 All E.R. 40) that there were at least three different classes of cases in which the question of the right to commission could arise. He states the first of them in these terms :

> " There is the class in which the agent is promised a commission by his principal if he succeeds in introducing to his principal a person who makes an adequate offer, usually an offer of not less than the stipulated amount. If that is all that is needed in order to earn his reward, it is obvious that he is entitled to be paid when this has been done, whether his principal accepts the offer and carries through the bargain or not. No implied term is needed to secure this result."

It is not disputed by counsel for the defendant that the present case falls within that class of cases in which commission may become payable, and, as my Lord has pointed out, in such a case it has been held that, in the absence of other circumstances, once the introduction is proved, the commission is recoverable as soon as the introduction has been effected. Counsel for the plaintiffs admits that, even in this class of case, some limitation must be implied, and he says that there are three events in which, notwithstanding the introduction, commission would not be payable. The first is if before introduction the authority is withdrawn ; the second is if before introduction the property has already been sold ; and the third is if before introduction the owner has entered into a binding contract to sell to somebody else. In the present case the learned judge has introduced a fourth limitation, namely, if at the time of the introduction the property is not for sale because the owner withdraws it by reason of some arrangement, not binding in law, but binding morally or as a matter of business. This opinion of the learned judge involves the implication of a term which is not to be found in the contract itself, and, as LORD SIMON, L.C., pointed out in Luxor (Eastbourne), Ltd. v. Cooper (4) ([1941] 1 All E.R. 40) :

> " In contracts made, however, with commission [agents] there is no justification for introducing an implied term unless it is necessary to do so for the purpose of giving to the contract the business effect which both parties to it intended it should have."

The same view is expressed at rather greater length by LORD WRIGHT (ibid., 53), where he ends his statement of the law with these words :

> " The implication must arise inevitably to give effect to the intention of the parties."

In considering whether or not we can imply here either of two terms which were suggested by counsel for the defendant as necessary in order to support the learned judge's judgment, I think it would be convenient to apply the well-known test of the officious bystander. Before I turn to that, let me state A what I understood to be the terms which counsel suggested. The first was that there should be implied a term that commission would be payable in respect of the first introduction by any agent. On this view, if there had been another agent employed on similar terms to the plaintiffs and he had introduced a purchaser before Mr. Payne arrived, no commission would be payable to the plaintiffs. In the alternative, he said that there must be an implied term that, if B the vendor had justifiably, as he put it, withdrawn the property, the commission would not be payable. I do not think it is possible to say that, if the officious bystander had turned to the parties and said : " Supposing the existence of a state of facts contemplated by either of these two implied terms, would commission have been payable ?", they would both have answered : " Of course not." It seems to me that it is one thing to ask an estate agent to say that he will C not claim commission if the vendor has bound himself to sell to somebody else and quite a different thing to say that he would have agreed not to claim commission if the property had been withdrawn from the market by reason of some arrangement, not binding in law, but which the vendor might choose to think was binding on him in honour or as a business arrangement. The learned judge has said a different question might arise if the vendor had D " improperly or arbitrarily or whimsically withdrawn the property ", but it seems to me that the court would be placed in a difficult position if it had to go into considerations of that kind.

Finally, even if one implied the first of the two terms that counsel for the defendant suggested, I am not sure that it would help him because in the present case it would appear that the other firm, Messrs. Cowdrey & Co., had not induced E the defendant to sign an agreement in this very wide and, as it seems to me at first sight, rather undesirable form, that had been supplied to her by the plaintiffs. The mere introduction of Mr. Emile would, therefore, not have given that firm any right to a commission. It seems to me that, even if we implied the first term, as counsel asked us to do, it would not have entitled him to succeed. For these reasons I agree that the appeal should be allowed.

F

ASQUITH, L.J.: I also agree. I do not think the term ought to be implied as necessary or inevitable. The plaintiffs have performed the literal terms of their contract by introducing a person ready, willing and able to buy, and I do not see the necessity for an implied term that they are to forfeit their right to commission simply because before the introduction the defendant had entered into an arrangement with a third person which made her feel herself morally G bound to sell to that third person. For these reasons, and for the others given by my Lords, I think the appeal should be allowed.

Appeal allowed with costs here and below, to include special fee for counsel.

Surtax—Private company—Undistributed income—Apportionment to members—Member a married woman living with her husband—Liability of husband—Income Tax Act, 1918 (c. 40), All Schedules Rules, r. 16—Finance Act, 1922 (c. 17), s. 21 (1) (2) (3) (7) (as amended by the Finance Act, 1927 (c. 10), s. 31 (2))—Finance Act, 1936 (c. 34), s. 19 (5).

The Finance Act, 1922, s. 21 (as amended by the Finance Act, 1927, s. 31 (2)), provides : " With a view to preventing the avoidance of the payment of super-tax [now surtax] through the withholding from distribution of income of a company which would otherwise be distributed, it is hereby enacted as follows : (1) Where it appears to the Special Commissioners that any company to which this section applies has not, within a reasonable time after the end of any year . . . for which accounts have been made up, distributed to its members in such manner as to render the amount distributed liable to be included in the statements to be made by the members of the company of their total income for the purposes of super-tax, a reasonable part of its actual income from all sources for the said year . . . the commissioners may, by notice in writing to the company, direct that . . . the said income of the company shall . . . be deemed to be the income of the members, and the amount thereof shall be apportioned among the members and super-tax shall be assessed and charged under the provisions of this section in respect of the sum so apportioned . . . (2) Any super-tax chargeable under this section . . . shall be assessed upon that member in the name of the company, and . . . shall be payable by the company . . . (7) In this section the expression ' member ' shall include any person having a share or interest in the capital or profits or income of a company . . . " The Finance Act, 1936, s. 19 (5), provides, with regard to tax assessed under s. 21 of the Act of 1922 : " Where . . . the tax . . . is not paid by the company before the expiration of three months from the date of service or before Jan. 2 following the year of assessment (whichever is the later), the tax shall . . . be recoverable from the member on whom the tax was assessed."

A company to which s. 21 applied became liable to surtax for the year 1936-37, and the revenue authorities assessed in the name of the company the husbands of three of its members who were married women living with their husbands. In so doing they relied on the Income Tax Act, 1918, All Schedules Rules, r. 16, which provides that the profits of a married woman living with her husband are to be deemed the profits of the husband and are to be assessed and charged in his name. The husbands appealed :

HELD : (i) section 21 was designed merely as machinery for charging the company with the tax and not as part of the ordinary procedure of assessing and charging an individual, and there was, therefore, no justification for reading the word " member " in that section as sometimes including " the husband of a member who is a married woman living with her husband."

(ii) the effect of s. 19 (5) of the Act of 1936 was to render the debt owed by the company payable by the member, but it did not have the effect of charging the husband of a member with tax, and the assessments should, therefore, be discharged.

Appeal by the taxpayers from a judgment of Atkinson, J., dated Mar. 24, 1947. The taxpayers were the husbands of three members of a private company, in respect of the undistributed income of which assessments to surtax had been made under the Finance Act, 1922, s. 21. Having regard to the Finance Act, 1936, s. 19 (5), and the Income Tax Act, 1918, All Schedules Rules, r. 16, the Crown claimed to assess the husbands of the members in the name of the company in respect of proportions of the undistributed income. The Special Commissioners confirmed the assessments, and their decision was affirmed by Atkinson, J. The Court of Appeal now allowed the appeal.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 27. The following judgments were read.

TUCKER, L.J. : These three appeals raise the question whether a husband is liable to be assessed and charged to surtax in respect of a sum which has been apportioned to his wife by the Special Commissioners under the Finance Act, 1922, s. 21 (1), as representing her interest in a company controlled by five or fewer people which, in the opinion of the Special Commissioners, has not distributed a reasonable part of its income and with regard to which they have made a direction under the above-mentioned section that its actual income is to be deemed for surtax purposes to be the income of its members. Under these provisions Mr. Latilla was, on Mar. 1, 1943, assessed to surtax in the sum of £285,996 in respect of the year 1936-37, being the sum apportioned to his wife in respect of her interest as a member of a company called F. P. H. Finance Trust, Ltd. Messrs. Latilla-Campbell and Mayo were similarly assessed in the sum of £285,910 each being the sums apportioned to their wives in respect of their interests in the same company. These assessments were upheld on appeal by the Special Commissioners, whose decision has been affirmed by Atkinson, J.

The point is a short one. On the one hand, there is the well-recognised principle of income tax law based on the Income Tax Act, 1918, All Schedules Rules, r. 16, that a husband is liable to be assessed and charged to tax in respect of the income of his wife who is living with him. On the other hand, the Finance Act, 1922, s. 21, as amended by the Finance Act, 1927, s. 31 (2), though, no doubt, designed to prevent loss of super-tax revenue due to the formation of small private companies which did not distribute their profits in dividends, was deliberately framed so as to make the tax recoverable from the company and not from the individual members of the company, though the individual members were given an option whereby they could elect to pay instead of the company. It was not until the passing of the Finance Act, 1936, that the tax in such cases became recoverable from the member, and it is contended that s. 19 (5) of the Act of 1936 cannot be used so as to give a different meaning to the language of s. 21 of the Act of 1922, which was clearly designed to put the liability on the company and consequently to render r. 16 inapplicable, save for the purpose of aggregation of income so as to ascertain the rate of tax chargeable against the company.

It will be convenient at this stage to refer to the relevant rules and sections. The Income Tax Act, 1918, All Schedules Rules, r. 16, so far as material, provides :

> " A married woman acting as a sole trader, or being entitled to any property or profits to her separate use, shall be assessable and chargeable > to tax as if she were sole and unmarried : Provided that—(1) the profits of a married woman living with her husband shall be deemed the profits of the husband, and shall be assessed and charged in his name, and not in her name or the name of her trustee."

Section 21 of the Act of 1922, as far as material, as amended by the Finance Act, 1927, s. 31 (2) provides :

> "With a view to preventing the avoidance of the payment of super-tax through the withholding from distribution of income of a company which would otherwise be distributed, it is hereby enacted as follows : (1) Where it appears to the Special Commissioners that any company to which this section applies has not, within a reasonable time after the end of any year or other period ending on any date subsequent to Apr. 5, 1922, for which accounts have been made up, distributed to its members in such manner as to render the amount distributed liable to be included in the statements to be made by the members of the company of their total income for the purposes of super-tax, a reasonable part of its actual income from all sources for the said year or other period, the commissioners may, by notice in writing to the company, direct that for purposes of assessment to super-tax, the said income of the company shall, for the year or other period specified in the notice, be deemed to be the income of the members, and the amount thereof shall be apportioned among the members and super-tax shall be assessed and charged under the provisions of this section in respect of the sum so apportioned after deducting in the case of each member any amount which has been distributed to him by the company in respect of the said year or period in such manner that the amount distributed falls to be included in the statement of total income to be made by that member for the purposes of super-tax . . . (2) Any super-tax chargeable under this section in respect of the amount of the income of the company apportioned to any member of the company, shall be assessed upon that member in the name of the company, and, subject as hereinafter provided, shall be payable by the company, and all the provisions of the Income Tax Acts and any regulations made thereunder relating to super-tax assessments and the collection and recovery of super-tax shall, with any necessary modification, apply to super-tax assessments and to the collection and recovery of super-tax charged under this section. (3) A notice of charge to super-tax under this section shall in the first instance be served on the member of the company on whom the tax is assessed, and if that member does not within 28 days from the date of the notice elect to pay the tax a notice of charge shall be served on the company and the tax shall thereupon become payable by the company : Provided that nothing in this sub-section shall prejudice the right to recover from the company the super-tax charged in respect of any member who has elected as aforesaid but who fails to pay the tax by Jan. 1 in the year of assessment or within 28 days of the date on which he so elected, whichever is later. (4) Any undistributed income which has been assessed and charged to super-tax under this section shall, when subsequently distributed, be deemed not to form part of the total income from all sources for the purposes of super-tax of any individual entitled thereto . . . (7) In this section the expression 'member' shall include any person having a share or interest in the capital or profits or income of a company . . . (8) The provisions contained in sched. I to this Act shall have effect as to the computation of the actual income from all sources of the company, the apportionment thereof amongst members of the company, and otherwise for the purpose of carrying into effect, and in connection with, this section."

Paragraph 8 of sched. I to the Act, as amended by the Finance Act, 1927, s. 46 and sched. V, pt. III, reads as follows :

> " The apportionment of the actual income from all sources of the company shall be made by the Special Commissioners in accordance with the respective interests of the members, and the income as apportioned to each member so far as assessable and chargeable to super-tax under s. 21 of this Act shall, for the purposes of super-tax, be deemed to represent income from his interest in the company for the year or other period and shall be included in the statement of his total income or in an amended statement of total income which the Special Commissioners are hereby authorised to require and shall be deemed to be the highest part of that income." A

It is not necessary to read the Finance Act, 1927, s. 38, in full, but it has the effect of substituting surtax for super-tax and making surtax a part of income tax. Section 42 (7) of that Act provides :

> " Assessments in respect of surtax shall be subject to appeal to the Special Commissioners except on such matters as under sub-s. (4) of this section are to be regarded as having been finally and conclusively determined, and all the provisions of the Income Tax Acts relating—(a) to persons who are to be chargeable with income tax at the standard rate and to assessments to such tax ; (b) to appeals against such assessments ; (c) to the collection and recovery of such tax ; (d) to Cases to be stated for the opinion of the High Court ; shall, so far as they are applicable, apply to the charge, assessment, collection and recovery of surtax, and the Special Commissioners shall, for the purpose of assessment of surtax, have any powers of a surveyor and, for the purpose of the representation of the Crown on any appeal before the Special Commissioners, any person nominated in that behalf by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue shall have the same power at, and upon the determination of, the appeal as a surveyor has at, and upon the determination of, any appeal relating to income tax at the standard rate." B C D

Finally, the Finance Act, 1936, s. 19 (5), provides :

> " Where a notice of charge is served on a company or the liquidator of a company under sub-s. (3) of the said s. 21 and the tax thereupon becoming payable is not paid by the company before the expiration of three months from the date of service or before Jan. 2 following the year of assessment (whichever is the later), the tax shall thereupon, without prejudice to the right to recover it from the company, be recoverable from the member on whom the tax was assessed." E

It is said by the Crown that the concluding words of the passage quoted above from s. 21 (1) of the Act of 1922 are inapplicable to a married woman living with her husband as she is not required to make a return of her total income, and, consequently, double taxation would result where there has been an actual distribution to a married woman member. Furthermore, emphasis is laid on the words " be deemed to be the income of the members," which it is said results in the income being deemed to be the income of the husband where the member is his wife living with him. It is, however, conceded that these words would not by themselves justify an assessment to surtax on the husband having regard to the later words " super-tax shall be assessed and charged under the provisions of this section." The Crown have, therefore, to admit that the husband could not be charged until the Act of 1936 was passed. In these circumstances I do not think they can derive much support from the words " shall be deemed to be the income of the members " which simply result in the apportioned sums being deemed to be the income of the member—including married women members living with their husbands—as a step in the process of rendering the tax recoverable from the company. F G H

With regard to the double taxation point, I take the view that para. 8 of sched. I would justify the Special Commissioners requiring a return of total income from a married woman member for the purposes of ascertaining the sum to be charged on the company of which she is a member. If, however, para. 8 does not justify such a requirement, I think the words " falls to be included in the statement of total income to be made " have the same meaning as the earlier words " liable to be included in the statement to be made," and merely refer to the quality of the receipt : see Penang & General Investment Trust v. Comrs. of Inland Revenue (1), and especially the language of LORD THANKERTON where he says ([1943] 1 All E.R. 517) :

> " In my opinion, the words above quoted refer to the quality of the distribution predicated. It appears to me to be clear that this part of sub-s. (1) had within its purview the failure of a company to distribute a reasonable part of its income as income, which, in an appropriate case, would render it returnable as part of the recipient's total income for purposes of super-tax. My construction of the words quoted may easily be expressed by the substitution of ' would ' for ' to ' and the insertion of the words ' if any ' after ' statements,' as follows—' distributed to its members in such manner as would render the amount distributed liable to be included in the statements, if any, to be made by the members of the company of their total income for the purposes of super-tax.' Accordingly, the appellants' ground of challenge of the direction fails."

The language of s. 21 (1) appears to me in its ordinary and natural meaning to be applicable to any member of the company, including a married woman living with her husband, whereas the Crown are compelled to read into the sub-section, after the words " that member " at the end of the passage quoted above, the words " or by her husband in the case of a member who is a married woman living with her husband." Similarly, in sub-s. (2), the Crown must insert after " that member " the words, " or her husband in the case of a member who is a married woman living with her husband." Again in sub-s. (3) they must insert, after " member of the company," the words " or the husband of the member," and after " that member," the words " or her husband as the case may be." Sub-section (3) seems to me decisive of this case, as it is, I think, clear that the election is given to the member of the company, and if she be a married woman she, and she alone, is entitled to elect. I cannot accept the submission of the Solicitor-General that the definition of " member " in sub-s. (7) as including " any person having a share or interest in the capital or profits or income of a company " is wide enough to include the husband of a member by reason of his liability to tax in respect of his wife's income. This submission assumes that the very question in dispute has been answered in favour of the Crown, but, even so, the husband could not possibly, in my view, be included in this definition. I feel unable to read into these sections the words necessary to support the Crown's construction, having regard to the fact that the whole section is designed merely as machinery for charging the company and not as part of the ordinary procedure of assessing and charging an individual. When s. 19 (5) of the Act of 1936 was passed it merely resulted in enabling the Crown to recover from the member that which had previously been recoverable only from the company, and I can see no reason for reading into that sub-section the words " but this shall not apply in the case of a member who is a married woman living with her husband, in which case the tax shall be recoverable from her husband." The sub-section appears to me to render the tax recoverable from the member whether she be a married woman or not, and I cannot see what answer she would have to such a claim if made on her personally. The provisions of s. 21 are of a penal character, and to interpret them as imposing on a husband a liability to pay surtax by reason of non-distribution of profits of a company of which he is not a member, and of the profits of which he has no right to any share and from which his wife may in fact have received nothing, would require very clear words.

In contrast to the language of s. 21 of the Act of 1922, the legislature in the Finance Act, 1938, s. 38 (1) (a), makes express reference to the wife or husband of a settlor, while in the Finance Act, 1939, s. 15 (6), it is provided that references in that section to a person shall in the case of an individual be deemed to include the wife or husband of the individual. The section in question is one giving extended powers to the Special Commissioners in the case of investment companies to make apportionments under s. 21 of the Act of 1922 in the case of persons who are not members of the company, and is, therefore, very much in point. Neither the Special Commissioners nor ATKINSON, J., have explained precisely how they would read s. 21 of the Finance Act, 1922, so as to give effect to their decision, nor have they expressed any view with regard to the election given under sub-s. (3) of the section. Furthermore, they make no reference to the fact that the section was designed solely as machinery for recovering tax from the company. For these reasons I would allow this appeal.

SINGLETON, L.J. : If a private company does not distribute a reasonable part of its income it is obvious that members of the company may avoid some part of that which they would have to pay by way of surtax if more was distributed. I use the expression "private company" to describe a company within the Finance Act, 1922, s. 21 (6), as amended. The F. P. H. Finance Trust, Ltd., was such a company. The Finance Act, 1922, s. 21, was passed in order to meet this position. The Special Commissioners are thereby enabled to direct that the income of such a company shall be deemed to be the income of the members if it appears to them that there has not been distributed a reasonable part of the income of the company from all sources. Thereafter that income is to be apportioned among the members. Under sub-s. (2) any super-tax (now surtax) chargeable under the section in respect of the amount of the income apportioned to any member of the company is to be assessed on that member in the name of the comany and > "shall be payable by the company, and all the provisions of the Income Tax Acts and any regulations made thereunder relating to super-tax assessments and the collection and recovery of super-tax shall, with any necessary modification, apply to super-tax assessments and to the collection and recovery of super-tax charged under this section."

Under sub-s. (3) a notice of charge to super-tax under the section is, in the first instance, to be served on the member of the company on whom the tax is to be assessed, and, if the member does not within 28 days of the notice elect to pay the tax, a notice of charge is to be served on the company and the tax thereupon becomes payable by the company. Thus, though the member might for reasons of his or her own elect to pay the tax, the liability to pay the tax was by the section placed upon the company and upon no one else. Paragraph 8 of sched. I to the Act provides the method of apportionment and that the income as apportioned to each member shall, for the purposes of super-tax, be deemed to represent income from his interest in the company for the year or other period, and shall be included in the statement of his total income, or in an amended statement of total income which the Special Commissioners are authorised to require, and shall be deemed to be the highest part of that income.

In order to arrive at the rate of tax payable regard must be had to the Income Tax Act, 1918, All Schedules Rules, r. 16. The incomes of husband and wife have to be lumped together and apportioned income of either of them is to be deemed the highest part of that income. On that basis the amount of tax on the apportioned income is calculated. Under the Finance Act, 1922, s. 21 (1), the apportionment is among the members of the company ; under s. 21 (2) super-tax chargeable in respect of the amount apportioned to any member is to be assessed on that member in the name of the company. What, then, was the position of a married woman who was a member of a company in regard to which action was taken by the Special Commissioners under s. 21 ? An apportionment could only be made among the members, and, consequently, a proportion of the income of the company must be apportioned to her. Under r. 16 a married woman entitled to any property or profits for her separate use is assessable and chargeable to tax, but if she is living with her husband at the material time the profits are to be deemed the profits of the husband and are to be assessed and charged in his name and not in her name. Section 21 applies when it appears to the Special Commissioners that the company has not distributed to its members in such manner as to render the amount distributed liable to be included in the statements to be made by the members of the company of their total income for the purposes of super-tax a reasonable part of its actual income. A married woman living with her husband did not, and does not, render any such statement. That is done by her husband, and her income is deemed to be his income for that purpose. It is not said that this affects the liability to super-tax under s. 21 (1), but the result would appear to be that "member" in that sub-section is sometimes to be read literally and at other times as meaning "husband of the member, if the member is a married woman living with her husband." This adds greatly to the difficulties of construing the section and of forming a view as to the position created by subsequent amendments.

By the Finance Act, 1927, s. 31 (2), there were added to s. 21 (1) of the Act of 1922 the words

> "and super-tax shall be assessed and charged under the provisions of this section in respect of the sum so apportioned after deducting in the case of each member any amount which has been distributed to him by the company in respect of the said year or period in such manner that the amount distributed falls to be included in the statement of total income to be made by that member for the purposes of super-tax."

The object of this amendment was to avoid double taxation. Again the position of a married woman who is a member of the company is overlooked. Where the member is a married woman her share of the income so distributed is distributed to her and not to her husband, but the husband makes the return for tax purposes. Thus, once more the word "member" is used in both senses. These refinements did not matter in the least until a further change was made by the Finance Act, 1936. So far a member of a company could not be called on to pay any super-tax assessed under the Finance Act, 1922 (as amended in 1927). Under s. 21 (2) of the Act of 1922 the amount of the income apportioned to any member is to be assessed on the member in the name of the company, and is payable by the company, and the provisions of the Income Tax Acts or regulations thereunder relating to super-tax and the collection and recovery of super-tax apply, with any necessary modification, to super-tax assessments and to the collection and recovery of super-tax charged under that section—that is, of course, to the collection and recovery of super-tax from the company. I have already referred to s. 21 (3) which makes it abundantly clear that the liability to pay was on the company. By the Finance Act, 1936, s. 19 (5), the matter is carried a stage further. If the tax is not paid by the company within a certain time

> ". . . the tax shall thereupon, without prejudice to the right to recover it from the company, be recoverable from the member on whom the tax was assessed."

The husband, the appellant, was not a member of the company. Mrs. Latilla was a member, and the Special Commissioners apportioned to her the sum of £286,996 5*s.* part of the income of the company for the period under consideration. An assessment to surtax was made under the Finance Act, 1922, s. 21, on the appellant, the husband of the member on whom the apportionment had been made. The company sustained a heavy loss in the year following the year of assessment and is in liquidation. Apparently, there is no prospect of its paying the tax. The husband objects to the assessment, contending that, even if the pre-requisites to assessment to surtax under the Finance Act, 1922, s. 21, be held to be satisfied, such assessment can only be made on a member of the company to whom an amount of the company's income has been apportioned; that there is no provision that where a wife is the member, the husband shall be deemed to be a member in her place; that, on consideration of all the relevant statutory provisions, income apportioned to a wife is not to be deemed the husband's income within the meaning of r. 16; and that, consequently, the assessment made on the husband was bad in law and should be discharged.

The Inland Revenue Commissioners rely on r. 16, which, they claim, is a controlling rule which operates throughout the Income Tax Acts. You cannot, they say, assess a married woman living with her husband, and this apportioned income, which is to be deemed to be her income, must be treated as his income and he is assessable and chargeable in respect of it. Rule 16, as LORD UTHWATT pointed out in Nugent-Head v. Jacob (2) ([1948] 1 All E.R. 418), is a collecting section and not a charging section. It is, I think, essential to bear in mind that one is not considering income which has been received, nor tax which has become due in respect of income received, by a taxpayer. The Finance Act, 1922, s. 21, initiated a scheme of taxing a private company which did not distribute what was considered to be a reasonably sufficient proportion of its income. One arrived at the amount of the tax by reference to the total income of the member (and for that purpose the incomes of husband and wife had to be aggregated) and the apportioned income was to be deemed to be the highest part of the income, thus attracting the highest rate of tax, but the liability to pay the tax was placed on the company, and is still on the company. The change made by the Finance Act, 1936, s. 19 (5), was to provide that, if the company did not discharge its debt or liability, the tax is to be recoverable from the member. The tax was, and is, payable by the company. It is a tax on the company. It is only if it is not paid by the company within the time specified that it becomes recoverable from the member. I cannot see why in these circumstances "member" in the Finance Act, 1936, s. 19 (5), should be read as meaning "husband of the member if the member is a married woman." As I have said, "member" in the Finance Act, 1922, s. 21 (1), means sometimes one and sometimes the other. The Solicitor-General, in dealing with s. 21 (2) and (3), said that it might mean either the husband or the wife.

There is some reason for making a member of a private company responsible if the company does not pay. He or she has, or had, an interest in the company and, maybe, some direction or control over its affairs. A wholly different position arises when it is sought to charge the husband of a married woman who is a member. So far as I know, he could have no right whatever to recover against the company any tax paid by him. It would require clear words to place liability on the husband, and I cannot find them anywhere. I see no reason why the word "member" in the Finance Act, 1936, s. 19 (5), should be read as meaning anyone other than a member. There is nothing in s. 19 itself to encourage one to take a wider view. If it had been the intention of the legislature to make the husband responsible, it would have been easy to add to s. 19 (5) "provided that if the member is a married woman living with her husband the tax shall be recoverable from the husband." This is not a case of the husband being called to defray tax accruing due on income received by his wife. The tax was a tax on the company, but, as it was surtax, it could not be assessed on the company. The effect of the change made by the Finance Act, 1936, is to make a debt owed by one person (the company) payable by another (the member) if the first does not discharge the debt. In my opinion, it goes no further than that, even though the debt is, or is described as, tax, it is still a tax on the company, and on no one else. I am in favour of allowing the appeal.

HARRISON v. HOPKINS.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Bucknill, Cohen and Asquith, L.JJ.), July 21, 22, 28, 1949.]

Rent Restriction—Tenant—"Persons deriving title under original tenant"—Administratrix of original tenant's estate—Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920 (c. 17), s. 12 (1) (f).

In 1928 the landlord let to the defendant's father a cottage to which the Rent Restrictions Acts applied. As from 1942 the defendant lived with her father in the cottage until his death in June, 1948, and thereafter she continued to live in it with her husband. The defendant's father died intestate, leaving five children living besides the defendant, but none of these other children had lived in the cottage. In July, 1948, the defendant obtained a grant of letters of administration to her father's estate, and on Aug. 24, 1948, the landlord served on her a notice to quit, expiring on Sept. 6, 1948, and later claimed possession from her both in her personal capacity and in her capacity as administratrix of her father's estate.

HELD: that the defendant, as administratrix of her father's estate, was a "person . . . deriving title under the original . . . tenant," and was, therefore, a "tenant" within the meaning of s. 12 (1) (f) of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, and when the notice to quit expired she became a statutory tenant and so entitled to the protection of the Acts.

APPEAL by the tenant from a decision of His Honour JUDGE ST. JOHN FIELD, K.C., sitting at the Leicester County Court, dated Mar. 9, 1949.

The landlord claimed possession of a dwelling-house to which the Rent Restrictions Acts applied, and the county court judge held that the defendant was not a tenant within the meaning of s. 12 (1) (f) of the Act of 1920 and made an order for possession. The Court of Appeal now allowed the defendant's appeal. The facts appear in the judgment of BUCKNILL, L.J.

Mrs. Y. Frazer for the tenant.
Stabb for the landlord.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 28. The following judgments were read.

BUCKNILL, L.J. : This is an appeal from an order of His Honour Judge St. John Field, K.C., granting to the landlord the possession of a cottage. In 1928 the landlord let the cottage to one Joseph Bland at a rent of 4s. per week. As from 1942 Bland's daughter, Christine, the defendant, started to live with him. Christine subsequently married Bernard Hopkins, but she and her husband continued to live with Bland in the cottage. On June 14, 1948, Bland died intestate, leaving five children living besides the defendant. On July 7, 1948, the defendant obtained letters of administration. On Aug. 24 the landlord served notice to quit by Sept. 6 on the defendant, who was living in the cottage, and subsequently issued the summons in this action, claiming possession against the defendant both in her own capacity and in her capacity as administratrix of the estate of Joseph Bland. At the hearing the landlord's arguments were : (i) Bland was always a contractual tenant and never a statutory tenant, and, therefore, the defendant could not claim protection under s. 12 (1) (g) of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920. (ii) The defendant was merely administratrix and representative of all persons entitled to Bland's estate, and, therefore, she was not a tenant within the meaning given to that word by s. 12 (1) (f) of the Act of 1920, which is to the following effect.

> " The expressions . . . ' tenant ' . . . include any person from time to time deriving title under the original . . . tenant."

The defendant's argument, on the other hand, was that she became the contractual tenant when she took out letters of administration, and, therefore, became a statutory tenant when the notice to quit expired. The county court judge decided for the landlord on the ground that the case came within the principle in Smith v. Mather (1), and that, therefore, the deceased's children did not become statutory tenants.

With respect to the judge, I do not think that Smith v. Mather (1) is decisive of this case. The facts in that case differed fundamentally from those in the present case, because in Mather's case (1) no letters of administration were taken out. The decision of the Court of Appeal proceeded on the basis that by s. 9 of the Administration of Estates Act, 1925, the tenancy vested in the President of the Probate, Divorce and Admiralty Division, that it was inconsistent with such vesting in the President that there should also be a statutory tenancy in the children of the deceased tenant, and that the notice to quit served on the President was a valid notice to bring the contractual tenancy to an end. The crucial point in this case is whether the defendant, when she received a grant of administration of the deceased tenant's estate, became a tenant within the meaning of s. 12 (1) (f) of the Act of 1920.

Some remarks by Morton, L.J., in Lawrance v. Hartwell (2) support this view. In that case the plaintiff let a dwelling-house to X. Subsequently, the defendant also went to live in the house and X made a will appointing the defendant sole executrix and sole beneficiary. X died and probate of her will was granted to the defendant. The plaintiff gave the necessary notice to quit to the defendant and then began an action for possession. The defendant claimed the protection of the Rent Acts, and the question for decision was whether she was a " tenant " entitled to protection. The county court judge gave judgment for the defendant. On appeal the plaintiff argued that the defendant took possession purely in a representative capacity, and as such was incapable of residing on the deceased's property as a home. Morton, L.J., in the course of his judgment, pointed out ([1946] 2 All E.R. 259) that the whole legal and beneficial interest in the tenancy was vested in the defendant, and then went on to say :

> "...I propose to assume for the moment that the defendant had no beneficial interest at all in the testatrix's estate. In those circumstances would the defendant be protected by the Acts? On the assumption that I have made, the defendant would still be a person deriving title under the original tenant and in fact the defendant would still be in possession although there would be this difference in the situation, that sooner or later a beneficiary might come along and say 'that house was demised to me and I A desire to reside in it. Please assent to my taking over, and leave the house.' But, in the meantime, the position is that the defendant is in the house. In my view, an executrix . . . who is living in the house at the time the notice to quit expires, and who has not up to that time taken any step to divest herself of the interest in the property, does become a statutory tenant."

B These remarks, although obiter, seem in principle to fit the present case. Indeed, inasmuch as the defendant is a part beneficiary as well as administratrix, her position is stronger than in the illustration given by MORTON, L.J., where the defendant has no beneficial interest in the tenancy. On the other hand, the landlord relied on Sharpe v. Nicholls (3). In that case the plaintiff's husband owned a cottage which he had let to the defendant. On the death of her husband C the plaintiff desired the cottage for her own occupation, and she, therefore, started proceedings claiming possession of the premises which were required for her own occupation, claiming with her nephew as personal representatives of the deceased landlord. At the hearing the case was argued solely on the question of hardship, and the judge ordered the defendant to give the plaintiff possession. On appeal the defendant argued that the plaintiffs claimed only as personal D representatives of the landlord, and that there was no evidence that the widow was beneficially entitled to the premises. As the point was not taken before the judge and the order was bad in other respects, a majority of the court ordered the case to be re-tried. MORTON, L.J., however, considered that judgment should be given for the defendant on the ground that the plaintiffs had not proved the necessary facts to bring them within para. (h) of sched. I to the Rent and E Mortgage Interest Restrictions (Amendment) Act, 1933, which provides, in effect, that the court shall have power to make an order for the recovery of possession if the dwelling-house is reasonably required by the landlord for occupation as a residence for himself or his children or parents. MORTON, L.J., said that the whole case was that the plaintiffs were the owners as personal representatives, there was no evidence that the widow had any beneficial interest F in the house, and, in his opinion, the expression "landlord" in para. (h) of sched. I did not apply to one of several legal personal representatives. So, also, in McIntyre v. Hardcastle (4) the plaintiffs were sisters and had joint legal and beneficial ownership of a house within the Rent Acts. They brought an action for possession against the tenant on the ground that the house was required for occupation as a residence by one of them. The judge dismissed the action G on the ground that para. (h) of sched. I to the Act of 1933 did not apply where only one of the landlords claimed the house for his own occupation, and this decision was upheld on appeal. In the present case counsel for the landlord argued that the administratrix only shared the beneficial interest in the premises with the five other children of the deceased tenant and could not be said to have such a beneficial interest in the property as would entitle her to claim to be a H person deriving title under the original tenant. He pointed out the hardship on the landlord if a personal representative could claim the house as a residence for himself although he had no beneficial interest in the property, provided he was residing there when the notice to quit was given.

The only effective solution that I can see to this difficult problem is on the basis that the decision must depend on its particular facts and on the actual words of the appropriate section of the Act, and that it is not practicable to make the decision accord with its possible results in every hypothetical case with quite different facts. In this case there was no evidence that any of the other five children made any claim to the cottage or had ever lived there. As Tucker, L.J., said ([1948] 1 All E.R. 699) in McIntyre v. Hardcastle (4)

> " All kinds of difficulties have been suggested as likely to follow whichever interpretation is accepted by us. I do not think that the legislature contemplated this situation at all when this paragraph was framed, and, therefore, I feel driven to interpret it merely in the light of the actual language used."

Applying this test, it seems to me that in the present case the defendant as administratrix derived title under the original tenant, and, being in occupation of the house at the material time, she is entitled to the protection of the Acts. I, therefore, think this appeal should be allowed.

COHEN, L.J. : I am of the same opinion. The question turns on the meaning of the word " tenant " in s. 12 (1) (f) of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, which provides that a " tenant " includes > " any person from time to time deriving title under the original . . . tenant."

There is nothing in the context to require the attribution of a secondary meaning to these words. In their natural signification persons claiming title by devolution are as much within the definition as persons claiming title by assignment. If, therefore, the sub-section is construed according to the natural sense of the words used, the defendant is a tenant within the sub-section. It is not disputed that she was in occupation at the material date, namely, the date of expiration of the notice to quit, and, says her counsel, she is therefore plainly a statutory tenant. This was the argument she addressed to the learned county court judge and she supported it by a reference to Lawrance v. Hartwell (2). In that case this court upheld the claim of the tenant on the ground that, as the entire interest in the tenancy had vested in the defendant as executrix and beneficiary before the expiration of the notice to quit, she was a person deriving title under the original tenant within the meaning of s. 12 (1) (f), and, since she was personally residing in the dwelling-house, she was entitled to remain as statutory tenant, but Morton, L.J., who gave the leading judgment with which the other members of the court agreed, went on to consider what the position would have been had the defendant had no beneficial interest in the estate of the testatrix. He held that even on this basis the defendant would have been entitled to remain in possession saying ([1946] 2 All E.R. 259) :

> " On the assumption that I have made, the defendant would still be a person deriving title under the original tenant and in fact the defendant would still be in possession although there would be this difference in the situation, that sooner or later a beneficiary might come along and say ' That house was demised to me and I desire to reside in it. Please assent to my taking over, and leave the house.' But, in the meantime, the position is that the defendant is in the house. In my view, an executrix who is living in the house at the time of the testatrix's death, who is living in the house at the time the notice to quit expires, and who has not up to that time taken any step to divest herself of the interest in the property, does become a statutory tenant."

This view, if correct, plainly covers the present case, but the learned county court judge rejected this argument, saying that the case was concluded in favour of the landlord by the decision of this court in Smith v. Mather (1). That case, however, turned on para. (g) of s. 12 (1), and the point we have to decide did not arise. Counsel for the landlord did not seek to support the county court judge's ratio decidendi, but he presented a much more formidable argument in support of the landlord. He relied particularly on two decisions of this court, the first, Sharpe v. Nicholls (3) and the second, Parker v. Rosenberg (5), in both of which this court had to consider the rights of a landlord to possession. The question in each case arose, not under s. 12 (1) (f), but under s. 3 of the Act of 1933 and para. (h) of sched. I thereto. In Sharpe v. Nicholls (3) proceedings were commenced by the widow and nephew of the deceased landlord as personal A representatives to recover possession of premises within the Acts for the occupation of the widow. There was no evidence to prove that the widow had any beneficial interest in the estate of the deceased landlord. The actual decision in the case did not turn on whether personal representatives were landlords within the meaning of para. (h), but MORTON, L.J., expressed an opinion on the point ([1945] 2 All E.R. 60) saying :

> B "The plaintiffs' whole case, as I have shown from their pleadings, is based upon the allegation that they were the owners as personal representatives. I cannot find any admission at the trial in any shape or form that the widow had any beneficial interest in the house. I do not know in the least who was entitled to the house. For all I know, Sharpe may have made a will leaving it to a nephew or to any other person. In those circumstances, C one must consider ; can it be said that 'the dwelling-house is reasonably required by the landlord . . . for occupation as a residence for himself' when the plaintiffs are legal personal representatives suing in that capacity and one of them wants to live in the house ? In my opinion, such a case is not within the terms of para. (h) at all. Strange results would follow if that were not so. For instance, you might have four legal personal representa- D tives, none of whom was related to the testator at all, and one of them might require the house as a residence for himself, having no beneficial interest whatsoever in the property. I am clearly of opinion that such a case could not possibly be within the terms of para. (h). It is also to be observed that the words 'himself or any son or daughter of his . . . or his father or mother' seem to refer to a person who is the landlord not in the E sense that he is one of several personal representatives but in the sense that he is the sole owner of the property subject to the tenancy. It seems to me, therefore, that the plaintiffs entirely failed to prove that they came within para. (h) ; and if they failed to prove that they came within para (h), it seems to me the words of s. 3 of the Act absolutely precluded the county court judge and would preclude this court, from making any order for F the recovery of possession."

These observations were obiter, but in Parker v. Rosenberg (5) they were approved and applied where legal personal representatives were seeking to recover possession of premises for the occupation of a sister of the testatrix who was the tenant for life under her will. TUCKER, L.J., said ([1947] K.B. 376) :

> G "It is clear that neither the definition section of the Act of 1920 nor para. (h) of sched. I to the Act of 1933 confer on anyone any right to an order for possession which he does not otherwise possess. Paragraph (h) is designed to relax in certain cases the previously imposed statutory restrictions on the right of recovery. In the present case Miss Marsh, apart from the Rent Restrictions Acts, would not have been entitled to sue in H ejectment. She was not a party to the lease and was not entitled to the reversion. There is nothing in para. (h) of sched. I to the Act of 1933 enabling her to sue or be added as a plaintiff. As the proper plaintiffs, the trustees, cannot bring themselves within para. (h) and Miss Marsh cannot herself sue, it follows that no order for possession could properly be made in the present case."

Those decisions lend some colour to the argument of counsel for the landlord, but I would observe that the question in each case before the court was not as to the meaning of the expression " landlord " in the abstract, but as to the right of the landlord to possession under para (h), and the landlord had, therefore, to prove not only that he was a landlord but also that he required the premises for his own occupation and that greater hardship would be involved in refusing him possession than in depriving the tenant of possession, a burden which plainly an executor or administrator without a beneficial interest in the property would be unable to discharge. These considerations are not expressly mentioned in the judgment in the cases cited, but they afford a means of reconciling them with the earlier opinion expressed by Morton, L.J., in Lawrance v. Hartwell (2), an opinion with which I find myself in complete agreement. Counsel for the landlord also referred us to a decision of this court in McIntyre v. Hardcastle (4), where two joint legal and beneficial owners sought to recover possession under para. (h) of sched. I to the Act of 1933 in order that one of them might occupy the premises. Their claim was rejected, it being pointed out that when the paragraph was re-written with the aid of the Interpretation Act, 1889, so as to apply to the case of two executors, the plaintiffs were unable to fulfil the conditions of para. (h). That case does not, I think, assist the decision of the case before us. For these reasons I would allow the appeal.

ASQUITH, L.J. : This is an appeal by a defendant from a decision of the county court judge granting possession of certain premises to the plaintiff. The facts of this case appear from the judgment and are not in dispute. The question is whether, on the expiry of the notice to quit served on the defendant, the defendant became a statutory tenant. If she did, it is now common ground that she has done nothing to forfeit the " status of irremovability " inherent in statutory tenancy. She was a statutory tenant from the moment the notice to quit expired, if, and only if, she was then a " tenant " of a dwelling-house to which the Acts apply. The dwelling-house was certainly, as regards rateable value, a dwelling-house to which the Acts applied, for, although only its rent appears in the evidence, every dwelling-house is presumed to be such in respect of the rateable value until the contrary is shown : s. 7 (1) of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1938.

Was the defendant a " tenant " of this dwelling-house ? This question remits us to the definition of " tenant " for the purpose of the Acts. Section 12 (1) (f) defines " tenant " as including anyone " deriving title under the original tenant." At the first blush it would appear obvious that the defendant complies with that description. On Mr. Bland's death intestate his tenancy vested under s. 9 of the Administration of Estates Act, 1925, in the President of the Probate Division until administration was granted, and, when administration was granted, it vested in the administratrix, namely, the defendant. She, therefore, derived title, through the President as intermediary, under " the original tenant," Mr. Bland. To be a tenant within the definition she has also to be in occupation at the time the notice to quit expires, but she more than fulfils this condition. She had resided in the dwelling-house for several years before her father died, and is residing there today. It is, however, argued that an administrator, though resident, is not a tenant (i) if he has no beneficial interest in the tenancy, or (ii) if, though he has a beneficial interest, it is not exclusive—if, that is, there are other beneficiaries sharing that interest with him.

I proceed to consider the first of these propositions. If its contrary is established, the second proposition does not arise and the case is concluded in favour of the defendant. It is said that, where the original tenant is dead, his personal representatives are a mere conduit pipe for " transmitting the title to the beneficiaries " and that it cannot have been intended that they should gain substantive rights exercisable in their own personal interest, such as the status of irremovability conferred by a protected tenancy. Such a status is notoriously non-transferable and is inappropriate to a bare personal representative whose raison d'etre is to transfer property or rights to others. Further, it is contended that, on the alternative view, a personal representative who is a trustee would necessarily, in circumstances such as those of the present case, make a profit out of his trust. Again, the object of the Act is, it is said, to keep a roof over the head of a person made of flesh and blood and beneficially entitled, not of a person whose occupation is inherently transitory and who is a mere mechanism for handing that occupation over. Then, again, it is argued that the only provision in the Acts designed to protect possession after death is s. 12 (1) (g), which, admittedly, does not apply to protect the defendant's possession in this case since it only applies where the deceased was a statutory, not a common law, tenant : Thynne v. Salmon (6) ; Smith v. Mather (1). These and similar arguments were advanced by counsel for the landlord, with a force and address to which this bald summary does less than justice.

In considering them, we should take as our starting point the proposition that, in construing a statute, the words used are primarily to be read in their ordinary grammatical meaning, or, if the words used amount to a term of art, in their established technical meaning. The words " deriving title under the original tenant " seem inevitably to include the defendant, whether regarded as plain English or as a formula used in a technical sense by conveyancers. But the matter doesn't rest there, for the meaning of words, as ascertained by the foregoing tests, may have to be modified by reference to the context, to the mischief struck at by the statute, and to decided cases construing it. As regards case law, there is no authority precisely in point, though several cases are indirectly relevant through dicta or implication. More than one of these are decisions on the meaning not of " tenant " but of " landlord," a term which is also defined in s. 12 (1) of the 1920 Act. These decisions construe " landlord " mainly in respect of its meaning for the purposes of para. (h) of sched. I to the 1933 Act. Thus, in Sharpe v. Nicholls (3) it was held by the Court of Appeal that, where two personal representatives sought to avail themselves of para. (h) on the ground that one of them required the premises for residence for himself, they were not a " landlord " within (h), and, therefore, failed. On the pleadings it was clear that the plaintiffs sued in their representative capacity. It does not appear whether both or either had any beneficial interest, since it does not even appear whether there was a will or not or whether the personal representatives sued as executrices or administrators. Parker v. Rosenberg (5) decided the same again as regards the meaning of " landlord " in para. (h) of the schedule in relation to a claim by trustees appointed under a will who had no beneficial interest. They were the proper plaintiffs, but they could not succeed. A beneficiary who was added as co-plaintiff was held to be improperly so added.

Lawrance v. Hartwell (2) is a decision on the meaning not of " landlord " but of " tenant," and, therefore, nearer to this case. The deceased tenant left a will, and the defendant, who was in residence at the time of the decease and thereafter, was sole executrix and sole beneficiary under the will. She was held to be a " tenant " within s. 12 (1) (f) qua person " deriving title under the original tenant." The question whether the position would have been the same if she had had no beneficial interest, though at the highest collateral to the point actually decided, was extensively canvassed and occupies half—or, perhaps, more than half—of the leading judgment of MORTON, L.J., with which the other two members of the court merely concurred. His answer to this question is a plain : " Yes." This appears sufficiently from such passages as the following ([1946] 2 All E.R. 259) :

> " . . . I propose to assume for the moment that the defendant had no beneficial interest at all in the testatrix's estate. In those circumstances would the defendant be protected by the Acts ? On the assumption that I have made, the defendant would still be a person deriving title under the original tenant [notwithstanding] that sooner or later a beneficiary might come along and say 'That house was demised to me, and I desire to reside in it. Please assent to my taking over, and leave the house'."

MORTON, L.J., pointed out that in Skinner v. Geary (7), SCRUTTON, L.J., commenting on Collis v. Flower (8), makes it clear that he held the same view. A
In conclusion MORTON, L.J., makes an observation which, even if the passages I have cited from his judgment and those he has cited from SCRUTTON, L.J., are purely obiter, is in itself irrefragable. He said (ibid., 261):

> "The position is that there is no authority for the proposition that an executor who has proved the will, who has not assented to a bequest to someone else, and who is in actual possession of the house at the termination of B > the common law tenancy, is not entitled to the protection of the Acts."

In my view, if this is true of executors, it is equally true of administrators. This expression of opinion may be obiter, but it proceeded from a judge with great experience in construing these Acts, and I cannot see any adequate reason why it should not be adopted. It accords not only with the views of C
SCRUTTON, L.J., but with the literal and the technical meaning of the words used. I am, for myself, not impressed by the argument founded on the construction given in certain cases to the word "landlord." I do not think the meaning of the word "tenant" can be deduced simply mutatis mutandis from that of the word "landlord." The definitions of the two terms in s. 12 (1) of the 1920 Act are not such that the definition of the one is an infallible guide to D that of the other by conversion, reciprocity, or any other logical automatic device, as a perusal of s. 12 (1) (g) will show. Apart from this, the cases I have in mind and have cited deal with the meaning of "landlord," not solely in regard to its definition in s. 12 (1), but specifically in regard to its meaning in the particular context of para. (h) of sched. I to the 1933 Act. The language employed in para. (h) is, it seems to me, entirely inappropriate when a land- E lord who is a personal representative is involved. Where a personal representative is involved, then, as was pointed out during the argument by COHEN, L.J., the question of the comparative hardship to the tenant of granting, and to the landlord of refusing, an order for possession seems wholly artificial, and I think these cases, founded on the meaning of "landlord" and of its meaning in a particular connection, shed no light on the meaning of the term F
"tenant" in this case.

Smith v. Mather (1), on the authority of which the county court judge decided against the defendant, seems to me of no direct relevance to this case, because it was concerned with the question whether a relation of the deceased was entitled to stay on by virtue of s. 12 (1) (g), and in this case no one contends that the defendant is entitled to stay on by virtue of that provision, which G only applies where the deceased tenant was a statutory and not, as in the present case, a contractual tenant. Thynne v. Salmon (6), is, for the same reason, irrelevant. So, also, is, as the learned county court judge rightly observes, Mackley v. Nutting (9), a case which the learned judge says was "brought to his notice." It was not cited before him by any counsel in the case. The judge states that though bound by, he does not understand, this H decision. Since we agree with him that the decision is irrelevant, perhaps this circumstance is not very important. The argument that, on the construction which I favour, the personal representatives, quoad trustees, would be bound to make a profit out of their trust does not strike me as at all decisive. If they did, the cestui que trust could, no doubt, cause them to account for the cash value of any such profit. For the purposes of s. 12 (1) (f) I do not think the landlords could look beyond the "curtain" of trustees. I adhere to the dicta of MORTON, L.J., in Lawrance v. Hartwell (2), a decision to which I was a party, and of SCRUTTON, L.J., in Skinner v. Geary (7). I am of opinion that the administratrix was a protected tenant, that the order for possession was wrong, and that the appeal should be allowed.

Re WRIGHT (a Bankrupt). Ex parte LANDAU (a Creditor) v. THE TRUSTEE.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Danckwerts, J.), August 3, 1949.]

Bankruptcy—Lease—Covenant not to assign without consent—Binding on tenant and "successors in title"—Trustee a "successor in title" to tenant.

By a covenant in a lease of a dwelling-house and shop the tenant, which expression was to include "his successors in title," undertook "not to assign underlet or part with the possession of the demised premises or any part thereof without the written consent of the landlord such consent not to be unreasonably withheld in the case of a respectable and responsible person." The tenant became bankrupt on Jan. 20, 1949. The trustee in bankruptcy wishing to assign the lease to the bankrupt's wife, the landlord sought a declaration that he (the trustee) was bound by the covenant.

HELD: the trustee was a successor in title to the bankrupt although the lease vested in him by operation of law, and as such was bound by the terms of the covenant.

MOTION for a declaration that the respondent was bound by the covenants in a lease vested in him as trustee of a bankrupt to whom premises had been demised by the applicant and, in particular, by a covenant not to assign or underlet or part with the possession of the premises without the applicant's written consent, such consent not to be unreasonably withheld in the case of a respectable and responsible person. The applicant also sought an injunction restraining the respondent from assigning, underletting or parting with the possession of the premises in breach of covenant ; for a declaration that the applicant was entitled reasonably to withhold his consent to the assignment of the premises to the bankrupt's wife ; and for an order that the respondent comply forthwith with a resolution of the committee of inspection directing him to take immediate steps to recover possession of the premises from the bankrupt's wife now in possession. Danckwerts, J., held that the expression " successor in title " in the covenant included a trustee in bankruptcy and the trustee was, accordingly, bound by the terms of the covenant.

Aronson, K.C., and Muir Hunter for the applicant (the landlord).
Caplan for the respondent (trustee in bankruptcy).

DANCKWERTS, J. : This is an application by motion by Mr. Joshua Landau, landlord under a lease dated Apr. 19, 1947 :

> " . . . (i) for a declaration that the respondent, the trustee in the bankruptcy of one Cyril Wright, is bound by the covenants in the said lease contained, and, in particular, by a covenant not to assign or underlet or part with the possession of the demised premises without the written consent of the applicant, such consent not to be unreasonably withheld in the case of a respectable person ; (ii) an injunction to restrain the respondent from assigning, underletting, or parting with possession of the said premises in breach of the aforesaid covenant ; (iii) a declaration that the applicant is entitled reasonably to withhold his consent to the assignment of the said premises to Mrs. Wright, being the wife of the bankrupt."

The lease was of a dwelling-house and shop, No. 6, Walkers Court, Berwick St., London, and was for the term of 21 years from Mar. 25, 1947. The rent reserved was for the first three years £550 per annum, for the next three years £600 per annum, and for the remainder of the term £650 per annum, payable by equal half-yearly payments in advance on Mar. 25 and Sept. 29 in every year. The parties are described in the lease as :

> " Joshua Landau . . . (hereinafter called ' the landlord ' which expression shall where the context so admits include the person for the time being entitled to the reversion immediately expectant on the determination of the term created) of the one part and Cyril Wright . . . (hereinafter called ' the tenant ' which expression shall where the context so admits include his successors in title) of the other part."

Clause 2 (8) of the lease is a covenant by the tenant

> " Not to assign underlet or part with the possession of the demised premises or any part thereof without the written consent of the landlord such consent not to be unreasonably withheld in the case of a respectable and responsible person."

In cl. 4 (1) there is a condition of re-entry in these terms :

> " If the rent hereby reserved or any part thereof shall at any time be unpaid for twenty-one days after becoming payable (whether formally demanded or not) or if the covenants on the tenant's part herein contained shall not be performed or observed or if the tenant shall become bankrupt or make any assignment . . . it shall be lawful for the landlord at any time thereafter to re-enter upon the demised premises or any part thereof in the name of the whole and thereupon this demise shall absolutely determine but without prejudice to the right of action of the landlord in respect of any antecedent breach of the tenant's covenants herein contained."

The tenant, Mr. Cyril Wright, was adjudicated bankrupt on Jan. 20, 1949. There is now no question of the condition of re-entry on bankruptcy because it is admitted on behalf of the applicant that the covenant and the right incident to it of re-entry has been waived. Apparently, the respondent, the trustee in bankruptcy, has had certain negotiations with the applicant with regard to the assignment to two different assignees and has paid rent for the six months in advance which was due on Mar. 25, 1949. The respondent now wishes to assign the residue of the term to Mrs. Wright, the debtor's wife, and it is claimed on his behalf that the covenant against assignment is not binding on him and he is entitled to assign without any consent on the part of the landlord. One of the best known authorities on the subject is Doe d. Goodbehere v. Bevan (1). It has long been accepted that on the authority of that case a trustee in bankruptcy is at liberty to assign a bankrupt's leasehold property notwithstanding a covenant that the tenant or his assigns shall not assign or part with the property in question. Counsel for the applicant, however, claims that the reasons for that decision no longer apply because s. 4 (1) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, contains statutory provisions, which have appeared in the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, and onwards, enabling a trustee in bankruptcy to get rid of an onerous lease by disclaimer. He says that provisions are made for the results which follow on such a disclaimer, and, therefore, a trustee in bankruptcy is no longer in such a position that he may find himself involuntarily landed with an onerous lease and unable to dispose of it except by assignment to some other person. He also claims that the reasons for the decision no longer apply because of the passing of the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927, which, by s. 19 (1), introduces into every covenant against assignment a provision to the effect that the consent to the assignment should not be unreasonably withheld. A third point taken by counsel for the applicant was, that, by reason of rent having been paid by the respondent under the lease and the applicant having accepted him as tenant and waived the condition of re-entry on bankruptcy, he had ceased to be a mere person in possession by operation of law and become a person in possession by privity of contract so that he was subject to the terms of the lease in all respects. For that he relied on Dyke v. Taylor (2). I need not decide whether that case was rightly or wrongly decided, because the present circumstances hardly approach the circumstances of that case, and also it is not necessary for me to apply it in view of the decision at which I have arrived. Somewhat extraordinary results might follow if that decision were applied to the full. For instance, a trustee in bankruptcy, having parted with property in perfectly ordinary circumstances, and even with the landlord's consent, might be held to be liable for ever under the covenants of the lease notwithstanding that he had parted with the property.

The matter really comes down to this. First, are cases such as Doe d. Goodbehere v. Bevan (1) to be treated as still good law ? Secondly, do those cases apply to the terms of the lease in the present case ? Counsel for the applicant asked me to decide that Doe d. Goodbehere v. Bevan (1) was no longer appropriate in regard to the present state of the law of bankruptcy. Counsel for the respondent, on the other hand, asked me to say that that case is fully operative at the present time and prevents any covenant against assignment limiting the trustee's ability to assign the lease. The reasons for that, he said, were that the bankruptcy law imposes on the trustee in bankruptcy a duty to realise the property of the bankrupt for the benefit of his creditors and that statutory duty overrides all contractual provisions which might limit and prevent the proper realisation of the property. I hope I have not put his argument too high, but that seems to me to be the result which must follow if he is correct.

Doe d. Goodbehere v. Bevan (1) and other cases cited are, in my opinion, explainable, apart from such a wide proposition as that which I have mentioned, by reference to the precise terms of the covenants in the particular cases concerned under which it can be said that persons who are not mentioned in the covenants are not bound by the provisions and so are not prohibited from assigning. For instance, in Goring v. Warner (3) the covenant was :

> " . . . that the lessee, his executors or administrators, should not assign the term without the lessor's consent under his hand in writing, with a power of re-entry in such case to the lessor . . . "

The commissioners under the authority of the statute referring to the strict distribution of property for the benefit of creditors, and assignees from such commissioners, are neither of them within the express terms of such a covenant, and counsel for the respondent is justified in saying that LORD MACCLESFIELD, L.C., as reported (2 Eq. Cas. Abr. 100),

> " held clearly, that the assignment by the commissioners (being done by authority of a statute, which will supersede any private agreement between even the parties) and the assignment over by the assignees was no breach of the condition ; ergo decreed plaintiff to hold and enjoy, and an injunction to stay proceedings at law."

If that is applied literally and to the full, it does not matter what the terms of the covenant against assignment are. The persons charged with the duty of distributing the bankrupt's property are not bound by them. In Doe d. Goodbehere v. Bevan (1) the covenant was that the tenant, his executors, administrators, or assigns, should not assign the indenture, or his or their interest therein, or assign, or underlet the messuage and premises, or any part thereof, to any person or persons whatsoever without the consent in writing of the lessor. Although there is language used by all the judges in that decision which might be construed in a wide sense, it seems to me that the real basis of the decision is that involuntary assigns such as a trustee in bankruptcy, or the commissioners for the purpose of distributing bankrupt's property, as it was in that case, are not assigns within the meaning of such a covenant, and are, therefore, not prohibited from parting with or assigning the leasehold property in question. That is the real basis of that decision, which has stood for a long time and which, if it is to be held no longer part of the law, must be so held, in my opinion, by the Court of Appeal.

The view which I take of the effect of that decision seems to be supported by two modern cases. In Re Birkbeck Permanent Benefit Building Society (4) there was an exception of persons taking by operation of law in a prohibition of assignment of a policy of insurance. The property having been vested by an order of the court in the liquidator of a company—it was held that the liquidator took by operation of law, and, therefore, was not subject to the provisions of the restriction in question. In the course of his judgment NEVILLE, J., said ([1913] 2 Ch. 38) :

> " There is another point of view which I think equally affects the condition of the insured, and it is this. Doe d. Goodbehere v. Bevan (1) clearly shows that prima facie a contractual restriction of assignment does not apply to the assignment by a person on whom the property has devolved by operation of law, and who is under an obligation to assign. Of course, you may have so contracted as to include such a case, but the mere condition against assignment does not prima facie include it."

That passage seems to me to be quite inconsistent with the wider view that there is some policy of the law of bankruptcy which prevents a trustee in bankruptcy being bound by any condition or covenant against assignment.

In Re Farrow's Bank, Ltd. (5) it was held that in the ordinary case of a liquidator of a company in liquidation, the liquidator could not assign the leasehold property of the company contrary to a covenant against assignment, for the simple reason that the property did not vest in the liquidator without an order of the court, and it would be an assignment by the tenant, that is to say, the company, but for my present purpose the material passage is in the judgment of LORD STERNDALE, M.R., in which he distinguished the case of a liquidator from that of a trustee in bankruptcy. He said ([1921] 2 Ch. 174):

> "Now, as has been pointed out, the position of the trustee in bankruptcy is quite different from that of a liquidator. He does not act on behalf of the bankrupt; he does not dispose of the bankrupt's property as such; all A the property is vested in him. The real question which arose in the bankruptcy cases to which we have been referred may be stated in this way. There was a covenant that the lessee should not assign without the consent of the lessor, and that bound him and his assigns. The trustee in bankruptcy had assigned without the consent of the lessor. Was that an act of the lessee or his assigns? It was not of course necessary to hold that the B assignment was not his act; that was obvious on the face of it; and what was held was that the trustee in bankruptcy was not the assign of the bankrupt within the meaning of the covenant, because the covenant related only to voluntary assigns and not to assigns in law. That is really the basis of all those decisions, whatever may have been the language used."

C Applying that to the present case, it seems to me that all that cases like Doe d. Goodbehere v. Bevan (1) have decided is that the trustee in bankruptcy is not an assign within the covenants in those cases that the lessee or his assigns should not dispose of the property. In the present case the words are different. The covenant, reading it with the clause descriptive of the parties at the beginning of the lease, is a covenant by the tenant and his successors D in title not to assign, and so forth, without the landlord's consent. I am unable to see why the trustee in bankruptcy, even though he obtains the property by operation of law, is not a successor in title of the debtor, that is to say, the tenant. Therefore, in my view, the respondent is bound by the terms of the covenant and I am prepared to make a declaration accordingly.

Declaration accordingly.

SORRELL v. PAGET.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Bucknill, Cohen and Asquith, L.JJ.), July 26, 1949.]

G Animal—Cattle straying—Damage feasant—Distraint—Lien of distrainor—Inappropriate claim by distrainor—Claim for "£2 for salvage"—Duty of owner to estimate and tender proper compensation.

The plaintiff's heifer strayed on to a railway line abutting on the farms of both the plaintiff and the defendant, and the defendant, in the interest H of public safety and that of the plaintiff, drove it into a stubble field. In the night it escaped from that field and strayed into one of the defendant's fields, in which he kept a herd of T.T. cattle. The defendant thereupon impounded the heifer in one of his own barns. When the plaintiff's servants called to collect the heifer, the defendant demanded "two pounds for 'salvage' and one shilling per day keep" as a condition of releasing the animal. The plaintiff did not pay the amount demanded, nor did he tender any sum. The defendant continued to detain the heifer which died some days later, though fed and watered by him. The court inferred from the judgment of the county court judge that the defendant had suffered damage as the result of the straying of the plaintiff's heifer. The plaintiff claimed damages for wrongful conversion of the heifer.

HELD : (i) that the defendant had a right of distress damage feasant, and was entitled to a lien on the heifer in respect of the damage sustained until compensation for such damage and a proper sum in respect of the keep of the heifer was paid or tendered.

(ii) that, however unreasonable or inappropriate may have been the amount or nature of the defendant's demand, it was the duty of the plaintiff to estimate the proper amount of compensation and to tender that amount to the defendant, and, therefore, the plaintiff's claim failed.

APPEAL by the plaintiff from an order of His Honour JUDGE CLEMENTS, sitting at Maidstone County Court, dated Feb. 25, 1949, dismissing the plaintiff's claim for £35 damages for wrongful conversion of a heifer. The Court of Appeal dismissed the appeal. The facts appear in the judgment of BUCKNILL, L.J.

H. G. Garland for the plaintiff.
Boydell for the defendant.

BUCKNILL, L.J. : This is an appeal from an order of His Honour JUDGE CLEMENTS dismissing the plaintiff's claim for £35, the value of a heifer. The plaintiff alleged that on Oct. 23, 1948, the defendant seized and took possession of the heifer, that on or about Oct. 26, the plaintiff by his servants orally demanded the return of the heifer by the defendant, but that the defendant refused to deliver it up and thereby converted it to his own use and deprived the plaintiff of it. The third allegation was that the defendant so negligently treated the heifer that it went mad and died on or about Oct. 30. The defendant, by his defence, alleged that on Oct. 23 the heifer was wrongfully in the defendant's close, doing damage there to the defendant, and that he seized and took the heifer as a distress for the damage and impounded it in a barn. On Oct. 27 the plaintiff by his servants demanded the return of the heifer, but, neither at the time of making the demand nor at any time prior to the heifer's death, did the plaintiff tender any compensation to the defendant for the damage caused by the heifer, nor make, nor offer to make, to the defendant payment for the reasonable cost of the food and water supplied by the defendant to the heifer. Then there is a denial of negligence.

The short history of this unfortunate heifer is that in October the plaintiff, who is a farmer and a stock dealer, bought her at market and took it to his farm. On Oct. 22 in the early morning the heifer strayed on to the railway line which abuts on both the plaintiff's and the defendant's farms. The defendant drove the heifer off the line at a level crossing, and she was taken possession of again by the plaintiff's servants, and the defendant at the time complained about the heifer. Notwithstanding that episode, in the evening of the same day the heifer again got on to the railway line, this time causing much inconvenience and stopping a train. It was getting dark, and the defendant, rightly I think, in the interests of the heifer and of the common safety of people using the line drove her off the line and into a field of his, described as a stubble field.

The first point which arises is this : Did the defendant, in doing that, commit any wrong with regard to the plaintiff's heifer ? Did he wrongfully take possession of her ? My answer to that is that he did not. What he did was done in the interests of the plaintiff and his property as well as of the safety of the public. He put her in this field, which the county court judge has described as a place of "comparative safety," and, when last seen that night by the light of a torch, the heifer was sleeping peacefully in the field. Unfortunately, either during the night or in the early morning of Oct. 23, the heifer got out of the stubble field, crossed a public highway, and strayed into another field of the defendant's, and on the morning of the 23rd the defendant saw her grazing in the field where also were cattle of his own T.T. herd. That was very discomforting for the defendant, because he was careful to keep his herd free from all possible infection. So this time, instead of putting the heifer back into the stubble field or on the road, he put her in his barn. He gave her hay and water, but he did not communicate with the plaintiff and tell him that his heifer was in the barn. On the morning of the 27th the plaintiff, having found out where the heifer was and having tried to communicate with the defendant on the telephone without success, sent two men with a lorry to collect her. There is a slight divergence in the evidence as to what happened at the interview between the defendant and these two men, but the county court judge says that he prefers the evidence of the defendant on that point. The judge's note of the evidence is as follows :

> "On the 27th, the plaintiff's men came to ask for the heifer. I met Burnham [one of the plaintiff's men]. He said he had come for the beast. I said : 'I want £2 for salvage, 1*s.* per day keep.' Never calculated. Burnham said he had no money, and referred me to the lorry driver. I repeated to the lorry driver what I had said to Burnham. He said : 'You will have to send in a bill.' I expostulated about the matter and said I could not trust their master. I said I wanted to be paid before I let her go. He said he would pay for the keep. I said I wanted to be paid the whole amount. He did not produce any money. No money offered . . . 10*s.* 0*d.* and 3*s.* 0*d.* was not mentioned. I sent him back to get the money, £2 and keep—whatever keep amounted to—not then calculated."

On that interview it seems to me that the second point arises in this case, namely, whether the defendant wrongfully refused to give the heifer up. The county court judge in his judgment says:

> "No actual money was offered to the defendant for the keep or damage. The defendant told the men to go and get the whole of the money, keep and compensation. It was open to the men to do one of two things—hand the defendant [a shilling] a day for keep, or go away and return and tender the keep money. It had been argued that they should be excused because they were told to go and get the money. There was never in this case any kind of offer to pay any sum at all, and, therefore, no legal tender."

During the argument a discussion took place as to the use of the word "salvage." Strictly speaking, salvage is not a recognised head of claim in the common law as it is at sea. I need only refer to the judgment of Bowen, L.J., in Falcke v. Scottish Imperial Insurance Co. (1) to show what the position is. He said (34 Ch.D. 248) : A

> "The general principle is, beyond all question, that work and labour done or money expended by one man to preserve or benefit the property of another do not according to English law create any lien upon the property saved or benefited, nor, even if standing alone, create any obligation to repay the expenditure. Liabilities are not to be forced upon people behind their backs any more than you can confer a benefit upon a man against his will." B

Unfortunately, although it is admitted that the defendant asked for salvage, there is no evidence in the note to show that he was asked what he included in that word. There is no evidence that he made any claim for damage apart from salvage, and I think he clearly would be entitled to damage, if he could prove it—damage, for instance, done by the heifer in getting into this field and grazing, and possible damage to the herd. But, assuming that the defendant put forward a claim for salvage which was not recognised by the law, I think that the cases establish that it was the duty of the plaintiff to make a tender in respect of damage done by the animal. He never made a tender, and until the tender was made I think the defendant was justified in keeping the heifer in the barn. C D

The third point is whether the defendant was negligent in keeping the heifer in the barn for a week before she died. It is for the plaintiff to prove that the defendant was negligent, and that the death of the beast was the result of that negligence. That is a question of fact, and the judge has come to the conclusion, as he says in his judgment, that "the plaintiff has not proved that the animal died as a result of the defendant's fault." For these reasons, in my judgment, this appeal should be dismissed. E

COHEN, L.J. : I agree. On the question whether the right of distress damage feasant had accrued to the defendant, I have nothing to add to what has been said by my Lord. That being so, the question is whether the refusal to deliver up the heifer on Oct. 27, gave the plaintiff a cause of action. The plaintiff was entitled to delivery of the heifer on making tender of the proper amount of compensation for damage. The judge has found that no tender was made. Counsel for the appellant first submitted that no damage was proved. It is true that there is no express record of any evidence as to damage or any reference to damage in the judgment, but I think it is a clear inference from the judgment that the judge was satisfied that there was sufficient damage to make a tender necessary. On any other basis it was unnecessary for him to go into the question of tender, but, as an alternative to his first submission, counsel for the appellant submitted that his client was relieved of the obligation to tender by the excessive demands on the part of the defendant, which he said were not only excessive in amount, but excessive in quality—that is to say, that he demanded compensation and keep when he was only entitled to damages. F G H

In support of that argument he relied on the observations of Scrutton, L.J., in Albemarle Supply Co. v. Hind & Co., (2). The observations in question are sufficiently recorded in the headnote. The Lord Justice said:

> "A person claiming a lien must either claim it for a definite amount > or give the owner particulars from which he himself can calculate the amount for which a lien is due. The owner must then, in the absence of express agreement, tender an amount covering the lien really existing. If he does not, unless excused, he has no answer to a claim of lien. He may be excused from tendering (a) if he has no knowledge, or means of knowledge, of the right amount; or (b) if the person claiming the lien A for a wrong cause or amount makes it clear that he will not release the goods unless his full claim is satisfied, and that claim is wrongful. The fact that the claim is made for more than the right amount does not matter unless the claimant gives no particulars from which the right amount can be calculated, or makes it clear that he insists on the full amount of the right claimed."

B That was a case, not of a right of distress damage feasant, but of the lien of a repairer who had done repairs to a car, a lien arising out of a contract and not a right arising out of the tort of the party against whom the lien was sought to be asserted, but counsel said that there was reason to think that the two rights were on a par, and he referred us to British Empire Shipping Co. v. C Somes (3) where the question that arose was as to the right of a ship repairer to claim £21 a day for the use of the dock during detention. LORD CAMPBELL, C.J., in giving the judgment of the court, said (E.B. & E. 366):

> "Although the lord of a manor be entitled to amends for the keep of a horse which he has seized as an estray (Henly v. Welch (4), the distrainor of goods which have been replevied cannot claim any lien upon them: D Bradyll v. Ball (5). So, where a horse was distrained to compel an appearance in a hundred court, it was held that, after appearance, the plaintiff could not justify detaining the horse for his keep. If cattle are distrained damage feasant, and impounded in a pound overt, the owner of the cattle must feed them; if in a pound covert or close, 'the cattle are to be sustained with meat and drink at the peril of him that distraineth, and he shall not E have any satisfaction therefore'."

That case would only, I think, go to this, that there would be no obligation to tender for keep. Indeed, counsel has called our attention to the fact that the right for claim for keep did not arise until 1854 (Cruelty to Animals Act, 1854), and then it was only a statutory right giving right to a summary F remedy and not a right to distrain for the amount due, but, despite the similarity, it seems to be clearly established by authority that there is a radical difference in one respect, and that is in respect of the question of the onus of fixing the amount which must be tendered in order to give the distrainee the right to return of the property on which the distraint has been levied. That distinction seems to be clearly established by the decision in Gulliver G v. Cosens (6). The actual decision in that case was as to the right of a distrainee, who had satisfied an excessive demand in order to recover his goods, to recover the amount thus paid in excess as money had and received to his use, but, in giving the judgment of the court, TINDAL, C.J., expressed an opinion on the wider point which is relevant here. He said (1 C.B. 796):

> "It appears to me that, when the present plaintiff found he was too H late to make a tender, so as to entitle himself to replevy the sheep and to succeed in an action of replevin, his proper course was, to make a tender of sufficient amends to cover the damage sustained; and, in the event of the defendant refusing to accept the sum tendered, and deliver up the sheep, he should have brought detinue; for, they were held by the defendant merely as a pledge. In that case, the hazard of the sufficiency of the tender would fall, as it ought to do, on the owner of the cattle. It has been urged that here a tender was unnecessary, inasmuch as the > sum demanded for compensation was exorbitant : that argument, however, as it seems to me, is answered by saying that the risk of determining the real amount of damage, is not by law imposed upon the defendant. This I should be disposed to hold upon principle, and independently of the authority of Lindon v. Hooper (7), which I am unable to get over, and which I am not aware has been overruled ; and, though cases have occurred in which it has been decided that an excessive demand dispenses A with a tender, yet those were cases where the law made it incumbent on the defendant correctly to ascertain the amount of his demand."

That case was approved and applied in the Court of Exchequer Chamber in Glynn v. Thomas (8) where COLERIDGE, J., in giving the judgment of the court, said (11 Exch. 877): B

> "In Gulliver v. Cosens (6) the court assumed the sum demanded for the damage to have been excessive, but laid it down that the plaintiff, being the original wrong-doer, was still bound to tender the sum which he alleged to be sufficient ; and in the present case the plaintiff, for the same reason was equally bound to make the tender." C

Those two cases seem to me to lay down a rule which we are bound to follow, and I do not think that it makes any difference in principle that the demand in the present case was excessive, or may have been excessive, not only in quantity but in quality. Had the plaintiff paid the amount demanded and sought to recover it as money had and received, the fact that there was an excessive demand in quality might have afforded a ground, notwithstanding D the decision in Gulliver v. Cosens (6), on which he would have been entitled to recover the amount paid as money had and received. It does not seem to me that an excessive demand, even in quality, relieves the plaintiff of the duty, which the county court judge has found he did not perform, of making a proper tender. It has been suggested that Gulliver v. Cosens (6) might not be followed, in so far as it held that the action for money had and received E would not lie. That suggestion is to be found in GLANVILLE WILLIAMS ON LIABILITY FOR ANIMALS, p. 116, but there is nothing to suggest that in so far as the case laid down that the onus of making a proper tender was on the plaintiff, it was not still the law. Indeed, it seems to be the view of the author, expressed on p. 114, that the law in this respect is as laid down in Gulliver v. Cosens (6). For these reasons, I agree that the appeal should be F dismissed.

ASQUITH, L.J. : I also agree and will only add a sentence or two on the question whether tender was excused. Gulliver v. Cosens (6) decides directly no more than that, where the rightful distrainor demands, as a condition of releasing the animal, more money than he is entitled to as compensation G for the damage done, and the owner of the animal pays this exorbitant sum, the latter cannot recover back the excess as money had and received, at any rate, where a pound is a common pound, but it affirms very clearly the principle that, however extortionate the demand of the distrainor for compensation in point of quantum this does not excuse the owner from the duty which lies on him, as a tortfeasor, of forming an estimate of the amount of damage H and making a tender of that amount. If he omits to do this, the continued detention of the animal by the distrainor is lawful, provided it was originally so. Is the position the same when the distrainor's demand is not for an extortionate quantum of compensation for damage done, but for payment in respect of something wholly distinct from compensation for damage, for instance, a reward for his services in rescuing the animal from a position of danger ? If it is, then the defendant should succeed ; if not, he fails. Here the defendant claimed what he called "salvage", something, strictly speaking, not in law recoverable for services rendered on land at all. Salvage by land is a legal chimera. Does this alter the position and excuse tender ? No direct authority on the point has been brought to our notice, and perhaps none exists. For myself, I think the principle underlying Gulliver v. Cosens (6), which was affirmed by the Exchequer Chamber in Glynn v. Thomas (8) both as to what it actually decided and as to the reasoning upon which it proceeded, is that the owner of the animal must estimate the damage and tender the estimated amount, whatever the nature of the distrainor's money demand, whether in relation to the quantity or the quality of that demand. It is just as unreasonable to require the owner to make such a tender where the actual damage amounts to 1*s.* 0*d.* and the distrainor demands in respect of such damage £100 as to require him to make a tender where the damage is £100 and he demands £100, but claims it under the inappropriate title of "salvage." Yet, if the distinction insisted upon by counsel for the appellant was upheld, and the owner made no tender, in the first case the distrainor would be within his rights in continuing the detention, and, in the second, he would not. He would have forfeited his right. Counsel was unable to cite any authority which decided, directly or indirectly, that the owner of the animal distrained is ever excused from making a tender by any kind of demand made by the distrainor.

The rule laid down in Gulliver v. Cosens (6) is harsh, and, it may be, unreasonable. But it certainly impresses the type of lien involved in distress damage feasant with a totally different character from an ordinary contractual lien such as was in issue in Albemarle Supply Co., Ltd. v. Hind & Co. (2), which was relied on by the appellant. But it seems to me to have been part of our law for centuries that no demand made by the distrainor can excuse the owner of the animal from tendering a sum estimated by himself as equivalent to the damage the animal has done. This was not done in the present case. For these reasons I think the appeal should be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

NATIONAL COAL BOARD v. HORNBY AND OTHERS.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Vaisey, J.), July 20, 21, 22, 29, 1949.]

Mines—Coal mine—Farm—Option to purchase granted to colliery concern—Acquisition of assets of colliery concern by National Coal Board—Purported exercise of option by National Coal Board—Coal Industry Nationalisation Act, 1946 (c. 59), ss. 5 (1) (2), 7, sched. I, pts. I, II, paras. 9, 14, sched. II.

On Apr. 4, 1938, F. entered into an agreement with the L. Co. (which was at all material times a colliery concern within the meaning of the Coal Industry Nationalisation Act, 1946, s. 63) by which it was provided that, in consideration of a yearly sum of £10 payable to F. by the L. Co., the L. Co. was to have the option to purchase at any time within ten years from the date thereof certain land and buildings known as N.L. Farm (which was a "farm" within para. 25 of sched. I to the said Act). Clause 3 of the agreement provided that the option was to be exercised by the L. Co.'s giving notice in writing to F., and thereupon F. was to be deemed to have agreed to the purchase of N.L. Farm for £13,000, to be completed within six weeks of the receipt of the notice. The agreement made no reference to the executors, administrators or assigns of F. or to the assigns of the L. Co. On May 4, 1945, F. conveyed N.L. Farm by way of gift to his son and daughter, H. and M., who acquired the property with full knowledge of the agreement of Apr. 4, 1938. By the Coal Industry Nationalisation Act, 1946, ss. 5-9, provision was made for the transference of the assets of colliery concerns to the National Coal Board. Certain classes of assets, described in sched. I, pt. I, were, by s. 5 (1) of the Act, vested automatically in the board on Jan. 1, 1947 ; other assets, indicated in sched. I, pt. II, and including interests in farms, were, by s. 5 (2), to vest at the option of the National Coal Board or the owners of the assets on the service of a notice by one on the other ; and further assets vested under s. 5 (3) on certain other conditions. No notice was served by the board under s. 5 (2), but by notice in writing to F. dated Feb. 18, 1948, the board purported to exercise the option under the deed of Apr. 4, 1938, and they now claimed specific performance of the agreement for sale which they submitted was so constituted. Evidence was given on behalf of the L. Co. that the company assumed and admitted that its rights and interests under the deed of Apr. 4, 1938, had passed to the board.

Held : on the evidence, the L. Co. entered into the agreement of 1938 for the purposes of coal industry activities, and its interest was held " for the purpose of having land available for use for coal industry or transferred allied activities " within the meaning of para. 9 of pt. I of sched. I to the Act, and, therefore, the interest could have passed under s. 5 (1) ; the agreement was a contract within s. 7 of the Act and sched. II to it, and, therefore, " had effect in favour of and against the board " so as to place the board in the shoes of the L. Co. for the purpose of enforcing the agreement ; and, although the N.L. farm was property within pt. II of sched. I passing only on notice, as the L. Co. had agreed that the property had passed it was unnecessary to determine under which provision it had so passed, and specific performance should be decreed.

Action by the National Coal Board for specific performance of an agreement for the sale of a farm which the board alleged was constituted on the giving of a notice to purchase in the purported exercise by the board of an option granted to a colliery concern under an agreement dated Apr. 4, 1938. Vaisey, J., granted the relief sought. The facts are set out in the judgment and are summarised in the headnote.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 29. VAISEY, J., read the following judgment. The origin of this action is an agreement in writing dated Apr. 4, 1938, and made between the first defendant, Francis Hornby (therein and hereinafter called " the grantor "), of the one part, and the Lilleshall Co., Ltd. (therein and hereinafter called "the company"), of the other part. I will at this point observe that the company is and was at all material times a "colliery concern" within the meaning of that expression as used in the Coal Industry Nationalisation Act, 1946, (see s. 63 (1)) which Act I will call "the Coal Act" or "the Act", that is, it is a company whose business includes the working of coal as more particularly defined in s. 63 (1) of the Act. I understand also that it had other activities in addition to those which constitute it a colliery concern. This fact may have some relevance to the matter in issue.

By cl. 1 of the said agreement it was declared and provided that in consideration of a yearly sum of £10 payable as therein mentioned by them to him the grantor thereby gave to the company an option to purchase at any time within ten years from the date thereof at the price of £13,000 the property described in the schedule thereto. That property consisted of certain lands and buildings at Lilleshall, in Shropshire, known as New Lodge Farm, comprising an area of about 329 acres. It is, in fact, a farm within the definition contained in para. 25 of sched. I to the Act. Clause 2 of the agreement prescribed the method of payment of the said sum of £10, and cl. 3 contains provisions to the following effect. The option was to be exercised by the company giving notice in writing to the grantor, and on that being done the grantor was to be deemed to have agreed to the purchase of the property at the price aforesaid. The purchase money was to be paid and the purchase completed within six weeks of the receipt of the notice by the grantor. An abstract of the grantor's title to the property was to be delivered within seven days of the receipt of the notice. Vacant possession of the property was to be given to the company on completion, but the company was on completion to let to the second defendant, Frank Hornby (son of the grantor), and the grantor was to procure the said Frank Hornby to take, the said property (other than any part thereof which might then be required by the company for its immediate purposes) from year to year at the yearly rent of £500 (or at a reduced rent proportionate to the acreage let if any part should be so required by the company as aforesaid), and otherwise on the terms and conditions of a tenancy agreement to be prepared by the company's solicitors and to contain in addition to the usual terms and conditions a provision authorising the company to resume possession on giving one month's notice in writing of any part of the said property for any purpose in connection with the company's business or for the purpose of building or estate development or for any other purpose not being the use of the property for agriculture. Certain provisions as to compensation for improvements are set out in the said clause, and the Law Society's conditions of sale (1934 ed.) are made applicable subject to the express terms of the agreement. There are further provisions in the said agreement to which it is unnecessary for me to refer. I have next to mention a deed of gift dated May 4, 1945, and made between the grantor, of the one part, and the second defendant and his sister, the third defendant, Muriel Hornby, of the other part, whereby the said property was conveyed to the second and third defendants in fee simple. It is not disputed that the second and third defendants acquired the property with full notice of the said agreement, which, somewhat surprisingly, makes no reference at all either to the executors, administrators or assigns of the grantor or to the assigns of the company.

The plaintiffs, the National Coal Board, were established by s. 1 and 2 of the Coal Act, and it is hardly necessary for me to state the general nature of their functions, rights and duties. They are matter of common knowledge. By a notice in writing dated Feb. 18, 1948, and served on the first defendant on or shortly after that day, the plaintiffs exercised or purported to exercise the option granted by the said agreement and require the first defendant to convey the said property to the plaintiffs in accordance with the provisions of the agreement. They claim specific performance of the agreement for sale constituted by the said agreement and the before-mentioned notice. They also originally claimed damages, but abandoned that claim at the trial. Their only other claim is for the costs of the action.

The right of the plaintiffs to the relief which they seek would appear to rest entirely on the provisions of the Coal Act and on the proper method of applying those provisions to the said agreement of Apr. 4, 1938. The company is and was, as I have said, a colliery concern, and the substantial question for my decision may be shortly stated as being the question whether the plaintiffs, having served the notice of Feb. 18, 1948, are entitled to enforce the rights and are liable to be subjected to the obligations which the company could have enforced and would have been liable to be subject to under the said agreement of Apr. 4, 1938, in accordance with its terms if the Coal Act had not been passed. The notice was admittedly served and received within the proper time and no point has been, or probably could have been, taken that the notice should have been served on the second and third defendants instead of or in addition to the first defendant. The defendants resist the plaintiffs' claim, not on the ground, but for the reason (as I must suppose), that they think that the property is now worth more than £13,000, or, possibly, they are actuated by some sentimental or similar considerations. Their case is wholly unmeritorous in the sense that they would admittedly have been bound by the agreement if the Coal Act has not been passed and would have had no defence if an action similar to the present had been brought against them by the company. Their case depends on their establishing that the provisions of the Act have incidentally and fortuitously invalidated the agreement by discharging them from their obligations thereunder. The plaintiffs, on the other hand, say that they have, under and by virtue of the Act, become and now are the successors in title of the company and stand in the place of the company for all the relevant purposes of the agreement. The case for the defendants has been argued with much force and ingenuity by their counsel who has led me through the tortuous mazes of the Coal Act with the object of proving that the plaintiffs are not the company's successors in title for the relevant purposes of such succession. He argues that their title is defective or non-existent, or that, at any rate, it has not been proved.

The plaintiffs, by s. 1 (1) of the Coal Act, are on and after a date defined in the Act as the primary vesting date (which was Jan. 1, 1947*) charged with, among other duties, that of working and getting the coal in Great Britain to the exclusion of every other person and company. To enable them to discharge that duty, the assets of the so-called colliery concerns are transferred to them under the extremely elaborate provisions of a fasciculus of sections (ss. 5 to 9 inclusive) of the Act. The scheme may be briefly stated. Certain assets or classes of assets, described in pt. I of sched. I to the Act, are to vest in the plaintiffs automatically on the primary vesting date : see s. 5 (1). Other assets or classes of assets, described in pt. II of the same schedule, are so to vest at the option of either the owners thereof or the plaintiffs exercisable by the service of a notice on the other of them : see s. 5 (2) ; and further assets or classes of assets (described in pts. III and IV of sched. I) are so to vest under conditions which I need not specify : see s. 5 (3) and (4).

The main contention of the defendants is that the company's interest in the said agreement of Apr. 4, 1938, is an asset which falls within pt. II of sched. I and has never vested in the plaintiffs for the reason that neither the company nor the plaintiffs have ever served the other with the requisite option notice. The defendants point to para. 14 in the said pt. II, which refers to "interests of colliery concerns in farms." They say that New Lodge Farm is unquestionably a farm, and they say that the agreement of Apr. 4, 1938, conferred an interest in a farm on the company. In support of this proposition they cite the well-known authorities of London & South Western Ry. Co. v. Gomm (1) and Woodall v. Clifton (2), and they say that the requisite notice under s. 5 (2) of the Coal Act has never been served. This last fact the plaintiffs admit, and I will say at once that the omission is, in my judgment, extremely regrettable and not at all easy to explain or justify. The reference to farms in para. 14 of pt. II of sched. I to the Act cannot have escaped the notice of the officials and legal advisers of the plaintiffs. The service of the appropriate notice would, it is true, have been a purely formal act, but it would have placed the matter beyond the reach of controversy and would have made it almost certain that this action would never have been brought. It would have established the plaintiffs' rights and freed them from the technical objection on which the defendants have placed reliance. The service of the notice ex abundanti cautela was so obvious and so simple a precaution that I confess surprise that the plaintiffs did not take it. I might go so far as to say that I think they were careless, but they may have grounds of legitimate excuse of which I am not informed. The plaintiffs' case may be stated as follows. They say that the company's rights and interests under the agreement of Apr. 4, 1938, have passed to them either as comprised in pt. I of sched. I, or, alternatively, by the operation of s. 7 of the Act. That section provides that the contracts mentioned in sched. II to the Act shall have effect in favour of or against the plaintiffs as and to the extent therein mentioned. The plaintiffs say that the agreement of Apr. 4, 1938, is such a contract.

* see Coal Industry Nationalisation (Primary Vesting Date) Order, 1946, (S.R. & O., 1946, No. 1986.)

Now, I have come to the conclusion that the Act in its application to that agreement contains provisions which are to some extent both contradictory and cumulative. If s. 5 (2) and pt. II of sched. I had stood alone, the company's interest under the said agreement would plainly, in my judgment, have come within their ambit, but I would say the same if s. 5 (1) and pt. I of sched. I had stood alone, and if s. 7 and sched. II had stood alone. The contention that the agreement must fall to be dealt with either under s. 5 (2), or under s. 5 (1), or under s. 7, and that those alternatives are mutually exclusive in the sense that it cannot be held to fall within more than one of them may be, and I think is, true in one sense, and, if a case arose as between the plaintiffs and a colliery concern which made it of importance to decide the question into which compartment (so to speak) of the concern's cupboard-full of assets a particular item of property such as the agreement of Apr. 4, 1938, had to be placed, then in such circumstances the question would have to be faced and decided. But if the colliery concern and the plaintiffs choose to treat such an asset as coming under any one or two of the three possible heads, and as excluded from the others or other of such heads, I do not see why the choice could not be effectively made. Have the plaintiffs and the company in the present case made such a joint election and chosen to put the agreement into s. 5 (1) or into s. 7, or one of them, and to exclude it from s. 5 (2) ?

Counsel for the plaintiffs alleged, but has not proved, that there is a document in the form of a schedule of assets which plainly establishes that they have done so. It is a matter for great regret and some comment that such evidence was not produced at an early stage of the proceedings, but, in the absence of evidence, I cannot accept that contention in that form. Witnesses were, however, called before me whose testimony, and, indeed, whose very presence in the witness-box, suffices to satisfy me that the company has assumed and admits, and could not now be heard to deny, that its rights and interests under the agreement have passed from it to the plaintiffs. The witnesses in question include a Mr. Fielden, who has been a director of the company since 1933 ; a Mr. Willis Brown, who was manager of the company from March, 1936, until 1940, when he became joint managing director, becoming sole managing director in 1945 ; and a Mr. Machin, who held responsible positions in the company in and after 1938. If the company had wished at any time to assert that its interests under the agreement of Apr. 4, 1938, were only to pass to the plaintiffs in the event of the service of an option notice under s. 5 (2) of the Act, I think it is now far too late for them to do so. I am satisfied by the A evidence that the company entered into the agreement in the course of or for the purposes of coal industry activities as defined in the Act, and that its interest thereunder was acquired and held for the purpose of having land available for use for coal industry or transferred allied activities as so defined.

So holding, I come to the conclusion that the matter is, or can be and has been, brought within para. 9 of pt. I of sched. I to the Act. Other relevant B paragraphs in that Part are paras. 1 and 2 : see also para. 22 in pt. V ; and it further follows (as it seems to me) that the agreement of Apr. 4, 1938, is a contract coming within s. 7 of the Act and para. I of sched. II to the Act, and I think that it has effect in favour of and against the plaintiffs to the extent requisite for placing them in the shoes of the company for the purposes for which they seek to be so placed. The agreement is a composite document. C It creates interests in coal-bearing land ; it creates interests in a farm ; and it is a contract. It is, therefore, a document which is not easy to place, or which is, perhaps, too easy to place. It seems to be doubly or trebly qualified —that is, qualified for entry into more than one compartment of the cupboard to which I have metaphorically referred. The complexities of the Act are very great, and offer a congenial and fruitful field for dialectical discussion, but the D basic fact remains (as I believe and hold) that the agreement was entered into by the company for the ultimate purpose of getting coal. The property lies in the middle of seams which were being and were intended to be worked by the company. It was, and is, a part of their undertaking as colliery proprietors. It would be a remarkable result if the omission to serve an option notice under s. 5 (2) of the Act had left this interest suspended in the air when all the other colliery E assets of the company had passed to the plaintiffs. If necessary, I suppose, the company could, for the purpose of quieting the plaintiffs' title, execute a confirmatory assurance of some kind in their favour, though I should have thought it quite unnecessary for them to do so. I decree specific performance of the agreement for the sale of the premises to the plaintiffs.

Decree of specific performance granted. Each party to bear his own costs down F to and including the order. Defendants to pay the costs thereafter.

KAHLER v. MIDLAND BANK, LTD.

[ouse of Lords (Lord Simonds, Lord Normand, Lord MacDermott, Lord Reid and Lord Radcliffe), June 21, 22, October 20, 1949.]

nkers—Deposit of securities—Canadian securities held by Czech bank in safe custody for customer—Deposit by Czech bank with London bank—Right of customer of Czech bank to demand delivery from London bank without consent of Czech bank—Release, or transfer into another name, of foreign securities in safe custody prohibited by Czechoslovak exchange control regulations.

In 1938 the appellant, who was at that time a Czechoslovak national resident in Prague, became a customer of the Z. bank in Prague, and on Dec. 28, 1938, the Z. bank wrote to him informing him that, by order of his former bankers, they were crediting him with certain securities (including 800 share certificates, equivalent to bearer securities, in a Canadian company) in the deposit account which they had opened for him. The share certificates, which had been bought by the appellant some years earlier on the London Stock Exchange through bankers in Zurich, were noted in the letter of Dec. 28, 1938, as being " domiciled " in London.

On Jan. 16, 1939, the Z. bank wrote to the respondents, the Midland Bank Ltd., in London, asking them to " receive for our account . . . and place . . . into our depot with your . . . selves, crediting us for same under advice to us," certain shares, including 1,164 shares in the Canadian company, 800 of which were those held by the Z. bank in safe custody for the appellant. The Z. bank did not, however, refer to the appellant in this letter, nor did they state that they were holding the shares on behalf of a third party. On the printed form, amended in typescript, sent by the respondents to the Z. bank on Feb. 6, 1939, acknowledging the latter's instructions, the respondents referred to the Z. bank as their " customer " in the transaction and there was no reference to the appellant. After the occupation of Czechoslovakia by the German forces in March, 1939, the appellant wished to leave the country, and, to obtain a permit to leave, he was compelled by the Germans to hand over to them all his assets in Czechoslovakia, including his rights in regard to the Canadian shares. To effect this, his account was transferred from the Z. bank to the B. bank, which was under German control (a transaction which was later ratified and accepted by the appellant), and on Apr. 17, 1939, the Z. bank wrote to the respondents asking them to withdraw from the Z. bank's securities account with the respondents 800 of the Canadian shares and to place them " into the depot of " the B. bank with the respondents. The letter of Apr. 17, 1939, went on to state : " This transfer is made by order and for account of the owner of these shares, Mr. V.K. [the appellant] who transfers his securities account from our bank to [the B. bank]. The ownership of the shares remains unchanged." On receipt of this letter, the respondents, on May 11, 1939, sent to the B. bank, advising them of the " receipt for your account " of the shares described, a form similar to the one sent to the Z. bank on Feb. 6, but the form of May 11 contained the name of the appellant as the " owner." The respondents did not communicate with the appellant at all. In May, 1946, the appellant's rights vis-a-vis the B. bank were restored by the Czechoslovak authorities, but under the Czechoslovak law (similar exchange control regulations having been in operation in that country at all material times) any transfer of foreign securities from or to a Czech resident without the permission of the Czechoslovak National Bank was unlawful (the word " transfer " being defined in the relevant Act as including release, or transfer into another name, of securities in safe custody). The appellant had ceased to be a Czech resident, as he had left Czechoslovakia about Apr. 1, 1939, but the B. bank was a Czech resident for the purposes of the regulation and the Czechoslovak National Bank had refused their consent to the delivery of the shares to the appellant. In an action by the appellant asking for an order on the respondents to hand over the shares to him, the appellant based his claim (a) ex contractu, and (b), alternatively, in detinue, on the ground that he was absolutely entitled to the shares. The respondents contended (a) that there was no contract between them and the appellant, because the B. bank, and not the appellant, was their customer, and (b) that the appellant's claim in detinue could not succeed, as he was not entitled to immediate possession of the shares, the National Bank having refused consent to the transfer to him of the shares.

Held : (i) the appellant had failed to establish any contractual relationship between himself and the respondents.

(ii) (Lord MacDermott and Lord Reid dissenting) as the Czech exchange control regulations were in force at all material times and under those regulations it was illegal for a Czech bank to part with foreign securities in its custody without the consent of the Czechoslovak National Bank, even if the securities were at the date of the contract situate in some other country, it must be presumed that the law of Czechoslovakia was intended to govern the delivery of the shares on termination of the bailment between the appellant and the B. bank, and, therefore, as the consent of the National Bank had been withheld, the B. bank would be entitled to deny possession of the shares to the appellant ; and, as the English courts would not compel performance of a contract if by its proper law the performance was illegal, his claim in detinue failed, he having no right to immediate possession, and the respondents could not be compelled to deliver the shares to him.

Appeal by the plaintiff from a decision of the Court of Appeal (Scott, Asquith and Evershed, L.JJ.), dated April 19, 1948, and reported [1948] 1 All E.R. 811, reversing a decision of Macnaghten, J., dated June 4, 1947.

The appellant claimed to be absolutely entitled to certain share certificate which the respondents held for safe custody in the dossier of the Bohemia Discount Bank and Society of Credit, a Czechoslovak banking company, an asked for an order on the respondents to hand over the securities to him. e respondents resisted the order on the ground that their contract was not th the appellant but with the Czech bank, and, therefore, it was inconsistent th the terms of their contract and with banking practice to hand over the curities to the appellant except with the consent of the Czech bank. MAC-GHTEN, J., gave judgment for the appellant, but the respondents' appeal om his decision was allowed by the Court of Appeal. The House of Lords ORD MACDERMOTT and LORD REID dissenting) now upheld the decision of e Court of Appeal. The facts appear in the opinions of LORD NORMAND d LORD REID.

Salmon, K.C., and D. C. L. Potter for the appellant.

Sir Valentine Holmes, K.C., H. L. Parker and J. G. Foster for the respondents.

The House took time for consideration.

Oct. 20. The following opinions were read.

LORD SIMONDS: My Lords, the facts of this case are fully stated in e opinion which my noble and learned friend, LORD NORMAND, will deliver d I need not rehearse them. Nor, but for the fact that, as I understand, me of your Lordships do not concur in the view that this appeal should be smissed, should I have thought it necessary to add any words of my own. appears to me, my Lords, that the solution of this case depends on the view ich is taken of the relation in which the appellant stood, or must be deemed have stood, to the Bohemian Bank after that bank had succeeded the Zivno-enska Bank as the customer of, and bailor to, the Midland Bank in respect the securities which are the subject of this appeal. I advisedly say "stood must be deemed to have stood," for, whatever alternative contention might ve been open to the appellant, he has by his pleading, original, amended d re-amended, committed himself—and I do not doubt for very good reason mmitted himself—to the view that the securities were properly transferred om the depot of the Zivnostenska Bank to that of the Bohemian Bank with the idland Bank. This view of the transaction materially narrows the area of bate.

In the first place, I am clearly of opinion that the Court of Appeal was right holding that between the appellant and the Midland Bank there was no ntractual nexus. On this point there is no disagreement among your Lord-ips. But it is on the alternative plea that a difference arises. The appellant, ntract failing him, claims in detinue. The securities, he says, are his. Neither e Midland Bank nor the Bohemian Bank claims any beneficial interest in, or n over, them. The answer made by the bank is that that is not enough to pport a claim in detinue—the appellant must show also that he is entitled immediate possession, and that he cannot do, for the Midland Bank holds e securities in safe custody for the Bohemian Bank and that bank is entitled refuse delivery to the appellant. It is the validity of this answer which is in sue and it is, I think, a matter of regret that the appellant did not think fit bring before the court the Bohemian Bank whose answer it is. The question, wever, is the same whether the answer is made by the one bank or the other.

It becomes necessary then to examine the answer made by the Midland Bank. involves two propositions which are to some extent interdependent. The st is that under Czechoslovak law the Bohemian Bank cannot lawfully deliver e securities to the appellant; the second, that, therefore, their bailee, the idland Bank, ought not to be compelled by the courts of this country so to liver them up. The first of these propositions is clearly established by the idence of Dr. Hartmann, which does not appear to me to be open to challenge. is necessary only to say that the relevant law relating to foreign exchange, der which the delivery without a consent that was in fact withheld would be illegal, is not, in my opinion, a law of such a penal or confiscatory nature that it should be disregarded by the courts of this country. The second proposition presents greater difficulties. It involves the consideration of two matters —first, what were the terms of the contract of bailment between the appellant and the Bohemian Bank, and, second, what was the law governing its performance so far as that consisted of delivery of the securities on termination of the bailment.

First, as to the terms of the contract. Here, my Lords, we are, I think, in a region of artificiality. For though, as I have already said, the appellant is committed to the view that the securities were properly transferred to the depot of the Bohemian Bank with the Midland Bank, yet it remains to determine what as between him and the Bohemian Bank were the contractual terms. Herein lies the difficulty, but it appears to me that, admitting the proper transfer of the securities to the depot of the Bohemian Bank and alleging no other terms as between himself and that bank than had formerly obtained between himself and the Zivnostenska Bank, the appellant is driven to the admission that he is in the same position, no better and no worse, as he would be in if no transfer had taken place. What, then, would the position be if, on behalf, not of the Bohemian Bank but of the Zivnostenska Bank, the Midland Bank had pleaded that the appellant was not entitled to immediate possession because their bailors were entitled to refuse delivery ? This would depend, I think, on one thing only, viz., what is the proper law of the contract between the parties. If the proper law is the law of Czechoslovakia, I have no doubt that the defence is a valid one, for the courts of this country will not compel the performance of a contract if by its proper law performance is illegal. And it follows that it must be admitted as a good defence in an action of detinue that the bailor, whose bailee is sued, is entitled to deny possession to the plaintiff because it is illegal to give him possession.

What, then, is the proper law of the contract that was made with the Zivnostenska Bank and that I have assumed to have been renewed with the Bohemian Bank ? In my opinion, it was the law of Czechoslovakia. The contract was made in that country between an individual and a corporation both resident there. At the date of the contract and at the material times thereafter the law of Czechoslovakia included a law regulating transactions in foreign exchange substantially the same as that which prevailed at the date of the issue of the writ. At all material times it was illegal for the bank, Zivnostenska or Bohemian, to part with foreign securities in its custody without the consent of the National Bank or other proper authority, whether those securities were at the date of the contracts in fact situate in Czechoslovakia or in some other country. In these circumstances I cannot accede to the contention of the appellant that the proper law of the contract so far as it concerns the delivery of the securities is governed by the law of England or of any other country in which they may chance to be situate. I do not doubt that the appellant may have hoped to obtain some advantage by having his securities kept in London, but, whatever his hopes or fears, it is impossible to suppose either that the bank intended any other law than that of Czechoslovakia to govern the contract or that the appellant could impute any such intention to them. Why should they be presumed to subject themselves to a foreign law, whose application might make them liable to penalties under their own law ? And why should he be presumed to have made a contract in the faith that its performance would be governed by a foreign law when he must have known that the bank would by no means agree to submit to it ? On the other hand, it is easy to presume that a contract, clearly governed by the lex loci contractus in its interpretation and in all aspects of the rights and obligations it creates except that of delivery up, should in that aspect also be governed by the same law. I doubt whether your Lordships can get any assistance from the very numerous authorities on this branch of the law and I refrain from reviewing them. Ultimately the test is that stated in DICEY'S CONFLICT OF LAWS, 6th ed., p. 579, r. 136 :

> ". . . the . . . 'proper law of a contract' means the law . . . by which the parties intended, or may fairly be presumed to have intended, the contract to be governed . . ."

A I think that the fair presumption to be derived from the whole of the circumstances of the contract, unusual and artificial as they are, is that the parties intended the law of Czechoslovakia to govern it in all its aspects.

Coming to this conclusion, I must hold that the Bohemian Bank would be entitled to deny possession of the securities to the appellant so long as under B Czechoslovakian law it was lawfully forbidden to do so. If so, its bailee, the Midland Bank, should not be compelled in the absence of the Bohemian Bank to deliver them up. For these reasons, which will be amplified by some of your Lordships, I am of opinion that this appeal should be dismissed with costs.

LORD NORMAND : My Lords, this appeal involves questions of difficulty affecting the owner's right to delivery of securities, deposited in a London bank C by a bank in a foreign country the law of which under certain conditions restricts the disposal or transfer of possession of the securities. The action was begun in July, 1939, but proceedings were suspended during the war. In June, 1947, MACNAGHTEN, J., gave judgment in favour of the appellant and ordered the respondents to deliver to him the share certificates, which are the subject of his claim. This judgment was reversed by the Court of Appeal in April, 1948. D The action was pleaded both on contract and in detinue. The judgment of MACNAGHTEN, J., was a judgment in detinue, and I may say at once that I agree both with the Court of Appeal and with my noble and learned friend on the woolsack and my noble and learned friends who are yet to address the House and whose opinions I have had the advantage of reading in print that the appellant has failed to establish that there was privity of contract between E himself and the respondents.

The appellant was a native of Czechoslovakia who formerly resided in Prague. In March, 1927, or later, he bought on the London Stock Exchange through his bankers in Zurich shares of the Brazilian Traction Light and Power Co., Ltd. [a Canadian company]. The share certificates, which are for practical purposes bearer securities, remained in London. The Zurich bankers transferred F the shares from the credit of the appellant's account with them to the credit of Messrs. Petschek and Co., bankers in Prague. From time to time the appellant caused certain of his shares to be sold, and in January, 1937, the number owned by him was 800, which were then, as they still are, deposited with the respondents in London. On Dec. 28, 1938, the Zivnostenska Bank, Prague, which was taking over the business of Messsr. Petschek and Co., wrote a letter to the G appellant informing him that they were by order of Messrs. Petschek crediting him with certain listed securities in the deposit account which they had recently opened for him. The list of securities included the 800 Brazilian Traction Co. shares with which this appeal is concerned and they were noted in the list as "domiciled" in London. On Jan. 16, 1939, the Zivnostenska Bank wrote also to the respondents in London informing them that they would receive for H Zivnostenska's account from Messrs. Samuel Montagu and Co., London, by order of Messrs. Petschek, 1,164 Brazilian Traction shares (which, it is agreed, included the 800 owned by the appellant) and requesting the respondents to place them in the Zivnostenska's deposit with the respondents. In reply to this letter the respondents, on Feb. 6, 1939, sent to Zivnostenska a printed form stating that the Zivnostenska Bank was the "customer" and that specified shares including the 1,164 Brazilian Traction shares had been received from Samuel Montagu and Co., by order of Messrs. Petschek and Co. There was a blank space in which the name of the owner of the shares would have been inserted if known. These documents, it is common ground, evidence two contracts, first, a contract between the appellant and the Zivnostenska Bank, which now becomes his banker and his bailee for the securities, and, second, a contract between the Zivnostenska Bank and the respondents by which the respondents become the Zivnostenska Bank's bailees. In March, 1939, the Germans overran Czechoslovakia, and the appellant, who is of Jewish race, became a victim of their persecutions. I may pass over the details of the proceedings by which the appellant was forced to deposit with the Bohemian Discount and Credit Bank all securities which he possessed, including the shares in suit, and to authorise that bank to dispose of them in his name. The appellant signed a written " agreement " confirming this arrangement, but as it was signed under duress it is not binding on him. In return for his signature the appellant, on Apr. 2, 1939, was allowed to leave Czechoslovakia. He first resided in France and afterwards in the United States of America, of which he is now a naturalised citizen.

The next document is important. It is a letter from the Zivnostenska Bank to the respondents dated Apr. 17, 1939, and I quote its terms in full.

> " Dear Sirs, By the present we beg to request you to withdraw from our securities account with your goodselves 800 shares Brazilian Traction Light and Power Co., Ord. Cap. Stock No Par, using for this purpose the shares which were credited to our above account on Feb. 6, 1939/ref. B64318/—and to place same into the depot of the Bohemian Discount Bank and Society of Credit, Praha, with your goodselves. This transfer is made by order and for account of the owner of these shares, Mr. Viktor Kahler, Praha 11, Vaclav. nam. 55, who transfers his securities account from our bank to the Bohemian Discount Bank and Society of Credit, Praha. The ownership of the above shares remains unchanged. While crediting you for these shares on the securities account, we remain, Dear Sirs, Yours very truly, Zivnostenska Banka."

As a result of the receipt of that letter the respondents, on May 11, 1939, sent to the Bohemian Bank a printed form similar to that sent to the Zivnostenska Bank on Feb. 6. Some differences may be noted. The appellant is named as owner and his address in Prague is entered, and the document " advises the receipt for your account " of the 800 Brazilian Traction shares. No communication was sent by the respondents to the appellant at the time. There is no doubt that Zivnostenska's letter of Apr. 17 was part of the machinery by which the German government in Czechoslovakia and its agents carried into effect the agreement which they had forced the appellant to sign. Further steps were taken as the result of which the Bohemian Bank came to hold the securities, not for the appellant, but for the German authorities. The appellant now entered into correspondence with the respondents, seeking without success to obtain from them an undertaking not to part with the securities except with his consent. The respondents' attitude then was that they had received the securities from the Zivnostenska Bank without intimation that they were to be held to the appellant's order. On July 26 the appellant wrote to the Zivnostenka Bank purporting to determine its authority to hold his securities and a copy of this letter was sent by him to the respondents.

To complete the statement of the relevant facts as they stood at the raising of this action I must now deal with the Czechoslovakian exchange regulations which the respondents allege, and the Court of Appeal has found, to be an impediment to the delivery of the securities in suit. Among the proved documents is a translation of the material paragraphs of the Czechoslovakian Foreign Exchange Act, No. 92 of 1946, and it is proved that regulations having the same effect have been in force in Czechoslovakia since 1934. The regulations made it unlawful and a punishable offence to transfer, without the permission of the Czechoslovakian National Bank, foreign securities

> "... from a currency inlander to a currency foreigner into his ownership, as a pledge or for any other reason and by whatever way (book transfer, placing into safe custody, transfer of securities in safe custody into another name, release, etc.) ..."

A or,

> "... from a currency foreigner to a currency inlander into his ownership, as a pledge or for any other reason ..."

or:

> "... from a currency inlander to a currency inlander, as a pledge or for > B any other reason."

Dr. Hartmann, a Czechoslovakian lawyer of experience, gave evidence about the meaning and effect of these regulations. His evidence is that "currency inlanders" are persons who have their normal residence in Czechoslovakia and have lived there for at least one year, and that all other persons are currency C foreigners. The appellant was, therefore, a currency inlander till Apr. 2, 1939, and he was thereafter a currency foreigner. Dr. Hartmann deponed also that, at the time when the securities were placed in the depot of the Zivnostenska Bank of the Midland Bank, the Zivnostenska Bank could not have delivered them to the appellant without the consent of the National Bank, because the Zivnostenska Bank and the appellant were at that time both currency inlanders, D and that after the appellant left Czechoslovakia and became a currency foreigner they could still not be delivered to him by a bank in Czechoslovakia without the consent of the National Bank. Under cross-examination he said that the word "transfer" in the regulations was not a matter of title but included a transfer of possession. There was no counter evidence, and Dr. Hartmann's evidence must be accepted as conclusive evidence of the law applicable in E Czechoslovakia to the transfer of possession of foreign securities.

In answer to the appellant's claim for a declaration that he was the owner of and beneficially entitled to the share certificates and for an order for their delivery, the respondents pleaded inter alia that since May 11, 1939, they had held the share certificates to the order and for the account of the Bohemian Bank and that it was their duty not to part with them without the assent of F their customer unless on proof of the appellant's title to immediate possession. They also pleaded that they were prohibited by the provisions of the Czechoslovakia (Restrictions on Banking Accounts, Etc.) Act, 1939, from parting with them without Treasury consent, or, alternatively, that the certificates were enemy property and that under the Trading with the Enemy (Custodian) Order, 1939 (S.R. & O., 1939, No. 1198), they were prohibited from dealing with G them without the consent of the Board of Trade. Any difficulties created by these enactments have, however, been removed because the consents of the Treasury and the Board of Trade were obtained on Mar. 27, 1947. After the war ended and before the trial of the action the appellant's solicitors were in communication with the Bohemian Bank in Czechoslovakia. The result was, in brief, that the Bohemian Bank admitted that it did not maintain any claim H to the securities, but informed the appellant's solicitors that the National Bank's position was that any transactions with the securities needed its consent. The solicitors tried to obtain the consent of the National Bank to the delivery of the securities, but it was refused.

My Lords, the appellant's contention, as stated in his Case, is that:

> "... he had an immediate right to the possession of the shares and that the Bohemian Bank's consent to the delivery up of the shares was unnecessary and that their failure to consent should be ignored."

It was on this contention that the decision in the Court of Appeal hinged. Evershed, L.J., said ([1948] 1 All E.R. 818) :

> "In my judgment, to succeed . . . the plaintiff must prove not merely that he is . . . entitled beneficially to the shares, but also that he is entitled to possession of the certificates."

With that way of stating the issue there can, I think, be no quarrel. The true owner's right to delivery of goods deposited by a third party with a bailee depends on his right to immediate possession : see Gordon v. Harper (1) and Bradley v. Copley (2) ; and if there is any defect in his right to immediate possession he must fail. Usually the defect arises from an adverse right of possession in a third party, but a defect arising from another cause would, I think, be equally fatal. In the present case, therefore, it is not sufficient that the appellant has established his title to the ownership of the shares. The bailee is entitled to demand proof that he is entitled to immediate possession. In the circumstances of this case that depends on the question whether there was a contract between the appellant and the bailor, the Bohemian Bank, and, if so, on the meaning and effect of that contract.

It is unfortunate that the appellant did not convene as defendants, in addition to the respondents, the Zivnostenska and the Bohemian Banks. If he had done so and if they, or, at any rate, the Bohemian Bank, had appeared, the issues would have been contested between the proper contradictors. The appellant did not choose to take that course. So it has come about that the respondents have been allowed to state contentions and maintain arguments which properly lay not in their mouth but in the mouth of the Bohemian Bank. Of this irregularity the appellant cannot complain and he must accept the situation which he has created by his own procedure and pleadings. It was, perhaps, the respondents' submission that there was no contract between them and the appellant and that their customer was the Bohemian Bank, and it alone, that induced the appellant to amend his pleadings in the Court of Appeal. By that amendment he has finally set at rest any doubt whether there was a contract between him and the Bohemian Bank, for he there alleges that the Zivnostenska Bank had been his bankers and that, purporting to act as his bankers and in pursuance of an authority to be implied from the relationship of banker and customer, the Zivnostenska Bank, by the letter of Apr. 17, 1939, instructed the respondents on his behalf to withdraw his certificates from the Zivnostenska Bank's securities account and to place them into the depot of the Bohemian Bank with the respondents for safe custody by order and for account of the appellant. And to clinch the matter he further alleges that, if the Zivnostenska Bank had no authority to write the letter of Apr. 17, 1939, he subsequently ratified its act in writing it. This amendment precluded the appellant from contending that the letter of Apr. 17, 1939, falls to be disregarded as being part of the machinery by which the German authorities effected the confiscation of the appellant's property, and it becomes unnecessary to consider that contention and the consequences which might flow from it if it were sustained.

Whether under the contract so alleged the appellant had against the Bohemian Bank an immediate right of possession, or whether his right of possession was governed by the Czech currency restriction laws must, I think, depend on whether English law or Czechoslovakian law is the proper law of the contract, for, if the proper law of a contract is the law of a foreign country, the courts of this country are by our law bound to apply that foreign law in determining the effect of the obligations undertaken by the parties. In ascertaining what is the proper law of a contract our courts have to solve a question of the parties' intention, and it is here that some difficulty arises. The Bohemian Bank and the appellant have to be taken as contracting parties because the appellant has by his pleadings accepted that position, but he was not a willing party at the time when the letter of Apr. 17, 1939, was written, and it may be doubted whether the Bohemian

Bank was a willing party. To ask what law the parties intended to govern the contract is to ask a question that admits only of an artificial answer. The one clear effect of the letter of Apr. 17, 1939, is to substitute the Bohemian Bank for the Zivnostenska Bank as the appellant's bailee. No change in the incidents or the conditions of the bailment except that can be inferred from the letter, and the appellant has suggested none in the amendment of his claim. The appellant, it is true, was no longer resident in Czechoslovakia on Apr. 17, 1939, but it appears to me unreal to inquire whether his change of residence should be taken as affecting the proper law of the bailment. The reality was that he had been allowed to change his residence only on condition of surrendering all right to the shares and neither that surrender nor the consequent change of residence were voluntary acts, for both were the result of German abuse of power and intimidation. They can lead to no inference of intention. I, therefore, come to the conclusion that the proper law of the bailment between the appellant and the Bohemian Bank must be taken to be the same law as the law which governed the bailment between the appellant and the Zivnostenska Bank. But that was a contract between parties who were resident in Czechoslovakia and subject to its laws. The proper law of that contract was clearly the law of Czechoslovakia. The answer of the Zivnostenska Bank to a demand by the appellant before Apr. 17, 1939, would have been that it could not deliver the certificates to him without the consent of the National Bank. The Bohemian Bank is now in the same position as that in which the Zivnostenska Bank then was, and it can make the same answer because the law of the contract must be taken to be the law of Czechoslovakia.

Cases like Ralli Brothers v. Compania Naviera Sota y Aznar (3) and De Beeche v. South American Stores, Ltd., and Chilian Stores, Ltd. (4) are not, I think, in point. The principle on which they were decided is that the courts of this country will not compel the fulfilment of an obligation when performance includes the doing in a foreign country of something which the laws of that country make it illegal to do, but a judgment in rem compelling the delivery of securities held in London would not involve the doing of anything in a foreign country. I think that the dismissal of the appeal does not involve the enforcement of Czechoslovakia revenue law or penal laws. I have not found it necessary to consider the Bretton Woods Agreements Order in Council, 1946. For these reasons I would dismiss the appeal.

My Lords, I should greatly regret that this House should come to a decision which might be represented as giving even the shadow of a figment of recognition to the German oppression of helpless people in territories lawlessly overrun by them. Let me, therefore, say without ambiguity that I give no recognition to the acts of the German authorities, and that I recognise the existence of a contract between the appellant and the Bohemian Bank only because the appellant himself has dissociated it from the confiscatory measures of which he was the victim and has himself voluntarily recognised and ratified it.

LORD MACDERMOTT : My Lords, I agree that the appellant has failed to establish any contractual relationship between himself and the respondents and I need not add to what has already been said about that branch of his case. This leaves for consideration the claim in detinue, a claim which, it may be well to observe at the outset, seeks from an English court an order for delivery up by an English company of chattels in their physical possession in England.

The writ claiming delivery of the certificates, the chattels in question, was issued on July 28, 1939. The salient features of the situation as it was at that date may be shortly stated. The appellant was the owner of the certificates. They were not subject to any encumbrance or lien and may be regarded as equivalent to bearer securities. The respondents, who may be taken as then aware of these facts, held the certificates in London for and on account of one of their foreign customers, a Czechoslovakian bank, and it in turn was or must be regarded as being then a bailee for the appellant for the safe custody of the certificates. (This bank was either the Zivnostenska Bank or the Bohemian Bank. To decide which is not altogether easy having regard to the complexities of the case and the somewhat artificial position produced by the course of the proceedings, but on consideration I think there is more to be said for holding that the Bohemian Bank was the respondents' customer at the time to which this narrative relates and I shall proceed on that basis. I need not pause to give my reasons for this choice. Little turns on it, in my opinion, since, on the view I take of the facts, the Bohemian Bank's contract of bailment with the appellant must be regarded as similar in all material respects to that which had subsisted earlier between him and the Zivnostenska Bank.) The appellant had made what may be treated as a demand for the certificates, as the sole owner thereof, and this had been refused by the respondents on the ground that they could not comply save on the order of a British court or on the instructions of their customer, the Bohemian Bank. Such instructions were not forthcoming for reasons stated as being that, by the Czechoslovakian foreign exchange laws then in force, they could not lawfully be given without the consent of the National Bank of Czechoslovakia which was withheld. I shall assume for the purposes of this opinion, and without any critical examination of the relevant Czechoslovakian legislation, that these reasons were well founded in fact—i.e., that the National Bank refused consent and that the law of Czechoslovakia forbade the respondents' customer, the Bohemian Bank, to do any act to release or transfer the certificates to the appellant without such consent. It will be necessary later to supplement this summary at certain points, particularly with respect to the appellant's contract with the Bohemian Bank, but it will be convenient now to pass to a brief consideration of the nature of the claim and the issues it involves.

It is trite law that a claimant in detinue must prove that he is entitled to possession and, further, that the respondents have failed to comply with a request for delivery. What is open by way of defence to a defendant is not so well settled in cases like the present where the relationship between the parties is not that of bailor and bailee. Can such a defendant, though claiming no adverse right or interest in himself, plead that some third party has such a right or interest and that, by reason thereof, the plaintiff is not entitled to immediate possession ? There seems to be no clear authority on the point, but, on principle, I do not see why a defence of this nature should be denied, at any rate where the relationship between the third party and the defendant is that of bailor and bailee. It is true that, as between a claiming bailor and his bailee, the latter is generally precluded from raising a jus tertii, but that rule rests on an estoppel arising from that relationship and cannot well be evoked where the bailee is sued by a stranger. The settled exception to the rule which permits a bailee to resist his bailor's claim by showing that he has lost the chattel bailed to the true owner or, as it is sometimes put, that he has suffered eviction by title paramount, is more relevant. The broad and simple ground for this exception may, I think, be found in the passage in the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench delivered by BLACKBURN, J., in Biddle v. Bond (5) which reads (6 B. & S. 231) :

> " . . . the bailee has no better title than the bailor, and, consequently, if a person entitled as against the bailor to the property claims it, the bailee has no defence against him."

Speaking generally, two results may be said to flow from this. First, a bailee must be at liberty to resist a claim made by one who is not his bailor by showing that his bailor has the better right to immediate possession. And, secondly, a bailee, in order to resist successfully the claim of an owner who is not his bailor, must usually do more than show that he is but a bailee and has not been authorised by his bailor to make delivery in satisfaction of the claim. I do not think this last proposition was seriously challenged at your Lordships' Bar, but it is not without relevance as the respondents' first line of defence, as appears from their letters and the pleadings, was that they could do nothing to meet the appellant's demand without the instructions of their customer, the Bohemian Bank. In the circumstances that was an understandable attitude, but, in itself, I do not think it constituted an answer in law to the claim, at any rate after a A reasonable time for investigation had elapsed.

Proceeding, then, on the basis that it was open to the respondents to show that the Bohemian Bank was entitled as against the appellant to possession, the next question is whether this has been done. As already indicated, the respondents alleged no proprietary interest in the Bohemian Bank or any claim to retention on foot of some charge or lien. They did prove, however, if the assumption I B have made above as to the effect of the relevant Czechoslovakian law is justified, that the Bohemian Bank could not do anything to authorise them to hand the certificates over without breaking that law and, indeed, committing a criminal offence thereunder. Now, if that were all and the respondents could say no more, I think it is clear that they would have no answer to the present claim. The law of another State will not of itself justify the detention or conversion of property C in England which is wrongful according to the law of England. If a foreigner in this jurisdiction finds my watch, the courts of this country will not allow him to keep it merely because the law of his own country forbids him, wherever he may be, to make restitution of articles of that sort. The respondents, however, based their case on the conjoint effect of the Czechoslovakian law and the appellant's contract of bailment with the Bohemian Bank. It may be said at D once that, if this contract bound that bank to re-deliver the certificates in Czechoslovakia and not elsewhere, the appellant could not succeed. Apart altogether from difficulties of a more technical nature, he would then have to face the rule, stated by VISCOUNT SANKEY, L.C., ([1935] A.C. 156) in De Beeche v. South American Stores, Ltd. and Chilian Stores, Ltd. (4), that :

> E " . . . the law of this country will not compel the fulfilment of an obligation whose performance involves the doing in a foreign country of something which the supervenient law of that country has rendered it illegal to do ".

But this does not, in my opinion, help the respondents in the present case. Whatever else may be said of it, I am satisfied that the contract he made, or must be taken to have made, with the Bohemian Bank entitled the appellant F to call for delivery of his certificates in London. That was where the relevant shares had been bought and where the certificates were at all material times. The contract itself referred to the certificates as located in London, though containing no express stipulation as to the place where delivery from safe custody was to be made. On the evidence I can see nothing to preclude the appellant from requiring the Bohemian Bank to hand over his certificates in London if, G in the circumstances, he was entitled to get them at all.

This brings me to the substance of the respondents' defence and the heart of the case as I see it. What the respondents say, if I have gathered their submissions aright, comes in effect to this. The appellant's contract of bailment should be regarded by the courts of this country as governed throughout by Czechoslovakian law, and, so regarded, the effect is that it cannot be determined H save with the consent of the National Bank, and, as that has not been given, the appellant has no present right to possession in London or elsewhere and cannot, therefore, sustain, a claim in detinue. It may be added here that the relevant Czechoslovakian law has been substantially the same at all times material to this appeal. My Lords, the appellant's contract must, I think, be rested on the letter of Dec. 28, 1938, which was addressed to him in Prague by the Zivnostenska Bank. This letter says little more than that the securities listed in it are credited to the appellant's deposit account with that bank for safe custody. The list includes some securities which, it may be inferred, were held in Czechoslovakia, but others, including the certificates in question are shown as " domiciled " elsewhere, some in London, some in New York, one in Amsterdam and another in Tel Aviv. The appellant was then a resident Czechoslovakian and the bank was a Czechoslovakian bank. In these circumstances I am unable to resist the conclusion that, at any rate so far as the interpretation of the contract and the substance of the obligations arising thereunder during the course of the bailment are concerned, the parties may be regarded as intending that the governing law should be that of Czechoslovakia. But must they be taken to have agreed that that law was also to govern the entire performance of the contract abroad, so that if the appellant, as he was entitled to do, sought delivery of his securities where they actually were, say in London or in New York, his bailee would be within its rights in retaining possession until the National Bank gave its consent ? If consensus went that length I think it would be an end of the matter, for in such case (and assuming no question of public policy to be involved) the law of England would regard Czechoslovakian law as the proper law of every material aspect and hold, accordingly, that the appellant was not entitled to immediate possession as against the respondents' bailor. But, my Lords, when the letter of Dec. 28, 1938, and its attendant circumstances are considered, the appellant cannot, in my view, be said to have agreed that the Czechoslovakian foreign exchange laws were to regulate performance outside Czechoslovakia with respect to those of his securities which were listed as domiciled abroad. By the end of 1938 the mounting tide of Nazi aggression was obviously threatening to engulf his country, and no one resident therein who was a man of property and belonged to the Jewish faith could entertain anything but the liveliest fears for himself and his fortune. The wise were those who had at least a part of their substance dispersed abroad and beyond immediate reach, the foolish those who had all in one basket at home. That such was the situation confronting the appellant and his co-religionists at that time cannot, I think, be disputed as a matter of historical fact. Nor, in my opinion, can it be ignored in any inquiry as to the contractual intention to be imputed to the appellant concerning the safe custody of his securities in December, 1938. He must be assumed to have known the general nature of the restrictions imposed by Czechoslovakian law, and I think it would not be going too far to say that he must also have appreciated that those restrictions might well be turned to account by the Nazis for their own purposes when they arrived. Why should he intend that his right to deal with his securities abroad should be regulated by those restrictions ? I can see no ground for attributing any such intention to him. On the contrary, it is, I think, but reasonable to assume that his confidence and hope in regard to these securities must have rested on the laws of the countries where they were placed and where as yet there was freedom and peace.

What, then, of the Zivnostenska Bank ? Can it be taken to have acquiesced in the choice of law which the appellant had such cogent grounds for making part of the contract ? Its position was, of course, quite different and it is impossible to impute to it any intention which would have meant a breach of the laws of its own country, but I do not think it can be said that by agreeing to facilitate the appellant to this extent the bank would necessarily have involved itself in such a breach. The certificates were at all material times in London and in other hands—first those of Samuel Montagu and Co. and then those of the respondents—and an order made against the actual holders by the courts of this jurisdiction on the basis that the law governing performance in England was English would not, so far as I can see, have required of the bank any act or course of conduct forbidden by the law of Czechoslovakia. For this reason, if one were at liberty to infer that the parties had actually come to agreement on the point, I would find it easier to regard them as agreeing to accept English rather than Czechoslovakian law as the law of performance in London. I doubt, however, if the facts justify an inference of agreement. It is true that the letter of Dec. 28, 1938, speaks of the certificates as " domiciled " in London, but there is nothing in the evidence to show that this was a term of art apt to attract the law of the place of deposit. I do not think it can be read as more than a statement of location and I can find nothing else in the material available to warrant

A a firm conclusion that there was agreement in fact on this particular aspect of the matter. These considerations may not, therefore, suffice to import any stipulation as to the applicability of laws other than those of Czechoslovakia, but they do suffice, in my opinion, to negative quite definitely the implication of any common intention that the laws of that country should dominate the whole field of performance.

B My Lords, if this is the right view to take, I do not think it can be displaced or overriden by saying that the contract is a Czechoslovakian contract and that the Czechoslovakian foreign exchange laws—in so far as material—must be read into it. Counsel for the respondents refrained from advancing this contention and I think he was right. There is nothing in the evidence of Dr. Paul Hartmann, the expert witness on Czechoslovakian law, to support it and it
C really begs the question to be decided. If then, as I would hold, the proper law of the contract is to a substantial extent that of Czechoslovakia, must it be said on that account, and notwithstanding the circumstances, that that law is also the proper law of the mode of performance in London ? Though there is no authority binding your Lordships to the view that there can be but one proper law in respect of any given contract, it is doubtless true to say that the courts
D of this country will not split the contract in this sense readily or without good reason. In my opinion, however, there is good ground for so doing in the somewhat unusual and, as I think, compelling circumstances of the case.

This, however, is really part and parcel of the larger question that now emerges, namely, what is the appropriate presumption of law to apply ? The choice is between the lex loci contractus and the lex loci solutionis. I would hold in favour
E of the latter. I think it meets the just requirements of the situation more adequately and fairly than the former. I also think it accords more closely with what may reasonably be imputed having regard to all the circumstances, including the nature of the contract—a bailment for safe custody with, as a normal characteristic, an obligation to re-deliver at the request of the bailor ; the position of each of the contracting parties ; the lack of any consensus, express
F or to be implied, in favour of Czechoslovakian law as the law of the aspect under discussion ; and, not least, the fact that the claim relates to the right to possession of tangible property in this jurisdiction. It is, moreover, to be observed, as a factor to be taken into consideration though not necessarily conclusive in itself, that, if the relief sought by the appellant were granted on this basis, it would not involve the Bohemian Bank, any more than it would have involved
G the Zivnostenska Bank, in taking any step in breach of Czechoslovakian law. The judgment desired would not necessitate collaboration or even a change of attitude on the part of the appellant's present bailee. For these reasons I think that the proper law in relation to performance in London ought to be the law of England and not that of Czechoslovakia.

If that view is correct, the absence of consent on the part of the National H Bank affords the respondents no valid ground for withholding the certificates unless it can be said that the Czechoslovakian foreign exchange laws are, apart from any question of choice or conflict of law, to be acted on by the courts of this country. As matters stand I think any contention of this kind must be rejected. In their defence the respondents pleaded the Bretton Woods Agreements and the Order in Council of 1946 relating thereto (S.R. & O., 1946, No. 36). In the course of the argument, however, they admitted their inability to rest this branch of their case on any specific provision of these agreements and were content to rely on them merely to the extent of indicating in a general way that the States which were parties thereto would respect each other's exchange control legislation. That might have some bearing if the question was whether the recognition of the relevant Czechoslovakian laws would be contrary to public policy in this country—a matter I have not found it necessary to discuss—but it cannot well have any other bearing, for these instruments do not go the length of incorporating those laws in the law of England. I am, accordingly, of opinion A that no adverse right or interest in the Bohemian Bank or its bailees, the respondents, sufficient to defeat the appellant's claim, has been established. I would, therefore, allow the appeal and restore the decision of MACNAGHTEN, J.

LORD REID: My Lords, in 1938 the appellant resided in Prague. He owned a number of securities which were held for him by a firm called Petschek. That firm was amalgamated with the Zivnostenska Bank and on Dec. 28, 1938, B a letter was written from the Prague office of that bank to the appellant which stated:

> "... we are crediting you with the undermentioned securities in the deposit account which we recently opened for you, namely ..."

Then follow a number of securities which were apparently held in Prague and C a number of others held in New York and elsewhere. The one with which this case is concerned is thus referred to:

> "Safe deposit, 800 Brazilian Traction shares with current coupons, dom. London."

The letter ends: D

> "... we desire to say that you will have the aforesaid securities deposited with us for safe custody."

These shares were, in fact, deposited with the respondents in London. On Jan. 16, 1939, a letter was written from the Prague office of the Zivnostenska Bank to the respondents informing them that they would receive 1,164 Brazilian E Traction shares (which admittedly include the above mentioned 800) and asking the respondents to:

> "... take over these shares and place them in our depot with your goodselves crediting us for same under advice to us."

The respondents were not informed and did not know to whom these shares F belonged. I have no doubt that at that stage the position was that there was a contract between the Zivnostenska Bank and the appellant, and that there was no contract between the respondents and the appellant. I have not much doubt that the appellant's contract with the Zivnostenska Bank was a Czechoslovakian contract of which the proper law was the law of that country. For the purposes of this case I shall assume that that was so.

G The appellant failed to escape when Czechoslovakia was overrun by the Germans and before being allowed to leave the country he was compelled to execute, on or before Apr. 1, 1939, a so-called agreement with the Bohemian Discount and Credit Bank which had become the tool of the Gestapo. By this document the Bohemian Bank, in effect, obtained complete control of the whole assets of the appellant. I have no doubt that this agreement was void as having H been obtained under duress and I did not understand the respondents' counsel to argue otherwise. On Apr. 17, 1939, the Zivnostenska Bank wrote to the respondents the following letter:

> "By the present we beg to request you to withdraw from our securities account with your goodselves 800 Shares Brazilian Traction Light & Power Co., Ord. Cap. Stock No Par, using for this purpose the shares which were credited to our above account on Feb. 6, 1939, /ref. B 64318/ —and to > place same into the depot of the Bohemian Discount Bank and Society of Credit, Praha, with your goodselves. This transfer is made by order and for account of the owner of these shares, Mr. Viktor Kahler, Praha, 11, Vaclav nam. 55, who transfers his securities account from our bank to the Bohemian Discount Bank and Society of Credit, Praha. The ownership of the above shares remains unchanged. While crediting you for these

> A shares on the securities account, we remain . . ."

The respondents acknowledged this letter by a printed form dated May 11, 1939. On the same day the respondents made an entry in their securities book under the heading "Bohemian Discount Bank and Society of Credit, Prague" showing that the appellant was the owner of the shares in question. On Apr. 1, 1939, the appellant left Czechoslovakia and he never returned to that country. It
B seems clear that he did not instruct the Zivnostenska Bank to write the letter of Apr. 17 to the respondents. No doubt, it was written because that bank accepted the appellant's agreement with the Bohemian Bank as a valid agreement. If the appellant had so chosen, I think that he could have disclaimed this letter as having been written without his authority and could have refused to recognise the Bohemian Bank as having any rights with regard to his shares.
C What the result would have been it is needless to inquire because the appellant has chosen to ratify and adopt the Zivnostenska Bank's letter of Apr. 17, 1939. This was made quite explicit in his amended statement of claim of Mar. 18, 1948. It necessarily follows from this that the appellant must be held to have assented to his shares being held in the depot of the Bohemian Bank with the respondents. As the Bohemian Bank also assented to the shares being held
D there for their account, there must, I think, be held to have arisen between the appellant and the Bohemian Bank the relationship of bailor and bailee, and that is not disputed by the respondents. I agree with your Lordships that on no view of the facts can it be held that such a relationship arose between the appellant and the respondents. I think that the respondents hold the shares under a contract of bailment with the Bohemian Bank, and they cannot have a
E better right to refuse to deliver the shares to the appellant than the Bohemian Bank could have. The Bohemian Bank is not a party to this case, but the case cannot, in my view, be decided without considering what their rights are. In the circumstances I think that it is possible to consider that matter in their absence.

I find it exceedingly difficult to determine the nature and terms of the contract
F of bailment between the appellant and the Bohemian Bank. That contract does not arise from any express agreement, because I think that the void agreement between them made before the appellant was allowed to leave Czechoslovakia must be left out of account. The terms of the contract cannot be clearly inferred from any of the actions of the parties, but the way in which the appellant has chosen to present his case makes it impossible for him to deny that such a
G contract exists. I think that, once it is determined that there is a contract of bailment between the appellant and the Bohemian Bank, the decision of this case must turn on the precise nature of that contract, but to determine the precise nature of a contract of this character is a speculative enterprise and I feel no confidence in the result at which I have arrived.

The refusal of the respondents to deliver the appellant's share certificates to H him can only be justified if the Bohemian Bank would be entitled to refuse to deliver. Admittedly, the Bohemian Bank has no right to the shares and no claim against the appellant which would warrant a claim to retain them. A refusal of the Bohemian Bank to deliver the shares or to authorise the respondents to deliver them could only be based on the law regarding foreign exchange control in force in Czechoslovakia. There is in evidence a translation of certain regulations which are part of the law of that country. In my judgment, those regulations do not come within the category of confiscatory or fiscal legislation of a foreign country which English courts cannot recognise. It is, therefore, necessary to determine their meaning and also to determine whether and to what extent they must be given effect in this case. On the first question I think that it is established that the Bohemian Bank would have committed an offence under the law of Czechoslovakia if, without having the necessary permission from the Czechoslovakian authorities, they had delivered these certificates to the appellant, either in London or in Czechoslovakia, at the date when this A action was raised, and would commit such an offence if they so delivered those certificates now. Such delivery would, in my view, be a " transfer " from a " currency inlander " to a " currency foreigner " within the meaning of those regulations and as such prohibited unless the consent of the National Bank of Czechoslovakia had first been obtained. The question in this case really is whether that would afford a good defence to the Bohemian Bank if they were B sued in England for delivery of the appellant's property which they hold for him in England.

The decision of this case, as I see it, turns on the question whether the appellant's contract with the Bohemian Bank must be held to be governed and interpreted by the law of Czechoslovakia or by the law of England. If the proper law of the contract is the law of Czechoslovakia, then it must be assumed C that that law is the same as the law of England except in so far as the contrary appears from evidence. Under the law of England performance of a contract will not be enforced if or in so far as such performance is illegal under the law of England. It must be assumed that a similar principle applies in Czechoslovakia and that, if an action were raised there for delivery in London of the securities in question, even if it were held that London is the locus solutionis under the D contract, that action would not succeed because delivery would involve an offence against the law of Czechoslovakia. It appears to me that, if it is established that the proper law of a contract is the law of a foreign country and that the courts of that country would hold that performance of that contract cannot be enforced, an English court must also so hold unless the ground on which the foreign court would so hold is a ground which an English court ought not to E recognise. I have already stated that, in my opinion, an exchange control regulation of the kind here in question is not within the kind of foreign law which an English court cannot recognise. It, therefore, follows that, if the proper law of this contract is the law of Czechoslovakia, the Bohemian Bank could not be required to deliver the securities. The bailment by the Bohemian Bank to the respondents was known to the appellant when he assented to the Bohemian F Bank holding his property as his bailee, and it must, I think, follow that, if the appellant could not succeed against the Bohemian Bank, he cannot succeed against the respondents and the appeal must fail.

I turn to consider what the position would be if the appellant's contract were held to be an English contract. The law of England will not require an act to be done in performance of an English contract if such act would be unlawful G under English law or if it would be unlawful by the law of the country in which the act has to be done, but I know of no authority for the proposition that an English court will not enforce performance in England by a foreigner of an act which is lawful in England merely because the law of the foreigner's country prohibits him from doing that act in England. A foreigner can only get protection in such a case if there is a term in the contract which gives it to him. So, if H delivery of the securities is an act which the Bohemian Bank are under the contract to do in England and if the contract is governed by the law of England, the appeal must succeed.

It is now necessary to determine what was the contract between the appellant and the Bohemian Bank. There appear to me to be three possible views about this contract : first, that it must be regarded as being similar in all respects to the appellant's contract with the Zivnostenska Bank which preceded it ;

secondly, that the course which the appellant has taken in this action compels Your Lordships to decide the case on the footing that the void agreement between the appellant and the Bohemian Bank must be regarded for the purposes of this case as valid in whole or in part ; and, thirdly, that neither the terms of the appellant's contract with the Zivnostenska Bank nor the terms of the void agreement can be imported into this contract, with the result that the terms A of this contract, in so far as not determined against the appellant by his admissions, must be inferred from the whole facts and circumstances of the case. I recognise the attraction of the first view, but I cannot accept it for this reason. The Zivnostenska contract may have contained special conditions such, for example, as those which will shortly have to be considered by Your Lordships in another contract to which the Zivnostenska Bank is now a party [Zivnostenska B Banka National Corporation v. Frankman (6)]. At least it might have contained such conditions and I think that the argument can fairly be tested by supposing that it did. I can see no ground for assuming that the Bohemian Bank agreed to take over the Zivnostenska Bank's contract whatever its conditions might be. In fact, the Bohemian Bank came in under an agreement which, if they could have operated it, gave them very much wider rights. Is the appellant, then, C precluded from asserting that the terms of his agreement with the Bohemian Bank differ from the terms of his previous agreement with the Zivnostenska Bank ? That leads me to the second view to which I have referred. I think that it is necessary to examine the pleadings to see just what the appellant must be held to have admitted. In the original stages no reference was made to the Bohemian Bank. The first reference to it was in the defence dated Dec. 6, 1939, D where the respondents referred to the letter of the Zivnostenska Bank of Apr. 17, 1939, which I have already quoted and pleaded :

> " Since the said May 11, 1939, the defendants have held and still hold the said share certificates to the order and for and on account of the said Bohemian Bank."

Then in an affidavit of Jan. 15, 1940, the truth of which is admitted, the appellant E told how he had been forced to sign the agreement with the Bohemian Bank. The facts there narrated appear to me to show clearly that that agreement was void and respondents' counsel did not argue either that it is valid or that the appellant is bound in this case to admit that it is wholly valid. That agreement is not again referred to. In their amended and re-amended defence the respondents continue to rely on their contract with the Bohemian Bank and F state alternatively :

> " . . . that the plaintiff by transferring the said shares into a depot with the defendants of the Bohemian Bank submitted himself according to Czechoslovak law to all the provisions from time to time in force of the financial and monetary regulations of Czechoslovakia in respect of the G said shares."

Finally, the appellant in his amended statement of claim stated alternatively that the Zivnostenska Bank had his authority to send the letter of Apr. 17, 1939, or that he subsequently ratified and adopted it. I have already stated that I think that this prevents the appellant from denying that there is a contract between him and the Bohemian Bank. Does it go farther and prevent him from H denying either (first) that that contract is similar in all respects to his earlier contract with the Zivnostenska Bank, or (secondly) that that contract is the void agreement and none other ? These two alternatives are quite different and I can only say that I can see no sufficient reason for holding the appellant to either alternative. It is quite true that the Bohemian Bank is admitted to have succeeded the Zivnostenska Bank as the appellant's bailee, but that does not necessarily imply any particular similarity between the two contracts, and I cannot see that the appellant must be held to have admitted, not only that there is a contract between him and the Bohemian Bank, but also that it is in all essential respects similar to his earlier contract with the Zivnostenska Bank. Still less can I see how he must be held to have admitted that the void agreement must for the purposes of this case be treated as a subsisting contract, and, as I have said, this was not argued. It was argued, somewhat faintly I thought, that the appellant had, in effect, adopted that part of the void agreement which authorised the Bohemian Bank to hold the shares. Subsequent partial adoption of a void contract I find to be a difficult conception which I cannot A accept as applicable.

I, therefore, think that the problem can only be solved by considering the whole facts of the case. I think that it is fairly clear that the appellant did not think that he had made or had admitted making any contract with the Bohemian Bank. The only reason why he adopted the Zivnostenska Bank's letter of Apr. 17, 1939, was because he thought that that course would help him to say B that he had a contract with the respondents. The Bohemian Bank were trying, so long as they were under German domination, to enforce the void agreement which had been obtained from the appellant before he was allowed to leave Czechoslovakia, but the fact that the parties misunderstood the legal effect of what they were doing cannot prevent the necessary legal consequences from attaching to their acts, and it is a necessary inference from their acts that a C contract of bailment exists between them. That contract must, I think, be independent of the void agreement. I think that the only matters which appear with any clarity are that the Bohemian Bank with the appellant's consent hold in London for the appellant property belonging to him. Moreover, before the letter of Apr. 17, 1939, the appellant had left Czechoslovakia with no intention of returning. He was probably in France at the relevant time. If that were all, D there would be a contract of bailment between a bailor in France and a bailee in Czechoslovakia with regard to property held throughout in London, and I think that the inference would be that London was the place where the bailor was entitled to demand re-delivery of his property. Such a contract would, I think, be governed by the law of England.

Is there anything more in the circumstances which makes it necessary to E infer that the contract is of a different nature or contains other terms ? It may be said that the Bohemian Bank would never have agreed to a contract which did not give them the necessary protection. That may be, though it might, perhaps, equally be said that the appellant, having just escaped from Czechoslovakia, would never have agreed to a contract which subjected his property to this control. I do not think that any help is to be got from considerations F of this character. If this is to be held relevant, the argument must, I think, be that, because it is clear that, if their attention had been directed to the point, the Bohemian Bank would never have consented to become bailees except on condition that in the performance of their contract they should not be required to do something which was unlawful and punishable under the law of Czechoslovakia, therefore it must be held to be an implied term of their contract that G performance cannot be demanded in such a manner as to render them liable to such punishment. But there are no special circumstances in this case. The case for implying such a term would arise in just the same way in most, if not all, cases where a foreigner contracts to do something in this country the doing of which will or may render him liable to prosecution in his own country. To give effect to this argument would, in substance, involve introducing a new H principle into the law of England that it is a good defence to an action on a contract the proper law of which is English law for the defendant to show that his performance of his obligation in England would subject him to penal liability in his own country. No argument was submitted to justify such a principle and I would not be prepared to accept it.

It must be accepted that there is a contract of bailment between the appellant and the Bohemian Bank. The basis of such a contract can be found with some certainty. The bank, with the assent of the appellant, holds the appellant's securities for safe keeping in its depot with the respondents in London. I can find no other facts which must necessarily be taken into account in settling the nature of the contract. On that footing it is a contract under which delivery can be demanded in London and which must be governed by English law. I can find no sufficient reason for adding anything more to the contract. I realise A that there are so many suppositions and hypotheses involved and there is so much unreality in the case that my conclusions may well be erroneous, but I think that there is less unreality involved in the suppositions which I have made than in any others suggested, and my view would, therefore, be that the appeal should be allowed.

LORD RADCLIFFE: My Lords, I think that the appellant's appeal fails. B What he asks by his appeal is that we should restore the order of the court of first instance which directed the delivery to him of 800 shares of the Brazilian Traction Light and Power Co. in the possession of the respondents, and it is that relief to which I would hold him disentitled. It is plain that we are dealing with an anomalous set of circumstances when the person who is the sole beneficial owner of property cannot obtain the aid of the law to recover its possession. C To see how the anomaly arises requires some consideration of the facts of this case. For our purposes it can begin with the letter dated Dec. 28, 1938, which the Zivnostenska Bank at Prague wrote to the appellant at Prague, in which they stated that they were :

> " . . . crediting you with the undermentioned securities in the deposit D account which we recently opened for you . . . "

There followed a long list of securities, the first block of which appears to be Czechoslovakian, but of which later groups are characterised as domiciled at New York, Amsterdam and Tel Aviv. Lastly there is a group " dom. London " which includes the 800 Brazilian Co. shares. The letter ends with the words :

> " . . . we desire to say that you will have the aforesaid securities deposited with us for safe custody ".

As I take the view that we are bound to treat the Bohemian Discount Bank as having duly succeeded to the Zivnostenska Bank's obligations to the appellant as created by this letter of Dec. 28, 1938, it is well to pause to state what I F interpret them as being. Certainly there was a bailment. The bank had the safe custody of the securities and the right to possession until the bailment was determined. We know from the appellant's affidavit of July 31, 1939, that the Brazilian Co. shares had always been deposited in London and I think that we may safely treat the bailees as having at any rate authority to retain them there. In the absence of any direct evidence of custom or any challenge by the appellant G as to the propriety of what they did, I think that we may also treat their authority as allowing the deposit in London either with a banking correspondent, such as the respondents, the Midland Bank, by sub-bailment or with their own London branch, if they had one. The shares are described as " with current coupons ", and I suppose that we must envisage the depositary's duties as including the detachment of coupons on maturity, the collection of dividend in London, and H the transmission of it to Prague or elsewhere as directed. In this respect the contract is more than a mere contract of bailment. It was so much of a gratuitous bailment (since the bank, though they may have charged for their services, were in no sense hirers) as to be terminable at the will of the bailor, on which event of termination the bailees would become responsible to deliver the shares to the bailor or as he should direct. It follows that, so far as the contract of bailment was concerned, the appellant could properly be said to have the right to recover immediate possession from the bank.

So far as the contract of bailment was concerned. But at the time when the letter of Dec. 28, 1938, was written, as now, the law of Czechoslovakia had imposed a restriction on the duty of a bailee under such a contract to re-deliver on demand. That is proved by Dr. Hartmann's evidence. The restriction consisted in the currency regulation that forbade, among others, a holder in safe custody of foreign securities to transfer his possession without the consent of the National Bank. The terms of this regulation ought not to be treated as A being themselves part of the contract, but, on the other hand, I do not know how to regard their legal significance except as modifying the relationship of any bailors and bailees who ought to be treated as having measured their rights and obligations under the bailment by the Czechoslovakian system of law. Now the proper law of the contract between the appellant and the Zivnostenska Bank was, as I see it, the law of Czechoslovakia. The arrangement was made B in that country by two persons there resident and subject to its laws. The securities were held on the deposit account which the appellant opened with the bank in Prague and it was with that branch, therefore, that he would have to clear the matter if he wished to determine the bailment. These considerations outweigh any other in determining the proper law of the contract, but the consequence is that, having regard to the currency regulations, a bailment so C created was not determinable at the will of the bailor so long as those regulations subsisted, but was determinable only with the permission of the National Bank.

A few months later the appellant left Czechoslovakia. The price of exile that was extorted from him was the transfer of all the securities that he possessed to the control of the Bohemian Bank. There is no reason to doubt that the German authorities then in power in Czechoslovakia intended that the securities D should be liquidated in due course and the proceeds appropriated for their own purposes. On Mar. 29, 1939, the appellant signed the required agreement with the Bohemian Bank and on Apr. 17, 1939, the Zivnostenska Bank, no doubt in consequence of this agreement, notified the Midland Bank that the 800 Brazilian company shares should be placed :

> " . . . into the depot of the Bohemian Discount Bank and Society of E > Credit, Praha, with your goodselves. This transfer is made by order and for account of the owner of these shares, Mr. Viktor Kahler, Praha 11, Vaclav. nam. 55, who transfers his securities account from our bank to the Bohemian Discount Bank and Society of Credit, Praha. The ownership of the above shares remains unchanged ".

The effect of the agreement of Mar. 29, 1939, and of this letter was much F debated before us. I will content myself with saying that, in my view, the form of the appellant's statement of claim, as finally amended during the hearing in the Court of Appeal, leaves us no option but to treat the transfer of his security deposit account to the Bohemian Bank as a valid and proper transaction. Of course, other views of the legal effect of the whole arrangement might be taken. I do not think that they are open to us. I have no doubt that the appellant's G advisers considered the alternative views and adopted that which seemed to them to give his case the best chance of success. But what is the consequence? I think that we must treat the Bohemian Bank as having been validly substituted for the Zivnostenska Bank as the bailees of the appellant's shares and as holding them for him on a deposit account similar in all respects to that which was transferred to them by the letter of Apr. 17, 1939. I think that the proper law H of that new bailment was necessarily that of Czechoslovakia. No doubt, the appellant, who was leaving Czechoslovakia, perhaps for ever, would have chosen some other law, had he been free to choose. What the bank would or could have accepted is another matter. But, in truth, the speculation seems to me aimless for, had the appellant been free to choose, he would not have transferred his account to the Bohemian Bank at all. If we are to assume, as the appellant's case requires us to assume, that the securities were properly transferred from the Zivnostenska Bank's depot with the respondents, the Midland Bank, Ltd., to the Bohemian Bank's depot with them, then I think that the law of the new bailment, as the law of the old bailment, was the law of Czechoslovakia.

The appellant now sues the respondents for the delivery of his securities. His claim was discussed before us as a claim in detinue. I think that it was rightly so described, but the answer of the respondents would have been the same if A his claim had been based on trespass or trover. First, he says that he is in direct contractual relation with the respondents and that his contract, being a terminable contract of bailment, entitles him to call for the delivery of his shares. The Court of Appeal have rejected his claim to be in any direct contractual relation with the respondents. I agree with all that they say on this head and I do not think it necessary to add anything. Secondly, he says that he is the absolute B owner of the shares, that the Bohemian Bank claim neither lien over nor interest in them, and that, therefore, he is entitled to the immediate delivery of what, after all, belongs to him and to no one else. To this the respondents reply that he is not entitled to the immediate possession of the shares, and that, if he is not so entitled, his claim must fail. It is not in dispute that the National Bank, having been applied to, have refused to consent to the release of the shares C from the Bohemian Bank to the appellant, but it is important that the respondents' objection is not based on the fact that they hold the shares to the order of the Bohemian Bank and that they cannot obtain that bank's consent to the delivery to the appellant. If the appellant had, indeed, the immediate right to possession, the respondents' possible embarrassments with the Bohemian Bank would not, as I see it, afford any defence, unless they could successfully D establish that his authority to the Bohemian Bank to place the shares with them estops him from calling on them to ignore that bank's refusal of consent. That line of argument has not been pursued before us and I do not consider it further. What the respondents rely on is a defect in the plaintiff's title to immediate possession. Here I think they do no more than assert a familiar legal principle. An action in detinue will not lie at the suit of a plaintiff who has not that title. E It would be an anomaly that the court should by its order transfer property into the hands of one who has not a legal right to immediate possession. It is true that in the case of a bailment which is terminable at the bailor's will the law will give the right of action to the bailor as well as to the bailee, but then such a bailor has nothing less than a right to immediate possession. On the other hand, a person may have all the existing rights of ownership in a F chattel and yet have no claim in detinue if by contract he is not entitled to immediate possession: see Bradley v. Copley (2).

It is, therefore, the appellant's right to possession that must be tried. By contract he has agreed that the Bohemian Bank should hold his shares in safe custody for him. There is nothing in the contract that would prevent him from calling for the shares at any time, but the law of Czechoslovakia to which the G contract is subject has so far modified his right so to recover possession of the shares as to make the consent of the National Bank a condition precedent. If, then, the courts of this country are to recognise that modification, the appellant lacks a present right to possession. It seems to me that we should ignore an established rule of our private international law if we were not to give effect to the currency regulation in question. If the proper law of the contract is the law H of Czechoslovakia, that law not merely sustains, but also, because it sustains, may also modify or dissolve, the contractual bond. The currency law is not part of the contract, but the rights and obligations under the contract are part of the legal system to which the currency law belongs. So to decide is to give effect to the same principle as was upheld by our courts when the obligations of the government of the United Kingdom under its American loan of 1917 were treated as modified by American legislation: see R. v. International Trustee for Protection of Bondholders Aktiengesellschaft (7); or when Mr. Perry's life assurance policy was annulled by supervening legislation in the U.S.S.R.: see Perry v. Equitable Life Assurance Society of U.S.A. (8).

For my part I should not regard the application of this principle to this case as a concession of extra-territorial operation to foreign currency regulations. I should regard it rather as an insistence that in applying the proper law of a contract—a conception which is inescapable in private international law—it is the full complex of substantive law that must be applied. The difficulty more often lies in the attribution of the proper law, but, however that may be, I should not have been prepared to treat such currency regulations as we are concerned with here as if they were no more than the "penal or revenue laws" of another State the existence of which our courts are traditionally disposed to ignore. It follows from what I have said that I think that we are bound to treat the appellant as having ceded the lawful possession of his shares for an existing, though indeterminate, period, and to hold him, accordingly, disentitled to the relief that he claims. In the result, I have said no more on this head than was said in the Court of Appeal by EVERSHED, L.J., and SCOTT, L.J., but I think that it may be important in this peculiar case to emphasise that, in my opinion, it is not the respondents' failure to get their customer's consent to hand the shares to the appellant that affords them defence, but the defect in the appellant's own right to immediate possession.

PRICE v. CITY OF LONDON CORPORATION.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., Denning, L.J., and Hodson, J.), October 17, 1949.]

Tithe—Extinguishment—Detriment to officer—Compensation—Expectation of continuance in office—City of London (Tithes) Act, 1947 (c. xxxi), s. 16 (1).

The City of London (Tithes) Act, 1947, s. 16, provides: "(1) Every officer in office at the date of the passing of this Act who suffers substantial detriment to his livelihood by reason of the passing of this Act shall be entitled to compensation from the [City of London] Corporation for that detriment." At the date of the passing of the Act the plaintiff was the collector of tithes for the parishes of S., A. and E., and as such was an officer within s. 16 (1). He had held office in S. and A. for a considerable time, and, although tacitly or expressly the appointment was made annually, by custom those offices were treated as perpetual in the sense that the holder, so long as he was able to act, continued to act and the offices were commonly passed from father to son. The plaintiff was not first appointed to office in E., to which there was also in theory an annual appointment, until Dec. 17, 1945, and his letter of appointment referred to the bill which eventually became the City of London (Tithes) Act, 1947, and to the fact that, having regard to it, the appointment was not likely to be of long duration. The county court judge awarded compensation amounting to ten times the annual value of the appointments to S. and A., but in the case of the appointment to E. he awarded compensation only in respect of the uncompleted year for which the plaintiff had been appointed. On appeal,

HELD: in assessing the "substantial detriment" for the purposes of s. 16 (1) it was necessary to inquire not only what were the rights of which the plaintiff had been deprived by reason of the passing of the Act, but also what were the plaintiff's expectations of remaining in office. While in the cases of S. and A. the plaintiff had on appointment reasonable expectation that he would continue to hold office indefinitely, in the case of E. he could have had no such expectation, and, therefore, the compensation in the latter case should be only in respect of the loss of the strict

A legal right to remain in office for the rest of the year for which he had actually been appointed.

APPEAL by the plaintiff from an order of His Honour JUDGE A. R. THOMAS,
B in the Mayor's and City of London Court, dated May 23, 1949.

The plaintiff had been the holder of the office of collector of tithes in each of three parishes. In the cases of two of the offices prior to their abolition by the City of London (Tithes) Act, 1947, he had had reasonable expectation that he would continue to hold office indefinitely, but in the case of the third he was aware, on appointment, that the office was likely shortly to be abolished.
C JUDGE THOMAS held that it was proper in each case, in assessing the compensation to be paid for loss of office under s. 16 (1) of the Act, to take into account the loss of expectation of the plaintiff's continuing in office. The Court of Appeal now affirmed his decision. The facts appear in the judgment of SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R.

D Blain for the plaintiff.

Heathcote-Williams, K.C., for the corporation.

SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R. : By the City of London (Tithes) Act, 1947, a private Act of Parliament passed, to take the words of the title,

E
> " . . . for extinguishing tithes and tithe rates and other payments by way or in lieu of tithes in the City of London ; and for other purposes," it was provided, in s. 16 (1) :

> " Every officer in office at the date of the passing of this Act who suffers substantial detriment to his livelihood by reason of the passing of this > F Act shall be entitled to compensation from the corporation [of the City of London] for that detriment."

It is conceded that the plaintiff, Mr. Cecil John Poley Price, falls within the description of an officer in office at the date of the passing of the Act, for by s. 16 (6) the word " officer " is defined as meaning " any clerk or collector appointed in connection with," among other things, " the collection of tithes."
G The Act of Parliament came into operation on Oct. 1, 1947, having received the Royal Assent on July 31, 1947. At both those dates the plaintiff was a collector appointed in connection with the collection of tithes in three parishes in the city of London, which I will refer to briefly as the parishes of St. Swithun, St. Antholin and St. Ethelburga. In the case of the first two of those parishes the plaintiff had held the office of collector for some considerable H time. His appointment to the office in the parish of St. Ethelburga was dated Dec. 17, 1945, and was effected by a letter to the terms of which I will refer more fully presently. As I understand the evidence, the appointments in each of the three cases were, strictly speaking, annual appointments in the sense that at the beginning of each year, expressly or tacitly, the plaintiff was re-appointed, but I also understand that by the custom which existed in these matters the office which he held—and I confine myself for the present to the first two parishes—was regarded as a perpetual office in the sense that the holder, so long as he was able to act, continued so to act, and, indeed, the office was commonly passed within a family from father to son.

Reverting to the terms of s. 16 (1), at first sight, as it seems to me, in assessing compensation for "substantial detriment" suffered by reason of the passing of the Act, it would be necessary to inquire what were the rights which the holder of the office had of which he had been deprived by the Act. If that were the correct approach exclusively in every case, the result would appear to be that the damage suffered would only be in respect of an uncompleted year for which the holder of the office had been appointed. He would have no right known to the law in respect of any future years, but so strict an interpretation of the statute would involve a neglect of the true facts and of common sense. When, therefore, the learned judge came to deal with the claim he took account of the fact—and, again, I am confining myself to the first two parishes—well-known by all concerned, that in the ordinary way a holder of this office would have the expectation of continuing in it more or less indefinitely. Proceeding on that view, and having regard to the age of the plaintiff, the learned judge arrived at a sum for compensation which multiplied the annual value of the office by ten, that is, he allowed a ten years expectation of office. Taking account, no doubt, of the vicissitudes of life, the possibility of death, and so on, ten years seemed to him to be a fair period for compensation on that basis. There has been no quarrel with his finding in that respect.

When, however, the learned judge came to apply himself to the office in respect of the parish of St. Ethelburga he came to the conclusion that there was no room for such an expectation of continued holding of the office as would justify any multiplication of the annual value by any number of years. That conclusion really turns solely on the terms of the plaintiff's appointment. I, therefore, at this stage, read the letter addressed to the plaintiff and signed by the then sole churchwarden of the parish, Mr. Hathaway Tucker. It was dated Dec. 17, 1945, rather more than eighteen months before the passing of the Act, and was as follows :

> "Dear Mr. Price, I understand that you are willing to accept the post of tithe clerk for the parish of St. Ethelburga the Virgin within Bishopsgate, and I am glad to appoint you to the post as from Jan. 1, 1946. A second churchwarden will doubtless be appointed next Easter. In view of the statement in this week's CITY PRESS it will be clear to you that the appointment is not likely to be of long duration."

We have not seen the issue of the newspaper alluded to, but I understand (and there is no dispute about this) that pursuant to standing orders of Parliament the promoters of the bill which eventually became the City of London (Tithes) Act, 1947—I do not say in exactly the form in which it was originally promoted—were bound to give notice in the newspapers of the proposal to introduce the bill. The reference in the letter is, undoubtedly, a reference to the notice then published that a bill was being promoted for the abolition of tithes in the city of London, a bill which, if it became law, would necessarily have the effect of putting an end to the office of tithe collector. In the light of the reference in that letter, what were the expectations ? The learned judge's conclusion is in the following terms :

> "I do not think one can say that when the appellant got the appointment [to St. Ethelburga] he really had any expectation of it going on for any particular time."

It seems to me impossible for us to differ from that conclusion. I think that when one reads the letter it becomes manifest that the appointment in this case was radically different from the other appointments in the important respect, that, whereas previously on appointment he had expected to continue in office indefinitely, the terms of this appointment made it quite plain that it was from the start intended to be—and it was accepted as being—very probably a short term appointment. As it seems to me, in view of the terms in which that letter was couched, counsel for the plaintiff is in this difficulty. To justify in the cases of St. Swithun and St. Antholin a figure which goes A beyond any legal rights which the plaintiff has, he must take account of the expectations which were entertained by the parties to the agreement from the beginning. In those cases something unknown and unprophesied at the date when the appointment was made has come into being and destroyed the hitherto accepted basis of those appointments. If, to justify the additional calculation in the first two cases, expectations are properly to be taken into B account, they cannot be excluded here, and the terms of the letter make it quite clear that no expectations and no promises were held out to the plaintiff when he was appointed beyond the expectation and promise that until, if at all, this Act was passed, he should hold office, but that he would not hold it beyond that period. In other words, the terms of his appointment negatived the notion that there was any kind of "freehold tenure," to use a C phrase used in the argument. The plaintiff must be taken willingly to have accepted this appointment on the strict legal basis of annual re-appointment. If that is correct, as it seems to me, no compensation within the language of s. 16 (1) could properly be arrived at which went beyond his strict legal rights. On that view, the learned judge in the Mayor's Court thought that all he could allow in respect of St. Ethelburga was a sum made up for the three D months October, November and December, 1947, in respect of which the plaintiff, though legally holding office, was deprived of the fruits of his employment. The figure he arrived at, £500 in all, allowed only so much in respect of St. Ethelburga.

My conclusion is that the learned judge was right and that this appeal should be dismissed.

E DENNING, L.J.: I agree. It is true that in Ex parte Lee (1) a different statute was under consideration, but that case expressed the same underlying principle, namely, that when assessing compensation for loss of office the tribunal should assess the compensation, not so much for loss of the legal right to the office, as for loss of the expectation of continuing in the office. It was held in that case that regard may be properly had to the fact F that at the date of the appointment the expectation of continuance was very little. LORD DENMAN, C.J., there said (7 Ad. & El. 142):

> "There could be no real loss, as it must have been known that the office would so soon cease."

So, here, the judge has found that at the time of the appointment the probability G was that the Act was going to be passed extinguishing tithe and that the plaintiff would lose his office in a very short time. The learned judge was right to take that into account. I agree, therefore, with my Lord that this appeal should be dismissed.

Lease—Assignment—Landlord's consent—" Will not be withheld in the case of a respectable and responsible person "—Need to imply proviso that lease not to be unreasonably withheld—Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927 (c. 36), s. 19 (1).

By a lease of certain premises the tenant covenanted not to assign the premises without the landlord's consent, and it was further provided that " such consent will not be withheld in the case of a respectable and responsible person." The tenant assigned the lease to a respectable and responsible person without having obtained the landlord's consent. On a claim by the landlord for possession,

Held : on the true construction of the covenant no consent by the landlord was required where the assignment was to a respectable and responsible person, and, in consequence, s. 19 (1) (a) of the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927, did not apply and the provision in the lease was not to be deemed to be subject to a proviso that the licence was not to be unreasonably withheld and so could be withheld on reasonable grounds.

Appeal by the landlord from a decision of His Honour Judge Blagden sitting at West London County Court, dated May 12, 1949, dismissing the landlord's claim for possession on the ground of breach of a covenant not to assign. The Court of Appeal dismissed the appeal.

Heathcote-Williams, K.C., and P. Freeman for the landlord.
Hunter-Brown for the tenant and the assignee of the lease.

SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R. : This is an appeal by a landlord who sought to recover possession of certain premises in Cornwall Gardens, London, as on a forfeiture for breach of contract by the tenant. Due notice under the Law of Property Act, 1925, s. 146, has been served, but the learned judge in the court below came to the conclusion that there had been no breach of contract and on that account dismissed the action. The breach alleged was an assignment by the tenant, Major Martin, to a Mr. Thom without the previous written consent of Mr. Moat, the landlord.

When the case was opened, it appeared that the main question which the landlord desired to put before this court was of the same kind as that in Swanson v. Forton (1) and Lee v. K. Carter, Ltd. (2) being whether, having regard to the period then remaining unexpired of the original term and the other circumstances of the case, including the proper inference to be drawn as to the tenant's intention himself to go on residing on the premises, it was unreasonable for the landlord to withhold his consent when by so doing he would prevent a person other than the existing tenant enjoying the privileges of the Rent Acts after expiry of the term. The learned judge came to the conclusion that there was here an unreasonable refusal by the landlord, distinguishing this case from the two cases to which I have alluded. It must not be assumed from anything I say that I think the learned judge was wrong in his conclusion, but as it has turned out it has been unnecessary for this court to consider that matter.

A preliminary point has arisen on which the learned judge concluded in favour of the landlord. The preliminary point arises because the provision against assignment is, in the present case, in an unusual form. It reads :

> "The tenant agrees with the landlord as follows . . . Not to assign A underlet or part with the possession of the demised premises or any part thereof without the consent in writing of the landlord such consent will not be withheld in the case of a respectable and responsible person and to pay the landlord a fee . . ."

All persons conversant with this type of case will appreciate that the formula which I have read departs from the more usual provision which, making perhaps B a virtue of necessity, follows the terms of the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927, s. 19 (1) (a), by saying "such consent not to be unreasonably withheld in the case of a respectable and responsible person." Here the provision is much more positive in the tenant's favour. It is : "such consent will not be withheld." The point was taken in the court below that, as Mr. Thom is by universal admission both respectable and responsible, the landlord has debarred himself C in any event from withholding his consent. The learned judge, however, came to the conclusion that a proper reading of s. 19 (1) (a) of the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927, compelled him to qualify the apparently absolute obligation on the landlord not to withhold his consent by inserting the word "unreasonably" after the words "will not be" and before the word "withheld." With all respect to the learned judge I do not think he was right in taking D that view. It would, indeed, be rather surprising if it were right, for one must not lose sight of the fact that the purpose of Part II of the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927, was to relieve tenants in certain respects and on certain conditions from the full strictness of their obligations. Section 19, on the face of it, is intended primarily to relieve the tenant from the result of arbitrary refusal by the landlord to give consent to assignment by requiring that consent to be E subjected to the proviso that it would not be unreasonably withheld. The learned judge came to the conclusion that though, no doubt, that was the primary intention of the section, nevertheless it did not in terms say that it only operated for the tenant's benefit, and, therefore, that if in particular cases it operated the other way, that could not be helped.

My view is that, properly construed, there is no real room for the applica- F tion of this section at all. It is obvious that the paragraph in the tenancy agreement which I have read may be construed in two ways. It may be said, on the one hand, that the words "such consent will not be withheld" amount to an affirmative, positive covenant by the landlord not to withhold consent in the case of a proposed assignment to a certain type of person. Alternatively, it may be said that the effect of the words "such consent will G not be withheld" does not impose a positive obligation or covenant on the landlord, but cuts down the tenant's obligation so as to make it inapplicable in the case of a proposed assignment to certain persons. In other words, in the case of an assignment to a respectable and responsible person there is no covenant by the tenant not to assign without consent. Since Treloar v. Bigge (3), in the ordinary case where the covenant is qualified by such words H as "such consent not to be unreasonably withheld" the effect is not to impose a countervailing obligation on the landlord, but is to limit or curtail the tenant's obligation under his covenant. In the present case there is a very unusual formula and it might be thought to be an exception to the general rule, but it is unnecessary to express a conclusion one way or the other because in either event, as it seems to me, s. 19 is inapplicable. Section 19 (1) provides :

> "In all leases . . . containing a covenant . . . against assigning . . . without . . . consent, such covenant . . . shall, notwithstanding any > express provision to the contrary, be deemed to be subject (a) to a proviso to the effect that such . . . consent is not to be unreasonably withheld."

The first thing to be noticed about the section is that it applies only in cases where there is a covenant against assignment without consent. If the true view is that the covenant against assignment in this case does not apply at all in the case of assignment to a responsible person, then there is no covenant which binds the tenant, and, therefore, nothing in respect of which s. 19 can A come into play. On the other hand, if there is a countervailing covenant that the landlord will not withhold his consent in certain circumstances, then that countervailing covenant is not a covenant against assignment. On that view there is no ground for reading into a covenant by the landlord not to withhold consent a proviso which is only required by the section to be inserted in a covenant by a tenant against assignment without consent. B

There would be other and formidable difficulties in so construing s. 19 as to require one to introduce the word "unreasonable" into the covenant in favour of the landlord. The result, in my judgment, is, with all respect to the learned judge in the court below, that this preliminary point is fatal in the circumstances of this case (Mr. Thom being admittedly a person who is reputable and responsible) to the landlord's contention. For reasons best C known to himself the landlord chose to enter into a covenant in which he said quite positively and clearly that in the case of assignment to respectable and responsible persons he would not in any circumstances withhold his consent. I see no reason why he should not now comply with the terms of the bargain he made. The result is, in my view, that on this point the appeal must fail. I am not expressing any view on the points on which the learned judge decided D in the tenant's favour and on which it is unnecessary in the circumstances for us to hear argument.

DENNING, L.J. : Under this covenant I take it to be clear that the tenant would in the case of any proposed assignment have to ask for the landlord's consent. To that extent, therefore, it is a covenant not to assign E without consent within the opening words of s. 19, but in this covenant there is a provision that such consent will not be withheld in the case of a respectable and responsible person. That provision is not "to the contrary of" a proviso that the consent is not to be unreasonably withheld. It supports it and goes beyond it. The provision is, therefore, not negatived by s. 19 (1), (a), for that only negatives provisions "to the contrary," which this is not. I agree, therefore, F that this appeal should be dismissed.

HODSON, J. : The county court judge's first impression was that the agreement which the parties had made was to be given its natural and ordinary meaning and that in those circumstances the landlord was out of court. That, I think, is really the correct view. The provision in this case is that the consent to assign will not be withheld at all, the circumstances of the G case being that the proposed assignee is admittedly a responsible and respectable person. There is, therefore, no room to inquire whether the consent is being withheld reasonably or unreasonably. In my judgment, s. 19 (1) of the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927, does not apply and I agree that the appeal must be dismissed.

O'NEILL v. O'NEILL AND PIGGOTT.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Bucknill, Cohen and Asquith, L.JJ.), October 17, 1949.]

Divorce—Appeal—Damages—Appeal by co-respondent—Appeal after decree absolute—Opportunity to co-respondent to appeal from decree nisi—Enlargement of time for appeal—Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925 (c. 49), s. 31 (1) (e)—R.S.C., Ord. 58, r. 15.

In a petition for dissolution of marriage on the ground of adultery a sum of £350 was awarded as damages against the co-respondent who had entered an appearance solely on the question of damages and costs. The decree nisi was pronounced on July 14, 1949, and was made absolute on Aug. 29. On Aug. 23 the co-respondent instructed his solicitors to appeal against the order for damages, but his advisers took the view that there was insufficient time to lodge an appeal within the six weeks after decree nisi allowed under R.S.C., Ord. 58, r. 15, and applied by notice of motion to the Court of Appeal for leave to appeal out of time.

HELD: the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, s. 31 (1) (e), which prohibits appeals from an order absolute for the dissolution of marriage by any person who, having had time and opportunity to appeal from the decree nisi, has not done so, does not apply to an appeal against an order for damages, which is independent of, and not ancillary to, an order absolute for divorce: Kent v. Atkinson ([1923] P. 142) and W. v. W. & D. ([1948] P. 157), applied; and in the circumstances of the case the co-respondent should have leave to appeal.

APPLICATION by the co-respondent to enlarge the time for appeal against an order against him for damages in a suit for divorce.

The co-respondent in a husband's suit for dissolution of marriage entered an appearance solely on the claim for damages and costs and was represented at the trial to contest this issue. After an award of £350 damages had been made against him he allowed five and a half weeks to pass before instructing his solicitors to lodge an appeal against the amount of damages. Considering that there was insufficient time to lodge an appeal within the prescribed period of six weeks, his advisers applied by notice of motion to the Court of Appeal for leave to appeal out of time. The husband resisted the application on the merits and also contended that the Court of Appeal had no jurisdiction to extend the time for appeal. The Court of Appeal granted the application and ordered that the husband should have the costs of the application in any event.

H. S. Law for the co-respondent.
Petrie for the husband.

BUCKNILL, L.J.: This is a motion for leave to extend the time to appeal. It is made on behalf of John Piggott, who was co-respondent in a divorce suit which was heard at Gloucester on July 14, 1949. The husband asked for the dissolution of his marriage on the ground of his wife's adultery with the co-respondent. Neither the wife nor the co-respondent disputed the adultery, but the wife entered an appearance on the question of custody and the co-respondent entered an appearance on the question of costs and damages. The husband claimed £500 damages. The co-respondent was represented by counsel at the hearing. The question of damages was fought out and the judge awarded the husband £350. The case was a district registry case in the Gloucester district.

The appropriate rule on the subject is Ord. 58, r. 15, which provides that no appeal from any order in any matter not being an action shall be brought after the expiration of six weeks unless the court or a judge at the time of making the order or at any time subsequently or the Court of Appeal shall enlarge the time. Two questions have been debated here—(i) that the court has no jurisdiction to extend the time, and (ii) whether this is a case in which it is proper for the court to extend the time.

On the first point counsel for the husband relied on the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, s. 31 (1), which provides :

> " No appeal shall lie . . . (e) from an order absolute for the dissolution or nullity of marriage in favour of any party who having had time and opportunity to appeal from the decree nisi on which the order was founded, has not appealed from that decree."

He argued that the co-respondent had had time and opportunity to appeal from the decree nisi because, the decree absolute was made on Aug. 29 and he had six weeks from July 14 to that date in which to do so. What the co-respondent did was this. On the evening of Aug. 23 he consulted his solicitors with a view to instructing them to take the necessary steps to lodge an appeal, and he says that he was informed that his wishes were communicated to counsel who represented him on the hearing of the petition, that counsel took the view that there was then insufficient time to obtain the essential documents and lodge an appeal in the ordinary way, and he (counsel), therefore, settled a draft notice of motion for leave to appeal out of time. So it seems clear that there was time and opportunity to appeal from the decree nisi before the decree absolute was made, and, if s. 31 (1) (e) applies, it would appear absolutely to bar the co-respondent's right to appeal now, with the result that we could not give him leave to appeal.

In my view, s. 31 (1) (e) does not apply to a case of this kind. That seems to be clear from the two cases to which we have been referred. One was Kent v. Atkinson (1) where Hill, J., decided that the petition for damages in a case of adultery was independent of, and not ancillary to, the petition for divorce, the death of the wife pending suit did not destroy the cause of action at common law which arose when the wrong was done, and there was no reason why her death before action should have any different effect, and, therefore, the death of the wife did not prevent the husband filing a petition for damages unless there were overriding provisions to be found in the Act. That shows clearly that the claim for damages is independent of the petition for dissolution. The fact that we are giving leave to appeal does not in any way affect the decree absolute which has been made.

The other case is W. v. W. & D. (2), where Willmer, J., held that, as an appeal against damages was not an appeal against the decree for dissolution of marriage but only against the quantum of damages awarded, the petitioner was at liberty to have the decree made absolute although the appeal had not been heard. One can quite understand how essential it is to bar appeals after decrees absolute have been made except in the circumstances laid down in s. 31, but sub-s. (1) (e), in my view, does not apply to a case where there is only an application to appeal against an award of damages.

The second point is whether in the circumstances of this case we ought to give leave to appeal. I appreciate what counsel for the husband has said—that it is hard on the husband that he should have his award held up pending the hearing of the appeal. He will not, however, be seriously prejudiced because the money has been paid into court, and I understand that his costs have also been paid. It is a fine point, but there was only a very short overlap, which occurred during the Long Vacation, and I think if the solicitor had taken other steps—I do not say he was to blame for not taking them—he could by the evening of Aug. 25 have done what was necessary to lodge the notice of appeal within time on his client's instructions. Counsel took a different view. He thought there was not time and so he lodged a draft notice of motion for leave to appeal out of time. I think in all the circumstances it would be hard on the co-respondent to shut him out from a right to appeal.

COHEN, L.J.: I agree.

ASQUITH, L.J.: I also agree.

[COURT OF CRIMINAL APPEAL (Lord Goddard, C.J., Croom-Johnson and Lynskey, JJ.), October 14, 1949.]

Criminal Law—Being found by night in a building with intent to commit felony—"In any building"—Prisoner with arm through window attempting to enter building—Larceny Act, 1916 (c. 50), s. 28 (4).

By the Larceny Act, 1916, s. 28: "Every person who shall be found by night . . . (4) in any building with intent to commit any felony therein; shall be guilty of a misdemeanour . . ."

The appellant was seen by night half-way up some piping at the side of a building with one of his hands through a window for the purpose of pulling himself into the building.

HELD: the words "being found in any building" must be construed in their ordinary sense; the appellant was found, not in the building but merely trying to get into it; and, therefore, he was not guilty of an offence under s. 28 (4).

[FOR THE LARCENY ACT, 1916, s. 28 (4), see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Vol. 4, p. 828.]

APPEAL against conviction at West Kent Quarter Sessions of being found in a building with intent to commit a felony, namely, larceny. The appellant was found attempting to enter the building. The appeal was allowed and the conviction quashed.

W. I. Percival for the appellant.
Maxwell Turner for the Crown.

LYNSKEY, J., delivered the following judgment of the court. The appellant was convicted at West Kent Quarter Sessions of being found by night in a building with intent to steal, contrary to the Larceny Act, 1916, s. 28 (4), and was sentenced to four months' imprisonment. He now appeals against his conviction on the ground that on the facts, which were not in dispute, he was not found in any building with intent to commit a felony.

The circumstances are that shortly after midnight on July 16, 1949, a police officer passing near a cinematograph theatre saw the appellant half-way up some piping at the side of the building with his foot on the junction of two pipes and his head and shoulders close to a window. In the police officer's view, though he could not see clearly, the appellant had one of his hands through the window for the purpose of gripping the sill and pulling himself into the building.

At the trial a submission was made on the appellant's behalf that on those facts he was not in the building for the purposes of s. 28 (4). The prosecution, on the other hand, said that, if he had been charged under s. 27 (2) with breaking and entering, the fact that he had one arm through the window would be a sufficient entry for the purposes of constituting that offence. We have to construe this statute according to its clear words. The words of s. 28 are :

> " Every person who shall be found by night . . . (4) in any building with intent to commit any felony therein ; shall be guilty of a misdemeanour . . ."

The question is: What do these words " being found in any building " mean ? One has to apply the ordinary meaning to the words unless the context requires them to be given some unusual meaning. The ordinary meaning of the words in the section is that the person must be found in a building. The circumstances of this case show that the appellant was not found in the building but that he was found outside the building trying to get into it. Therefore, of whatever other offence he may have been guilty, he was not guilty of the offence with which he was charged, namely, being found in a building with intent to commit a felony. The appeal will be allowed and the conviction quashed.

Appeal allowed.

Income Tax—Allowance—" Expenditure . . . laid out or expended wholly or exclusively for the purpose of . . . business "—Raw material for manufacturing cigarettes—Contract to collect and remove leaves from forests—Indian Income Tax Act, 1922, s. 10 (2), para. xii (as amended by Indian Income Tax (Amendment) Act, 1939).

By the Indian Income Tax Act, 1922, s. 10 (2), para. xii (as amended by the Indian Income Tax (Amendment) Act, 1939), in computing the profits or gains of a business for the purpose of income tax an allowance is to be made for " any expenditure (not being in the nature of capital expenditure or personal expenses of the assessee) laid out or expended wholly or exclusively for the purpose of such business."

The appellants, a firm of cigarette manufacturers, entered into short term contracts with the owners of forests in India with the object wholly and exclusively of supplying themselves with raw material for the purpose of their business by enabling them to pick and remove the leaves of tendu trees which they used instead of paper in making cigarettes.

HELD : on their true construction the contracts granted to the appellants no interest in land or in the trees or plants themselves, but merely a right to pick and carry away the leaves and appropriate them as their own property ; A the expression " expenditure . . . laid out or expended wholly or exclusively for the purpose of such business " must be construed in a business sense; and in a business sense the expenditure in question was on revenue, and not on capital, account, and so fell to be allowed under para. xii.

APPEAL from the High Court of Nagpur confirming an assessment to income tax.

The taxpayers appealed against a judgment confirming an assessment to income tax for the years 1940-1 and 1941-2. They claimed that money expended E under contracts with the Government of India and other proprietors of forests by which they were granted the right to remove and collect the leaves of tendu trees was a current expense for the purposes of their business and as such deductible for income tax. The decision of the income tax officer disallowing that claim was upheld by two income tax appeal tribunals and by the High Court at Nagpur. The Board now allowed the taxpayers' appeal.

The Board took time for consideration.

July 28. LORD GREENE : This appeal raises a short question as to G the application of s. 10 (2), para. xii, of the Indian Income Tax Act, 1922, as amended by the Indian Income Tax (Amendment) Act, 1939, in respect of assessments on the appellants for the years 1940-1 and 1941-2. That paragraph provides that in computing profits or gains of a business for the purpose of income tax an allowance is to be made for " any expenditure (not being in the nature of capital expenditure or personal expenses of the assessee) laid out or H expended wholly or exclusively for the purpose of such business." Certain expenditure claimed by the assessee to be a permissible deduction under this paragraph and admitted to have been made " wholly and exclusively for the purpose " of the business of the appellants was disallowed by the income tax officer. His order was confirmed successively by the Appellate Assistant Commissioner of Income Tax, Nagpur, and by the Income Tax Appellate Tribunal, Bombay. Application was made to that tribunal for a reference to the High Court of Judicature, Nagpur, of the question whether the appellants were entitled to the deduction in question and the High Court (Sir Frederick Grille, C.J. and Sen, J.) answered that question in the negative for the reasons given by them in their judgment in another case.

The relevant facts are as follows. The appellants carry on business at several places in the Central Provinces of India as manufacturers and vendors of country made cigarettes which are known as bidis. These cigarettes are composed of tobacco contained or rolled in leaves of a tree known as tendu leaves which fulfil a corresponding function in the finished cigarette to that played by a cigarette paper. The appellants obtain the tendu leaves which they require by entering into a number of contracts with the government and other owners of forests. Two of these contracts which were taken as typical of the rest are included in the record, one relating to a government forest and one to a forest belonging to the Rewa State. It is important to examine the terms of these documents. The former is dated Sept. 5, 1939, and is made between the divisional forest officer on behalf of the Secretary of State in Council and the appellants' representative described as the "forest contractor." Clause 1 identifies the subject-matter of the contract, which is described as "the forest produce sold and purchased under the agreement," as that specified in sched. 1 in the "contract area" therein indicated. By cl. 2 the quantity of the forest produce is defined as all the said produce "which may now exist or may come into existence in the contract area which the forest contractor may remove from the said area . . . during the period from Sept. 5, 1939, to June 30, 1941." Schedule 1A provides that "the contractor shall commence his work before the day of 193 , and shall, to the satisfaction of the office empowered to execute the contract on behalf of government, make continuous and adequate progress throughout the term of the contract." In this provision the dates by an obvious oversight are left in blank, but the date of commencement could not be later than Dec. 31, 1939. In the second of the two agreements, which with certain minor differences is substantially in the same form, the period of the operations is Oct. 1, 1938, to June 30, 1941, and the work is to be commenced on Oct. 1, 1938. This agreement recites an application for the grant of "the contract of collecting and removing" tendu leaves. The grant is a grant of the right to collect and remove them from the area described. In the case of each contract a sum payable by instalments is fixed as the consideration for the grant. In the former contract the contractor is allowed to coppice small tendu plants a few months in advance to obtain good leaves and to pollard tendu trees a few months in advance to obtain better and bigger leaves.

It appears to their Lordships that there has been some misapprehension as to the true nature of these agreements and they wish to state at once what in their opinion is and what is not the effect of them. They are merely examples of many similar contracts entered into by the appellants wholly and exclusively for the purpose of their business, that purpose being to supply themselves with one of the raw materials of that business. The contracts grant no interest in land and no interest in the trees or plants themselves. They are simply and solely contracts giving to the grantees the right to pick and carry away leaves, which, of course, implies the right to appropriate them as their own property. The small right of cultivation given in the first of the two contracts is merely ancillary and is of no more significance than would be, e.g., a right to spray a fruit tree given to the person who has bought the crop of apples. The contracts are short term contracts. The picking of the leaves under them has to start at once or practically at once and to proceed continuously. It is true that the rights under the contracts are exclusive, but in such a case as this that is a matter which appears to their Lordships to be of no significance.

The question, therefore, resolves itself into the short one :—Is expenditure of this character made in acquiring one of the raw materials of the appellant's manufacture capital expenditure within the meaning of this Act ? There is no definition of that expression which must, in their Lordships' opinion, be construed in a business sense save in so far as there may be rules of construction applicable to it. Their Lordships feel no doubt that in a business sense this expenditure is expenditure on revenue account and not on capital account just as much as if the tendu leaves had been bought in a shop. Under the contracts it is the tendu leaves and nothing but the tendu leaves that are acquired. It is not the right to A pick the leaves or to go on to the land for the purpose—those rights are merely ancillary to the real purpose of the contracts, and, if not expressed, would be implied by law in the sale of a growing crop.

In their Lordships' opinion, the High Court has adopted an approach to the question which has diverted its view from the real point and has attached too much importance to cases decided on quite different facts. Cases relating to the B purchase or leasing of mines, quarries, deposits of brick earth, land with standing timber, &c. referred to in the judgment and relied on in the argument before the Board do not appear to their Lordships to be of assistance, nor do their Lordships consider that the elaborate distinction between movable and immovable property drawn in the judgment affords in such a case as the present a reliable test.

The cases principally relied on in the judgment are Alianza Co., Ltd. v. Bell (1) C and Kauri Timber Co., Ltd. v. Commissioner of Taxes (2). The former was the case of a company whose object was treated as one to work and develop a bed containing a substance called caliche from which nitrates and iodine could be obtained by a process or manufacture. It was analogous to the purchase or leasing of a mine and was obviously capital expenditure. The claim was one equivalent to a claim to deduct the expenditure made in D acquiring the land for it was a claim to deduct the amount carried year by year to a sinking fund set up to meet the exhaustion of the caliche. This case appears to their Lordships to bear no resemblance to the facts of the present case which resembles much more closely Coltness Iron Co. v. Black (3) described and distinguished by CHANNELL, J., in his judgment in Alianza Co., Ltd. v. Bell (1) of the cost of material worked up in a manufactory. CHANNELL, J., said ([1904] E 2 K.B. 673):

> " . . . it is a current expenditure, and does not become a capital expenditure merely because the material is provided by something like a forward contract, under which a person for the payment of a lump sum down secures a supply of the raw material for a period extending over several F years."

In the Kauri Timber case (2) the company's business consisted in cutting and disposing of timber. It acquired in some cases timber bearing lands; in other cases it purchased the standing timber. The leases were for 99 years. So far as the cases where the land was acquired were concerned, there could have been no doubt that the expenditure made in acquiring it was capital G expenditure. In the case of the purchase of the standing timber what was acquired was an interest in land. The purchasers bought the trees which they could allow to remain standing as long as they liked. As LORD SHAW OF DUNFERMLINE said in delivering the judgment of the Board ([1913] A.C. 776):

> " So long as the timber, at the option of the company, remained upon H the soil, it derived its sustenance and nutriment from it. The additional growths became ipso jure the property of the company."

In the present case the trees were not acquired, nor were the leaves acquired until the appellants had reduced them into their own possession and ownership by picking them. The two cases can, in their Lordships' opinion, in no sense be regarded as comparable. If the tendu leaves had been stored in a merchant's go-down and the appellants had bought the right to go and fetch them and so reduce them into their possession and ownership it could scarcely have been suggested that the purchase price was capital expenditure. Their Lordships see no ground in principle or reason for differentiating the present case from that supposed. Their Lordships will humbly advise His Majesty that this appeal should be allowed and that the respondent should be ordered to pay the costs of the appellants of and relating to the reference to the High Court. The respondent will pay the costs of this appeal.

Divorce—Practice—Costs—Poor person—Security for costs—Payment by wife respondent of deposit to Poor Persons Committee—Subsequent application for security for costs—Amount of order against husband—Deduction of deposit from amount of security—R.S.C., Ord. 16, r. 28 (5), r. 28a.

A wife respondent in a divorce suit appearing as a poor person asked for an order that her husband should pay £10 10*s.* 0*d.* into court by way of security for her costs in respect of items recoverable on taxation. The registrar deducted from this sum £3 3*s.* 0*d.* due in respect of charges by the Law Society and made an order for £7 7*s.* 0*d.* The wife had already paid by way of deposit to the Poor Persons Committee the sum of £5 to cover the out-of-pocket expenses of the conducting solicitor in accordance with R.S.C., Ord. 16, r. 28 (5) and r. 28a. Both husband and wife appealed against the registrar's order.

Held: where a wife has handed to the Poor Persons Committee a sum to be devoted to paying the conducting solicitor's out-of-pocket expenses the proper way to deal with the matter, if subsequently she applies for an order for security for her costs in respect of items recoverable on taxation, is to deduct any sum so paid by her from whatever the proper sum may be in respect of which she would otherwise have been entitled to ask for security, and, accordingly, the appropriate method of procedure in the present case was to subtract the £5 deposit from the £10 10*s.* 0*d.* asked for by way of security and to order the husband to pay the balance, viz., £5 10*s.* 0*d.*, into court or to give bond for that amount.

Appeal from an order of the registrar ordering a petitioner husband to give security for his wife's costs in a defended suit for divorce.

The wife respondent applied for a certificate to defend a petition for divorce and paid to the Poor Persons Committee the sum of £5 as a deposit to cover the out-of-pocket expenses of the conducting solicitor. Subsequently, she asked for an order against her husband for £10 10*s.* 0*d.* as security for her costs, made up as follows: £3 3*s.* 0*d.* payable to the Law Society in respect of their administrative charges, £3 3*s.* 0*d.* for counsel's fees, and £4 4*s.* 0*d.* for anticipated out-of-pocket expenses for the respondent's witnesses. The registrar deducted the sum of £3 3*s.* 0*d.* in respect of the Law Society's charges and made an order for £7 7*s.* 0*d.* Both parties appealed to the judge in chambers, and as a matter of principle was involved it was ordered that the hearing should be adjourned into open court for argument. PILCHER, J., now allowed the appeal of both parties and ordered the husband to give security for the sum of £5 10*s.* 0*d.*, being the balance left after deducting from the £10 10*s.* 0*d.* the sum of £5 the wife had paid as deposit to the Poor Persons Committee.

A Merrylees for the wife (respondent).

Bayne-Powell for the husband (petitioner).

PILCHER, J. : This is an appeal by the wife respondent from an order made by Mr. Registrar Townley Millers on June 22, 1949, ordering the husband to pay into court the sum of £7 7*s.* 0*d.* security for the wife's costs. The wife (who was represented before the registrar by one of the solicitors who act for B the Law Society) asked for £10 10*s.* 0*d.* to be the amount of the security. Counsel for the wife said that that sum was made up as follows :—£3 3*s.* 0*d.* being the sum which the Law Society are entitled to charge in respect of their administrative services in matrimonial causes which they manage ; £3 3*s.* 0*d.* in respect of counsel's fees, the case being a defended case ; and £4 4*s.* 0*d.* being the anticipated out-of-pocket expenses to be incurred in respect of witnesses whom C the wife desired to call. In the result, the registrar ordered security for £7 7*s.* 0*d.* It is clear from a note which he made that he took the view that the £3 3*s.* 0*d.* which the Law Society charges in respect of their services in a case of this kind should not be taken into account in estimating the sums for which the husband should give security.

The ordinary procedure is for every applicant for a poor person's certificate D to be asked to deposit the sum of £5 before the Poor Persons Committee investigate the merits of his case. That is done because often substantial time and trouble are taken in investigating a case which turns out to be unsuitable for prosecution and great difficulty is experienced after the investigation in getting the deposit from the would-be petitioner. The Poor Persons Committee hand this £5 to the cashier of the Law Society, not to the Poor Persons Department E of the Law Society, and not until the case is actually concluded does the cashier of the Law Society hand out any sum to the Poor Persons Department.

Under R.S.C., Ord. 16, r. 28 (5), the Poor Persons Committee

> " . . . may require a poor person in a matrimonial cause or in any other proceedings where in the opinion of the committee the special circumstances so require to deposit with them or as they shall direct a sum of money in F order to cover the out-of-pocket expenses of the conducting solicitor, and if such deposit shall in relation to the proceedings be found insufficient such further sum as the committee may direct. Every sum so deposited shall be utilised by the committee only for the payment to the solicitor of any out-of-pocket expenses (not including office expenses) properly incurred in relation to the proceedings and any surplus shall be repaid to the poor person."

G Rule 28A is a new rule and sub-r. (2) of that rule is in the following terms :

> " Where a solicitor employed by the Law Society as aforesaid is nominated by a committee as conducting solicitor for the purpose of the proceedings, the committee shall pay to the Law Society in respect of the proceedings the sum of £3 3*s.* 0*d.*, or such lesser sum as the Law Society may from time H to time prescribe, towards the cost of the employment of the conducting solicitor and of the department of the Law Society under his supervision."

It is under those two rules that the Poor Persons Committee have acted in the present case. The wife objected to the order and she appealed from it, contending that the registrar ought to have ordered by way of security the whole sum of £10 10*s.* 0*d.* which she claims to be the amount of her probable costs. Counsel also appeared on behalf of the husband against the order and said that £7 7*s.* 0*d.* was too much and that the proper way to deal with the matter was to take the wife's estimated costs at £10 10*s*. 0*d*. and to deduct from that the sum of £5 which she had paid by way of deposit to the Poor Persons Committee, which sum the committee in their turn had deposited with the cashier of the Law Society towards the out-of-pocket expenses generally in connection with the case. Counsel for the wife regarded the matter more as one of principle than as a dispute on the particular figures and was inclined to think that possibly the registrar might have arrived at the right figure for his £7 7*s*. 0*d*. for the reason which I will give presently.

I am satisfied that where the wife has actually handed to the Poor Persons Committee a sum to be devoted to paying the solicitor's out-of-pocket expenses, the proper way to deal with the matter when she subsequently makes an application for security for costs is to deduct any sum so paid by her from whatever the proper sum may be in respect of which she would otherwise have been entitled to ask for security. One does not need to cite authority for the proposition that a wife is nowadays granted security for her costs or part of them for the protection of the solicitor conducting her case. I need only refer to Smith v. Smith and Rutherford (1). In the present case the Law Society had in their hands a sum of £5 and the wife then estimated her costs at £10 10*s*. 0*d*. The appropriate method of procedure, therefore, would be to subtract the £5 from the £10 10*s*. 0*d*. and to order the husband to pay by way of security, or to give bond, for the balance, namely, £5 10*s*. 0*d*.

Counsel for the wife further said with justification that in some cases the Services Department of the Law Society asks the Poor Persons Committee to obtain from the petitioner a further deposit which, I suppose, in the ordinary way would be to deal with disbursements recoverable on taxation, but in some cases would be to deal with disbursements not so recoverable. As an instance of that type of disbursement there was given the charge of £1 usually made by the process server which the party would have to pay, whereas it is customary to allow only 10*s*. in respect of the services of the process server on taxation, so that the extra 10*s*. would be irrecoverable on taxation. That is an example of the type of disbursement not recoverable under the present practice which the Poor Persons Committee would ask the petitioner to cover. In a case where it appeared that one of the matters in respect of which the wife was asking for security was such an irrecoverable item it would be proper for the registrar to take into account the fact that that particular disbursement was irrecoverable, but, in the present case, where I have been told that the whole basis on which the registrar proceeded was that all sums were properly recoverable on taxation, that complication is not one with which I need concern myself. Proceeding on the general principle which I have already indicated, I think that both these appeals must be allowed and that the amount of security which the wife is entitled to have is not £10 10*s*. 0*d*. nor £7 7*s*. 0*d*., but £10 10*s*. 0*d*. minus £5—£5 10*s*. 0*d*.

A latitude must always be allowed to the registrar and I should have hesitated to interfere with this order if it was not clear from the note which he made at the time on what basis he proceeded. It is here clear that the registrar deducted from the £10 10*s*. 0*d*. which the wife claimed the sum of £3 3*s*. 0*d*. which he, not unnaturally, thought that the Poor Persons Committee had handed over to the Services Department of the Law Society. What had, in fact, occurred was that the wife had deposited £5 towards the costs of her case with the Poor Persons Committee who in their turn had handed this sum over to the cashier of the Law Society. Accordingly, I think both of these appeals will be allowed and security will be ordered in the sum of £5 10*s*. 0*d*. Appeal of both parties allowed.

ACTION by the mother of a soldier who died on military service overseas for probate of his estate on the ground that he died intestate. The defendant put forward a soldier's will made by oral declaration in August, 1944, before the deceased proceeded overseas. HODSON, J., found that the actual words used by the deceased were : "If anything happens to me everything is to be for 'Richie'" (the defendant) and pronounced for the will in that form.

HODSON, J. : The plaintiff is the mother of Mr. Frank Spicer deceased and she is claiming that he died intestate. The defendant, Dorothy May Richardson, contends that the deceased made his last will in or about the month of August, 1944, and by that she alone benefits. The will set up by the defendant is what is called a soldier's will. It is not alleged that the deceased ever made a will such as is required by the law relating to people other than those in actual military service.

The deceased died on Sept. 28, 1947. He was in partnership with the defendant, and for the last 26 years of his life he had lived with her in the same house, not only carrying on the same business but living with her on the terms of husband and wife. They were never married because Mrs. Richardson had a husband who had left her at the time of the 1914/1918 war and she did not know whether or not he was dead. The partnership business was a furniture removal business and accounts have been produced which show that the partners shared the profits equally. It also appears that they bought property jointly and, from the evidence of various witnesses, that not only were they living together but that they were on very affectionate terms. So far as there is any evidence of any discord between them, it is not in the least inconsistent with that general picture.

In 1930 the deceased filled up a printed form by which he purported to leave all his property to the defendant. He dated and signed the document, but his signature was never witnessed, so that the document is of no importance in this case except as an indication of what he wanted to do with his property in 1930. In 1937 his father died, and his mother, the plaintiff, became to some extent dependant for her support on him. From that time onwards he or Mrs. Richardson made payments to her of 10*s.* a week and Mrs. Richardson has continued those payments right up to the present time. In February, 1944, the deceased joined the army. He was over forty years of age and had served in the earlier war. I mention that fact as he would then have known something about a paybook and the pages of the paybook which then, as now, had to do with the making of a will. He was posted abroad to Europe on Aug. 25, 1944. His last leave at home was two days on Aug. 15 and 16, 1944. On the second of those two days, it is said, he made his will orally by a statement to the defendant and to another person, a Mrs. Miller, who has given evidence.

In the pleadings as originally drawn it was stated that at 11, Bath Road, Cheltenham, where the defendant and the mother of the deceased were living, he made a will by declaring that if anything happened to him everything was to be the defendant's. The evidence in support of that was the evidence of the defendant who used this language :

> " Before he left he was very upset and when he left he put his hand to his breast pocket, pulled out a little book, and said : ' If anything happens to me, everything belongs to you. Do as you like with it.' The book was a small one. I did not take all that notice. We were both very upset. Red or brown, I could not say."

Mrs. Miller was a friend who was in the house at the time sitting down by the defendant when this conversation took place. Her version of the language used was this : " He said if anything happened to him, everything was for ' Richie here,' " " Richie " being one of the names by which he called the defendant.

In cross-examination Mrs. Miller admitted that the impression that she gained from what was being said was that he was referring to something that he had already done. The language used, coupled with the gesture, which was spoken to both by the defendant and by Mrs. Miller, the tapping of his pocket and the producing of the book, indicated to them that he was talking about something which he had written, presumably in his paybook, and part of the argument for the plaintiff depends on that point. It is said that if in making these observations, if he ever made them—which is not admitted—he was merely referring to something which he had already done, he was not making a will, but was merely indicating what was the effect of a will which was already in existence. The case relied on to support that proposition is In the Estate of Beech, Beech v. Public Trustee (1), a decision of the Court of Appeal which had to do with two letters written by a soldier in actual military service clearly referring to elaborate testamentary dispositions he had already made. The letters paraphrased the effect of the will inaccurately, so that it was to the advantage of those contending for the admission of the letters as a soldier's will to get them admitted to probate. The court held that what the soldier was doing was merely referring, albeit inaccurately, to what he had already done by his will, and that is clear from the terms of the first letter and not so clear, but also to be inferred, from the terms of the second. In the first letter it was stated : " I daresay you would like to know that I have left you after me both Brandon and the Shawe estates, also the London house." That is clearly indicating what he had done, or thought he had done, by his will, and it was held by the court that that was not a will by a soldier but an indication of an existing testamentary disposition. If I accept the evidence of Mrs. Miller and the defendant, the disposition which the deceased made on the last day of his leave, in my judgment, goes beyond a reference to an existing disposition, and, standing by itself, is an indication of what was to be done with his estate after his death so as to come within the decision in Re Stable, Dalrymple v. Campbell (2) where HORRIDGE, J., said ([1919] P. 9) :

> " . . . it is not necessary, in order to establish the validity of a soldier's will, to prove that he knew he was making a will . . . The statement made A by the deceased man must, I think, be meant for a will, only in the sense that he intended deliberately to give expression to his wishes as to what should be done with his property in the event of his death."

I think language of this kind clearly stating what Mr. Spicer wanted to be done with his property after his death comes within that definition and it is immaterial whether, as HORRIDGE, J., pointed out, he knew it could have any testamentary B effect, and it is equally immaterial whether other people thought, or whether he thought, that he could only do that by referring to a document which was then in existence.

The case as originally presented before the writ was issued was put differently in a letter of Oct. 7, 1947, shortly after the death. The solicitors wrote to the officer in charge of records stating that " Mrs. Richardson of 11, Bath Road, C Cheltenham, has instructed us that the deceased made a will in his paybook " and that that " impression is probably correct." I need not deal, in view of the conclusion at which I have arrived, in great detail with the position of the paybook. Great efforts were made to find it, but it never was found, and the case which was adumbrated in the letter of Oct. 7 was not pleaded. In any event it would have been very difficult for the court to have arrived at a con- D clusion as to what was written in the paybook, if it had been necessary for the defendant to rely on that as being the last will. I need not say anything further about the question because, in my judgment, the statement made by the deceased when he was on the eve of embarkation for overseas to the defendant and to Mrs. Miller constituted a soldier's will made by him when he was in actual military service and having the effect of disposing of his whole estate in favour of E the defendant.

The plaintiff, who gave evidence about statements made by the deceased, and other witnesses who were called on her behalf, did not seem to me to carry the case any further than that the deceased was saying that his mother would be all right as he was making a contribution for her keep and he trusted Mrs. Richardson who, according to one piece of evidence, he had told to do what she F liked, and who, according to another piece of evidence, knew what to do. The fact that Mrs. Richardson has continued to make the payment of 10*s*. a week since the death seems to justify the trust which he reposed in her. I do not think that the mere statement that the deceased said that the plaintiff would be all right means more than that he intended she should have an allowance. It can hardly refer to an intestacy in favour of the plaintiff because those G words do not seem to be apt to describe the situation at all. They might be apt to describe a will made in favour of the mother, but they are hardly likely in the circumstances of this case to refer to more than the provision he was making for his mother.

In my judgment, the defendant succeeds in establishing an oral will as originally pleaded. The actual words of the will I think are most accurately H to be taken from the evidence of Mrs. Miller as follows : " Will made on Aug. 16, 1944, in these words : ' If anything happens to me, everything is to be for " Richie ".' " I pronounce for the will in that form.

[Court of Criminal Appeal (Humphreys, Hilbery and Croom-Johnson, JJ.), August 29, 30, 1949.]

Criminal Law—Murder—Autrefois convict—Previous conviction for felonious wounding with intent to murder—Subsequent death of person assaulted.

On May 2, 1949, the appellant was convicted of having, on Mar. 20, 1949, feloniously wounded his wife with intent to murder her. On June 2, 1949, she died as a result of her wounds and the appellant was indicted for murder. In answer to the indictment he pleaded autrefois convict, but the judge held that the plea had not been made out and the appellant was convicted of murder. On appeal, Held : (i) although, to prove the murder, it was essential to prove the assault adjudicated on at the time of the conviction of felonious wounding, that conviction could not be pleaded in bar to the indictment for murder because the offence of murder only arose when the appellant's wife died.

Appeal against conviction.

On July 13, 1949, the appellant was tried and convicted on an indictment for murder before Devlin, J., at the Central Criminal Court. On Mar. 20, 1949, he inflicted serious wounds on his wife with a knife and for that offence he was convicted on May 2, 1949, of felonious wounding with intent to murder. At that time his wife was in hospital where she died on June 2, 1949, from her wounds. In answer to the indictment for murder the appellant handed in a plea of autrefois convict which, on the direction of the learned judge, was rejected by the jury. The trial on the indictment proceeded and the appellant was convicted and sentenced to death. On appeal the only point argued was whether or not the plea of autrefois convict was a bar in law to the indictment for murder. The court held that the plea was not maintainable and dismissed the appeal.

Paget, K.C., L. L. Rose and T. R. Heald for the appellant.
Hawke and Bass for the Crown.

HUMPHREYS, J., delivered the following judgment of the court. This is an application by Leonard Jack Thomas for leave to appeal against a conviction of murder and is treated as an appeal. The appellant was convicted at the Central Criminal Court on May 2, 1949, of having, on Mar. 20, feloniously wounded his wife, Florence Ethel Lavinia Thomas, with intent to murder her and was sentenced to seven years' penal servitude. At that time his wife was in hospital. She died on June 2 as the result of those wounds. On July 13 the appellant was indicted at the Central Criminal Court in accordance with the usual practice for the murder of his wife. I repeat A those words "in accordance with the usual practice" because it is the usual practice. Similar facts have occurred time out of mind, and the same results have followed. The appellant handed in as answer to the indictment a plea in bar, that is, a plea of autrefois convict. DEVLIN, J., after a long argument held that the plea was not made out, and he so directed the jury who followed his direction. The appellant was then tried on his plea to the indictment of Not B Guilty, and the jury convicted him of murder. From that conviction he has appealed to this court, the sole ground of appeal being that his plea of autrefois convict ought not to have been rejected. The whole question, therefore, is: Was the plea of autrefois convict a bar in law to the indictment for murder ?

The nature of the plea and the law relating to it sufficiently appear from the language of the plea itself which alleges that the King ought not further to C prosecute the indictment against the appellant because he has been lawfully convicted of the offence charged therein. Murder consists of the felonious killing of another with malice. It is plain that the appellant was not convicted on May 2 of that offence, nor anything which is substantially the same offence or crime as that charged in the indictment, nor could he have been since his wife was then alive. It follows that the plea of autrefois convict in the strict sense D of the term is bound to fail, and does fail. That would dispose of this case, but for the fact that before DEVLIN, J., and in this court counsel for the appellant has argued other grounds which, he says, do not depend on the plea of autrefois convict, but are of the same nature. He referred to a number of cases, mostly charges of assault, in which the courts have expressed their approval of the ancient maxim : "Nemo debet bis puniri pro uno delicto," that is to say, that E no one ought to be punished twice for one offence, or, as it is sometimes written, "pro eadem causa," that is, for the same offence, and have treated the earlier conviction as being a bar to the second indictment.

In R. v. Miles (1) which is, perhaps, the strongest case in favour of the argument for the appellant in regard to charges of assault, the accused was indicted on five counts. The first count charged him with unlawfully and maliciously F wounding Charles Living on Oct. 26, 1889 ; the second with inflicting grievous bodily harm on Living on the same day ; the third with assaulting Living and causing him actual bodily harm on the same day ; and the fourth with a common assault on Living on the same day. The fifth count charged a common assault on one Anstey, and on that count the accused was acquitted. The accused came up for trial before the Recorder of London on Dec. 16, 1889. To the first G four counts he pleaded Not Guilty, and also a plea in bar which alleged that, on Oct. 28, 1889, he, on the complaint of the said Charles Living, had been convicted before a court of summary jurisdiction at West Ham for that he, on Oct. 26, 1889, did unlawfully assault and beat the said Charles Living. That assault was the same as the assault which was charged in the fourth count of the indictment. After argument, the court upheld the plea, which they regarded as H an informal plea of autrefois convict. It is important in the present case to examine the reasons why the court so held. All the judges considered that the plea and the evidence established that there was one offence only committed by that person, one and the same assault, although in three of the counts that assault was alleged to have been accompanied by circumstances of aggravation. POLLOCK, B., in his judgment, spoke as follows (24 Q.B.D. 436) :

> "At the trial it was proved on behalf of the prisoner, and admitted by counsel for the prosecution, that the first four counts of the indictment > referred to the same matter as the offence mentioned in the record. In substance, therefore, the plea and the evidence establish that there was but one offence, and that the acts done by the defendant in respect of which he was convicted, by whatever legal name they might be called, were the same as those to which the indictment referred . . . " and he then quotes the Latin maxim. Charles, J., with whose judgment Lord Coleridge, C.J., and Grantham, J. concurred, referred (ibid., 438) to the rule which I have previously mentioned as the > " . . . well established rule at common law—that where a person has been convicted for an offence by a court of competent jurisdiction, the conviction is a bar to all further criminal proceedings for the same offence."

Hawkins, J., who gave the first judgment in the case, agreeing as he did with the propositions which I have read from the judgments of Pollock, B. and Charles, J. said (ibid., 433) :

> " But it is not every summary conviction or acquittal for a common assault which will operate as a bar to an indictment for an offence in which that assault was an element."

That is precisely this case. No one will doubt that the assault committed on the deceased woman was an element in the charge of murder. It was one of the principal elements, but another element was the death of the woman. Hawkins, J. continued (ibid.) :

> " It could hardly be contended that a previous conviction for a common assault could be pleaded in bar to an indictment for murder, though to prove the murder it might be essential to prove the assault adjudicated upon. For the offence of murder consists in the felonious killing."

In our judgment, that observation applies with equal force to the present case and is sufficient to dispose of this case so far as it depends on autrefois convict. It is right to say, though lawyers will not need the information, that when Hawkins, J. speaks of a common assault, his observations equally apply to every other form of assault. The point in R. v. Miles (1) was that there was one assault, and every count in the subsequent indictment charged that assault and nothing else, although there were circumstances of aggravation added to it.

Reference to the Interpretation Act, 1889, s. 33, was made by counsel for the appellant. That section provides :

> " Where an act or omission constitutes an offence under two or more Acts, or both under an Act and at common law . . . the offender shall, unless the contrary intention appears, be liable to be prosecuted and punished under either or any of those Acts or at common law, but shall not be liable to be punished twice for the same offence."

That Act may be said to state in the language dear to the persons who prepare and are responsible for the language of statutes what the common law says in very much shorter and simpler language. Certainly it adds nothing and detracts nothing from the common law. It was argued that we ought so to read the section that the last word " offence " should be read as meaning " act," and it was submitted that " act," " cause," and " offence " all mean the same thing. In our view, that is not correct. It is not the law that a person shall not be liable to be punished twice for the same act. No court has ever said so, and the Interpretation Act does not say so. Not only is it not the law, but it never has been the law, as appears from the decision of the Court for Crown Cases Reserved as far back as 1867 in R. v. Morris (2). In that case the court consisted of Kelly, C.B., Martin, B., Byles, J., Keating, J., and Shee, J. The case had been reserved by Pigott, B. The headnote is as follows (10 Cox C.C. 480) :

> "A previous summary conviction for an assault under 24 and 25 Vict., c. 100, s. 45, is not a bar to an indictment for manslaughter of the party assaulted, founded upon the same facts. Kelly, C.B. dissentiente."

Martin, B., with whose judgment Byles, J., Keating, J. and Shee, J. agreed, stated the facts (ibid., 484):

> "Thomas Morris was convicted of an assault on Timothy Lymer, and committed to prison . . . He has undergone that punishment, and Timothy Lymer, the man assaulted, has since died in consequence of that assault. Now, this indictment is for the manslaughter of that man; and the question is, whether the suffering of the imprisonment for the assault is an answer to that indictment, and that depends on the meaning of the words 'for the same cause' in the statute."

"The same cause," it was stated on the authority of Martin, B. means the same thing as "the same offence." He continued (ibid., 485):

> "The cause on which the justices adjudicated was not the same as that for which the prisoner has been convicted under this indictment. A new offence, in my opinion, arose when the man died. I therefore think that this conviction was right."

Byles, J. said this (ibid., 485):

> "I am of opinion that the prior conviction . . . affords no defence to the subsequent indictment for manslaughter, the death of the deceased having occurred after the conviction, but being a consequence of the assault. The form and intention of the common law pleas of autrefois convict and autrefois acquit show that they apply only where there has been a former judicial decision on the same accusation in substance, and where the question in dispute has been already decided. There has, in the present case, been no judicial decision on the same accusation, and the whole question now in dispute could not have been decided, for at the time of the hearing before the magistrates whether the assault would amount to culpable homicide or not depended on the then future contingency whether it would cause death . . . The cause for the present indictment comprehends more than the cause in the former summons before the magistrates, for it comprehends the death of the party assaulted."

He adds that, therefore, it was not the same cause. At the end of the judgment he uses these words (ibid., 485):

> "My brother Martin has already illustrated the mischief in civil cases by a reference to Lord Campbell's Act, and in criminal cases the mischiefs might be much greater. A murderer, for example, by suffering or obtaining a previous conviction for an assault, might escape the due punishment of his crime."

It is only right to refer shortly to the dissenting judgment of Kelly, C.B., and, with the most profound respect to the Chief Baron, it is necessary to say that his judgment, so far as I am aware, has never been quoted with approval in any case, and has never been followed. What he said was precisely what counsel for the appellant has argued, or, perhaps, it would be more accurate to say that counsel for the appellant has argued something founded on what Kelly, C.B. said in 1867, which was not the law and with which statement the other four judges disagreed. Kelly, C.B. said (ibid., 482):

> "The assault, the unlawful act, with which he was charged"—that is the manslaughter—"is the same assault and one and the same act as that which caused the death of Lymer, and of which he has been convicted under the present indictment."

That was putting it the other way round. The original assault was the same assault as the one under which the appellant had been convicted under "the indictment." The answer is, of course, he was not convicted of assault under that indictment at all, he was convicted of manslaughter. KELLY, C.B. continued (ibid., 482) :

> "I think, therefore, that the case comes within the precise words of s. 45 of the 24 and 25 Vict., c. 100 [Offences against the Person Act, 1861], which provides in such a case 'he shall be released from all further or other proceedings, civil or criminal, for the same cause.'" A

Counsel for the appellant relied on a passage in ARCHBOLD'S CRIMINAL PLEADING EVIDENCE AND PRACTICE, 31st ed., p. 135. The same phrase occurs, as I have been able to find out, in every edition of ARCHBOLD since 1889. The statement appears under the heading of "Autrefois acquit," and after referring to HAWKINS PLEAS OF THE CROWN, where it is stated B

> "It is an established rule of the common law that a man may not be put twice in peril for the same offence," the learned editor refers to the Interpretation Act, 1889, s. 33, and says : C

> "Perhaps this enactment would have been clearer if for the word 'offence' at the end had been substituted the words 'act or omission.' But it does no more than extend to statutory offences the common law rule as laid down in R. v. Miles (1)."

D

Exactly what that means I do not know, but I deprecate the use by any textbook writer of such an expression as "the Act should have done something which the Act does not do." It is clear that the word in the Act is "offence," and I deprecate this suggestion that the Act, to have made things clear, should have enacted something different. The answer is that it does not. At p. 136 of the same textbook, we find a different statement as to the law, and at p. 142 E we find a still further statement as to the law in regard to autrefois convict. They do not all agree with one another. In the opinion of the court, if the passage on p. 135 bears the interpretation which counsel for the appellant seeks to put on it, it is wrong.

R. v. Morris (2) was followed in R. v. Friel (3). That case came before WILLIAMS, J. at Liverpool Assizes. Friel had been summarily convicted under F the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, of assault, and the person assaulted had subsequently died of the injuries caused by the act constituting that assault. A plea of autrefois convict was entered in answer to the indictment for manslaughter. It was held that the plea was not a good answer by the person so summarily convicted to the indictment for manslaughter. WILLIAMS, J., having taken time to consider an application that he should reserve the question for G judges, said this (17 Cox C.C. 326) :

> "I have looked at the authorities, and I think that it is plain on the authorities that a conviction or acquittal on an indictment for an assault cannot be pleaded in bar to a subsequent indictment for murder or manslaughter. This proposition is expressly laid down by BYLES, J., in delivering the judgment of himself and KEATING, J., in R. v. Morris (2). It is true that H KELLY, C.B., dissented, and is true that in that case the question to be decided was the construction and effect of 24 and 25 Vict., c. 100, ss. 44, 45, and was not the question of the effect of a previous conviction on an indictment, but the decision has, I believe, always been recognised as a decision on the common law question, and is so treated by HAWKINS, J., in the recent case of R. v. Miles (1), where he says it would hardly be contended that a previous conviction for a common assault could be pleaded > in bar to an indictment for murder, though to prove the murder it might be essential to prove the assault adjudicated upon. For the offence of murder consists in the felonious killing. So also of manslaughter . . . This seems in accordance with principle. The indictment for manslaughter is not a charge in a new form based on the facts supporting the former charge, nor is it the former charge with the addition of matters of aggravation or of newly alleged consequences. It is a charge based on new facts ; and the circumstance that some of those facts have been made the basis of a former charge of a different class is immaterial. The difference is not of degree merely. The characteristic new fact here is the death. That death is a new fact, and not a mere matter of aggravation or a mere consequence, is plain from the consideration that in cases of manslaughter, where the charge is based on death resulting from culpable negligence, there is no criminal offence unless death ensues and gives rise to a charge of manslaughter. I wish to add that this view of the law that a prior conviction for assault cannot be effectively pleaded in bar to a subsequent indictment for murder or manslaughter, is confirmed by the great authority of STEPHEN, J., in his book on CRIMINAL LAW PROCEDURE, p. 173, who, though in terms he does not mention manslaughter, yet lays down the principle, and gives indictment for murder after a previous conviction for unlawful wounding as an illustration, and no reason has been suggested to me, or I believe could be suggested, why the doctrine thus illustrated should not include manslaughter as much as murder."

There are other decisions to be found in the books which are quite inconsistent D with the argument of counsel for the defendant. In R. v. Morris (2), there is a reference by way of note (L.R. 1 C.C.R. 93) to R. v. Salvi (4), who was indicted for the wilful murder of Robert Henderson Robertson. A plea of autrefois acquit was pleaded, to which the Crown demurred, and the plea was held bad in law. That case is not fully reported, and, perhaps, it would be more satisfactory not to rely on it, but on the facts it appears to have been precisely the present case. Salvi E had been indicted for wilful murder and it was proved that he had been acquitted on a charge of cutting and wounding with intent to murder. When he was charged with killing the person in regard to whom he had been acquitted on the charge of cutting and wounding, the court held unanimously that that was no answer and that he must be tried on the charge of murder. Those are precisely the facts of the present case.

F R. v. Salvi (4) cannot be said to assist in any way the argument of counsel for the appellant, but he developed another point. He said it is a recognised rule that a person not only may not be indicted for an offence of which he has already been convicted, or acquitted, but he must not be indicted for an offence regarding which he was in peril on the former occasion, though not convicted or acquitted, and, generally speaking, subject to certain narrow limits, that G may be accurate. It was contended that the appellant was convicted of wounding with intent to murder and that he could have been convicted by the jury on the murder indictment of that same offence. When counsel for the appellant made that statement, the members of this court—I think simultaneously—asked : " What is the authority for that ? " because none of us was aware that such a proposition had ever been put forward in a court of law. The answer H was : " I have no authority in support," and one of my brothers then asked this pointed question : " Can you tell the court of any case where it has been even suggested that a man who is tried on a charge of murder may be found Not Guilty of murder but Guilty of wounding with intent to murder ? " The answer was No, so this is an entirely new and novel proposition.

The ordinary rule is well known and unquestionable. The jury is bound to find a verdict, if they agree, of Guilty or Not Guilty on the indictment unless some statute, or, in very rare cases, the common law, permits them to find some lesser or different crime while acquitting on the actual charge in the indictment. There are numerous exceptions to the rule because many statutes have been passed, particularly within the last fifty years, which enable the jury to find a verdict, on an indictment charging crime A, of Guilty either of crime A, or of crime B, C, D or E. There are many such instances, but no one has ever suggested hitherto that there is either a statute or a common law rule by which a jury, on a charge of murder, can find the statutory felony of wounding with intent to murder, although they can certainly find manslaughter or an attempt, because the jury in every indictable criminal case have been able to find an attempt since 1851. That cuts away the basis of the argument of counsel for the appellant. Assuming, however, for the moment that a jury could find such a verdict, what would be the result ? Counsel for the appellant said that, if the jury could find wounding with intent to murder, the appellant was in peril of being convicted of wounding with intent to murder. That, it was submitted, was so decided in R. v. White (5), but that decision of the Court of Criminal Appeal has nothing whatever to do with autrefois convict or autrefois acquit. White was not convicted twice or acquitted twice ; he was only tried once. The headnote is ([1910] 2 K.B. 124) :

> " A person who upon an indictment charging him with murder is convicted . . . of an attempt to murder may be sentenced to penal servitude for life by virtue of the provisions of ss. 11 to 15 of the Offences Against the Person Act, 1861."

The prisoner was tried at the Birmingham Assizes on an indictment charging that he did murder one Mary Ann White. A wineglass was found close to the deceased woman in her house at Coventry containing lemonade with a small quantity of cyanide of potassium. The medical evidence showed that death was not due to poisoning. No trace of cyanide was found in the body. The prisoner was proved to have purchased some cyanide of potassium shortly before, and there was evidence from which, as the court held, the jury would be justified in inferring that the prisoner had put into the deceased's glass the cyanide that was found there, and that he did so with intent to murder her. The jury convicted him of an attempt to murder and he was sentenced to penal servitude for life. He appealed against conviction and sentence. The court disposed of the appeal against conviction on the facts of the case, saying, in effect, that there was ample evidence to justify the jury coming to the conclusion at which they had arrived. I do not think I need read the judgment because it has nothing to do with this case, and relates merely to the question whether a person convicted of attempting to murder on an indictment for murder can be sent to penal servitude or whether the offence of which he has been convicted is to be regarded in law as a common law misdemeanour—the attempt to commit a felony—and, therefore, giving rise only to two years' imprisonment. References were made in that case to various statutes. It is, however, only necessary to refer, I think, to one section of one statute, beyond saying that in 1851 the Criminal Procedure Act was passed which enabled juries to return a verdict in most cases of Not Guilty of the crime charged, but Guilty of the attempt. In 1861 there was a series of consolidation Acts, and one of them contained a number of new provisions and provided for what were called statutory felonies, that is to say, a number of methods by which a person might attempt to kill another were collected in different sections and were all made felonies. Some of them had been taken from old statutes and they were all put together in ss. 11, 12, 13 and 14 of the Offences against the Person Act, 1861. The question in R. v. White (5) was whether in the circumstances of that case the offence came within that list of statutory felonies, or should still be regarded as a common law misdemeanour, and the sole question was what sentence could be awarded ? Section 15 of the Offences Against the Person Act, 1861, which I think the court thought was decisive of the matter, is this :

> "Whosoever shall, by any means other than those specified in any of the preceding sections of this Act, attempt to commit murder, shall be guilty of felony, and being convicted thereof shall be liable . . . to be kept in penal servitude for life."

That was held by the court to justify that any person charged with murder in regard to whom the jury find a verdict of Not Guilty of murder but Guilty of A attempted murder is thereby convicted of an offence for which he is liable to be kept in penal servitude for life. That is the whole of R. v. White (5), and I can only say that I do not understand the argument that that case is an authority for saying that on a charge of murder the jury can return a verdict of wounding with intent to murder.

It is necessary to refer to one more case so far as that case did deal to some B extent with the question what is to happen if a man is tried on a charge on which he has not been tried before, but where it is open to the jury on that charge to find him Guilty of some other charge of which, in fact, he has been already convicted. That case was R. v. Tonks (6). Counsel for the appellant frankly said, in referring to it both in the court below and in this court : "R. v. Tonks is my great difficulty," and I think a member of the court observed : "It is one C of your difficulties only, but it certainly is a difficulty." Mrs. Tonks had been convicted of the offence of wilfully neglecting her child in a manner likely to cause injury to its health, and she was sent to prison for that offence. While she was in prison, the child died—and died, we must assume, as the result of that neglect. She was then charged, in accordance with the usual practice, with manslaughter, having caused her child's death by neglect. It was the same neglect D that had been the substance of the case against her when she was convicted and sent to prison, but there was the added fact of the death. In that case there was no actual plea of autrefois convict handed in, but the Court of Criminal Appeal agreed that the court ought to look into the circumstances and, if a plea of autrefois convict would have been effective, to give effect to it although it was not on the file. LORD READING, C.J., gave the judgment of the court, the other E members of the court being LORD COLERIDGE and AVORY, JJ. It appeared that under the Children Act, 1908, s. 12, under which the accused had been originally convicted, there was a special provision that, if a person were charged with the manslaughter of a child as the result of neglect and the jury did not think that the child died as the result of the neglect but were satisfied that there was criminal neglect of the child, they might convict of that offence instead of F manslaughter. LORD READING made it clear that that only meant that, if the jury were not satisfied that the accused woman was guilty of manslaughter then they should decide whether she was guilty of something less, that is, neglecting her child. In his judgment LORD READING, C.J., said ([1916] 1 K.B. 449) :

> "On behalf of the appellant it was also urged that on the second trial she G was charged with the offence with which she had already been convicted, because the greater charge includes the less. But that contention ignores the most important fact of the subsequent death of the child, which occurred some days after her first conviction. At the date of the first trial for the offence of wilful neglect, whether it had taken place under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts or on indictment, it would have been impossible H to charge her with manslaughter because the death had not then occurred."

That, of course, is dead against counsel for the appellant on his first point. It is only one more authority to that effect. LORD READING continued (ibid., 449) :

> "When the death occurs after the conviction for the lesser offence and an indictment for manslaughter is preferred, no difficulty arises, because proper effect can be given to s. 12 (4), by the judge telling the jury that they must, having regard to the special facts of the case, either come to the conclusion > that the accused is guilty of manslaughter or return a verdict of acquittal. The judge could not, as he could in a normal case under the section where there had been no previous conviction for wilful neglect of the child, point out to the jury that it is open to them if they think fit to find the prisoner guilty only of the lesser offence on the indictment for the greater one. In our view it is wrong to say that a person indicted for the manslaughter of a child whose death has occurred after the conviction of the same person A for the wilful neglect of that child is twice put upon his or her trial for the same offence."

That case was quoted to DEVLIN, J., by counsel for the appellant on the argument on the question of autrefois convict. DEVLIN, J., directed the jury that they must either convict of murder or find a verdict of Not Guilty. That is B exactly what LORD READING, C.J., had said the judge should do. DEVLIN, J., did not tell the jury that they must take that course because the appellant had been previously convicted of anything, but he put it on the ground that the question whether the appellant intended the death of the deceased or to do her grievous bodily harm, which would make for the offence of murder, depended on the facts of the case. The prosecution said, that, if a man was found to C have attacked a woman with a knife and driven it into her in such a way that she was unable to move the lower part of her body and later died, there was ample evidence on which the jury could find that he knew, or must be taken to have known, that the probable consequence of his act would be either death or at least terrible injury to the woman. If, however, those facts were not found, there was no other ground on which the jury could find anything against the D appellant. Therefore, if the jury acquitted on the charge of murder, that meant that they did not accept the evidence, and should acquit the appellant. DEVLIN, J., so directed the jury, in mercy to the appellant. In our view, he was perfectly entitled to do that, and it is sufficient to say that we cannot accept the argument put forward by counsel for the appellant either that there was any power in the jury to find a verdict of wounding with intent to murder on the E charge for murder or that there has been anything wrong in the decision of DEVLIN, J., in advising the jury not to pay any attention to this plea of autrefois convict. The appeal is dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

ZIVNOSTENSKA BANKA NATIONAL CORPORATION v. FRANKMAN.

[HOUSE OF LORDS (Lord Simonds, Lord Normand, Lord MacDermott, Lord Reid and Lord Radcliffe), June 22, 23, 27, October 20, 1949.]

Banker—Deposit of securities—Deposit of debentures at London branch of Czech bank—Condition that deposits be "subject to the legal measures" of country where deposited—Customer's claim for return of debentures—Re-delivery illegal under Czech law—Right of bank to refuse re-delivery.

The respondent, as personal representative of Mrs. F., claimed re-delivery in London of £300 debentures in a Czech company from the appellants, a Czech bank with its head office in Prague and a branch in London. In 1938 the debentures were held on Mrs. F.'s deposit account by the Anglo Prague Credit Bank (since amalgamated with the appellants), and in that year she was informed that the debentures were deposited at their London branch and remain there at her risk unless she otherwise ordered. Enclosed with the notification was a document setting out the conditions of the contract, the relevant clauses of which were as follows :—" 11. As regards such stocks and securities as were purchased at a stock exchange other than that of Prague or were received by any bank other than a Prague bank, we shall not have the same sent to us unless the customer has ordered the transmission thereof at his own expense and risk, but will leave the same, at the risk and expense of the customer, deposited with our correspondent, where they shall be subject to the legal measures of the respective country. This also applies in the case of our having credited the principal with such securities on a securities deposit account. In the event of our entrusting any securities to or leaving them in the custody of any third party—provided, of course, that we are otherwise authorised so to do—we shall only be responsible for our diligence in selecting the depositary, naturally subject to the provisions of the Law of Oct. 10, 1924, No. 241 of the Collection of Laws and Decrees. 50. The place of performance and payment in respect of all obligations resulting from the business connection with us, shall be considered to be the place of that department of our establishment which has carried out the relevant transactions with the customer, except in so far as any other special stipulation has been made in this connection." In 1939 Mrs. F. came to England where she resided until her death in 1945. The appellants, who asserted no beneficial interest in the debentures, refused to re-deliver them to the respondent because under Czech law the return of securities was only permissible with the consent of the National Bank of Czechoslovakia and this had been refused.

HELD : (i) that the contract under which the debentures were deposited was made in Czechoslovakia between a Czech bank and a Czech national, and the lex loci contractus was that of Czechoslovakia. Under the contract the locus solutionis was deemed to be Prague and so the lex loci solutionis was also that of Czechoslovakia.

(ii) condition 11 of the contract meant that securities deposited abroad were subject to the law of the country of deposit and not that the rights of the parties under the contract should be subject to that law.

(iii) under Czechoslovakian law it was illegal for the appellants to part with the debentures without the consent of the National Bank of Czechoslovakia, which leave had been withheld, and, therefore, the fulfilment of the contract involved the doing of an act in Czechoslovakia, (either the actual delivery of the debentures or the giving of authority for their delivery), which by the Czech law governing the contract was illegal, and the English courts would not enforce its performance.

Appeal from a decision of the Court of Appeal (sub nom., Frankman v. Anglo-Prague Credit Bank, ([1948] 2 All E.R. 1025), reversing a decision by Cassels, J. ([1948] 1 All E.R. 337) who held that the respondent was not entitled to enforce in an English court a contract made in Czechoslovakia between a customer (through whom he claimed) and the appellant bank under which £300 registered debentures in Skoda Works, Ltd., a Czechoslovakian company, were deposited at the customer's risk at the London branch of the bank. The Court of Appeal decided that the contract was enforceable in England and ordered the appellant bank to return the debentures to the respondent and to pay his costs in both courts.

On appeal to the House of Lords their lordships now set aside the judgment of the Court of Appeal and restored the judgment of Cassels, J., but ordered that the judgment of the Court of Appeal so far as it related to the costs of the appeal to that court should be undisturbed and that the appellants should pay the respondent's costs of the appeal to the House of Lords.

The House took time for consideration.
Oct. 20. The following opinions were read.

LORD SIMONDS : My Lords, this appeal from an order of the Court of Appeal which reversed a decision of Cassels, J., raises a question of some importance to bankers, though, as I think, its solution will be found to depend on the language of the particular documents by which the transaction to be considered by the House was carried out. The short question is whether the respondent, Hans Frankman, is, as the Court of Appeal held, entitled to have returned to him through the London office of the appellant bank three debenture bonds for £100 each issued by a Czechoslovak company known as Skoda Works, Ltd., and further to have executed by nominees of the appellant bank in whose names the bonds are registered all such transfers as are necessary to perfect his title to them.

I shall for convenience refer to the appellant bank, now known as Zivnostenska Banka National Corporation, as " the bank." The bank was incorporated in 1922 under the laws of Czechoslovakia with the name of the Anglo-Czechoslovak and Prague Credit Bank. Its head office was in Prague. In 1924 it established a branch in London at 48 Bishopsgate. Its name was changed first to Anglo-Prague Credit Bank, then to Prague Credit Bank, and ultimately to its present name. At the outbreak of war in 1939 the bank became an enemy for the purposes of the Trading with the Enemy Act, 1939. On Sept. 12, 1939, a licence was granted by His Majesty's Treasury to the London branch to carry on the business of the branch and it did so until Dec. 30, 1946, under the name of the Anglo-Prague Credit Bank London Office, under which name it was originally sued in the proceedings out of which this appeal rises.

At the end of 1946 the bank had ceased to be an enemy within the meaning of the Act and permission was given by His Majesty's government for control of the branch to be resumed by the bank.

In October, 1930, a branch of the bank at Trautenau in Czechoslovakia bought for the account of a Dr. Weiner, who lived there, £300 six per cent. Skoda Works debentures, notifying him of the fact by letter dated Oct. 14, 1930, of which I set out the following material passages :

> "We beg to inform you that in accordance with your instruction of the 8/10/1930 we have bought for your account the undermentioned securities, for which we have debited you according to statement. We are crediting you with the securities on your securities account. At the same time we take note of your authorisation to deal with the securities enumerated below as we choose and to deposit the same as we think best, even abroad. We do not mention to you the name of our foreign correspondent, with whom the securities acquired and mentioned below, are deposited, following your declaration according to which you exempted us from our obligation to do so."

The statement exhibited to the latter showed that the debentures had been acquired on the London Stock Exchange. It is conceded that Dr. Weiner was never the registered holder of them, but debentures to the nominal value of £300 of Skoda Works, Ltd., were (together with a large number of other debentures of the same issue) registered in the names of nominees of the bank and were held by the London branch in safe custody to the order of the head office of the bank in Prague. Dr. Weiner was at no time a customer of the London branch, which did not know his name in connection with these debentures. In or about 1935 Dr. Weiner died intestate and his sister, Paula Frankman, succeeded to his estate, which included the £300 debentures in question. Before March, 1935, she had by some means acquired £400 similar debentures. She, too, had lived at Trautenau and had an account with the Trautenau branch of the bank, but in 1935 she moved to Prague and transferred her account to the head office in that city. On Mar. 22, 1938, the head office wrote to her at an address in Prague, informing her that by order of their Trautenau branch they credited her with £700 six per cent. Skoda Works debentures (identifying them) on her deposit account with them held in London, and they enclosed in addition to their "business conditions" a declaration concerning the deposit of their securities abroad and specimen signature forms which they asked her to return duly completed. It would seem that Mrs. Frankman did not sign the declaration enclosed in the letter of Mar. 22, for on Apr. 27 the head office wrote to her again saying that, as she had not returned to them the declaration form relating to the place of custody of her £700 Skoda Works debentures, they had to inform her that they were deposited with their branch in London.

Before I refer to the "business conditions" which are, as I think, of crucial importance, I will finish the narrative of relevant facts. On May 24 the head office sold £400 of the £700 debentures and credited the account of Mrs. Frankman in Prague with the equivalent in kronen of the net proceeds. Similarly her same account was credited with interest on the remaining £300 debentures on May 30 and Dec. 1, 1935. In March, 1939, Mrs. Frankman came to England and there lived until she died in August, 1945. Her son, the respondent, Hans Frankman, had come to England in 1935 and he became a naturalised British subject in 1945. Letters of administration of his mother's estate were granted to him on May 24, 1946. In that capacity he, through his solicitors, required the London branch of the bank to deliver up the debentures to him. Some question at first arose in regard to a possible claim by the Custodian of Enemy Property, but this difficulty was removed and it remained only for the London branch to obtain the consent of the head office, for whom the debentures were held in safe custody, to the delivery of them to the respondent. This consent was refused. Without it the London branch declined to act, and, accordingly, the respondent commenced these proceedings claiming the return of the debentures or their value and damages for their detention. It may be observed that this claim was in the appropriate form to an action of detinue, but ignored the fact that, the debentures being registered in the names of nominees of the bank, further relief was required beyond that claimed if the debentures were to become effectively the property of the respondent. The ground of the refusal by the bank, which asserted no beneficial interest in the debentures, was that under and by virtue of Czechoslovak Finance Regulations (viz., Foreign Exchange Law No. 92 of Apr. 11, 1946) delivery of them by the bank to the respondent was only permissible with the consent of the National Bank of Czechoslovakia and that that consent had been asked for by the bank and had been refused. The single question for the consideration of the House is whether the ground of refusal is a valid one and at this stage I must return to the " business conditions " which, so far as they are relevant, govern the contractual relations of the parties. I do not understand it to be questioned that the rights of the respondent in relation to the bank are not different from those of his mother through whom he claims.

Of the business conditions which were enclosed in the bank's letter to Mrs. Frankman of Mar. 22, 1938, two only need be quoted—conditions 11 and 50. It was suggested that condition 50 had no relevance to a transaction which in part consisted of the keeping of bonds in safe custody for a customer, but I see no ground for this suggestion. I, therefore, set out these two conditions :

> " 11. As regards such stocks and securities as were purchased at a stock exchange other than that of Prague or were received by any bank other than a Prague bank, we shall not have the same sent to us unless the customer has ordered the transmission thereof at his own expense and risk, but will leave the same, at the risk and expense of the customer, deposited with our correspondent, where they shall be subject to the legal measures of the respective country. This also applies in the case of our having credited the principal with such securities on a securities deposit account. In the event of our entrusting any securities to or leaving them in the custody of any third party—provided, of course, that we are otherwise authorised so to do—we shall only be responsible for our diligence in selecting the depositary, naturally subject to the provisions of the Law of Oct. 10, 1924, No. 241 of the Collection of Laws and Decrees.
> 50. The place of performance and payment in respect of all obligations resulting from the business connection with us, shall be considered to be the place of that department of our establishment which has carried out the relevant transactions with the customer, except in so far as any other special stipulation has been made in this connection."

I think that it clearly emerges from these conditions of a contract, made, it is to be remembered, between a bank in Prague and a Czechoslovakian citizen then resident at Trautenau, that first and last the law of the contract was Czechoslovakian law. It was the head office which carried out the " relevant transaction " with Mrs. Frankman, and, accordingly, the place of performance in respect of all obligations under the contract was under condition 50 to be considered to be at the head office. Beyond all doubt the lex loci contractus was that of Czechoslovakia. If, as condition 50 prescribes, the locus solutionis is deemed to be Prague, so also must the lex loci solutionis be the law of Czechoslovakia. It appears to me probable that it was largely in order that the bank might assert this applicability from first to last of the municipal law of that branch which carried out a transaction, that condition 50 was made a term of the contract. But it is said that this view is inconsistent with condition 11 if under that condition securities are deposited with a correspondent of the bank outside Czechoslovakia. Two points are made. In the first place, it is contended that the provision that in such a case the securities shall be "subject to the legal measures of the respective country" excludes the application of the law of Czechoslovakia. I do not think that this is so. I do not read the provision as affecting the legal rights or obligations of the parties except so far as may be necessary for the protection of the bank. It might be laid to their charge that they had not taken due care of securities left in their custody, if, being deposited with a correspondent in another country, they became subject to some penal or confiscatory measure. It is, I think, to avoid the possibility of such a liability that the bank makes this provision. Secondly, it is said that condition 11, where it operates, imports a contractual term that, if securities are deposited with a correspondent of the bank in a foreign country (say, in London) and the customer has not at his own risk and expense ordered their transmission to Czechoslovakia, or, presumably, to some other place, then the bank remains under an obligation to let them remain where they are and (as a corollary) delivery can be validly demanded from that foreign correspondent. Then, it is said, the performance of the bank's obligation must take place, in the example given, in London, and the law applicable to such performance must be the law of England. This is, I think, the view of the transaction taken by the Court of Appeal, but apart from the fact that this view ignores condition 50, which is to me conclusive, I cannot accept the interpretation of condition 11 on which it is founded. I think that this condition excuses the bank from liability if, in the absence of instructions to the contrary, they think fit to leave securities with their correspondent abroad, whether a branch or an independent depositary, but I do not think that the condition denies them the right to have them transmitted to Czechoslovakia if in their discretion they think that a safer course to take. Clearly, I think, the customer could under these conditions demand delivery in Prague, though a question might then arise whether, if the securities were in London at the time of demand, the transmission to Prague should not be at his risk and expense. I do not doubt that in such a case it might as a matter of practical convenience, if the customer so wished, he arranged that the delivery should take place wherever the securities happened to be, but this does not mean that, as a matter of legal obligation, the bank are bound by these conditions to keep securities abroad or to deliver them up in any place except at the office where the transaction is carried out. If the conditions were different, so might be the result. That is why I said at the beginning of this opinion that the issue of this case turned on the particular instruments by which the transaction was carried out.

It follows from what I have said that, in my opinion, the proper law of the contract by which the rights and obligations of the parties are determined is in every aspect of it the law of Czechoslovakia. Upon this assumption I think that the judgment of the Court of Appeal cannot stand. In common with other nations the Czechoslovakian State has from time to time made laws for the protection of its currency and for the control of foreign exchange. I have already referred to the law in force at the relevant date, viz., the Foreign Exchange Law No. 92 of Apr. 11, 1946, which substantially re-enacted earlier laws. The evidence of Doctor Kulhanek, who was called as an expert in the law of Czechoslovakia, proved that it was illegal by that law for the bank to part with the securities in question to the respondent without the leave of the National Bank of Czechoslovakia, which leave, as I have already said, had been withheld. The fulfilment of the contract, therefore, involves the doing of an act in Czechoslovakia, viz., either the actual delivery of the securities or the giving of an authority for their delivery, which is, by the law of Czechoslovakia, itself the law of the contract, illegal. It is, I think, clear that the courts of this country will not enforce such performance: see Ralli Brothers

v. Compania Naviera Sota y Aznar (1), and contrast Kleinwort's Case (2). It was urged that, even if the law of Czechoslovakia was the proper law of the contract and by that law the bank could not legally deliver up the debentures, yet the courts of this country should not enforce that law. It was sought to apply to the circumstances of the present case the principle that an English court will not enforce a penal or confiscatory law of another country. I do not exclude the possibility of this principle applying where it appears that the law which is sought to be enforced or relied on is in reality confiscatory, though in appearance regulatory of currency, but I see no reason why it should be applied in the case of a law which does not appear to differ in material respects from the legislation contemplated by the Bretton Woods Agreement which is now part of the law of this country. A

I am, accordingly, of opinion that this appeal should be allowed and that the action brought by the respondent should be dismissed. In the special circumstances which have been brought to the notice of the House I think that the order of the Court of Appeal so far as it relates to the costs of the appeal to that court should be undisturbed and that the bank should pay the respondent's costs of the appeal to this House. B

LORD NORMAND: My Lords, on the facts stated by my noble and learned friend on the Woolsack the contract of bailment between the parties was a contract between a Czechoslovakian bank and a Czechoslovakian citizen resident in Czechoslovakia. It is said, however, that the contract itself stipulates that the bonds were to be kept for safe custody in London, and that the place of re-delivery, the locus solutionis, is the bank's London branch, and that it follows that the appellant, as present owner of the bonds, is entitled to demand and receive them in London without regard to the law of Czechoslovakia, provided that he imposes no uncovenanted burden on the bailee and does not detract from his covenanted reward. The question is whether this proposition is well founded. C D

I think it well to emphasize that the contract was one between a bank and its customer and that it was for mutual advantage and not for the advantage of the customer alone. Nor was it a contract merely for safe custody. The bonds were English securities bought in London, and the interest on them was collected there. They remained in London, not so much for reasons of safety as because that was the most convenient and business-like arrangement, but the bank did not oblige itself to keep the bonds in London. It informed Mrs. Frankman by letters of Mar. 22 and Apr. 27, 1938, that it held the bonds in London and at its branch there, but it gave no undertaking that it would not remove them from London. It is, on the contrary, plain from the terms of the form of declaration which accompanied the letter of Mar. 22 that the bank was in its own interest seeking its customer's authority to deposit the bonds "even abroad" at its own discretion. In the same letter, the bank enclosed its business conditions. Condition 11 deals only with the costs and risks of the custody. It makes it a condition of the contract that the bank need not transmit the bonds to Prague except by the customer's order and at her expense and risk, and that it will leave them deposited at her expense and risk with "the bank's correspondent where they shall be subject to the legal measures of the respective country." This is a condition conceived in the interests of the bank and for its protection, and it imposes no obligations on the bank. In two respects there has been some misunderstanding possibly, even by the Court of Appeal, of the terms of this condition. "Our correspondent" is not to be identified with the bank's branch in London. The correspondent might be another bank in London, and since the condition is part of a form of general application it might happen that the condition applied to a deposit of securities with a foreign bank at a place where the appellant bank had no branch. The other misunderstanding is that it has been supposed E F G H that this condition makes the law of the country of the place of deposit the governing law of the contract, but the words " where they shall be subject to the legal measures of the respective country " warn the customer that the bonds themselves are at the risk of the legislation or administrative action in the country where they are situated and they have no bearing on the law of the contract. Condition 11, therefore, does not support the respondent's case.

The respondent next says that condition 50 has no application to contracts of deposit. This contention is without any foundation. The place of the condition in the document of which it is part is among general conditions affecting the bank's business with customers of whatever nature the business may be. It was intended by the bank and must have been understood by the customer, if she read it, to apply to the deposit of the bonds which was the sole subject-matter of the letter with which the copy of the conditions was enclosed. The meaning of condition 50 is clear beyond reasonable doubt. The only departments of the bank's establishment which had carried out any transaction with the customer were its branch at Trautenau and the head office in Prague, but the customer had ceased to be a Trautenau customer and had become a Prague customer, so for her the department indicated was plainly the bank in Prague. The words " with the customer " must be taken to have their full significance and I cannot treat them as the equivalent of " on behalf of the customer " as the argument of the respondent requires. The relevant transactions were the transactions by which the shares were acquired and deposited by the bank. Here then is an express stipulation that the place of performance and payment in respect of all obligations under the contract is to be Prague. I do not think that this condition would necessarily have stood in the way of the respondent's receiving physical delivery in London, but it was the bank in Prague which was to make delivery, and it was to that bank that he had to apply for delivery in terms of the condition. The result of this analysis, if it is sound, is that the locus solutionis is Prague and that the contract is from first to last and in all its aspects a Czechoslovakian contract.

From that it follows that the Czechoslovakian law applies and that it is one of the incidents of the contract that it is subject to a municipal law which, as has been held in Kahler v. Midland Bank, Ltd. (3), requires that performance by delivery can only be made with the permission of the National Bank of Czechoslovakia. I would, therefore, allow the appeal.

LORD MACDERMOTT : My Lords, the relationship between the respondent and the appellants is that of bailor and bailee and the right of the former (as personal representative of his mother, Mrs. Paula Frankman) to the return of the debenture bonds, of which he is the owner, necessarily turns on the contract of bailment which was entered into by Mrs. Frankman in the early part of 1938, and the effect thereon, if any, of the relevant Czechoslovakian foreign exchange legislation. The contract was made in Czechoslovakia between a resident Czechoslovakian and a Czechoslovakian bank and I entertain no doubt that, at least so far as its construction is concerned, the governing law is Czechoslovakian. On that law there is the evidence of Dr. Otto Kulhanek, though your Lordships are, of course, at liberty to form a view on the accepted translation of the material documents.

The relevant facts and circumstances have already been set forth and I need not repeat them. They raise three questions for determination which I may state thus :—(1) Is it open to the respondent to ignore the appellants' head office in Prague and to have his rights settled as between himself and the appellants' branch office in London where the bonds are ? (2) If not, what is the proper law governing the delivery of the bonds to the respondent ? and (3) Does that law justify the retention of the bonds by the appellants ?

As to (1) : The importance of this question lies in the fact that, although the appellants are but a single legal entity, the Czechoslovakian foreign exchange law regards their London branch as an exchange foreigner and their head office as an exchange citizen, the result being that, if the respondent, himself an exchange foreigner, is entitled to look to the London branch alone, the delivery of the bonds which he now seeks would not involve any contravention of Czechoslovakian law, and the respondent would not have a good defence to the claim. This question depends, in my opinion, on the true construction of conditions 11 and 50 of the contract. Condition 11 is, I think, only material in so far as it throws light on the meaning of condition 50. In effect condition 11 authorises the appellants not to bring to their head office securities (such as these bonds) which have not been purchased at the Prague Stock Exchange or received by a Prague bank save on the order and at the risk and expense of the customer, but to keep such securities deposited elsewhere " where they shall be subject to the legal measures of the respective country." There can be no doubt that under this condition, and as Mrs. Frankman did not otherwise order, the appellants were justified in keeping the bonds as they did at their London branch, and it may, therefore, be said that as regards the duty to keep in safe custody the actual place of performance was at that branch. It may also be observed in passing that, though the present case is not concerned with a sub-bailment to some third party, condition 11 contemplates that safe custody may be provided for in that way. The words I have quoted were relied on as showing that the law of the place of deposit was intended to govern the performance of the obligations arising out of the bailment. I cannot accede to this view. In my opinion, these words are only a warning that securities kept in another country will, as a matter of course, be subject to any law of that country which may apply to them. I do not think they have any further significance or bearing on the question under discussion.

I come, then, to condition 50. [HIS LORDSHIP read the condition and continued :] The respondent's first contention was that this stipulation was confined to money transactions and had no relation to deposits for safe custody. In my opinion, this contention is ill-founded. When the contract is examined, the arrangement of its terms—a matter relied on by the respondent—does not support the submission, and there is nothing that I can see in condition 50 itself to warrant such a limiting interpretation. The respondent's second, and principal, contention was that this condition made the appellants' London branch " the place of performance," and, therefore, the place where the bonds were to be restored to the possession of the bailor. The " relevant transactions with the customer " were, it was said, the safe-keeping of the bonds, and, as that obligation had been carried out at the London branch, it, the argument proceeded, was the " department of our establishment " referred to in the condition, and, so, the place of performance. My Lords, this view accords neither with the evidence of Dr. Kulhanek nor with what seems to me to be the true meaning of condition 50.

The London branch, may, in one sense, be said to have kept the bonds for Mrs. Frankman, but it did not carry out any relevant transaction with that lady. On the proper interpretation of the condition the relevant transaction with her was, in my opinion, the contract of bailment, and the department of the appellants' establishment which carried it out was their head office at Prague and no other. So read, this condition recognises and declares an established banking practice, namely, that a customer who does business with one branch of a bank cannot, in the absence of some special provision, call as of right on another branch to complete or clear that business, but, read as the respondent would have it, the condition would work a far-reaching departure from that practice and one which it would be strange to find in a series of printed " business conditions " obviously designed for general use. I do not leave out of account the fact that the expression " the place of performance . . . of all obligations " is wide and, if read literally, capable of including the safe-keeping in London as authorised by condition 11. In my opinion, however, this consideration does not suffice to displace the construction for which I have already expressed a preference. Condition 50 is, I think, clearly aimed at fixing (in the absence of special stipulation) a particular place of performance, and for that reason the word " performance " must, as it appears to me, be taken to connote, in relation to deposits for safe custody, not every act of performance in the due course of the bailment, for that—as condition 11 goes to show—might involve several places, but the act of performance which completes the transaction in question and in which the customer or his nominee participates. So construed, condition 50 is not in conflict with condition 11 and can be applied as readily where there is a sub-bailment, or succession of sub-bailments as where the deposit has been committed to a branch to which the customer is a stranger. For these reasons I would answer question (1) in the negative.

Next, as to question (2). What is the proper law governing the delivery of the bonds ? If the view I take as to the construction of condition 50 is correct, it must follow that the parties to the contract have agreed that Prague is to be considered as the place for delivery up of the bonds. That being their expressed intention I can see no ground for saying that the proper law in this connection is other than that of Czechoslovakia, and I would answer question (2) accordingly.

This brings me to question (3). Does the law of Czechoslovakia justify the appellants in their refusal to hand over the bonds ? On the evidence I think it must be accepted that by the Czechoslovakian foreign exchange legislation in force at all material times the appellants' head office could not lawfully deliver the bonds to their owner without the consent of the Czechoslovakian National Bank, and that such consent has been withheld. That being the position, the bailment has not been effectually terminated and the respondent lacks a right to immediate possession. This question must, therefore, be answered in the affirmative. It is an answer that the respondent may not find it easy to appreciate having regard to the course of events since 1938. It seems, however, inescapable so long as the relevant legislation and the attitude of the National Bank remain unaltered ; the material terms of the contract still subsist and there is no room for doubt as to the law which they attract. For these reasons I agree that the appeal should be allowed and the judgment of CASSELS, J., restored.

LORD REID : My Lords, the respondent is the owner of three £100 debentures of the Skoda Works. He inherited them from his mother, Mrs. Paula Frankman, and it is not disputed that he is the beneficial owner of these securities and that neither the appellants nor anyone else have any interest in them. These securities are at present held in London for the respondent by the appellants who are a Czechoslovakian bank. They are held in the names of nominees of the bank, but I do not think that that fact materially affects the issue in this case. In this action the respondent seeks to obtain delivery of these securities and the appellants have refused to deliver or transfer them, the ground of their refusal being that such delivery or transfer would be illegal under the law of Czechoslovakia without the consent of the National Bank of that country, which consent has been refused. This illegality arises under the same foreign exchange law of Czechoslovakia as that which has just been considered by your Lordships in Kahler v. Midland Bank, Ltd. (3). I have already expressed my opinion that this law is not one which the English courts are bound to disregard and the same reasoning as that which I have expressed in Kahler's case leads to the same conclusion here that the appellants would commit an offence under the law of Czechoslovakia if they now delivered or transferred these securities to the respondent either in that country or in England. The question for decision in this case is whether the appellants are entitled to rely on that fact as giving them a good defence to this action.

In 1938 the respondent's mother, Mrs. Frankman, owned seven of these Skoda debentures including the three which are the subject of this action. At that time Mrs. Frankman was residing in Prague and the seven debentures were held for her in London. I do not think that it is necessary to consider in detail anything that happened before Mar. 22, 1938. At that date the securities were held by the Anglo-Prague Credit Bank. That bank has since been amalgamated with the appellants so that as regards any contract to which that bank was a party the appellants are substituted in their place. On Mar. 22 the Anglo-Prague Credit Bank wrote to Mrs. Frankman from their Prague office a letter in German of which the following is a translation :—

> " Mrs. Paula Frankman, 22.3.38.
> Prague 2,
> Smecky 26,
> Ladies Club Register.
> We beg to inform you that by order of our Trautenau branch we credit you with 8220 £700 six per cent. Skoda Works debentures cum. coupon 1/6/1938
> 3/100 Nos. 261991-3
> 4/100 Nos. 272422-24
> and 268606 on your deposit account with us held in London.
> We enclose in addition to our business conditions a declaration concerning the deposit of the securities abroad and specimen signature forms which please return to us duly completed.
>
> Assuring you of our best attention at all times.
> We remain,
> (Signed) Anglo-Prague Credit Bank."

It would seem that Mrs. Frankman did not answer this letter, and on Apr. 27 a further letter was sent to her from the same office as follows :

> " As you have not returned to us the declaration form sent to you on the 16th ultimo relating to place of custody of your £700 six per cent. Skoda Works debentures we have to inform you that the above mentioned securities are deposited with our branch in London. Requesting you to take note of this fact."

It does not appear that Mrs. Frankman answered this letter either. She remained silent, but I think that it must be held that these letters and the business conditions therein referred to constituted and defined a contract between the bank and Mrs. Frankman. I leave out of account the declaration referred to because it was never signed. I need not re-state the course of events between that date and the raising of the present action. I think that it is clear that the contract made in Prague in 1938 is still in force between the respondent and the appellants as regards the three debentures owned by the respondent and that nothing which has occurred since that date has altered the terms of the contract.

The decision of this case must depend on the interpretation of that contract. Two of the business conditions which form part of it are specially important. They are conditions 11 and 50. [His Lordship read the conditions and continued :] If the true meaning of the contract is that the only place at which Mrs. Frankman was entitled to demand re-delivery of her securities was Prague, then I think that the appeal must necessarily succeed. If the appellants were to deliver these securities in Prague to the respondent who now represents Mrs. Frankman, they would commit an offence under the law in force there because the consent of the National Bank has not been given.

I think that it is now settled law that, whatever be the proper law of the contract, an English court will not require a party to do an act in performance of a contract which would be an offence under the law in force at the place where the act has to be done, but, if in the circumstances the respondent has a right to require the securities to be delivered to him in London, then it is necessary to go further and inquire whether his right to such delivery must be held to be governed by the law of England or by the law of Czechoslovakia. With these considerations in view I proceed to examine conditions 11 and 50 and the letters. I take condition 50 first because on one view it would be decisive.

It was argued that condition 50 has no application to a deposit of securities for safe keeping because all the conditions which specifically relate to such deposit are grouped near the beginning of the conditions, and condition 50, which is far removed from them, must be intended only to apply to topics dealt with in conditions in its vicinity. I do not think that there is any substance in this argument. Condition 50 is by its terms a general condition and there appear to be other general conditions in its neighbourhood. It occurs near the end of the conditions and that is a natural place to put a condition intended to have general application. The bank's obligations as bailee of these securities must, I think, be held to have "resulted from the business connection" between it and its customer. That being so, condition 50 stipulates that the place of performance and payment shall be the place of "that department of our establishment which has carried out the relevant transactions with the customer." It is transactions with the customer that matter, not transactions for the customer. The bank certainly carried out certain transactions for the customer in London, but they carried out no transactions with Mrs. Frankman except through their Prague office. The debentures being held in the name of nominees, the London office did not even know that Mrs. Frankman was their owner. All that the London office ever did was to acquire and hold the securities on instructions from the Prague office. No doubt in the ordinary course the London office would also have collected the interest, but again that interest would have been dealt with on instructions from the Prague office. With the greatest respect to the learned judges of the Court of Appeal I am unable to see how the London office can be said by doing these things to have been carrying out any "transaction with the customer." Condition 50 would, therefore, apply unless some "other special stipulation" can be found or unless some qualification of its apparently general meaning is necessary to bring it into line with the rest of the conditions. It was argued that a "special stipulation" can be found in the letters which I have quoted. I do not think so. The letters informed Mrs. Frankman where her securities were being held, but I do not think that they were intended to vary or can be held to have varied the business conditions to which they referred.

The condition which is said to require a qualification of the apparent meaning of condition 50 is condition 11. I think that, assuming that the translation is exact, there is a strong argument that under this condition the bank would not be entitled to move the customer's securities without his consent and this may throw some light on the place where the customer is entitled to demand delivery. A customer dealing with the Prague office would certainly be entitled to demand delivery there if he chose to order transmission of his securities to Prague at his own expense and risk, but could he demand delivery anywhere else? Could he say to the bank: "I want my securities in London. You are holding them there for me in your own office. You are not entitled to put me to the expense and risk of having the securities sent to Prague for delivery to me and then having them sent back again to London where I want them. Your business conditions were never intended to require such an unbusinesslike procedure"? That raises a question which I find it unnecessary to decide.

I am prepared for the purposes of this case to assume in the respondent's favour that, notwithstanding the terms of condition 50, he may have a right to require delivery of these debentures in London. Then it is said that, if that is so, such delivery would not be an offence under Czechoslovakian law. It appears that for the purpose of the Czechoslovakian foreign exchange law foreign branches of Czech undertakings are regarded as separate undertakings, and so the London branch of the appellants' bank is an "exchange foreigner" within A the meaning of that law. The respondent is also an "exchange foreigner" and transactions between exchange foreigners in London are not prohibited. Therefore, it is said that delivery to the respondent by the London branch would not be an offence. I think that this argument leaves out of account the fact that the respondent's contract is not with the London branch. The respondent's contract is with the appellants in Czechoslovakia and the London branch could B not deliver in performance of that contract except on instructions from Prague. Such delivery, though in London, would, I think, be delivery by an exchange citizen to an exchange foreigner and as such be prohibited by Czech law. It is, therefore, necessary to inquire whether the parties' contractual rights with regard to such delivery are governed by the law of Czechoslovakia or by the law of England. C

Apart from certain words in condition 11 which I must now consider, I would hold without difficulty that these rights are governed by the law of Czechoslovakia because the proper law of this contract and of every part of it is the law of Czechoslovakia. The contract was made in that country between two parties resident there. It is true that the property with which it was concerned was, at that time, in England, but it was at least in the option of D one party to have it moved at any time and to demand re-delivery of the property in Czechoslovakia. The phrase which is said to point to a different conclusion is in condition 11 where the bank stated that they will leave the securities deposited with their correspondent "where they shall be subject to the legal measures of the respective country." As I understand the argument it is that this does not merely mean that "they" (i.e., the securities them- E selves) shall be subject to the laws of the country where they are deposited, but means that the rights of the parties under the contract with regard to these securities shall also be governed by the law of the country where they are deposited at least for so long as they remain deposited there. This argument has found favour with the learned judges of the Court of Appeal. As it is at this point that, with the greatest respect, I feel bound to part company with them, F I ought to quote their words. LORD GODDARD, C.J., said ([1948] 2 All E.R. 1030):

> "Those shares were to be held in London according to the laws of England. Therefore, any consideration of what is the proper law of the contract is provided by the condition itself and the proper law of the contract is the law of England and not the law of Czechoslovakia." G

ASQUITH, L.J., said ([1948] 2 All E.R. 1031):

> "This appeal would seem to turn on the application to the facts of this case of the rules of English and private international law. Two conclusions, among others, seem to me to result from that application—first, that the contract entered into between Mrs. Frankman and the bank in 1938 H was governed by Czechoslovak law, the lex loci contractus, but secondly, that, if and so far as, construed by that law, the contract provided for obligations to be performed in England, such obligations were intended to be governed by, and should be treated by English courts as governed by, the municipal law of this country, the lex loci solutionis. Such obligations are, accordingly, not affected by Czech domestic legislation . . ."

I would agree with LORD GODDARD, C.J., that, in one sense at least, securities deposited in London were under condition 11 "to be held in London according to the law of England," but, with respect, I would not agree that it follows that "the proper law of the contract once these debentures are deposited and so far as their deposit is concerned is the law of England and not the law of Czechoslovakia." I would agree with ASQUITH, L.J., in his first conclusion that the contract was governed by Czechoslovakian law, but I would respectfully disagree with his second conclusion that, if and in so far as the contract provided for obligations to be performed in England, such obligations were intended to be governed by the law of England.

Many, if not most, of the obligations under the contract were to be performed in Czechoslovakia, but, assuming that delivery might be obligatory in certain circumstances in England, some of the obligations of the contract were to be performed in England. I do not think that in such circumstances there is any rule or presumption that those obligations which are to be performed outside the country of the contracting parties shall be construed or governed by the law of the place of their performance. The parties can so agree if they choose, and such an agreement need not be in express terms. It may appear on a proper construction of the contract as a whole, but there must at least be something from which such an agreement can reasonably be inferred. I do not think that it is expressed in or can be inferred from the words of condition 11. Those words are a reminder from the bank to the customer that, if the customer chooses to leave his securities lying abroad, his securities will be subject to the hazards of the local law of the place of their deposit. I do not think that in themselves the words of condition 11 mean anything more. Is there, then, anything in the context to indicate a wider meaning? I cannot find it. In ordinary circumstances one would hardly expect the parties to intend a wider meaning. There is no apparent reason why the parties should find it attractive that rights under the contract with regard to deposited property should vary according to the place where that property might be at the time, and should, so long as that property was deposited abroad, be settled by a law with which the parties were, perhaps, unfamiliar, but should be settled by the law of their own country as soon as the property was brought back there. In 1938 circumstances in Czechoslovakia were far from ordinary and it may well be that Mrs. Frankman intended that her property deposited outside that country should not be held under a contract which had any relation to the law of that country, but it is not so clear that that would be the intention of a Czechoslovakian bank. I cannot find that any sufficient inference as to the intention of both parties can be drawn from the abnormal circumstances of the time to justify an interpretation being put on the contract which could not otherwise be justified, and, therefore, I must hold that the proper law of the contract—the law of Czechoslovakia—applies throughout whether the deposited securities remain abroad or are brought back to Prague. If that is so it follows, for the reasons which I have stated in Kahler v. Midland Bank, Ltd. (3) and need not repeat, that, as re-delivery in present circumstances would be illegal according to the law of Czechoslovakia and that for a reason which the English courts are not bound to disregard, there is a good defence to this action. Accordingly, I agree that this appeal must be allowed.

LORD RADCLIFFE: My Lords, the issue of this appeal depends on the view that is taken of the contract which Mrs. Paula Frankman made with the appellants in the year 1938. I think that CASSELS, J., in the High Court took the correct view of that contract. It is only because we are differing from the unanimous view of the Court of Appeal that I add a few words.

In 1938 Mrs. Frankman was a national of Czechoslovakia resident in that country. In March of that year she seems to have transferred her account from the appellants' Trautenau branch to a branch of theirs at Prague, and on Mar. 22 that office wrote to her stating that they credited her with the Skoda Works debentures that are now in question "on your deposit account with us held in London," and enclosed their business conditions and a declaration concerning the deposit of securities abroad. We must treat her as having accepted the conditions and out of this material we have to ascertain what the contract was. Certainly condition 11 and condition 50 are important for this purpose. I do not think it necessary to set them out again. No doubt, the primary object of condition 11 is to protect the appellants and to make it plain that they are not to be blamed for having left on deposit abroad securities that have been purchased abroad, unless their customer has expressly instructed them otherwise, but it is said that it also results from this condition that, if a customer does not so instruct them, they are bound to keep the securities where they purchased them—in this case London. I do not think it necessary to decide whether this contention is right or wrong, since, even if they had bound themselves to keep the securities in London until otherwise directed, I do not think that the proper law of this contract would be any the more English.

Condition 50 is, of course, relied on by the appellants. I cannot accept the respondent's argument that its position in the list of business conditions render it inapplicable to contracts of safe custody of securities. I think that it does apply to them as a general condition governing all business relations between the bank and a customer. It is very difficult to escape from the consequence that Prague is the stipulated place for delivery of the securities if the bailment is determined, for Prague and Prague alone is the "place of that department of our establishment which has carried out the relevant transactions with the customer." Nor do I find it easy to see how any "special stipulation" to the contrary can be said to have been made, but here again I do not think it essential to determine the point. Even if it were right to suppose that under this contract Mrs. Frankman could demand delivery of her securities in London, since they were in London, it could only be on the authority and with the direction of the Prague branch whose customer she was. The London branch neither had nor was expected to have any direct responsibility to her. Whatever else condition 50 secured, it secured at least this, that, consistently with banking practice, a customer could only resort for the clearance of his business to that branch of the bank with which the business was done. And that is enough to determine this appeal. I find it impossible to treat this contract, so construed, as anything but a contract the proper law of which is the law of Czechoslovakia. I think it impossible to read the words in condition 11, "where they shall be subject to the laws of the respective country", as importing that English law was to be the proper law of this contract. These words are no more than a warning, for the protection of the bank, that securities left on deposit abroad will be exposed to the incidence of local legislation. Nor do I think it an admissible construction of condition 50 to treat the London branch of the appellants as the branch "which has carried out the relevant transaction with the customer." However far one may go in regarding London as the place in which this contract was expected or even was required to be performed, the circumstances of the contract as a whole are such that the law of England cannot be held to displace the law of Czechoslovakia as the proper law of this contract. It is here that I differ from the views of the learned judges of the Court of Appeal. The place of performance is, of course, an important consideration in determining the proper law of a contract, and if the whole contract is to be performed in one place, as often it is not, that consideration is, I think, that much the more important, but it would be to ignore decided cases of high authority if we were to regard the place of performance as in any sense determining the proper law as a matter of rule, whether it be for the contract as a whole or for one or more parts of the contract.

But if the proper law is the law of Czechoslovakia we are faced with the same issue as arose in the case of Kahler v. Midland Bank, Ltd. (3), and I would make the same answer. It is unnecessary to repeat what I said there. We have in this case the evidence of Dr. Otto Kulhanek, a doctor of law of Prague University. I think that his evidence establishes that the Czechoslovakian currency regulations do draw a distinction between the appellants' A Prague office and its London branch. The legal entity remains the same, but the appellants, as the London branch, being exchange foreigners, may effect transactions which would be forbidden to them when acting as their Prague office and as such exchange citizens. Dr. Kulhanek was, however, explicit that under these regulations a release to the respondent, even if the operation was consummated by physical delivery in London, would be regarded as a B transfer between an exchange citizen and an exchange foreigner, because Mrs. Frankman was the customer of the Prague office, not the London branch, and the release would accordingly be forbidden unless the prior consent of the National Bank of Czechoslovakia had been obtained. The physical situation of the bonds he regarded as irrelevant for this purpose. I think that we ought to accept his interpretation of the law on this point, and it seems C to me to present a reasonable view of the scope of the regulatory system. The London branch of the appellants may deal with its customers, if they are exchange foreigners, without the Czechoslovakian regulations seeking to control the appellants, but the Prague office may not deal with its own customers through the hands of the London branch except under the control of the National Bank.

D In the result, I think that we ought to come to the conclusion that the contract of safe deposit between Mrs. Frankman and the appellants, to the benefit and obligations of which the respondent has succeeded, cannot be treated as terminable at the will of the bailor. It must be treated as terminable only with the consent of the National Bank, and that consent is not forthcoming. If the contract that governs the bailment is not presently E terminable, it is impossible to allow the respondent to ignore the contract and to sue the appellants in rem for the recovery of what is indisputably his property.

Appeal allowed. Order of the Court of Appeal for payment by appellants of costs of appeal to that court to remain undisturbed. Appellants to pay costs of respondent's appeal in the House of Lords.

DHULIPALA KAMESWARA RAO v. WYLES.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Croom-Johnson and Lynskey, JJ.), October 19, 1949.]

Drugs—Dangerous drugs—Custody—"Locked receptacle"—Drugs left in H unlocked case in locked motor car—Dangerous Drugs Regulations, 1937 (S.R. & O., 1937, No. 560), reg. 5 (2), (as amended by Dangerous Drugs Regulations, 1948 (S.I., 1948, No. 2653), art. 4).

By the Dangerous Drugs Regulations, 1937 (S.R. & O., 1937, No. 560), reg. 5, as amended by the Dangerous Drugs Regulations, 1948 (S.I., 1948, No. 2653), art. 4, it is provided: "(2) Every drug or preparation in the actual custody of a person authorised by virtue of this regulation shall, except when the necessities of the practice of the profession, function or employment by virtue of which that person is authorised as aforesaid otherwise require, be kept in a locked receptacle which can be opened only by him or by some other person authorised by virtue of this regulation."

The appellant, a registered medical practitioner and a person legally authorised to be in possession of drugs to which the Dangerous Drugs Act, 1920, applied, left his motor car in a car-park near a picture theatre, leaving in the car, the doors of which he had locked, an unlocked leather case containing drugs. The car was stolen and, when later it was recovered, it was found that the drugs had been removed.

HELD: a motor car was not a "receptacle" within the meaning of reg. 5 (2), and, therefore, the appellant had committed an offence under the regulation.

CASE STATED by the stipendiary magistrate for the city of Birmingham.

An information was laid before the magistrate by the respondent, a chief inspector of police, against the appellant, a medical practitioner, that he did fail to comply with reg. 5 (2) of the Dangerous Drugs Regulations, 1937, as amended by the Dangerous Drugs Regulations, 1948, in that he left drugs in an unlocked case in a motor car, the doors of which were locked. The appellant was found Guilty and fined £5, and the Divisional Court now dismissed his appeal.

Bourke for the appellant.

Vernon Gattie for the respondent.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: This is a Case stated by LORD ILKESTON, the stipendiary magistrate for Birmingham, before whom the appellant was charged with a breach of the Dangerous Drugs Regulations, 1937 (S.R. & O., 1937, No. 560), reg. 5, as amended by the Dangerous Drugs Regulations, 1948 (S.I., 1948, No. 2653), art. 4. Reg. 5 (2), as amended, provides:

> "Every drug or preparation in the actual custody of a person authorised by virtue of this regulation shall, except when the necessities of the practice of the profession, function or employment by virtue of which that person is authorised as aforesaid otherwise require, be kept in a locked receptacle which can be opened only by him or by some other person authorised by virtue of this regulation."

The appellant is a medical man, and, therefore, is authorised to be in possession of dangerous drugs, which, in my opinion, can be said to be in his actual custody even although at any particular moment of time he has not actually got his hand on them. In the present case he put the drugs in a case which was not locked, put the case in his motor car, and drove to a picture theatre. Before entering the theatre he locked his car. The car was stolen, the lock having been forced, and the drugs were taken out.

The regulation is not, perhaps, very happily worded. It is possible that it might be worded differently or more strongly, but we have only to consider the facts of this particular case. I am deciding this case merely on those facts, and I am not speculating as to what might be the result if different facts had been found, such as that this case had been locked or if the motor car had contained a locker in which these things were kept. First, I think that the regulation contemplates that drugs of this sort are to be kept regularly in some receptacle, and not that it can be said that at any particular moment, because a lock is turned somewhere, that there is a compliance with the regulation. It is impossible to say that a motor car is a receptacle within the meaning of this regulation. If it is, as was put by counsel for the respondent in argument, it would be just as true to say, if a doctor left his drugs lying about in a house and locked the front door, the back door and the windows, that they were in a locked receptacle. No one, I think, would call a motor car a receptacle for drugs any more than he would call a house a receptacle for them. One has to give the regulation an interpretation which will make sense of it and, unless the words compel one to take another view, construe it in a way to effect the purpose which the legislature must have had in mind. It is impossible to say that a motor car which must be locked and unlocked according to whether the person is in it is a receptacle, and there is no suggestion that the appellant keeps his motor car locked at all times whether he is in it or not. I put my judgment entirely on the ground that a motor car cannot be regarded as a receptacle, and that I think was the view taken by the learned magistrate. I agree with him, and this appeal fails.

CROOM-JOHNSON, J.: I agree with the order which is proposed, and for the same reasons.

LYNSKEY, J.: I agree.

[COURT OF CRIMINAL APPEAL (Lord Goddard, C.J., Croom-Johnson and Lynskey, JJ.), October 14, 1949.]

Criminal Law—Sentence—Preventive detention—When an appropriate sentence—Length of sentence—Criminal Justice Act, 1948 (c. 58), s. 21 (2).

The appellant was convicted of attempting to obtain money by false pretences and was sentenced to seven years' preventive detention. There were eight previous convictions recorded against him, the last being in 1938.

HELD: preventive detention was not an appropriate sentence in the circumstances, and a sentence of imprisonment should be substituted.

Per curiam: In many instances courts have been passing sentences of preventive detention in cases where, but for the substitution of imprisonment for penal servitude by the Criminal Justice Act, 1948, s. 1 (1), the sentence would have been penal servitude for the same number of years. The court thought it right to emphasise that, in its opinion, it was not the intention of the Act of 1948 to substitute preventive detention for the old sentence of penal servitude. Preventive detention ought to be awarded only in cases where, before that Act, there would probably have been a charge and finding that the prisoner was an habitual criminal. Such a sentence ought to be passed only where prolonged detention was necessary for the protection of the public. It should be regarded as an exceptional sentence and not one to be given merely instead of imprisonment. Where it was given, it ought to be for a long period.

APPEAL against a sentence of seven years' preventive detention on conviction of attempting to obtain money by false pretences.

The appellant had eight previous convictions, but between the present and the last previous sentence he had had a clean record for nine years. The appeal was allowed and a sentence of eighteen months' imprisonment was substituted for the sentence of preventive detention. The facts appear in the judgment of the court delivered by Lord Goddard, C.J., who, on Oct. 18, 1949, made some general observations on the subject of preventive detention which follow the judgment.

Bechhofer Roberts for the appellant.
The Crown was not represented.

The following judgment of the Court was delivered by LORD GODDARD, C.J.: The appellant was convicted before the learned recorder of West Ham of attempting to obtain a sum of £150 by false pretences. There was also a charge against him of unlawfully being in possession of some petrol coupons, which was dealt with by the magistrate, and he was sentenced to six months' imprisonment.

The learned recorder, having heard that the appellant had had eight previous convictions, ordered him to be detained in preventive detention for seven years for the misdemeanour of attempting to obtain money by false pretences, although he was aware of the fact that the appellant's last sentence was as far back as 1938 and that for nine years he had gone absolutely straight. We cannot allow a sentence of seven years' preventive detention, in the circumstances of the case, to stand, and the court has decided to set aside that sentence and to substitute for it a sentence of eighteen months' imprisonment to date from conviction.

Sentence varied.

Solicitors: Registrar of the Court of Criminal Appeal (for the appellant).

Oct. 18. LORD GODDARD, C.J., made the following observations on the subject of preventive detention: Since the beginning of these sittings we have had before us more than eighty cases. The majority have been appeals against sentence, and in a substantial number the sentence passed has been one of preventive detention. A common sentence of this description has been one of five years, and this court feels that in many instances courts are passing this class of sentence in cases where, but for the recent substitution of imprisonment for penal servitude by the Criminal Justice Act, 1948, the sentence would have been penal servitude for the same number of years. We think it right to emphasise that, in our opinion, it was not the intention of s. 21 (2) of the Act of 1948 to substitute preventive detention for the old sentence of penal servitude. If a court is of opinion that a given number of years is the appropriate sentence, it does not by any means follow that because the prisoner has the requisite number of previous convictions the sentence should be one of preventive detention rather that imprisonment, still less does this follow because of a report from the Prison Commissioners that the prisoner is suitable for this form of sentence. Their report is merely as to his suitability if the court deems it right to pass such a sentence. Preventive detention ought to be awarded only in cases where before the Act of 1948 there would probably have been a charge and finding that the prisoner was a habitual criminal. Before the Act it will be remembered that, as in such a case at least three years' penal servitude had first to be given, the total length of detention would have been at least eight years. Preventive detention ought to be passed only where prolonged detention is necessary for the protection of the public. It may well be that, when a sentence of five years' imprisonment would ordinarily be passed, the court may consider that the particular circumstances require an additional term because of the criminal proclivities of the offender and so give seven or ten or even more years preventive detention. Possibly, if a sentence of two or three years' imprisonment would ordinarily be regarded as appropriate, preventive detention for five years might in some cases be deemed justifiable, but the court is of opinion that preventive detention should be regarded as an exceptional sentence and not one to be given merely in lieu of imprisonment. Where it is given it ought to be for a long period. As a rule five years would only be appropriate in the case of a man of advanced age who habitually commits crime, it may be of a petty nature, who must, therefore, be kept in custody, but who, it may be hoped, will not end his life in prison. There have been very few cases of this nature before the court in which they have disapproved of the length of sentence, but several in which, in their opinion, it should have been ordinary imprisonment and not preventive detention. If the latter sentences continue to be given at the present rate it would seem that the Prison Commissioners may be put into difficulties in finding the requisite accommodation in the places set aside for this form of detention.

NOTE.

R. v. BARRETT.

[Court of Criminal Appeal (Lord Goddard, C.J., Croom-Johnson and Lynskey, JJ.), October 14, 1949.]

Criminal Law—Sentence—Corrective training—When appropriate sentence—Length of sentence—Criminal Justice Act, 1948 (c. 58), s. 21 (1).

Application for leave to appeal against conviction and sentence of five years' preventive detention on charges of possessing housebreaking implements by night and attempted shopbreaking.

The applicant, who was 36 years old, had four previous convictions, three for shopbreaking and one for receiving, and had just been released from prison when he committed the offence for which he was sentenced. The court, while holding that, in general, where imprisonment was an appropriate sentence preventive detention should not be awarded, decided that in the present circumstances the application should be refused.

No counsel appeared.

LORD GODDARD, C.J., made observations in regard to preventive detention similar to those reported in R. v. Askew (supra) and continued : Very much the same considerations apply to sentences of corrective training, which is intended for what I may call extended Borstal treatment. Since a person of 21 years or over who is in need of training, by virtue of the Criminal Justice Act, 1948, s. 48 (1), can no longer be sent to Borstal, it is a good thing, no doubt, to send him for corrective training. If his record shows that his tendency is to lead a criminal life, it is as well to make the sentence of corrective training of substantial length and to bear in mind that the usual remission will be granted if the prisoner behaves himself. In such cases, it is of little use giving a sentence of a length which will not enable real reform to be attempted.

Application refused.

Street Traffic—In charge of motor vehicle while under the influence of drink—Disqualification for holding licence—"Special reasons" for not disqualifying—Ignorance of combined effect of drink and drugs—Road Traffic Act, 1930 A (c. 43), s. 15 (2).

A motorist, having sustained an injury to his leg, took drugs not knowing that he would thereby be rendered more susceptible to the effect of alcohol. Later he took an amount of beer and whisky to which he was accustomed. The combined effect of the drugs and alcohol rendered him unfit to drive a car. He was convicted of being in charge of a motor vehicle while under B the influence of drink so that he was incapable of having proper control of the vehicle, but he was not disqualified for holding a licence, the justices being of the opinion that his ignorance of the combined effect of the drugs and the alcoholic drink constituted "special reasons" within the Road Traffic Act, 1930, s. 15 (2). On appeal,

Held: this circumstance was one which the justices were entitled to C consider as constituting "special reasons" for not disqualifying the motorist, and, as they had not acted perversely, the court would not interfere with their exercise of their discretion.

[For the Road Traffic Act, 1930, s. 15 (2), see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Vol. 23, p. 623.]

Case Stated by Essex Justices. D

At a court of summary jurisdiction sitting at Halstead the respondent was charged with having been, while in charge of a motor vehicle on a road, under the influence of drink to such an extent as to be incapable of having proper control of the vehicle, contrary to the Road Traffic Act, 1930, s. 15 (1). On Mar. 28, 1949, the respondent pleaded Guilty to the charge, and was convicted and ordered to pay a fine of £10 and costs. The justices ordered that his driving E licence be endorsed, but they found that the taking of drugs had rendered him more susceptible to the effect of the alcohol, and that his ignorance of what would be the combined effect of the drugs and the alcohol constituted a special reason within s. 15 (2) why he should not be disqualified. The appeal of the prosecution was dismissed. The facts appear in the judgment of Lord Goddard, C.J. F

E. J. P. Cussen for the appellant, an inspector of police.

G. Pollock for the respondent.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: This is another case which raises the often very difficult question whether justices are justified, having convicted and fined a man for being in charge of a motor car when he was unfit to drive owing to G drink or drugs, in finding special circumstances entitling them to refrain from disqualifying him for holding a driving licence.

The respondent, who was a veterinary surgeon, having some injury to his leg, administered to himself a drug generally called "M. & B.", and also phenobarbitone, which is a drug of the hypnotic variety. Having taken those drugs at 6 p.m. he went to a public house and there consumed some whisky and some H beer of an amount to which he was accustomed. At 10.10 p.m. he was seen staggering near his car, which would seem clearly to point to the fact that he was under the influence of drink or drugs or, probably, both. At 11.5 p.m. he was found sitting in the driving seat of the car which had been driven from one side of the road on to the pathway on the other side, and at that time he was under the influence of drink or drugs to such an extent that he was unfit to drive the car. The justices, however, came to the conclusion that there were special reasons entitling them to refrain from disqualifying him because they considered that he did not know that the effect of taking alcohol after the drugs would have a more serious effect on him than if he had taken the same amount of alcohol and no drugs.

It is a borderline case, and I think that, if the case had come before me, I should have had no difficulty in holding that there was no special circumstance. A On the other hand, I feel a difficulty in saying that we can reverse the justices' decision unless we conclude that it was perverse, and I am certainly not prepared to say it was perverse. I think they have given their best consideration to the case, and have come to a conclusion on a matter in which they have a discretion, and even if I disagree, as I do, with the way in which they exercised their discretion, I do not think that is sufficient ground in law for upsetting their B decision. Accordingly, I have come to the conclusion, after considerable hesitation and with some reluctance, that this appeal must be dismissed.

CROOM-JOHNSON, J.: I have the greatest possible doubt in this case. It looks to me as though the justices had really examined the question whether there was any good reason why the respondent should, after taking his accustomed quantity of alcohol, have become under the influence of drink, and C one sympathises with them in the conclusion to which they came on the very peculiar facts of this case. The difficulty I feel is that the offence charged is that the respondent was in charge of a car when he was not in a fit and proper condition to drive it. I doubt whether the justices considered the facts at the proper moment of time when they considered whether there was material which entitled them to exercise the discretion which is given to them under the statute. However, D it is a very exceptional case, and I do not feel sufficiently certain of the view that I have expressed to come to the conclusion that I ought not to concur in the judgment which is proposed. In those circumstances, I do concur in it.

LYNSKEY, J.: I agree. As I understand the law, for reasons to be "special" within s. 15 (2) of the Road Traffic Act, 1930, they must be special E to the facts constituting the offence. The offence here was that of being under the influence of drink or drugs to such an extent as to affect the respondent's ability to control the car. It is an essential ingredient of the offence that the justices should be satisfied that the defendant was drunk at the material time. If there are facts which show that his drunkenness was induced by the malicious act of some third party, or, as in this case, by ignorance of the effect of certain F drugs on alcohol, those are matters which the justices are entitled to consider as special circumstances. Once there are special circumstances, the discretion whether or not the defendant shall be disqualified is that of the justices, and as long as they act within the terms of their discretion and on the facts and not perversely this court cannot interfere. I think this is a borderline case. If I had been trying it myself, even if I thought there were special circumstances, I should G have said that the aggravating circumstance of the respondent's taking control of the car knowing he was under the influence of drugs was sufficient to prevent the exercise of the discretion in his favour. But that is a matter for the justices. One cannot say they misdirected themselves, and in these circumstances, in my view, we cannot interfere with their decision, and this appeal must be dismissed.

EDLER v. AUERBACH.

[King's Bench Division (Devlin, J.), July 7, 8, 11, 27, October 12, 1949.]

Landlord and Tenant—Lease—Illegal user of premises—Permission to use premises for professional purposes—Regulation forbidding such use without consent of local housing authority—Enforceability of lease—Illegal object of lessor not pleaded, but disclosed, and dealt with, in evidence—Defence (General) Regulations, 1939 (S.R. & O., 1945, No. 1361), reg. 68ca (1).

Landlord and Tenant—Fitness of premises—Innocent misrepresentation inducing contract—Recovery of rent paid—Implied warranty—Unilateral mistake—Money had and received.

By the Defence (General) Regulations, 1939, reg. 68ca (1): "No person shall except with the consent of the local housing authority use for purposes other than residential purposes any housing accommodation which has been used for residential purposes at any time since December 31, 1938 . . ."

When negotiating for the letting of rooms on the second floor of premises, which to his knowledge had been used for residential purposes from January to August, 1939, the lessor told the prospective lessee that it was all right for him to let them for office purposes and that they had not been used for residential purposes after Dec. 31, 1938. In the lease subsequently made, in March, 1947, the lessee covenanted to use and occupy the rooms for professional purposes and not otherwise. On learning of the position the local housing authority informed the lessor that the occupation of the premises was a contravention of the Defence (General) Regulations, 1939, reg. 68ca (1), and the lessor applied for consent to user for professional purposes. On May 22 the authority gave consent to the use of the ground and first floors (used by the lessor) for professional purposes and decided to take no action to enforce the regulation in respect of such use of the second and third floors by the existing tenants on an undertaking by the lessor to re-allocate accommodation on the ground and first floors to enable the tenants to release the other two floors for residential use. In an action by the lessee claiming repayment of rent which he had paid, he contended (a) that the agreement was null and void for illegality, and, alternatively, (b) that the agreement was voidable by reason of an innocent misrepresentation made by the lessor that the premises had not been used for residential purposes since Dec. 31, 1938; (c) that the agreement was entered into under a mutual mistake of fact respecting such user or (in an amendment to the statement of claim) on a unilateral mistake; and (d) that there was an implied term or warranty in the agreement that the lessee could use the premises for professional purposes and that the warranty had been broken. The lessor counterclaimed (inter alia) for the balance of the rent due under the tenancy agreement. Evidence of the lessor's knowledge of the truth when making his misstatement was given on behalf of the lessee without objection from the lessor, and was also dealt with by the lessor in his evidence.

Held: (i) the agreement was not ex facie illegal because (a) the covenant as to user, being really a negative covenant (i.e., not to use the premises otherwise than for professional purposes), did not impose any obligation on the lessee to use the premises at all, and (b) the agreement did not require the lessee to enter into occupation without first obtaining the consent of the local housing authority to professional user, and, therefore, the agreement did not necessarily involve an infringement of the Defence (General) Regulations, 1939, reg. 68ca (1).

(ii) the covenant as to user was not per se evidence that the parties contemplated an unlawful performance because they might have intended to obtain the consent of the local authority.

(iii) the lease was unenforceable by the lessor because, though not intending to break the law himself, he intended that the lessee, as his innocent instrument, should break it ; by granting the lease he had taken an overt step in carrying out his illegal intention and the fact that his attempt to break the law was frustrated was immaterial ; and, even if the subsequent consent of the local housing authority legalised the professional use of the premises, the lessor's conduct disentitled him from obtaining the aid of the court to enforce the agreement.

Alexander v. Rayson ([1936] 1 K.B. 169), applied.

(iv) although the illegal object of the lessor was not pleaded, the facts in regard thereto had been given in evidence for the lessee without objection by the lessor and had been fully dealt with in evidence by the lessor, so that all the relevant circumstances were before the court ; although it was submitted, after the evidence was completed, that it ought not to have been received and that the court should disregard it, public policy required that the court should not ignore an illegality which had been brought to its attention, and, therefore, it must refuse to allow the lessor to enforce the agreement.

North-Western Salt Co., Ltd. v. Electrolytic Alkali Co., Ltd. ([1914] A.C. 461), considered.

(v) the rent paid by the lessee was properly paid under a valid agreement and the lessor's illegal object did not by itself give any right of action to the lessee ; as the misrepresentation regarding user of the premises after 1938 was pleaded only as innocent misrepresentation, and as innocent misrepresentation was not a ground for the rescission of an executed lease, the lessee was not entitled to rescission : Angel v. Jay ([1911] 1 K.B. 666), followed ; on a demise of real property there was no warranty implied by law that the property was fit for the purpose for which it was let, and this principle applied whether the premises were physically or legally unfit, and, therefore, the plea of implied warranty failed : Hart v. Windsor (1844) (12 M. & W. 68), followed ; on the facts, there was no mutual mistake and, although there was a unilateral mistake on the lessee's part, the effect of the mistake was exhausted when the lease was made, and the rent was paid, not because of the mistake, but because the lease compelled it ; as the lessee had not pleaded fraudulent misrepresentation, the misrepresentation must be assumed to be innocent and, on such assumption, there was nothing unjust or unconscientious in allowing the lessor to retain the money, and, therefore, the rent was not recoverable as money had and received ; and, accordingly, the claim for recovery of rent paid under the lease failed.

Action for money received by the defendant for the use of the plaintiff (i.e., for rent paid under mistake or for a user of premises which was illegal under the Defence (General) Regulations, 1939, reg. 68CA (1)) ; for a declaration that an agreement was null and void ; for rescission of the agreement ; and for payment to the plaintiff of a sum paid under the agreement. Counterclaim for rent due under the agreement, and for damages for breach of covenant to deliver up in good repair and for damage done to the premises.

The plaintiff, a solicitor, was the lessee of two rooms on the second floor of premises at 9 Mansfield Street, London, let to him by the defendant, an accountant, by an agreement dated Mar. 31, 1947. The whole premises had been used for residential purposes until the outbreak of war in 1939, after which they were uninhabited. The defendant, in the course of inquiries by him about the premises in 1945, was shown a letter stating that the house was inhabited in the ordinary way until September, 1939. At that time he intended to use the second and third floors as his residence and the rest of the house for his business (which, by proviso (b) to reg. 68CA (1), would prevent the regulation from applying). He went into occupation in November or December, 1945, but, finding the cost of conversion for residential purposes prohibitive and the grant of a licence unlikely, he abandoned the idea of residence and used the premises as an office in breach of the regulation. On May 1, 1946, he obtained a lease of the premises which permitted him to use the premises either as a private dwelling-house or for the purpose of offices, and under it he covenanted to obtain any necessary consent of the local housing authority under reg. 68CA (1) in respect of the use of any part of the premises for purposes other than residential. He took no steps, however, to obtain such consent. He then decided to sub-let the second and third floors of the premises. In March, 1947, in the course of negotiations for a letting, he informed the plaintiff that it was all right for him to let the premises for office purposes and that they had not been used residentially after Dec. 31, 1938. The plaintiff was satisfied and made no further inquiries, and on Mar. 31, 1947, he signed a lease of two rooms on the second floor for a term of six months from Mar. 31, 1947, and thereafter until determination by either party giving to the other six months' notice. The rent was £525, payable quarterly in advance, the first payment to be made as from Apr. 10, 1947. The plaintiff covenanted to use and occupy the premises for professional purposes and not otherwise. He paid £111 1*s.* 2*d.* rent on Apr. 11, 1947. Having decided to sub-let one of the rooms, he made an application to the appropriate authority for a licence for electrical work to be done on the premises. As a result, the local housing authority made inquiries and discovered that the whole of the house had been used for residential purposes from January to August, 1939. The town clerk informed the defendant that his occupation of the ground floor was a contravention of the regulation, and the defendant, after expressing surprise that the premises had been used for residential purposes in 1939, applied for the authority's consent to business user. Both the plaintiff and the defendant attended the hearing of the application by the committee of the local authority on May 22, when consent was granted to the defendant for the use of the ground and first floors for professional offices, and it was decided, as the plaintiff had apparently made a bona fide error, to take no action to enforce the regulation in respect of the use of the second and third floors for other than residential purposes by the existing tenants, on an undertaking being given by the defendant that he would endeavour to re-allocate the accommodation on the ground and first floors to enable those tenants to release their existing accommodation for use for residential purposes. The plaintiff gave notice to determine his tenancy on Mar. 31, 1948, and brought proceedings to have the lease declared null and void and rescinded and to recover the rent he had paid. DEVLIN, J., held that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover the rent paid, but that the defendant was debarred from suing on the tenancy agreement.

Cur. adv. vult.

Oct. 12. DEVLIN, J., read the following judgment. The Defence (General) Regulations, 1939, reg. 68CA (1), which came into force on Oct. 20, 1945, provides :

B

> " No person shall except with the consent of the local housing authority use for purposes other than residential purposes any housing accommodation which has been used for residential purposes at any time since Dec. 31, 1938 . . . "

This action concerns a lease of premises which fall within this regulation.

By an agreement dated Mar. 31, 1947, the defendant let to the plaintiff some C rooms on the second floor of 9, Mansfield Street, London, and the plaintiff agreed to use them for professional purposes only. The plaintiff now contends that the agreement is null and void for illegality. Alternatively, he says, first, that the agreement is voidable by reason of an innocent misrepresentation made by the defendant that the premises had not been used for residential purposes since Dec. 31, 1938 ; secondly, that the agreement was entered into on a mutual D mistake of fact respecting such user ; and, thirdly, that there was an implied term or warranty in the agreement that he could use the premises for professional purposes and that the warranty has been broken.

[His Lordship stated the facts and found as a fact that the defendant knew that the premises had been used for residential purposes in 1939 and that he had informed the plaintiff that they had not been so used when negotiating the E lease. His Lordship proceeded] : I am now in a position to consider the question of law which arise in this case, and I shall take first the issue of illegality. It is well settled that an agreement may be unenforceable either because on the face of it it cannot be performed without breaking the law, or because, although capable of being performed legally, it was made with the object of breaking the law. The statement of claim pleads ex facie illegality only. It contains no allega- F tion about the object of the agreement or about the state of mind of either party. I am bound to deal with any sort of illegality, but I must first consider the case as pleaded. In my judgment, it fails. The regulation does not touch the letting of premises. It deals only with their use. The lease contains a covenant by the tenant to use the premises for professional purposes and not otherwise. Though positive in form, this is really a negative covenant. It should more correctly G be phrased as a covenant not to use the premises otherwise than for professional purposes. Counsel for the plaintiff rightly concedes that it cannot be construed as imposing any obligation on the tenant to use the premises at all. The plaintiff can legally perform all his obligations under the agreement. He can get no benefit from it, because he could not, assuming the prohibition in the regulation to be absolute, enter into occupation, but that is immaterial.

H This is enough to dispose of the point, but, since the prohibition is not absolute, it is unnecessary to take quite such a legalistic view of the position. The regulation forbids non-residential user without the consent of the authority. There would be nothing remarkable in a man taking a lease in this form if he had previously satisfied himself that consent would be granted or if he was willing to take the risk of its refusal. The agreement would be ex facie illegal only if expressly or impliedly it required the tenant to enter into occupation without first obtaining consent to professional user.

Counsel for the plaintiff argues alternatively that, if the agreement could be performed lawfully, the covenant as to user is at least clear evidence that the parties contemplated an unlawful performance. That is to say, they contemplated that the premises should be used for professional purposes and that would be an unlawful use. The object of the agreement was, therefore, unlawful, and it is immaterial, counsel for the plaintiff argues, whether the parties appreciated that their object was unlawful. Thus, he says, there is no need to investigate the state of mind of either the plaintiff or the defendant. He can establish that the agreement had an illegal object from the document itself and without going outside his pleading. The fallacy in this argument is in the assertion that the covenant by itself shows that the parties contemplated an unlawful performance. It might if the prohibition were absolute, but, as I have pointed out, it is consistent with the hypothesis that the parties intended first to obtain the consent of the local authority. Whether or not they had such an intention can be shown only by extraneous evidence. The covenant by itself proves nothing. I am not accepting the view that, when the agreement is one which can be performed lawfully, it does not matter that the parties may not have intended to break the law if their object or intended mode of performance is in fact illegal. Such authority as there is suggests the contrary: see per BLACKBURN, J. (L.R. Q.B. 208), delivering the judgment of the court in Waugh v. Morris (1). But I need not determine that point.

Before I consider the other issues raised on the pleadings, it is convenient that I should complete what I have to say on illegality. I am satisfied that the defendant knew that his use of 9, Mansfield Street, was a breach of the law. Since he was using it illegally throughout 1946 without attempting to regularise his position by applying for the council's consent, I infer that he had no intention of making the application. Doubtless he thought that the risk of refusal was greater than the risk of discovery. When at the end of 1946 he decided to sublet part of the premises for office accommodation, I am satisfied that he did not intend that either he or the plaintiff should apply for the council's consent. If he had, he would not have deceived the plaintiff about the position. Accordingly, when he granted the tenancy he expected and intended that the premises demised would be used by the tenant for an illegal purpose. It is, I suppose, notorious that a higher rent is obtainable for premises of this class if let for offices than if the user is restricted to dwelling.

The relevant principle of law is expressed by the Court of Appeal in Alexander v. Rayson (2) as follows ([1936] 1 K.B. 182):

> "But it often happens that an agreement which in itself is not unlawful is made with the intention of one or both parties to make use of the subject-matter for an unlawful purpose . . . In such a case any party to the agreement who had the unlawful intention is precluded from suing upon it."

Counsel for the defendant submits that I ought not in the circumstances of this case to apply this principle at all. Subject to this objection, which I shall consider later, he distinguishes it in three ways. First, he says that there is here no question of the defendant himself using the demised premises illegally. The only person who could use them is the plaintiff. This is a distinction of form, but not, I think of substance. If both parties intend to use the subject-matter illegally, it is clear that the agreement is enforceable by neither. If one party intends to use the subject-matter illegally, it is clear that the agreement is not enforceable by him. If one party intends that the other should use the subject-matter illegally, I think that it is a logical and necessary extension of the principle that the agreement should be unenforceable by the first party. The plaintiff in this case is the innocent instrument through which the defendant sought to effect his intention that the law should be broken, and the defendant's position is, therefore, no better than if he were using the subject-matter himself. Secondly, it is said that all that is shown against the defendant is an intention to break the law and that is not enough to attract the principle : see Alexander v. Rayson (2) ([1936] 1 K.B. 189). I do not think that this is a case of mere intention. The granting of the lease which permitted only professional use was itself an overt step in carrying out the illegal intention which the defendant had already formed. Indeed, when the defendant, having deceived the plaintiff, had granted him the lease, there was nothing left for him to do. The breach of the law would

A follow naturally the steps he had taken. There was more than an intent to break the law, there was an attempt to break it, and the fact that the attempt was frustrated, because before the premises were actually used the council discovered the position, is immaterial. Thirdly, the defendant says that on May 22 the council consented, in effect if not in form, to the plaintiff's professional use of the premises, and, accordingly, the lease can be enforced by the defendant after
B that date. I think that this plea fails. I doubt that the council's resolution legalises the professional use of the premises, but, assuming that it does, what has to be considered in the application of this principle is not whether the premises can legally be used for the purpose contemplated, but whether the defendant's conduct has been such as to disentitle him from obtaining the aid of the court to enforce the agreement to his own advantage. The agreement was part of the C illegal scheme conceived by the defendant. It succeeded to this extent, as is clear from the minute of the meeting of the appropriate committee of the council on May 22, that, if the committee had not considered the plaintiff as being in actual occupation by reason of a bona fide error, they would not have given him any relief. To allow the defendant to take advantage of a consent obtained in those circumstances would give him a profit from his own wrong,
D but, in truth, neither success nor failure of the scheme matters. Neither would atone for the fact that it was conceived in wrongdoing. That is what matters and what debars the defendant from invoking the aid of the court.

I turn now to the objection that I ought not to be considering any illegality except that which is pleaded. I accept the submission of counsel for the defendant that the illegality which I have found depends on the knowledge or intention
E of the defendant, that this is not pleaded, and that it ought to have been pleaded if it was to be relied on. Counsel then cites North-Western Salt Co., Ltd. v. Electrolytic Alkali Co., Ltd. (3). That case authorises, I think, four propositions : first, that where a contract is ex facie illegal, the court will not enforce it, whether the illegality is pleaded or not ; secondly, that where, as here, the contract is not ex facie illegal, evidence of extraneous circumstances tending to show that
F it has an illegal object should not be admitted unless the circumstances relied on are pleaded ; thirdly, that where unpleaded facts, which, taken by themselves, show an illegal object, have got in evidence (because, perhaps, no objection was raised or because they were adduced for some other purpose), the court should not act on them unless it is satisfied that the whole of the relevant circumstances are before it ; but, fourthly, that where the court is satisfied that all
G the relevant facts are before it and it can see clearly from them that the contract had an illegal object, it may not enforce the contract, whether the facts were pleaded or not. The last proposition is the most important for the purpose of this case and I think that it fairly synthesises the relevant dicta. The court must pronounce on the transaction if, in the words of VISCOUNT HALDANE, L.C. ([1914] A.C. 469), the " case has been completely presented ", or, in LORD
H MOULTON's words (ibid., 476) : " the contract and its setting be fully before the court." What I have expressed as the third proposition is not so much an exception to the principle as an exemplification of it. The court must be satisfied of the illegality of the transaction. That means that it must be satisfied that it knows all the relevant facts. On any issue that is raised on the pleadings the court may safely assume that the relevant facts will be brought before it by one side or the other. Where notice of the issue is not given on the pleadings, there is a danger that that assumption may break down, and the decision in North-

Western Salt Co., Ltd. v. Electrolytic Alkali Co., Ltd. (3) is a warning against overlooking that danger. In Rawlings v. General Trading Co. (4) ([1921] 1 K.B. 645), Scrutton, L.J., treated the decision as making it clear :

> " . . . that where all the facts are before the court, and it can see clearly that it is contrary to public policy to enforce the agreement, the court should act, though the pleadings do not raise the point."

This dictum is in a dissenting judgment, but the point of dissent was whether the agreement in that case was in restraint of trade or not.

I must now apply these propositions to the circumstances of this case. The plaintiff called Mr. Malden [of John A. Rutter & Son, estate agents, who were acting for the defendant when he was negotiating for the lease of the premises in 1945] and the only point of his evidence was to establish that the defendant at all material times knew quite well that the premises were subject to reg. 68ca. Fraudulent misrepresentation is not pleaded. The only issue in the statement of claim to which the defendant's state of mind might relate is mutual mistake and Mr. Malden's evidence was inconsistent with the plea on that point. Nevertheless, his evidence was taken without objection. If objection had been made, I think that I should have upheld it. It was not until after his evidence, including cross-examination, had been completed that counsel for the defendant submitted that it ought not to have been received and that I ought to disregard it. That is, in effect, inviting me to ignore an illegality that has been brought to my attention. I cannot do that. When the court comes to know of an illegality, public policy requires that it should refuse any help to the wrongdoer, and public policy cannot be circumvented by the court fictitiously deeming itself not to have heard that which in truth it has heard. Things might be different if the illegality depended on evidence received after an objection made in time had been wrongly overruled, but I have not to consider that.

If the matter had been left there, I might, applying the third of the propositions which I have expressed above, have concluded that I had heard only one side of the case and have refused to act on Mr. Malden's evidence, even though unchallenged, but the defendant went into the box and dealt fully with the point. I am satisfied that I have all the relevant material before me. Indeed, it was not suggested that I had not or that there was any aspect of the point insufficiently exposed. I am satisfied that the evidence leads clearly and inevitably to the inferences I have set out above and that I must refuse to allow the defendant to enforce the tenancy agreement. Accordingly, the counterclaim, in so far as it consists of a claim for rent, fails, as it would have failed in Alexander v. Rayson (2) ([1936] 1 K.B. 191), had it been pursued. Similarly, the other claims in para. 12 of the counterclaim which depend on the terms of the lease must fail. It is agreed, and I hold, that para. 13, which claims compensation for damage done to the structure of the building during the removal of a bath, arises independently of the lease. The issues raised by that paragraph and para. 9 of the reply will be referred to an official referee for determination. The illegality does not affect the validity of the lease : see Alexander v. Rayson (2) ([1936] 1 K.B. 184), and so para. 3 of the prayer in the statement of claim fails. Prima facie the rent, which the plaintiff is seeking to recover, was properly paid under a valid agreement and the defendant is entitled to retain it : see Alexander v. Rayson (2) (ibid., 191). The defendant's illegality prevents him from enforcing his rights under the lease, but does not by itself give any right of action to the plaintiff. If the plaintiff is to sustain his claim, he must show a good cause of action entitling him to repayment of the money either as a liquidated sum or by way of damages or equitable relief based on rescission or otherwise, and I must, therefore, resume consideration of the causes of action pleaded in the statement of claim.

I take, first, misrepresentation about the user of the premises in 1939. I find the misrepresentation proved, but it is pleaded only as innocent misrepresentation and can, therefore, lead only to the remedy of rescission. Angel v. Jay (5) clearly decides that innocent misrepresentation is not a ground for the rescission of an executed lease. I treat the decision as binding on me, and so need not consider the effect of the plaintiff's acts after the lease was executed, and, indeed, after May 15 when he discovered the truth. This claim fails. Mutual mistake of fact about the user of the premises fails also, because on the facts I have found that the mistake was not mutual. Paragraph 7 of the statement of claim pleads an implied warranty that the plaintiff could use the premises for professional purposes. The relevant principle of law was enunciated by PARKE, B. (12 M. & W. 87) in Hart v. Windsor (6) :

> " . . . there is no contract, still less a condition, implied by law on the demise of real property only, that it is fit for the purpose for which it is let."

This principle, which was quoted with approval by SCRUTTON, L.J. ([1932] 1 K.B. 468) in Bottomley v. Bannister (7), has often been applied in cases where the premises are physically unfit for the purpose. I think it is equally applicable where premises are, so to speak, legally unfit. It is the business of the tenant, if he does not protect himself by an express warranty, to satisfy himself that the premises are fit for the purpose for which he wants to use them, whether such fitness depends on the state of their structure or the state of the law or on any other relevant circumstances. Even if in the ordinary case of this type the law implied a warranty, it must still remain true that it is based on the presumed intention of the parties. Where, as in this case, the point is expressly dealt with and a specific representation is made during the negotiations leading to the agreement, it seems to me that the plaintiff's case must be an express collateral warranty or nothing. If the representation is made with the intention that it should be a warranty, it will be one. If it was made without such an intention, how is the intention, which is necessary for implied warranty, to be presumed ? The refusal of an express warranty would clearly negative any implication. I think that what I might call the withholding of it must have the same effect. No express warranty is pleaded here, doubtless because the plaintiff did not regard the statement as a warranty. If he had, it would be difficult to explain how, as a solicitor with a knowledge of these distinctions, he did not ask for it to be incorporated in the draft agreement he was then considering. In my judgment, the plea of implied warranty fails.

I take next the plea that the money was paid for a consideration that has failed. The money was paid because it was due under a valid lease, under which an estate passed to the plaintiff. The defendant has not broken or repudiated any covenant in the lease. The plaintiff, once implied warranty is negatived, has got all that he bargained for. He may have derived no benefit from the consideration which he got, but that is not the same thing as failing to get it. Next, there is a plea that the money was paid under a mistake of fact. This is pleaded sufficiently widely in the writ, but in the prayer of the statement of claim it is restricted to mutual mistake. During the trial I permitted an amendment to the statement of claim to enable the plaintiff to rely on unilateral mistake. The mistake relied on is the plaintiff's mistake in supposing that the premises had not been used for residential purposes since Dec. 31, 1938. I think that the plaintiff made this mistake, but I do not think that he paid the money because of it. The effect of the mistake was exhausted when the lease was made and the plaintiff made the payment because the lease compelled him to do so. The lease could be rescinded only if the mistake was mutual. Presumably the plaintiff would not contend, leaving illegality, which is irrelevant on this point, on one side, that he could escape payment of rent and at the same time hold the defendant to his obligations under the lease. But if the tenant is released from paying rent and the landlord released from his obligations, it would amount to a rescission of the lease on the ground of unilateral mistake.

If the plaintiff had known from the start the facts showing illegality, he could have resisted the first payment of rent on the same ground as that on which the counterclaim has been dismissed. It may at first sight seem odd that he should not now be allowed to recover it. It may be that, if the plaintiff had pleaded that he made the payment under the mistaken belief that the lease was enforceable by the defendant, he could have recovered it. I do not have to consider this point. It is not the mistake pleaded, and, if the necessary amendment had been asked for, I should not have allowed it. The facts necessary to support it would have involved the allegation that the defendant at the material time knew of the 1939 residence and was engaged in a deliberate attempt to defeat the law. The allegation of knowledge would almost inevitably have turned the plea of innocent misrepresentation into one of fraudulent misrepresentation. It is one of the unfortunate aspects of this case that I have been compelled, as I think, on grounds of public policy to give effect to what is tantamount to a finding of fraud against the defendant although fraud is not pleaded. In so doing I must be careful to limit myself to that which public policy requires, namely, the denial of relief to the defendant. In the matter of the relief to be granted to the plaintiff, he must be held most strictly to his pleading.

This last point is relevant also to the final plea raised by the plaintiff. This is the action of money had and received which counsel for the plaintiff invoked in wide terms, pleading that the defendant had been unjustly enriched and that it would be unconscientious of him to retain the money. Counsel relied on the passage in Lord Wright's speech ([1942] 1 All E.R. 137) in Fibrosa Spolka Akcyjna v. Fairbairn Lawson Combe Barbour, Ltd. (8). I am not going to explore the boundaries of the action for money had and received. I do not think that any question of injustice or unconscientiousness arises in this case or that the law need fear any reproach if it refuses relief. The plaintiff can legitimately complain that he was misled by the defendant ; that is his real grievance. It was open to him to allege and, if he could, to prove that the defendant had acted fraudulently, and, if he had proved it, the law would grant him a remedy. Since he does not allege it, it would be unjust to the defendant to assume that he acted otherwise than innocently. It is never easy to decide which of two innocent men should bear a loss that has fallen on them both, for it must be remembered that, while the plaintiff has paid his rent without benefit to himself, the defendant, if the rent was repaid, would have given up without any return the use of his premises from the beginning of the lease until the plaintiff elected to claim relief. It would be inequitable, therefore, to grant the plaintiff unconditional relief. Equity will grant relief, but only on terms as to restitution with which in this case the plaintiff cannot comply. The last plea of the plaintiff's is in reality, therefore, only a plea that the well-settled principles on which relief is granted for innocent misrepresentation should be overturned, and as such it must fail.

There will be judgment for the defendant on the claim and, save as to para. 13 [referred to the Official Referee], for the plaintiff on the counterclaim.

Judgment for the defendant on the claim and for the plaintiff on the counterclaim. No order as to costs (except that costs on issue referred to the Official Referee be dealt with by him).

Re DUKE OF NORFOLK'S WILL TRUSTS. PUBLIC TRUSTEE v. INLAND REVENUE COMMISSIONERS.

[Chancery Division (Wynn-Parry, J.), October 13, 19, 1949.]

Estate Duty—Continuing annuity—Bequest of annuity for joint lives and life of survivor—Property passing on death of first of beneficiaries to die—Finance Act, 1894 (c. 30), s. 1; s. 2 (1) (b).

The Finance Act, 1894, s. 1, provides: "In the case of every person dying after the commencement of this Part of this Act, there shall . . . be levied and paid, on the principal value . . . of all property . . . which passes on the death of such person a duty, called 'estate duty' . . ."

Section 2 of that Act provides: "(1) Property passing on the death of the deceased shall be deemed to include the property following, that is to say: . . . (b) Property in which the deceased or any other person had an interest ceasing on the death of the deceased, to the extent to which a benefit accrues or arises by the cesser of such interest . . ."

A testator, who died on Feb. 11, 1917, bequeathed to the trustees of his will an annuity to commence from his death and to continue payable during the joint lives of his brother A. and his brother's son B. and the survivor of them, and to be paid to A. during his lifetime and after his death to B. On May 18, 1947, A. died leaving B. him surviving, and the Inland Revenue Commissioners claimed estate duty in respect of the cesser of the annuity calculated on the "slice" principle under s. 2 (1) (b) and s. 7 (7) of the Act of 1894.

Held: estate duty was chargeable in connection with A.'s death under s. 1 in respect of the value of the continuing annuity for the life of B.; s. 1 and s. 2 (1) (b) were mutually exclusive; and, as the property passed under s. 1, it could not be deemed to pass under s. 2 (1) (b).

Adjourned Summons to determine the basis on which estate duty became payable on the death of Viscount Fitzalan.

By his will, the testator, Henry, Duke of Norfolk, inter alia provided a fund on trust out of the income therefrom to "pay any annuity or annuities which may be bequeathed by any codicil hereto." By a first codicil to his said will the testator bequeathed to his trustees an annuity of £3,000 to commence from the day of his death and to continue payable during the joint lives of his brother Viscount Fitzalan and his said brother's son, Henry Edmund Talbot, and during the life of the survivor of them, and he directed that his trustees should stand possessed of the said annuity on trust to pay the annuity to Viscount Fitzalan during his life on protective trusts. The testator in the same codicil further declared that after the death of Viscount Fitzalan, on certain (in the events, irrelevant) conditions, the trustees should pay the annuity to Viscount Fitzalan's said son during his life on similar protective trusts. By a second codicil the amount of the annuity was reduced to £2,000. On Feb. 11, 1917, the testator died. On May 18, 1947, Viscount Fitzalan died, and the protective trust had not operated to determine the payment to him of the annuity of £2,000. Viscount Fitzalan was survived by his son. The summons raised the question whether on the death of Viscount Fitzalan estate duty became payable (a) under the Finance Act, 1894, s. 1, and only on the value (calculated under s. 7 (5) of the said Act) of a continuing annuity of £2,000 for the life of the son, or (b) under s. 2 (1) (b) of the said Act on the capital value (ascertained according to s. 7 (7)) of the proportion of the testator's estate required to produce an annuity of £2,000. WYNN-PARRY, J., held that duty was payable under s. 1.

Cur. adv. vult.

October 19. WYNN-PARRY, J., read the following judgment. By the first codicil to his will the late Duke of Norfolk (to whom I will refer as "the testator") bequeathed to the trustees of his will an annuity of £3,000, reduced by his second codicil to £2,000, to commence from his death and to continue payable during the joint lives of his brother, the late Viscount Fitzalan, and his brother's son, the present Viscount Fitzalan, and the survivor of them. The testator died on Feb. 11, 1917, and his brother, the late Viscount Fitzalan, died on May 18, 1947. The question raised by this summons is whether, on this death, estate duty is payable under s. 1 of the Finance Act, 1894 (to which I will refer as "the Act"), on the value of a continuing annuity of £2,000 for the life of the son, the present Viscount Fitzalan, or under s. 2 (1) of the Act on the capital value of the proportion of the testator's estate required to produce an annuity of £2,000. It is conceded on behalf of the Inland Revenue Commissioners that on the true construction of the first codicil there is created only one continuing annuity, that that annuity is property within the meaning of s. 1 of the Act, which is settled, and, therefore, that estate duty could be claimed under that section on the basis which I have mentioned, but it is argued on behalf of the commissioners that there is an alternative course open to them—that they need not levy the duty under s. 1, but may levy the duty under s. 2 (1) (b) of the Act as on the cesser of an interest.

There is a practice which has grown up and which, up to the present time, has prevailed in the Estate Duty Office in regard to joint or successive interests in a single annuity. This practice has been conveniently stated by ROMER, J., in Re Cassel's Will Trusts (1) ([1946] 1 All E.R. 34) in these words :

> "The practice may be illustrated in the following way: If an annuity of £x a year is bequeathed to A. for life, then to B. for life, then to C. for life, on the death of A. (B. and C. surviving) estate duty is charged as on the passing of property (viz., a share of the annuity) and not as on the cesser of an interest. The same principle would be applied on the death of B., leaving C. surviving, and estate duty would not be levied on a cesser of interest (i.e., on a capital value basis) until the death of C. The same practice is adopted where joint beneficial interests are created in one annuity. Thus, in a letter from the Estate Duty Office which is in evidence in the present case, it is stated that, as the official practice now stands, the interests of Mrs. Joshua's two daughters, which arose on the death of their mother, would be treated as being in one annuity. This practice evidently did not prevail at the time of Re Palmer (2), for, had it done so, duty would not have been charged on the death of Ronald Palmer on a cesser of interest basis so far as the £3,000 annuity there under consideration was concerned. It may have sprung up as a result of some of the observations which fell from the Court of Appeal in that case ".

In this instance the Inland Revenue Commissioners desire to depart from this A practice and to be free to do so in any particular case in the future. The question is whether or not they are entitled to do so ; or, to put it in another way, is the practice rightly to be regarded only as a practice, from which, therefore, they can depart, or is the so-called practice an accurate interpretation of the legal position, in which case there can be no right to depart from it ? In these circumstances the case has, rightly I think, been described as a test case.

B So far as this court is concerned the matter is, I think, concluded against the Inland Revenue Commissioners by Re Cassel (3). In that case :

> " The testator bequeathed ' Brook House and contents ' and the stables held therewith, the leases of which would expire in 1995, to trustees upon trust to allow Mrs. Cassel to have the use and enjoyment thereof for life, and after her death upon the like trust for the benefit of Lady Louis C Mountbatten for life. The testator directed : ' the rent outgoings rates and taxes for the time being payable in respect of the said messuage and premises and keeping the same and the contents thereof insured against fire and burglary and in a proper state of preservation shall always be paid by my trustees out of the income of my residuary personal estate '. Mrs. Cassel, the first tenant for life of Brook House, died September 16, 1925, D and was succeeded as tenant for life by Lady Louis Mountbatten. The summons asked how the estate duty, payable on Mrs. Cassel's death in respect of the benefit of the annual expenditure on Brook House, should be borne as between Lady Louis Mountbatten and the testator's residuary estate, and how assessed ".

E RUSSELL, J., expressed the view that had he been unassisted or unimpeded by previous authority, he would have said that the case was only brought into charge under s. 1 of the Act by virtue of the provisions of s. 2. He said ([1927] 2 Ch. 279) :

> " I should have thought that where a life interest in A. ceased by A.'s death, with the result that an interest in B., which during A.'s life was F reversionary became an interest in possession, no property passed on A.'s death. A.'s interest merely ceases, no part of it is transferred to B., or passes to B. I should have thought that such a case fell directly within the provisions of s. 2 (1) (b), and only came within the charging s. 1 by virtue of s. 2 ".

G He then proceeded to state how, if that had been the correct view, the principal value would have been ascertained under s. 7 (7) of the Act, observing that such a method would have been in accordance with the decision of the Court of Appeal in Re Palmer (2). RUSSELL, J., however, was driven to the conclusion that he was prevented from holding that the case before him was not a s. 1 case but a s. 2 case by the decision of the House of Lords in Earl Cowley v. Inland Revenue H Comrs. (4). He then considered what was the property which passed on Mrs. Cassel's death, and held that it was the benefit of the annual sum payable under the special clause. He said (ibid., 280) :

> " In substance, the trustees are bound for a period of time to apply an annual sum of varying amount for the benefit of the person for the time being entitled under the will to the enjoyment of Brook House and contents. What passes is the right to enjoy the benefit of that annual sum. That is the property which passed on the death of Mrs. Cassel ".

The learned judge then dealt with the question how the principal value of that property was to be ascertained under s. 7 (5), as supplemented by sub-s. (8). He pointed out (ibid., 281) that the machinery provided by these sub-sections did not exactly fit the case before him, but observed: "Nevertheless the machinery must be made to fit, and I think it can be made to fit". He then stated the basis on which the principal value was to be ascertained.

In following and applying the decision of Russell, J., in Re Cassel (3) I am not embarrassed by the decision of the Court of Appeal in Re Palmer (2), because, as is pointed out by Russell, J., the question between s. 1 and s. 2 of the Act was not before the court. He said (ibid., 282):

> "The Inland Revenue was not represented. The question was simply this—how as between the persons interested in residue was the burden of the estate duty already paid as on a s. 2 case to be borne? The hands of the court were tied to that extent. The case had to be treated on the footing of s. 2 being the section to be considered, and not s. 1".

In the later case of Re Northcliffe (5), which concerned in substance aliquot shares in a residuary trust fund, Maugham, J., described Re Cassel (3) as a very exceptional case. It is plain, however, from a consideration of his judgment that the respect in which Maugham, J., regarded the case as being exceptional was the difficulty which arose, after Russell, J., had been driven to hold that the case was a s. 1 case, in applying the machinery under s. 7, sub-ss. (5) and (8), by reason of the fluctuating nature of the annual sum involved. Again, in the still later case of Christie v. Lord Advocate (6), Lord Russell of Killowen (as he had then become) referred to his decision in Re Cassel (3) and made clear that the respect in which he regarded that case as being exceptional was as I have indicated. I cannot do better than quote his own words ([1936] 1 All E.R. 447):

> "... Re Cassel (3) was cited. That was indeed a very special case, in which, it having been decided that the Cowley case (4) compelled me to treat it as falling within s. 1 of the Act, it became apparent that no capital sum could be earmarked as producing either actually or notionally an annual sum which necessarily varied in amount within elastic limits. I indicated, as best I could, the lines upon which a valuation might be fairly reached. The case is certainly no authority justifying a departure from the principles laid down in the Cowley case (4) where, as here, a tenant for life of an aliquot share of settled property dies, and is succeeded by others who immediately enter into the enjoyment of the income of the same share. In this connection I would refer to the remarks of Maugham, J., in the case of Re Northcliffe (5) ([1929] 1 Ch. 331) which deal with the death of a tenant for life of an aliquot share of residue, and which appear to me relevant to a consideration of the present case".

In Earl Cowley v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (4) it is made plain that ss. 1 and 2 are mutually exclusive and that s. 2 is to be invoked only if s. 1 by itself cannot be invoked.

Counsel for the Inland Revenue Commissioners contended that the principle emerging from Earl Cowley v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (4) is only to be applied where each section operated on the same property, and relied on the circumstance that in that case the property consisted of an equity of redemption, whereas in the present case the property caught by s. 1 was the benefit of the continuing annuity while the property fastened on by s. 2 was the whole of the testator's estate. I do not so read the opinions of their Lordships. In my judgment, on the particular death in question, the question has first to be put in regard to this annuity: Does property pass? If it does, then cadit quaestio, the duty will be payable under s. 1. One is not entitled to go on and ask whether, in regard to this annuity, property could be deemed to pass under s. 2 as on the cesser of an interest. The determination that property passes under s. 1 makes it needless to consider and prevents one from considering whether in regard to the same annuity an interest has ceased under s. 2.

In my judgment, the argument advanced by counsel for the Inland Revenue Commissioners was in effect considered and rejected by RUSSELL, J., in Re Cassel (3). The choice in that case was the same as that before the court in this case. As s. 1 applied, the property subject to duty was the benefit of the annual sum payable under the special clause, calculated by reference to the estimated market value thereof, and the person liable for the duty was Lady Louis Mountbatten as the person entitled to the benefit of the special clause after the death of Mrs. Cassel. On the other hand, if s. 2 (1) (b) had applied, wholly different considerations would have arisen. The calculation would have been made under s. 7 (7) on what has been called the " slice " theory to ascertain the value of the benefit arising from the cessor of Mrs. Cassel's interest, and subject to the question of interest the estate duty would have been payable out of the residuary estate. Yet RUSSELL, J., felt no difficulty in applying the principle underlying Earl Cowley v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (4).

For these reasons, I am of opinion that, so far as this court is concerned, the question is concluded by the decision of RUSSELL, J., in Re Cassel (3), and I, therefore, propose, in answer to question 1 of the summons, to declare that on the death of the late Viscount Fitzalan estate duty became payable under s. 1 of the Act, and only on the value of a continuing annuity for the life of his son, the present viscount.

Order accordingly. The parties had entered into an agreement as to the payment of costs.

Currency Control—Export—Deliberate offence—Penalty—Dismissal of charge under Probation of Offenders Act, 1907 (c. 17), s. 1 (1)—Exchange Control Act, 1947 (c. 14), s. 22 (1).

The respondent, an elderly woman of small means, was apprehended by a customs officer when attempting to leave England taking with her 85 Bank of England notes of £1 denomination. She said that she knew she was permitted only to take £5 sterling out of the country, but that " it was a matter of life and death " to her to take the money to Italy to her son who had no work and was in debt. Before the justices, the respondent pleaded Guilty to a charge of having attempted to take out of the country the notes, the export of which was prohibited by the Exchange Control Act, 1947, s. 22 (1). The justices dismissed the information under the Probation of Offenders Act, 1907, s. 1 (1) on the ground that there existed the extenuating circumstances set out in that sub-section. On appeal,

HELD : the respondent's deliberate offence against the Exchange Control Act, 1947, could not be regarded otherwise than as serious and any sympathy which might be felt for her could not be permitted to obscure its gravity, and, therefore, the case would be remitted to the justices with an intimation that it was their duty to impose a penalty.

Case Stated by Sussex justices.

At a court of summary jurisdiction sitting at Lewes an information was preferred by the appellant, a chief preventive officer of Customs and Excise, that the respondent was knowingly concerned at Newhaven in a fraudulent attempt at evasion of the laws and restrictions of the customs relating to certain prohibited goods, namely, 85 £1 Bank of England notes, the export of which was prohibited by the Exchange Control Act, 1947, s. 22 (1), contrary to the Customs Consolidation Act, 1876, s. 186, whereby and by force of the said s. 186, the Finance Act, 1935, s. 15, and the Finance Act, 1943, s. 12, the respondent had for such offence forfeited the sum of £255 for which the Commissioners of Customs and Excise had elected to sue. The information was heard on May 10, 1949, when the respondent pleaded Guilty and the following facts were admitted. On Apr. 26, 1949, the respondent, who was then about to leave England for Dieppe, was asked by a customs officer how much currency was in her possession, and she declared £5 in English money, 400 Italian lira and 300 French francs. On examination of the respondent's bag, it was discovered that underneath some clothing there was a sealed envelope containing 85 £1 Bank of England notes. When asked for an explanation the respondent stated : " I was aware I could only take out £5. I did not declare the £85 as I knew they would not let me take it out. It was a matter of life and death for me to take the money to Italy. It was intended for my son out there." The 85 £1 notes were seized. The respondent, an elderly woman, was a person of good character. Her total income was about £60 a year and she was supported by one of her sons. The respondent had intended to obtain traveller's cheques, but, owing to her bad health and forgetfulness, she had omitted to do so. The justices were of the opinion that having regard to the character, antecedents, age, health and mental condition of the respondent, it was inexpedient to inflict any punishment, and, having regard to the extenuating circumstances, they dismissed the information under the Probation of Offenders Act, 1907, s. 1 (1). The Divisional Court now allowed the appeal and remitted the case to the justices with the direction to convict and inflict a penalty.

The respondent did not appear.

LORD GODDARD, C.J. : By the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, s. 16 :

> " If upon the hearing of a charge for an offence punishable on summary conviction under this Act, or under any other Act, whether past or future, the court of summary jurisdiction think that though the charge is proved the offence was in the particular case of so trifling a nature that it is inexpedient to inflict any punishment, or any other than a nominal punishment,—(1) The court, without proceeding to conviction, may dismiss the information, and . . . may order the person charged to pay such damages, not exceeding 40*s*., and such costs . . . as the court think reasonable . . . "

Many cases were brought before this court where justices had purported to exercise the power given them by that section, and this court corrected the decision of justices where a case had been dismissed as trivial when it could not properly be so described. A well-known case on that point is Phillips v. Evans (1). There are many other cases, all of which will be found in Stone's Justices

MANUAL, and I need not refer to them. This court has always exercised the power of correcting a wrong decision and ordering the justices to inflict a penalty if they think the circumstances of the case are such that the justices ought not to have dealt with it under s. 16.

Section 16 of the Act of 1879, was repealed by the Probation of Offenders Act, 1907, s. 10, and replaced by s. 1 of the later Act. Section 1 provided :

A

> " (1) Where any person is charged before a court of summary jurisdiction with an offence punishable by such court, and the court thinks that the charge is proved, but is of opinion that, having regard to the character, antecedents, age, health, or mental condition of the person charged, or to the trivial nature of the offence, or to the extenuating circumstances under which the offence was committed, it is inexpedient to inflict any punish-
> B ment or any other than a nominal punishment, or that it is expedient to release the offender on probation . . . " the court may dismiss the information or discharge the offender conditionally.

The justices in the present case purported to act under s. 1 (1). Since Aug. 1, 1949, s. 1 (1) of the Act of 1907 has been replaced by the Criminal Justice Act, 1948, s. 7, which provides :

C

> " (1) Where a court by or before which a person is convicted of an offence (not being an offence the sentence for which is fixed by law) is of opinion, having regard to the circumstances including the nature of the offence and the character of the offender, that it is inexpedient to inflict punishment and that a probation order is not appropriate, the court may make an order
> D discharging him absolutely . . . "

The main difference between that section and the Probation of Offenders Act, 1907, s. 1, in effect is that under the latter provision the court could refrain from convicting. The illogical situation which used to arise has often been pointed out in this court, and Parliament has altered the law now by providing that there must be a conviction, but the defendant can be discharged without any penalty.
E That Act was not, however, in force at the time when the justices heard this case, and they purported to act under the Probation of Offenders Act, 1907.

The respondent, who was an elderly woman and for whom in many respects I dare say a good deal of sympathy can be felt, committed an offence against the Exchange Control Act, 1947. That Act was passed to protect sterling in the serious financial situation which exists in this country at the present time, and
F it is of the utmost importance that its provisions should be observed by all citizens, that, if they do not observe the stringent provisions of the Act, they should be brought before the courts, and that the courts should deal resolutely and properly with them. If circumstances of sympathy are to be introduced into a matter of this sort, it would in a great number of cases be possible for the court to overlook deliberate offences against the Act. In my judgment,
G such a thing would not be right.

If a person commits an offence against this statute, a statute for the breach of the provisions of which very heavy penalties have been provided by Parliament, the offence is serious. It is almost impossible to suppose that there could be circumstances which would justify a court in treating such an offence as trivial. It may not generally be known how rigid and far reaching are the pro-
H visions of the Exchange Control Act, 1947. It has been pointed out by high authority that if a person plays a game of cards in this country with a person who does not live in one of the scheduled territories—as, for instance, an American—and at the end of the game he hands him 5*s.* which he has lost to him, he is really committing an offence. I do not suppose that in those circumstances anybody would say that a serious offence had been committed or that there would be likely to be a prosecution, but the Act is wide enough to cover such a case. Parliament has thought fit in its wisdom to treat this matter as one of very grave public importance, and offences under this Act cannot be regarded as other than grave and serious.

The respondent was charged with taking out of the country 85 £1 notes, the export of which was prohibited by s. 22 (1) of the Act of 1947. I suppose everybody by this time knows that it is an offence to take out of this country in £1 notes more than £5 sterling. She does not pretend that she was doing this in ignorance, because when she was stopped and this money was found concealed in her bag, she said : " I did not declare the £85 as I knew they would not let me take it out ". That is an admission of a deliberate offence. She was smuggling this money out of the country after having taken precautions which she thought would deceive the customs officials. The fact that it was a matter of life or death to her to take the money to Italy, as she says, simply means she had every reason to commit the offence if she could.

If she had applied, she might have got a licence to take something in some form. Whether the Treasury or the Bank of England would have given her permission, I do not know. She did not apply for it. She knew that it was unlikely that she would get permission to take out as much as £85, and she decided to smuggle it. There are many matters in this story which the justices have set out which show that she is a person who is deserving of some sympathy, perhaps, but sympathy cannot be allowed to gloss an offence of this gravity. The penalty for which she was liable was £255, three times the value of the money which she was smuggling, and, in addition, the money is forfeited. Furthermore, she was also liable to imprisonment for a period not exceeding two years. That being the offence, the justices say that because she was a woman of good character—and very often people who commit currency offences are in what we may call the " police-court " sense, people of good character, i.e., there are no convictions against them—they dealt with her as they did.

There is no ground whatever for saying that this is a case in which the justices would be justified in applying the Probation of Offenders Act, 1907, s. 1. They say that they were of the opinion that it was inexpedient to inflict any punishment " having regard to the character, antecedents, age, health and mental condition of the respondent ". As far as mental condition is concerned, the mental condition of the woman is shown by what she did and said. She knew quite well she was committing an offence. There is no ground for saying she did not know what she was doing. There was nothing in her health, antecedents or age which could possibly mitigate the offence. The result is that the case must go back to the justices with an intimation that it is their duty to impose a penalty. It is not for this court to indicate what penalty is to be inflicted, but that a penalty must be inflicted, and that that penalty must not be a nominal one, there is no doubt. For these reasons, this appeal must be allowed.

CROOM-JOHNSON, J. : I agree.

LYNSKEY, J. : I agree.

Appeal allowed. Case remitted with a direction that it was the duty of the justices to impose a penalty. No order as to costs was asked for.

WOODSIDE HOUSE (WIMBLEDON), LTD. v. HUTCHINSON.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., Denning, L.J. and Hodson, J.), October 18, 19, 1949.]

Rent Restriction—Transfer of liability for rates—" Corresponding reduction " in rent—Relevant date—Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920 (c. 17), s. 2 (3), proviso.

By the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, s. 2 (3) : " Any transfer to a tenant of any burden or liability previously borne by the landlord shall, for the purposes of this Act, be treated as an alteration of rent, and where, as the result of such a transfer, the terms on which a dwelling-house is held are on the whole less favourable to the tenant than the previous terms, the rent shall be deemed to be increased . . . Provided that, for the purposes of this section, the rent shall not be deemed to be increased where the liability for rates is transferred from the landlord to the tenant, if a corresponding reduction is made in the rent."

In 1942 the landlords let to the tenant a flat, to which the Rent and Mortgage Restrictions Act, 1939, applied, for a term of three years at a rent of £180 a year, the landlord undertaking to pay the rates which then amounted to £41 a year. On Oct. 1, 1946, the landlords transferred to the tenant the burden of paying the rates which, at that date, amounted to £61.

HELD : the " corresponding reduction " in the rent under the proviso to s. 2 (3) was a reduction by the amount of the rates payable at the date of the transfer of the liability to the tenant, viz., Oct. 1, 1946.

Per curiam : the landlords could, on giving notice to the tenant, adjust the rent to a sum equivalent to that of the standard rent less the amount of rates payable in 1939.

Observations as to the terms and contents of the notice to the tenant.

[FOR THE INCREASE OF RENT AND MORTGAGE INTEREST (RESTRICTIONS) ACT, 1920, s. 2 (3), see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Vol. 10, p. 334.]

APPEAL by the landlords from an order of HIS HONOUR JUDGE HANCOCK sitting at Kingston-on-Thames County Court, dated May 12, 1949, declaring that, the landlords having transferred the liability for the payment of rates to the tenant, the " corresponding reduction " in the rent provided by the proviso to s. 2 (3) of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, had to be ascertained at the end of each year so that the net adjusted rent plus the actual rates for the year amounted to the standard rent. The Court of Appeal now allowed the appeal, holding that the amount of the reduction of the rent ought to correspond to that of the rates payable at the date of the transfer of the liability to the tenant. They further held, however, that the landlords were not thereby prevented from subsequently increasing the rent to the net standard rent on notice being given by them to the tenant of their intention so to do. The facts appear in the judgment of SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R.

L. A. Blundell for the landlords.
Neil Lawson for the tenant.

SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R. : This appeal has raised a question of what, under the provisions of s. 2 (3) of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, is meant by the phrase " a corresponding reduction ". The case is peculiar, and it may well be that it has only arisen because when the landlords attempted to serve notices for permitted increases in the rent they failed to observe the appropriate forms which have to be used, with the result that no permitted increases had successfully been added to the standard rent when the dispute between the parties which is now before the court arose.

The case relates to a flat, 15, Woodside House, Wimbledon, of which the tenant at all material times was a Mr. Hutchinson. In 1942 the parties entered into a contract of tenancy for three years. The contractual rent was £180 per annum, and the landlords undertook to pay both the general rate and the water rate. That tenancy expired in June, 1945, and since that date the tenant has remained in possession and has enjoyed the privileges of a statutory tenant. It is conceded that, although the contractual rent was £180 per annum, the standard rent, which had to be fixed in relation to the year 1939, was and is £190 per annum. In October, 1946, the landlords transferred to the tenant the burden of paying the rates which they had hitherto undertaken and discharged. The amount of the rates payable in respect of this flat in 1939 was approximately £41. As a result of variations both in the poundage and in the valuation the amount of rates payable in respect of the flat between 1939 to 1946 first of all fell and then rose substantially beyond the figure at which it stood in 1939, so that when the transfer was made the amount of the rates payable was approximately £61. The notice to the tenant of the proposed transfer is contained in a letter of Sept. 2, 1946, which reads :

> " Dear Sir, As from Oct. 1 we shall be pleased if you will kindly pay the following net amount of rent per month instead of as at present. We feel that it will be mutually more convenient for you to pay this way as the rates are likely to fluctuate from year to year. Arrangements will be made whereby the council and the water board will make their own collection ".

In the left-hand bottom corner of the letter appears the following : " Monthly £13 8*s.* 0*d.*", equivalent to a total of £160 16*s.* 0*d.* It is now conceded that on no view was that figure right, but the letter at least made it clear that from Oct. 1, 1946, the tenant would pay the rates as demanded from time to time, and that the amount which the landlords demanded for rent was to be adjusted in some way. The question of principle, and the main question argued in this court, has been : In what way ?

It is the argument of the landlords that under s. 2 (3) of the Act of 1920 one deducts from the rent then payable the amount of the rates as they stood when the standard rent was fixed. The result in the present case would be to leave a net rent payable to the landlords of £149 per annum. Counsel for the tenant has argued primarily that the amount of the " corresponding reduction ", to use the formula in the sub-section, is the actual amount of the rates payable in respect of the flat at the date when the transfer of the obligation is effected, i.e., here, £61, which would leave, not £149, but only £129, payable to the landlords by way of rent. On either view the tenant would suffer thereafter if the rates were increased, for the landlords would no longer be concerned with them. If the rates fell the tenant would get the benefit, but the rent would remain at the figure either of £149 or of £129, and would not be liable to further variation in accordance with any variation of the amount of the rates. There was, however, a third view which counsel for the tenant took, I gather somewhat lightly, in the court below, and has taken even more lightly in this court. It commended itself, however, to the learned county court judge. That was that s. 2 (3) does not contemplate a single " corresponding reduction " of the rent which is then fixed for all time, but contemplates a sort of sliding scale. According to this view one has to look each year at the amount of the rates in fact leviable and then make an adjustment so that the net adjusted rent plus the actual rates for that year always comes to the standard rent. The effect of that view, which would be administratively highly inconvenient, would be of all the ways put forward most disadvantageous for the landlords, for, whatever happened to the rates, the tenant would pay £190 all told for rent and rates. If the rates went up the tenant would not be further out of pocket, but the landlords would suffer the loss. If the rates went down, it is true, the landlords would get rather more rent, but in what are the more probable circumstances today, namely, that rates should increase, the landlord would have no means of serving any notice of increase or otherwise recouping themselves.

The point is not by any means free from difficulty and I hope I am not in any way being disrespectful to the learned county court judge when I say that I cannot accept his view of the operation of this proviso. For reasons which I have already indicated it would be inconvenient, and I think unjust. Nor does A it seem to me that the language of the sub-section requires or justifies such a conclusion. Section 2 (3) provides :

> " Any transfer to a tenant of any burden or liability previously borne by the landlord shall, for the purposes of this Act, be treated as an alteration of rent, and where, as the result of such a transfer, the terms on which a dwelling-house is held are on the whole less favourable to the tenant than B the previous terms, the rent shall be deemed to be increased . . . Provided that, for the purposes of this section, the rent shall not be deemed to be increased where the liability for rates is transferred from the landlord to the tenant, if a corresponding reduction is made in the rent ".

Counsel for the landlords contended that when regard is had to the proposed adjustment of rent in this case, it cannot be said that the terms on which the C dwelling-house has been held after the transfer was made were on the whole less favourable to the tenant than the previous terms, and that, therefore, we need not concern ourselves with the proviso. I cannot accept that. The transfer to the tenant of the burden of rates, which might well go up, allowing for whatever adjustment was suggested by the landlords in regard to the rent and assuming in their favour that the " terms " should include the amount of the rent, still D left the terms on the whole less favourable. It becomes necessary, therefore, in order to save the landlords from the illegality which might otherwise ensue, to have regard to the proviso, and to find a reduction made in the rent corresponding to the liability for rates which is transferred from the landlords to the tenant, for that, I think, is the meaning of the proviso. Counsel for the landlords has suggested that " corresponding reduction " ought to carry one back to the original E fixing of the standard rent, and that what is contemplated is that the so-called equilibrium which was established when the standard rent was originally agreed between the parties should be preserved or restored. Expressing it a little more precisely in reference to this case, the figure of £190 must be taken to be the sum arrived at between two parties under their contract after bringing into account various considerations, all the benefits and advantages of one kind and F another, and allowing for the circumstance that the landlords were under an obligation to pay out for rates the sum then standing at £41. Counsel for the landlords says that the preservation of that equilibrium will only be achieved if such an adjustment in the rent is now made that the landlords will be left, after disembarrassing themselves of the obligation to pay rates, with the same amount in pocket as they originally had, representing the consideration for the G other and remaining advantages that the tenant will continue to enjoy. He says that if what was intended by this paragraph was a reduction equal to or equivalent to the amount of the rates at the time of the transfer, Parliament would have said that and would have used the words " equivalent to " and not the word " corresponding ".

In my judgment, that argument, attractive though it is, is not justified. It H requires an over-elaboration of what I regard as a perfectly simple piece of English. I think this proviso means simply that where one transfers at a particular point of time a burden hitherto borne by a landlord to the tenant, namely, the liability to rates, then one does not get into the difficulties of the sub-section provided one reduces the rent by a sum equivalent to the then existing liability for rates which is being transferred. I, therefore, read this proviso as meaning that when a transfer of rates is made, an unlawful increase of rent is avoided by reducing the rent by a sum equivalent to the liability for rates as it then stands. It thereafter becomes a matter for the tenant to bear any increase in rates and enjoy any reduction. The landlord is left with a net rent which is entirely unaffected by rates and is arrived at by deducting from the rent then payable the then amount of the rates. Put arithmetically for the purposes of this case, the result is £190 minus £61.

The result appears at first sight to involve a possible hardship on the landlords for this reason. From now on, as they are not paying the rates, it is plain that they cannot serve a notice of increase of rent because of an increase in the rates. If the result was that they were left with a maximum net rent—apart from any other considerations which would entitle them under the other sub-sections to increase—of £129, it would appear that they were in the unhappy position of suffering a serious and perpetual loss as a result of their failing to give in proper form the notices of increase which they had attempted to give. Counsel for the tenant has conceded, however, that, although it is no longer open to the landlords to serve a notice in standard form increasing the standard rent by reference to increases in rates, it is still, under the general terms and intention of the Act, open to them, provided they do it in the proper way, to bring up the rent receivable by them to the standard rent if it has fallen below the standard rent. In the course of the argument examples were given. One was a case where a landlord allowed a tenant for compassionate reasons to have a flat at a very much smaller rent than the standard rent. In that sort of case, if there was a transfer of the burden of rates it would be absurd if the result was that the landlord could never bring up the rent to the standard rent. It would, of course, have to be adjusted in that case, as in this, by reason of the fact that the landlord's original liability to pay rates (a liability comprehended in this case in the standard rent figure of £190) had been transferred to the tenant. The result, therefore, is that the landlord can say: "I am entitled, without giving any statutory form of notice, as in other similar cases, to increase the rent and ask you to pay an amount equivalent to the standard rent". The £190 must now be reduced for this purpose by that part of it which represented, when the standard rent was arrived at, the obligation to pay rates. Again, putting it in figures, the £190 standard rent becomes now, for this purpose, a net standard rent of £190 minus £41, namely, £149. So that, though the operation of transfer, in order to satisfy s. 2 (3), must reduce the rent to £129, it is open to the landlords, on proper steps being taken, to bring it up to £149.

That leaves the question whether a demand to raise the rent to £149 has already been made. In my judgment there is nothing in the correspondence which contains such a demand. The demand obviously must, though not following any statutory or precise form, make it plain what it is the landlords are demanding. Where, as here, there has been a transfer of the burden of paying rates it is obviously right that the tenant, who may not in the ordinary way have any knowledge of what the rates were when the standard rent was fixed, should be fully informed. He must, therefore, be given a proper opportunity (by being given the necessary explanation of what the landlords intend) to verify, and, if he so desires, to challenge the figures. Over and above all that, it is essential in such a demand as that which the landlords want to make, that they should make it clear that they are proposing to increase the rent. That is where these early letters fall down. It is true that by certain calculations it is possible to arrive at a figure which would equal or exceed the sum which the landlords can demand, but, if I am right in the view which I have taken of s. 2 (3) and of the landlords' present rights against the tenant, they can increase the rent up to the standard, the rent having in the circumstances fallen below the standard. Anything which does not make it reasonably clear that that is what the landlords are intending to do is not such a demand as fairly constitutes the sort of notice which I have indicated.

For these reasons I take a different view from that which appealed to the county court judge on the construction of this paragraph, but at the same time I reject the argument of the landlords. I think the main argument which counsel for the tenant has put forward here and below is right, and it is for that construction that I myself decide.

DENNING, L.J. : When this flat was let to the tenant, the landlords, by arrangement with the local authority, were paying the rates. In 1945 and 1946 the landlords purported to serve notices of increases of rent on account of increases of rates. Those notices, as it was eventually conceded, were invalid and so were inoperative to increase the rent, but, at a time when the landlords thought they were valid, they made an arrangement with the local authorities whereby the landlords no longer paid the rates and threw the liability on to the tenant. The tenant acquiesced, so that the liability for rates was transferred from the landlords to the tenant. If the landlords had validly increased the rent to the full permitted amount, there is no doubt that the new rent payable after the transfer would be found by deducting the amount of the current rates from the amount of the current rent. It has been found, however, that the landlords never validly increased the rent, so that only the standard rent of £190 was payable. In those circumstances it seems to me that the new rent payable immediately after the transfer must be found by deducting the amount of the current rates from the amount of the rent lawfully payable at the time of the transfer, namely, the standard rent. Any other view would enable a landlord to escape from all the requirements relating to notices of increase.

This does not mean that the landlord is confined for ever to the lower rent. Just as, before the transfer, he could have increased the rent by giving valid notices of increase, so also, after the transfer, he can raise it to the amount permitted by the Act, that is, the 1939 rent less the 1939 rates, but he must make a demand which shows that he is raising it to the permitted amount. Although this demand does not require to be in the form of a statutory notice of increase, it must afford substantially the same information. An error or omission due to a bona fide mistake may not defeat the validity of the demand, but that there must be some demand I have no doubt. In cases where there is no question of transfer and a landlord wishes to raise a low rent payable by a statutory tenant up to the standard rent, he must clearly make a demand before he has any right to the standard rent, and the demand must show on what ground it is made. So here, after the transfer, there must be a demand for the increase showing on what ground it is being made.

HODSON, J. : I agree with the construction placed by the Master of the Rolls on s. 2 (3) of the Act of 1920. The construction contended for by the landlords is, in my opinion, a strained construction which it would be wrong to adopt. That is really decisive of the question which has been raised and argued on this appeal. It follows that the judgment of the learned county court judge must be varied in that the construction which he puts on the proviso to the sub-section is rejected by this court. I agree also with the remarks which have fallen from my Lord as to what may happen in the future. The only question which is left for consideration here is the form of the order and also the question of costs.

Declaration of the county court varied by substituting a declaration that the reduction of rent proper to be made pursuant to the proviso to s. 2 (3) of the Act of 1920 ought to correspond with the actual amount of the general and water rates payable in respect of the period current at the date of the transfer of the liability to the tenant, viz., Oct. 1, 1946. *Appeal allowed. Carriage—Carriage of goods—Carriage for hire—Failure to comply with conditions of B licence—Aiding and abetting—Liability of hirer—Road and Rail Traffic Act, 1933 (c. 53), s. 9 (1).

The appellant carried on the business of a transport clearing house, which consisted of obtaining orders for the transport of goods and employing lorry owners to carry the goods. On Jan. 27, 1949, he hired a lorry for the transport of some copper cathodes. The lorry owner held a B licence in respect of the vehicle, but the carriage of copper cathodes for hire or reward was not permitted by the conditions subject to which the licence was held, and the appellant failed to inquire of the lorry owner whether he was legally entitled to carry the goods. The appellant was summoned for aiding and abetting the commission of an offence by the lorry owner against the Road and Rail Traffic Act, 1933, s. 9 (1).

Held: it was the appellant's duty to see that the persons whose vehicles he hired could lawfully carry out the contracts which he had made, and, in hiring a lorry from an owner whose licence did not entitle him to carry the goods in question, the appellant was guilty of aiding and abetting that lorry owner in the commission of an offence against s. 9 (1) of the Act of 1933.

Case Stated by Bootle justices.

The appellant, who carried on the business of a transport clearing house, on Jan. 27, 1949, hired a lorry to carry some copper cathodes which he had contracted to transport. The lorry owner held a B (limited carrier's) licence in respect of the vehicle under pt. I of the Road and Rail Traffic Act, 1933, and the carriage of copper cathodes for hire or reward was not authorised by the conditions subject to which the licence was held. The appellant knew that all B licences had conditions attached to them in regard to the carriage of goods for hire or reward and his usual practice was to ask any person offering him transport what goods he could carry, but on this occasion he failed to do so. At a court of summary jurisdiction at Bootle an information was preferred by the respondent, on behalf of the Licensing Authority for Goods Vehicles for the North-Western Traffic Area, charging the appellant with aiding and abetting the lorry owner in the commission of an offence against s. 9 (1) of the Act of 1933 (which provides that any person who fails to comply with any condition of a licence held by him is guilty of an offence under pt. I of the Act). The information was heard on May 2, 1949. The appellant contended that there was no duty on him to ensure that a person offering to carry goods in a goods vehicle for hire or reward was legally entitled under his licence to carry the goods offered to him, and that he was entitled to assume that the licence holder would observe the conditions of his licence. The justices found the appellant Guilty of the offence charged, and his appeal from their decision was now dismissed by the Divisional Court.

H. L. Parker for the respondent.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: This is a Case stated by justices for the county borough of Bootle before whom the appellant was summoned for aiding and abetting the commission of an offence against the Road and Rail Traffic Act, 1933, s. 9 (1), by one James Bennett Alderson. Alderson had a licence (granted to him under pt. I of the Act) which entitled him to operate a goods vehicle, but which was subject to certain conditions in regard to the distance within which he could operate and the materials which he could carry for hire or reward. His licence (a B, or limited carrier's, licence) entitled him to carry building plant and building material for a certain distance, market produce within a certain distance, and solid fuel within seven miles of base. The appellant carries on a business which is described as a clearing house for transport. That means that he executes orders from people who want goods transported. He does not transport A the goods himself, but he gets other people to do so. He engages the lorry owners to do the work and pays them rather less than he receives.

If the appellant undertakes this class of business, he must see that contracts are carried out in a legal manner, and that the people whom he employs can lawfully carry out the contracts which he has made. In the present case, he employed Alderson to carry copper cathodes which he, the appellant, had under- B taken to transport for someone else, but Alderson's licence did not entitle him to carry copper cathodes. In these circumstances, it seems to me perfectly clear that the appellant was aiding and abetting the commission of the offence by Alderson. The appellant carries on his business in the ordinary way in a perfectly satisfactory manner, but in this case he made a slip. The justices have not treated it as a serious case. They only fined him £3 and £2 2*s*. costs. They C were right in so doing, and this appeal must be dismissed with costs.

CROOM-JOHNSON, J.: I agree.

LYNSKEY, J.: I agree.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

Factory—Dangerous machinery—Fencing—Maintenance of fencing—Safety guard F not kept in position by workman—Accident—Section under which summons to be issued—Factories Act, 1937 (c. 67), s. 14 (1), s. 16.

Justices—Case stated—Joining of third party—Liability for costs—Factories Act, 1937 (c. 67), s. 137 (1).

The appellant, a factory inspector, laid an information against the first respondents alleging that a dangerous machine in their factory was not G properly fenced and that, accordingly, they had contravened the provisions of the Factories Act, 1937, s. 14 (1). It was proved that the machine, a power press, was fitted with a guard which rendered it safe so long as the guard was in what was called the "down" position, but, if the guard was in the "up" position, the machine became dangerous. The second respondent, H., was operating the press with the guard in the "up" position H when an accident occurred and he was injured. The first respondents contended that H. was the actual offender and they laid an information against him under s. 137 (1). At the hearing it was submitted by the first respondents that no offence had been committed under s. 14 (1) because they had complied with that sub-section by providing an adequate guard, and, therefore, the proceedings should have been brought under s. 16, which required that all fencing and other safeguards fitted to dangerous machinery must be maintained and kept constantly in position, except when any part of the machine was necessarily exposed for examination. The justices upheld the submission and dismissed both informations.

Held : (i) that the summons had been rightly issued under s. 14 (1) which imposed a duty on owners and occupiers of factories containing dangerous machinery to see that it was securely fenced at the material time, viz., the time when the accident occurred, whereas s. 16 did not create any new offence but merely defined the extent of the obligation, and introduced exceptions from the provisions, of s. 14 available as a defence to those within such exceptions.

(ii) where a person was brought in as a third party, as the second respondent had been in the present case, he must be joined as a party to the appeal proceedings in the Divisional Court, but he need not appear there unless he wished to take part in the argument. If he did so, he might become liable to pay costs.

Case Stated by Oxford City Justices.

On Mar. 17, 1949, the justices dismissed an information laid by the appellant, Barbara Tuke Smith, an inspector of factories, alleging that the first respondents, Morris Motors, Ltd., had contravened the Factories Act, 1937, s. 14 (1), in failing to fence securely a piece of dangerous machinery, namely, a power press, in their factory. The justices also dismissed an information laid by the first respondents against the second respondent, Kenneth Charles Harris, under s. 137 (1) of the Act, alleging that he was the actual offender because he operated the machine with the safeguard in a dangerous position. The Divisional Court now allowed the appeal and remitted the case to the justices for hearing with an intimation that the submissions made to them on behalf of the first respondents were erroneous in law The facts and the relevant sections of the Factories Act, 1937, appear in the judgment of Lord Goddard, C.J.

MacKenna for the appellant.
Winn for the first respondents.
E. V. Falk for the second respondent.

LORD GODDARD, C.J. : This is a Case stated by Oxford city justices before whom the first respondents, Morris Motors, Ltd., were prosecuted for a breach of the Factories Act, 1937, s. 14 (1). It is unnecessary to say more about the breach than that the allegation was that a certain machine had not been securely fenced whereby personal injury was caused to the second respondent, a workman named Harris, who was brought into the proceedings before the justices under the Factories Act, 1937, s. 137 (1), it being alleged by the first respondents that he was actually responsible for the accident. At the hearing it was proved that the machine was fitted with a movable fence. If the fence had been in the " down " position in which it ought to have been when the second respondent was carrying out the operation which led to the accident, the machine was perfectly safe. If, however, the guard was in what was called the " up " or " raised " position, the machine was capable of causing injury. Therefore, it was a dangerous machine.

Counsel for the first respondents took the point that, if the justices were satisfied that an adequate fence was provided, he was in a position to say that the proceedings ought to have been taken under the Factories Act, 1937, s. 16, and not under s. 14. He invited the appellant to amend the summons and put forward an information under s. 16. The appellant, however, elected to stand on the information which was before the court under s. 14. The justices found in favour of the first respondents, holding that the machine was securely fenced, and, apparently, taking the view that the proceedings might have been begun under s. 16.

Section 14 provides:

> " Every dangerous part of any machinery, other than prime movers and transmission machinery, shall be securely fenced . . . "

That is the obligation. Section 16 provides :

> " All fencing or other safeguards provided in pursuance of the foregoing provisions of this Part of this Act shall be of substantial construction, and constantly maintained and kept in position while the parts required to be fenced or safeguarded are in motion or in use, except when any such parts are necessarily exposed for examination and for any lubrication or adjustment shown by such examination to be immediately necessary, and all such conditions as may be specified in regulations made by the Secretary of State are complied with."

This point has really been decided, so far as this court is concerned, by the decision in Massey v. Lingwood (S. & P.), Ltd. (1) heard by HUMPHREYS, J., and CROOM-JOHNSON, J., on June 21, 1945. The effect of that decision was that the material time at which to ascertain whether the machine was securely fenced was when the accident took place. If there was no fencing on the machinery at that time, an offence was committed. HUMPHREYS, J., said in his judgment that s. 16 gives a sort of definition, an explanation, of what is meant by " securely fenced ", and he treated the section as indicating that the fencing must be substantial, that it must be properly maintained, and that it must be kept in position, and he said unless those things were done the machine could not be said to be securely fenced. Section 16 also excepts from the provisions of s. 14 the case where > " . . . such parts are necessarily exposed for examination and for any lubrication or adjustment shown by such examination to be immediately necessary, and all such conditions as may be specified in regulations made by the Secretary of State are complied with."

So s. 16 does two things. While it does not create a new offence, it indicates the circumstances relating to the fencing which will make it secure fencing, and at the same time provides an exception which will afford a defence to an employer if he can bring himself within the words. Much the same decision had been given by this court on Apr. 21, 1942, three years previously, in the unreported case of Davis v. Reeves & Sons, Ltd. (2).

Those cases are binding on this court and show that an employer cannot say : " Your real case against me is that I did not maintain or keep in position, and so you ought to have proceeded under s. 16." The court decided that, if the machine was not fenced at the time of the accident, an offence was committed under s. 14.

Counsel for the first respondents invited us to say that the Court of Appeal had taken a different view in Nash v. High Duty Alloys, Ltd. (3). On looking at that case, we do not think that the Court of Appeal did take a different view or that that case is in any way in conflict with the two decisions to which I have referred. What the Court of Appeal were considering there was whether or not the employers were entitled to rely on the exception created in s. 16, and they held on the facts of the case that the employers were not entitled to rely on that section. That case in no way conflicts with the decisions in Massey v. Lingwood (S. & P.), Ltd. (1) and Davis v. Reeves & Sons, Ltd. (2). We are bound by those decisions, and no argument has convinced me that there would be any reason to differ from them, even if we could do so.

The decision of the justices was:

> "We were of opinion that the contentions of the respondents, Morris Motors, Ltd., were correct, and we, accordingly, dismissed the summons against them, and the summons brought by the respondents, Morris Motors, Ltd., against the respondent, Harris, was withdrawn by our leave."

The result of the view which I have formed is that the case will have to go back to the justices for them to hear the defence of the first respondents and the proceedings between the first respondents and the second respondent under s. 137 with an intimation that the contentions of the first respondents were not correct.

CROOM-JOHNSON, J. : I am of the same opinion. The argument on behalf of the first respondents is that s. 16 creates an obligation on the occupiers of factories, separate, distinct, and beyond those provided in ss. 12, 13, and 14. Against that it is said that s. 16 is directed to an explanation of the statutory obligations which are imposed on the occupiers of factories by those three sections. I have, I hope, applied my mind with sufficient independence again today to the arguments which have been addressed to us, I will not say untrammelled by, but having regard to, the judgment of Humphreys, J., in Massey v. Lingwood (S. & P.), Ltd. (1) in which I concurred. I have come to the conclusion that I was right in concurring in that judgment, and that the judgment of Humphreys, J., was right, and, accordingly, that the argument which was taken before the justices on the hearing of the complaint in this case was not one which they ought to have accepted. I agree with the judgment which is proposed by my Lord.

LYNSKEY, J. : I agree. It seems to me that s. 14 of the Factories Act, 1937, is the section which imposes the duty of having fencing. It provides :

> "Every dangerous part of any machinery, other than prime movers and transmission machinery, shall be securely fenced . . ."

If that section stood alone, it would mean that there was an obligation on the employer at all times and in all circumstances to have his machinery properly fenced. Section 16, however, applies not only to s. 14 but also as to fencing called for under ss. 12 and 13. The effect of s. 16 is to indicate how and when the duty imposed under ss. 12, 13 and 14 is to be carried out. That duty is to be carried out, so far as the provision of fencing is concerned, by providing fencing of substantial construction, by constantly maintaining the fencing, which means keeping it in good and efficient working order and repair and also keeping the fencing in position while the parts required to be fenced or guarded are in motion or use, with certain exceptions. The effect really is that s. 14 imposes the duty and s. 16 defines its extent and introduces exceptions as to when it need not be carried out. In these circumstances it seems to me that the decision of this court in Massey v. Lingwood (S. & P.), Ltd. (1) was right, and that where a summons is issued for breach of fencing regulations it is properly issued under s. 14, because it is s. 14 which imposes the duty. It is not necessary, or, indeed, possible, to lay an information under s. 16. For those reasons, in my view, the appeal should be allowed.

After the court had refused an application by counsel for the appellant that the respondents should pay the costs of the appeal, counsel for the second respondent asked the court to consider the question of the second respondent's costs.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: We have not ordered the second respondent to pay any costs, and I do not suppose we should have ordered him to pay the costs of the appellant, but I am afraid we cannot give him any costs. The second respondent need not have come to this court. It should be understood in these third party proceedings, that, if the third party—I use that expression for convenience—feels that he does not want to argue the point because at the moment no order has been made against him, he need not appear. The reason why he must be joined as a party to the proceedings is that, if the case is sent back, as this case is being sent back, and the third party has not been brought here, the proceedings between the first respondent and the third party would be at an end, and that would be unfair to the first respondent. That is why we said the third party must be made a party to the case and served, but there is no reason why he should incur expense in coming here unless he wants to take part in the argument. If he does, he may become liable for costs.

Appeal allowed. Case remitted. No order as to costs.

From 1929 to 1935 a house was let as a whole as a dwelling-house at a rent of £80 a year, but from 1935 to 1946 it was let for business purposes. On regaining possession in 1946 the landlord converted the house into two residential flats by putting in some wooden partitions to divide the two top floors from the bottom floor and by installing some new baths and sinks, but the county court judge found that there was no change of identity. In 1947 the two flats were let, one at a rent of £156 a year and the other at £130 a year. The tenants contended that, under the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, s. 12 (1) (a), as amended by the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1939, s. 3 (1) and sched. I, the standard rent of the whole house was £80 a year, and that, to determine the rents of the two flats, the standard rent of the whole house should be apportioned under s. 12 (3) of the Act of 1920.

HELD: (i) the standard rent of the whole house, within the meaning of s. 12 (1) (a) of the Act of 1920, as amended by the Act of 1939, was £80 a year, the rent at which the house was last let as a dwelling-house before Sept. 1, 1939, i.e., from 1929 to 1935; the intervening period of decontrol did not have the effect of taking the house out of the scope of the Rent Restriction so as to enable the landlord to charge what he liked on a new letting; and the fact that on Sept. 1, 1939, the house was let for business purposes was as irrelevant as if it was empty or was let furnished at that time.

(ii) whether the original dwelling-house had lost its identity as a result of substantial structural alterations was a question of fact for the county court judge, and, as he had found that there was no change of identity, the tenants were entitled to an apportionment of the standard rent, under s. 12 (3) of the Act of 1920.

APPEAL by the landlord from an order of His Honour JUDGE PRATT, at Torquay County Court, dated June 7, 1949, apportioning the standard rent of a dwelling-house which had been converted into two flats.

The house, which had been let as a dwelling-house from 1929 to 1935 at a rent of £80 a year, was let for business purposes from 1935 to 1946. The two flats were first let in 1947. The tenants contended that the standard rent of the whole house was £80 a year and that this figure should be apportioned as between the two flats. The landlord contended (a) that the user of the premises for business purposes disentitled the tenants from seeking to found the standard rent on the rent payable before that user, and (b) that, as a result of the conversion of the premises, the original dwelling-house had lost its identity and the standard rent of the flats was the rent at which they were let in 1947. The county court judge found that there was no change of identity, and held that the standard rent of the house was £80 a year, and he apportioned that rent between the two flats. The landlord's appeal from the order of the county court judge was now dismissed by the Court of Appeal. The facts appear in the judgment of DENNING, L.J.

Alan Campbell for the landlord (the plaintiff).

Raymond Stock for the tenants (the defendants).

SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R. : I will ask DENNING, L.J., to give the first judgment.

DENNING, L.J. : The question is what is the standard rents of two flats at 25, Totnes Road, Paignton. That house was let as a whole in 1929 as a dwelling-house at a rent of £80 a year. After being so occupied for six years it was let for business purposes to the local authority. The local authority remained in occupation for business purposes from 1935 until 1946, when they gave up possession. During their occupation they had altered the premises a good deal, cutting new doorways and so forth, but when the landlord got possession he restored the walls and did other work, as a result of which the house was able to be occupied by two separate households in the form of two flats. In 1947 these two flats were let, one at £156 a year and the other at £130 a year. The landlord says that those are the proper figures for the standard rents of the flats, whereas the tenants say that the standard rent of the whole house is £80, being the A figure at which it was let in 1929, and that that figure must be apportioned between the two flats, £44 for one and £36 for the other.

To decide this question, it is simplest in the first place to consider the house as not having had any structural alterations at all, but as being let in two separate parts. What would the position be then ? The first limb of s. 12 (1) (a) of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, as amended B by the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1939, s. 3 (1) and sched. I, defines the standard rent as " the rent at which the dwelling-house was let on Sept. 1, 1939 ", that is, of course, let as a dwelling-house. This house was not so let, so that first limb of the definition does not apply. I pause here to say that Cole v. Harris (1) was decided on that first limb. The flat there in question was let on Sept. 1, 1939, at 22*s.* a week, and that is ample ground for the decision C in that case, but it does not apply here because this house was not let as a dwelling-house on Sept. 1, 1939. It was then being used for business purposes. The second limb of the definition of " standard rent " in s. 12 (1) (a) of the Act of 1920, as amended, is :

> " . . . where the dwelling-house was not let on that date, the rent at D which it was last let before that date . . . "

Were these flats let before Sept. 1, 1939, as a dwelling-house ? The answer is : Yes, they were let from 1929 to 1935 at £80 a year. It is true that the house was then let as one dwelling-house, but that makes no difference because s. 12 (3) of the Act of 1920 provides that where it is necessary to apportion an apportionment should be made, and that means that, when a house previously let as a E whole is subsequently let in two parts, one must apportion. Any other view would mean that a landlord could, after Sept. 1, 1939, divide his house into two parts and charge what he liked for each. The Act clearly forbids any such thing. Apart from the question of conversion into two flats, therefore, the standard rent of this whole dwelling-house as at Sept. 1, 1939, was £80 a year, and to obtain the standard rent of the two separate parts that rent would have to be apportioned. F All the cases, such as Upsons, Ltd. v. Herne (2) and Lindop v. Quaife (3) proceed on this principle.

It was suggested that as the premises had been used in the intervening time for business purposes we could not look back to the 1929-35 letting. Reference was made to Macmillan & Co., Ltd. v. Rees (4), where the point was left open. It seems to me, however, that the fact that on Sept. 1, 1939, the house was let G for business purposes is just as irrelevant as if it was empty or was let furnished at that time. An intervening period of decontrol does not enable a landlord to charge what he likes on a new letting. He is confined to the rent payable previously for dwelling purposes : see Davis v. Warwick (5).

This brings me, therefore, to the question of the conversion of the house into flats. If there was a substantial structural alteration so that the old dwelling-H house changed its identity and two new dwelling-houses were in fact created, then, when the old dwelling-house ceased to exist, its standard rent would have fallen with it. On this point the county court judge went to see the premises himself. He found that all the dilapidations which had happened during the local authority's time had been made good, and then, to convert the house into two flats, some wooden partitions had been erected so as to divide the top two floors from the bottom floor and some new baths and sinks had been put in. He found that there was no change of identity. The question of change of identity is primarily an inference to be drawn by the county court judge. If he has directed himself properly—as in this case he did—we can only interfere if it is quite plain that he has come to the wrong conclusion. It would be clearly unjust if a landlord, by making one or two comparatively small alterations—putting in a window, or a door, or a sink—could thereby get rid of the standard rent altogether. On the other hand, if he does a great deal of structural work he ought to be able to charge a new rent. It is a question of degree, and one primarily for the county court judge. It seems to me that in this case we cannot say he was so clearly wrong that we can interfere. A

It is to be noticed that for any improvement or structural alteration the landlord is entitled, under s. 2 (1) (a) of the Act of 1920, as amended by s. 7 (1) of the Act of 1933 and s. 3 (1) and sched. I of the Act of 1939, to an increase in the rent, and that is the real remedy in a case when the house retains its identity. B It has been pointed out to us that the Landlord and Tenant (Rent Control) Act, 1949, s. 1, enables a rent tribunal to fix a reasonable rent in respect of post-1939 new lettings. This means that, even where there is a change of identity, the landlord cannot charge what he likes, with the result that the court need not shrink so much from a finding of change of identity as they have done in the past, but that does not afford ground on which we can interfere in this case. C In cases, as here, when it is found that there has been no change of identity, there is a standard rent properly applicable to the flats by way of apportionment, and the Act of 1949 does not apply. In my view, therefore, the appeal should fail.

HODSON, J. : It has been argued that the county court judge was wrong in coming to the conclusion that the dwelling-house concerned in this D case had not been substantially changed in identity by virtue of the reconstruction which admittedly took place. It has been said that in a number of cases this court has treated that question, which has often arisen, as a question of law. I think it is clear from the authorities to which our attention has been drawn that that is not so, and that the Court of Appeal has consistently treated the question whether reconstruction has changed the identity of a house as a question E of fact. It is only where the court has come to the conclusion that there was no evidence on which the county court judge could come to the conclusion at which he arrived, or that he had misdirected himself, that this court has interfered. In the present case, the county court judge paid attention to the details of the work which had been done—in particular, that part of the work which might be termed constructional work as opposed to decorative work, and he F himself went to look at the premises and then arrived at the conclusion that the amount expended on the work and the work itself were not such as to make it a case in which it could be said that the identity of the premises had been substantially changed. In directing himself on that matter he referred to the decision of the Court of Appeal in Sinclair v. Powell (6), particularly to the well-known passage from the judgment of ATKIN, L.J., which has been followed G in a number of cases of this class. ATKIN, L.J., said ([1922] 1 K.B. 407) :

> " If the part of a house was not let as a separate dwelling in August, 1914, you may show that substantially in the form in which it now is it existed and was let as part of a whole house or a larger tenement in August, 1914, and can get the rent apportioned. But if the part has been substantially altered so that you cannot fairly predicate of it that in its present form H it was, as part of a whole, let in 1914, I do not think that apportionment is possible ".

The learned judge having applied that language as he did, it seems to me impossible to say that this court can interfere by reason of misdirection, any more than it can on the ground that there was no evidence on which the learned county court judge could come to the conclusion at which he arrived. That seems to be the question of fact on which this case was fought.

On the question of law, it has been argued that, the house having been used for business purposes, it was taken out of the Rent Restrictions Acts and the flats must be held to be outside their scope when it comes to assessing their standard rents under the Acts again in 1947. That matter has been considered by the Court of Appeal in Macmillan & Co., Ltd. v. Rees (4), in which EVERSHED, J., read the judgment, and left that question open. As it was A left open, an opportunity was given to counsel in this case to argue that the effect of the user of the premises as business premises was to take the premises out of the Acts altogether for the purpose of determining the standard rent, but I think I am right in saying that counsel was unable to put forward either any authority for the proposition, or any substantial argument which ought to be accepted, to drive the court away from the ordinary construction of s. 12 (1) (a) B of the Act of 1920 (as amended by s. 3 (1) and sched. I of the Act of 1939), which directs how the standard rent is to be arrived at. In this case the house had been let as a dwelling-house in 1929, and it seems to me to be the plain meaning of the section that it was necessary to go back to that letting to ascertain the standard rent in 1947 and that it matters not whether the house has come out of the Act since 1929, whether by reason of letting for business purposes, C or of being empty or occupied by the owner, or for any other reason.

A third point which was urged has been, I think, taken in this court before in reliance on Cole v. Harris (1). I have nothing to add to what has been said about Cole v. Harris (1) except that in that case there was in fact a letting of the flat on Sept. 1, 1939, and that excluded apportionment. In the present case there was no letting on Sept. 1, 1939, the critical date, and it is, therefore, D necessary under s. 12 (3) of the Act of 1920 to go back to find out what the earlier rent was at which the house was let as a dwelling-house. For these reasons, in my opinion, the appeal should be dismissed.

SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R. : I agree that this appeal fails, and I will only add a few observations on the point made that user of the premises for business purposes disables the tenant from seeking to found the standard E rent on the rent payable on the occasion of the letting as a dwelling-house prior to that user and prior also to Sept. 1, 1939. Reference has been made by DENNING, L.J., and HODSON, J., to Macmillan and Co., Ltd. v. Rees (4), and it appears from the judgment of this court in that case that the point was then advanced and was regarded as a point of substance, for I see that, in delivering F the judgment of the court, I used this language ([1946] 1 All E.R. 676) :

> " Thirdly, it was argued that if there was a user, and therefore a letting, of the premises as a dwelling-house for the first four months of the term of the 1938 lease, the premises were, during the remainder of that term, indubitably used exclusively for business purposes : with the result that the premises wholly ceased to exist as a dwelling-house and that the land- G lord accordingly cannot now identify the premises which were let as a dwelling-house to the appellant in 1940 with the subject-matter of any letting as a dwelling-house prior to their user for business premises, and cannot therefore have recourse to any such earlier letting for the purposes of fixing the standard rent ".

It is to be observed that the last sentence introduces precisely the standard rent H point. At the end of the judgment I say (ibid., 678) :

> " The question was stated by GREER, L.J. ([1931] 2 K.B. 16), in Haskins v. Lewis (7) to be undecided : and it remains undecided today ".

If, then, there was this gap in the judicial interpretation of these Acts, it must now be taken to be filled.

In Phillips v. Barnett (8) three dwelling-houses were converted into something structurally quite different, namely, one factory. I do not think anything in the judgments in that case throws any light on this point. The observation of Greer, L.J., in Haskins v. Lewis (7) is merely a statement that the point is undecided. I am satisfied from the argument that there is no justification for imposing merely as a result of user for business premises such an exclusion of prior letting of the same premises as a dwelling-house. Section 12 (1) (a) of the Act of 1920 (as amended) seems to me, as a matter of English, to negative any such view. I have failed to find any ground for saying that user for business purposes alone, indeed any of the events which may for the time being remove a building from the ambit of the Acts, have the effect suggested. For these reasons and the reasons which have been stated by my brethren, both on this point and on Cole v. Harris (1) and the other points argued, I think that the appeal fails.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

MINISTRY OF AGRICULTURE AND FISHERIES v. MATTHEWS.

[King's Bench Division (Cassels, J.), October 13, 14, 1949.]

Emergency Legislation—Requisition—Land—Agreement purporting to grant tenancy—Lease or licence—Powers of competent authority—Defence (General) Regulations, 1939 (S.R. & O., 1939, No. 927) (as amended), reg. 51 (1), (2).

Estoppel—Agreement by Minister of Agriculture purporting to grant tenancy of requisitioned land—Granting of lease ultra vires the grantor—Defence (General) Regulations, 1939 (S.R. & O., 1939, No. 927) (as amended), reg. 51 (1), (2).

By the Defence (General) Regulations, 1939, reg. 51 (1), a competent authority "may take possession of any land, and may give such directions as appear to the competent authority to be necessary or expedient in connection with the taking of possession of that land."

By reg. 51 (2): "While any land is in the possession of a competent authority by virtue of this regulation . . . the land may . . . be used by, or under the authority of, the competent authority for such purpose, and in such manner, as that authority thinks expedient . . . and the competent authority so far as appears to it to be necessary or expedient in connection with the taking of possession . . . (a) may do, or authorise persons using the land as aforesaid to do, in relation to the land, anything which any person having an interest in the land would be entitled to do by virtue of that interest".

On Dec. 1, 1942, the Minister of Agriculture and Fisheries took possession of agricultural land under reg. 51. On Oct. 11, 1944, the defendant went into possession of the land and an agreement in writing with the Minister with reference thereto was concluded on Oct. 24, 1945, applying certain provisions of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1923, including s. 25 (relating to notice to quit), but excluding inter alia s. 23 (relating to the extension of tenancies under leases for a term of years). The agreement recited that possession of the land had been taken by the Minister under the Defence Regulations and proceeded: "The Minister agrees to let and the tenant agrees to take the land" for the duration of the war period (as defined by statute) and thereafter for three years. The words "rent", "additional rent", "during his tenancy", "good tenantable repair", "shall not assign or under-let" and "non-payment of rent" were also used in the agreement.

Held: (i) the Minister of Agriculture and Fisheries, having, under the Defence (General) Regulations, 1939, no interest in the land apart from possession, could grant only the right of occupation of the land, and, therefore, the agreement was not a lease but an agreement for leave and licence to use the land for the termination of which no notice, or a reasonable notice, was required.

Dictum of Denning, L.J., in Lewisham Borough Council v. Roberts ([1949] 1 All E.R. 824) and Southgate Borough Council v. Watson ([1944] 1 All E.R. 603), applied.

(ii) the Ministry were not estopped from denying that the agreement created a tenancy since to hold otherwise would enable the Minister by estoppel to do an act which was ultra vires.

(iii) since the creation of a tenancy, as an act ultra vires the Minister, was no act in law, the occupier could not claim damages from the Ministry for a breach of contract in conferring on the occupier only a licence instead of the tenancy which the agreement purported to grant.

[EDITORIAL NOTE. The Minister of Agriculture and Fisheries was first appointed by virtue of the Ministry of Agriculture and Fisheries Act, 1919 (c. 91), s. 1, and by that section he was constituted a corporation sole, succeeding on appointment to the benefit of all deeds, contracts, things in action, etc., formerly vested in the Board of Agriculture. It was, therefore, the Minister, and not the Ministry, who was constituted a "competent authority" by reg. 49 of the Regulations of 1939, and it was he who took action in the present case under reg. 51. By the Crown Proceedings Act, 1947 (c. 44), s. 17, however, it was provided that proceedings by or against the Crown should be instituted by or against the appropriate government department selected from a list published by the Treasury in the London Gazette on Dec. 5, 1947, which included the Ministry of Agriculture and Fisheries. By s. 39 of and sched. II to the Act of 1947, the Board of Agriculture Act, 1889 (c. 30), s. 6 (1), was amended so as to revoke the power of suing and being sued formerly vested in the Board of Agriculture. The present action was, therefore, brought by the Ministry, although the Minister had made the agreement with the defendant.

(5) Ministry of Agriculture and Fisheries v. Hunkin, (1948) (unrep.).

Action by the plaintiffs, the Ministry of Agriculture and Fisheries, for (a) possession of land for the occupation of which by the defendant the parties had contracted; and (b) the payment of £496 11*s.* 7*d.* claimed to be owed by the defendant under the agreement and for damages for trespass. COUNTERCLAIM for damages for breach of contract.

The Minister of Agriculture and Fisheries by his agent had requisitioned agricultural land of nearly 300 acres in extent under the Defence (General) Regulations, 1939, reg. 51, and had entered into an agreement with the defendant under which the defendant entered into occupation of the land for a term, which, under the agreement and statutory enactments applied thereby, came to an end on Oct. 11, 1948. The defendant contended that the agreement was a lease, and, alternatively, that the plaintiffs were estopped from denying that it was a lease, and that in either case he (the defendant) was entitled to one year's notice to determine the tenancy under the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1923, s. 25, read in conjunction with the Validation of War-Time Leases Act, 1944, s. 1. Alternatively, he counter-claimed for damages for breach of contract on the ground that the Minister had failed to convey the tenancy which the agreement purported to grant. CASSELS, J., gave judgment for the plaintiffs on the action and counterclaim.

Upjohn, K.C., and Wingate-Saul for the plaintiffs.
L. A. Blundell for the defendant.

CASSELS, J.: This is an action by the Ministry of Agriculture and Fisheries to recover possession of land occupied by the defendant, Mr. William West Matthews, in the parish of Oxborough in the county of Norfolk, and a claim is made for certain moneys in connection therewith. There have been no witnesses on either side and no correspondence has been put before the court. The facts are not in dispute. The conclusion depends on the view that the court may take of the arguments of counsel. The agricultural land involved in this action extends to just on 300 acres. In 1942 it had not been cultivated according to the principles of good husbandry, and on Dec. 1, with the consent of the Minister of Agriculture, the Norfolk Agricultural Committee took possession. They retained it until Oct. 11, 1944, when, under the Defence (General) Regulations, 1939, reg. 51, the Minister let the defendant into possession. Regulation 51 provides :

> "(1) A competent authority, if it appears to that authority to be necessary or expedient so to do in the interests of the public safety, the defence of the realm or the efficient prosecution of the war, or for maintaining supplies and services essential to the life of the community, may take possession of any land, and may give such directions as appear to the competent authority to be necessary or expedient in connection with the taking of possession of that land. (2) While any land is in the possession of a competent authority by virtue of this regulation . . . the land may, notwithstanding any restriction imposed on the use thereof (whether by any Act or other instrument or otherwise), be used by, or under the authority of, the competent authority for such purpose, and in such manner, as that authority thinks expedient in the interests of the public safety, the defence of the realm or the efficient prosecution of the war, or for maintaining supplies and services essential to the life of the community ; and the competent authority, so far as appears to it to be necessary or expedient in connection with the taking of possession . . . (a) may do, or authorise persons using the land as aforesaid to do, in relation to the land, anything which any person having an interest in the land would be entitled to do by virtue of that interest . . . (5) A competent authority may, to such extent and subject to such restrictions as it thinks proper, delegate all or any of its functions under paras. (1) to (3) of this regulation to any specified persons or class of persons."

The agreement under which the defendant took possession on Oct. 11, 1944, was dated more than a year later, viz., Oct. 24, 1945, and was made between the Minister of Agriculture and Fisheries and the defendant. Various provisions of that agreement, such as the payment of £400 a year, cultivation, and some restrictions, do not arise for consideration. The provisions of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1923, are expressed to be applicable, except certain sections, including s. 23. Section 25 was not excluded. The agreement was :

> " An agreement made this 24th day of October, 1945, between the Minister A of Agriculture and Fisheries (hereinafter referred to as ' the Minister ') acting by Henry Edward Sparke Upcher the chairman of the Norfolk War Agricultural Executive Committee by which committee possession of the lands described in the first schedule hereto has been taken on behalf of the Minister under the powers conferred by the Defence Regulations, 1939, of the one part and William West Matthews [the defendant] of Lakesend B Welney, in the county of Norfolk (hereinafter referred to as ' the tenant ') of the other part ".

Clause (1) provides :

> " The Minister agrees to let and the tenant agrees to take the land particularly described in the first schedule hereto and coloured pink on the C plan annexed hereto and being part of Hall Farm and part of White House Farm both situate in the parish of Oxborough in the county of Norfolk, but subject to the rights of the persons entitled thereto to exercise the sporting rights over the said lands. The tenancy shall be from the 11th day of October, 1944, for the duration of the war period as defined in the Agriculture (Miscellaneous War Provisions) Act, 1940, and thereafter to the D expiration of three years from the end of the said war period or if the said three years shall not expire on the 11th day of October then to the 11th day of October next before the expiration of the said three years, and subject to the other agreements and conditions herein contained ".

The duration of the war period, as defined by s. 30 (1) (c) of the Agriculture (Miscellaneous War Provisions) Act, 1940, is :

> " the expression ' war period ' means the period for which the Emergency Powers (Defence) Act, 1939, is in force ".

Under the Emergency Powers (Defence) Act, 1945, s. 1 (which substituted a new sub-s. (1) in s. 11 of the Act of 1939) the Act of 1939, which brought the regulations into existence, expired on Feb. 24, 1946. The expiration of three F years from that date would be Feb. 24, 1949, and that would be the end of the period during which the plaintiff or any one through him could have possession of this land. The " 11th day of October next before the expiration of the said three years " in cl. 1 of the agreement would be Oct. 11, 1948, and that is the date when the plaintiff expected that the defendant would vacate the holding, but he did not do so.

G The first issue to be decided is : What is the nature of this agreement ? Is it a tenancy agreement or is it an agreement merely giving to the defendant leave and licence to be in occupation of this land ? At first reading, the words and phrases in use, and, I think, unfortunately in use, in this document might easily lead one to regard it as a tenancy agreement. I find such words and phrases as : " The Minister agrees to let ", " agrees to take " " the tenancy ", " the rent", H " additional rent ", " during his tenancy ", " good tenantable repair ", " shall not assign or under-let " and " non-payment of rent ". It almost seems as if the draftsman has left nothing out which could make it look more like a tenancy agreement. The Minister, of course, has only such powers as the regulation confers on him. He is not the owner of the land; he has no interest in the land ; and, therefore, he cannot grant a lease. He merely has possession through the agricultural committee, under the regulation. He can only pass on what he has himself, namely, the use of the land.

In Lewisham Borough Council v. Roberts (1), DENNING, L.J., discussing this very point, said ([1949] 1 All E.R. 824):

> " . . . it is necessary to consider the nature of the power to requisition land. It is only a power to take possession of land. It is not a power to acquire any estate or interest in any land : see s. 1 (2) (b) (i) of the Emergency Powers (Defence) Act, 1939, and ss. 1 and 2 of the Compensation (Defence) Act, 1939. Once possession is taken the Crown can exercise all the powers incident to possession, such as to license other people to use the premises : see Southgate Borough Council v. Watson (2), but it cannot grant a lease or create any legal interest in the land in favour of any other person because it has itself no estate in the land out of which to carve any interest. Once possession is taken, the Crown, of course, has all the rights incident to possession, and may, by itself or its agents or sub-agents, exercise all the possessory remedies. A government department, or a town clerk, or a local authority, who is in possession on behalf of the Crown may, therefore, like a bailiff, bring an action of trespass against anyone who disturbs that possession : see Erith Corporation v. Holder (3), and the fact of being in possession is good as against purchasers without being registered on the Land Charges Register : see Lewisham Borough Council v. Maloney (4). None of this, however, confers a legal estate or even an equitable interest on the Crown. The basis of it all is possession ".

Those observations were made in the course of a dissenting judgment, but the other members of the court did not deal with this particular matter.

Southgate Borough Council v. Watson (2), to which the learned lord justice referred, was an appeal from the Edmonton County Court. The headnote is ([1944] 1 K.B. 541) :

> " A competent authority who has requisitioned a house under reg. 51 of the Defence (General) Regulations, 1939, under powers delegated by the Minister of Health, has no power to create a tenancy with regard to that house, and the person who has been let into possession of the requisitioned house because he has been rendered homeless by enemy action and has been required to pay rent for that accommodation is not thereby made a tenant thereof so as to enable him to claim the protection of the Rent Restrictions Acts ".

SCOTT, L.J., in giving judgment said (ibid., 544) :

> " The question in this case is whether the competent authority who requisitioned the house had power under the Defence Regulations to create a tenancy, turning himself into a landlord and turning into a tenant the person who was put into possession of the house because he had lost possession of his own house by enemy action. The county court judge gave a simple, short and entirely sound judgment in which he held that no tenancy had been created. I think that right ".

For the defendant here it is contended that he has a tenancy determinable by notice which has not been given, and that the Minister had power to create a tenancy. The defendant says, not that he has a tenancy as against the true owner of the land, but that he has a tenancy only as against the Minister, until the regulations cease to have effect and a title paramount prevails. I have to bear in mind that the powers of the Minister were brought into existence by the regulation. His powers are statutory. The power to take possession is not a power to acquire ownership. Apart from possession, the Minister had no interest in the land which he could convey, and no lease the whole or part of which he could assign. He could only part with possession. He had statutory possession, and his only power was to make a contract for the statutory occupation or use of the land. The argument of the plaintiffs is that if, by the agreement of Oct. 24, 1945, the Minister was granting a tenancy, then he was acting ultra vires. He could only act within his powers and part with what he had, and what he had was possession and nothing more.

It is further contended on behalf of the defendant that the Minister " by the solemn Act of his entry into the said agreement is estopped from denying that he has vested in the defendant such a tenancy as aforesaid ". It may well be that, if it were a private individual who had entered into this contract, he would have been estopped from denying that it was a tenancy agreement, or, at any rate, would have been liable to an action for damages, but the Minister is a statutory and not an actual person and he can only perform the acts which he is empowered to perform. An ultra vires act is not the act of the Minister at all. In Ministry of Agriculture and Fisheries v. Hunkin (5) the present plaintiffs were suing one Hunkin for possession of a cottage and garden. The county court judge took the view that under the relevant Defence Regulations it was competent for the county agricultural committee, acting under the authorisation of the Minister and as a delegate of the Minister's own powers, to create the relationship of landlord and tenant between the Minister and the defendant. I think he said that the Rent Restrictions Acts protected Mr. Hunkin. The Court of Appeal allowed the appeal against that decision, and in his judgment Lord Greene, M.R., made certain observations which are certainly of value in the present case. Counsel for the defendant, the person in possession of the land possession of which was sought by the Ministry of Agriculture and Fisheries, disclaimed any intention of attempting to support the county court judge's judgment that the Minister had power under the regulations to create a tenancy and had in fact created it by the document in that case, but he took the point that the Minister was estopped from denying that the document did create a tenancy. On that the Master of the Rolls said (referring to counsel for the defendant) :

> " He suggested, first of all, that even assuming, as he conceded, that the regulations gave no power to the Minister to create a tenancy, nevertheless the Minister was estopped from denying that the document in question did create a tenancy and, accordingly, the relationship must be regarded as one of landlord and tenant. There is, I think, a very short answer to that. Accepting the view which Mr. Baillieu [counsel] accepts, that the Minister had no power under the regulations to grant a tenancy, it is perfectly manifest to my mind that he could not by estoppel give himself such power. The power given to an authority under a statute is limited to the four corners of the power given. It would entirely destroy the whole doctrine of ultra vires if it was possible for the donee of a statutory power to extend his power by effecting an estoppel. That point, I think, can be shortly disposed of."

I have, therefore, come to the conclusion that this was an agreement for leave and licence, for the determination of which no notice is required, or, at most, only a reasonable notice according to the circumstances. Some comment has been made that this agreement discloses a considerable uncertainty. I do not know whether it does. The agreement by which the defendant was let into possession was specific as to the date for determination being Oct. 11 next before the expiration of three years from the end of the war period as defined in the Agriculture (Miscellaneous War Provisions) Act, 1940, to which I have referred. I think that the plaintiff is entitled to judgment for possession.

There is a counter-claim for damages, namely, that inasmuch as the Minister purported to grant a tenancy to the defendant and as the document reads much more like a tenancy agreement than anything else, there has been a breach of contract on the part of the Minister and the defendant ought to be entitled to recover the difference between the value to him of the tenancy that he would have had if the contract had been what it purported to be and the value to him of the licence which he has got. There is no doubt that, if he had been a tenant in the ordinary way, he might well have enjoyed one of the two or three favourable positions which have been put before the court under various Acts of Parliament. I gather that he might have been entitled to a month's notice or a year's notice, and a tenancy likely to last for ten years, and of none of those does he get the advantage. I think the answer again must prevail that an ultra vires act is no act at all if done by a statutory body whose powers are limited by the statute or statutes which brought them into existence and subsequently regulate their actions. Therefore, the counterclaim must fail.

Judgment for the plaintiff for possession and on the counterclaim. Case to stand over as to the amount due from the defendant to the plaintiff and as to costs, with liberty to both sides to apply.

Street Traffic—In charge of motor vehicle while under influence of drink—Disqualification for holding licence—Special reasons for not disqualifying—No attempt to drive and no intention to drive—Road Traffic Act, 1930 (c. 43), s. 15 (2).

Returning to his motor car, a driver realised that he was under the influence of drink and decided not to drive again that night but to rest and sleep in the car. He sat in the passenger's seat, keeping the ignition key in his pocket intending ultimately to be driven home (as he, in fact, was) by one of his employees at the dance, or, alternatively, to take a taxi-cab. He was convicted of being in charge of a motor vehicle while under the influence of drink to such an extent as to be incapable of having proper control of it in contravention of s. 15 (1) of the Road Traffic Act, 1930.

HELD: these facts were special to the offence and not to the offender and constituted "special reasons" within s. 15 (2) of the Act why the court should order that the driver be not disqualified for holding a driving licence.

CASE STATED by the recorder of Birmingham. The facts appear in the judgment of LORD GODDARD, C.J.

Vernon Gattie for the appellant.
A. H. Ormerod for the respondent.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: This is a Case stated by the recorder of Birmingham on an appeal by the present respondent against his conviction by justices of being in charge of a motor vehicle while under the influence of drink to such an extent as to be incapable of having proper control of the vehicle and to remove the disqualification which had been imposed by the court of summary jurisdiction.

This court has laid it down authoritatively in Whittall v. Kirby (1) that to find special reasons for not disqualifying a convicted person for holding a driving licence the facts said to constitute special reasons must be special to the offence and not to the offender. In other words, the mere fact that it would cause great hardship to the offender—financial hardship or business hardship, whatever it might be—or the fact that he has never been convicted before, or that he has just begun to drive, or some matter of that sort, is not a ground which can be regarded as affording "special reasons". If, however, the court of trial finds facts which are special to the particular offence and go strongly in mitigation of the offence, it is not for this court to say whether or not they themselves would have imposed disqualification. That is for the court of trial. If there are proper facts found which can amount to "special reasons," this court does not interfere.

In the present case the recorder found that the respondent, who was undoubtedly the owner of the car and to that extent in charge of it, had taken his car to a dance hall with two of his employees and the employees had gone into the dance. He himself left the hall because he did not dance, and he then consumed too much drink. Realising that he was under the influence of drink, he entered his motor car. He did not sit at the driving seat. He sat in the passenger's seat and did not put the ignition key into the lock. He simply went to rest in the car. The recorder finds that he had no intention himself of driving or moving the car from the place where it was parked. The Case states :

> "When spoken to he [the respondent] said that he was resting and was awaiting the arrival of his employees, and that he had gone to the motor car in order to sleep, and that he had no intention of driving. He also said that, if his employees (one of whom could, and did, in fact, drive the car away) did not come, he intended to take a taxi-cab in order to get home".

The recorder then states the reasons which he finds to be special reasons :

> "That the [respondent] had entered the motor car in order to rest ; that he was in a position of rest in the motor car ; that he had not made any attempt or effort to drive or to get into a position to drive ; that the ignition key was in his pocket ; that he had left his hat and gloves in the dance hall ; and that he did not intend to drive the motor car again that night".

Those were the "special reasons" which, the recorder held, justified him in holding that the respondent should not be disqualified. In the opinion of the court, the recorder addressed his mind to right considerations, and he has found here circumstances which can fairly be said to be special to the offence and not merely to the offender. In those circumstances, this appeal fails.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. A. W. GAMAGE, LTD.

[King's Bench Division (Cassels, J.), October 17, 18, 1949.]

Purchase Tax—Wholesale value—Appropriation by manufacturer of chargeable goods for sale in retail department—Opinion of commissioners—Power of court to review—Finance (No. 2) Act, 1940 (c. 48), s. 21 (1).

By s. 18 (1) of the Finance (No. 2) Act, 1940 (as amended by the Finance Act, 1944, s. 10 (1)), purchase tax is chargeable on the wholesale value of certain goods. " Wholesale value " is defined by s. 21 (1) as being " the price which in the opinion of the commissioners the goods would fetch, on a sale . . . by a person selling by wholesale in the open market . . . to a retail trader . . . "

The defendants were both manufacturers and retailers of water softeners, articles subject to purchase tax, which passed direct from the defendants' manufacturing department to their retail department without going through the hands of a wholesaler. The defendants contended that the wholesale value should be calculated on the cost of production, but the Commissioners of Customs and Excise, after obtaining information from the trade, expressed the opinion that the wholesale value was that cost with an increase (commonly called " uplift ") of fifteen per cent., that total representing the price which could have been obtained in the open market by a wholesaler.

Held : under s. 21 (1) of the Act the opinion of the commissioners as to wholesale value was final and conclusive ; there was no evidence that they had not expressed an opinion, or that, in arriving at their opinion, they had applied any wrong principle ; and, therefore, the court had no power to review their decision.

The defendants did not, within the period of fourteen days, as prescribed by the Purchase Tax Regulations, 1945 (S.R. & O., 1945, No. 517), reg. 17, or within such further period as the commissioners might allow, serve a notice on the commissioners requiring reference of a dispute to a referee under s. 21 (2) of the Finance (No. 2) Act, 1940, and, therefore, the matter came before the court. Cassels, J., refused to interfere with the decision of the commissioners and gave judgment for the amount claimed.

H. L. Parker for the Attorney-General.

CASSELS, J. : The Attorney-General, on behalf of His Majesty's Commissioners of Customs and Excise, sues the defendants, A. W. Gamage, Ltd., for the payment of £67 16*s.* 10*d.*, being the balance remaining unpaid of purchase tax on certain water softeners which were manufactured and sold by the defendants in their store. If the contentions of the defendants are right, the commissioners have claimed an amount from the defendants which is founded on a wrong method of calculation, and so are not entitled to succeed.

By s. 18 (1) of the Finance (No. 2) Act, 1940 (as amended by the Finance Act, 1944, s. 10 (1)) :

> " A tax, to be called purchase tax, shall be charged, subject to and in accordance with the provisions of this Part of this Act, on the wholesale value of all chargeable goods bought under chargeable purchases."

The case raises an important question from the point of view of manufacturers and traders, because the defendants are not only retailers, but are also, in respect of the goods in this case, manufacturers. Water softeners are goods which attract purchase tax and the question is in what way the tax should be calculated. The defendants manufacture these water softeners and sell them retail in their shop. This presented to the commissioners a somewhat different type of case A from the normal, namely, where a wholesaler sells the article to a retailer who sells it to the public. The defendants took the view that purchase tax ought to be calculated on the cost of production, including the cost of the raw materials and labour, and they invited the commissioners to calculate a wholesale value on that cost. That did not appeal to the commissioners. It, therefore, becomes necessary to decide what is the meaning of the words in the Finance (No. 2) B Act, 1940, which imposes this tax.

Section 21 (1), which deals with the meaning of " wholesale value ", provides :

> " The wholesale value of any goods in respect of which tax is chargeable shall be taken to be the price which in the opinion of the commissioners the goods would fetch, on a sale made at the time when the tax in respect of the goods becomes due by a person selling by wholesale in the open C market in the United Kingdom to a retail trader carrying on business in the United Kingdom only, if no tax were chargeable in respect of the sale and it were made in the circumstances specified in sched. VIII to this Act."

Section 21 (2) provides :

> " If, in ascertaining the amount of tax for which any person is accountable, D any dispute arises as to the wholesale value of any goods, the question shall be referred to the arbitration of a referee appointed by the Lord Chancellor, who shall not be an official of any government department, and the decision of the referee with respect to the matter in dispute shall be final and conclusive: Provided that this sub-section shall not have effect, and tax shall be chargeable on the wholesale value of the goods as fixed by the Com- E missioners, unless, within the prescribed period from the time when the commissioners' opinion as to the wholesale value of the goods has been communicated to the person accountable, or within such further period as they may allow, notice requiring a reference thereunder has been served on the commissioners, and that person has deposited with them the amount of the tax appearing on the basis of their opinion to have become due."

F By sub-s. (3):

> " If the amount of the tax chargeable on the basis of the wholesale value of any goods as determined on a reference under the last preceding sub-section is less than the amount deposited with the commissioners thereunder the excess shall be repaid ".

G In sched. VIII, para. 2, provision is made as to the things which are to be assumed in computing the price which goods to be valued would fetch on such a sale as is mentioned in s. 21 (1), namely, that the seller is paying the commission, costs, charges and other expenses; that the price includes the cost of delivery to the buyer ; that the price is the sole consideration for the sale ; that neither the seller nor any person associated with him in business has any interest in the H subsequent disposal of the goods ; and that there is no commercial relationship between the buyer and the seller otherwise than that created by the sale.

It has been contended here that because there was no factual open market in water softeners, therefore there was no factual basis on which the commissioners could form an opinion. I am unable to subscribe to that submission. When the commissioners have a case such as this I think they must arrive at their opinion as the result of information which they have available. In the present case on Feb. 18, 1946, an officer of the Customs and Excise told the defendants that the value for purchase tax would be equivalent to the cost of the completely assembled water softeners, increased by twenty-five per cent. On Sept. 7, 1946, when there was further information available, another officer of the Customs and Excise wrote stating that the tax would be calculated at 33 1/3 per cent. on a wholesale value represented by the total cost to the defendants of the completed water softeners increased by fifteen per cent. A great deal of criticism has been levelled against the commissioners because of these two letters and counsel for the defendants says : " In one part of the year you say twenty-five per cent. and in another you say fifteen per cent. Why come down ? What is the information that you had ? " The answer which is made is : " We had other information which enabled us to arrive at a proper method of calculating the wholesale value on articles which are subject to purchase tax and do not pass through the usual channels."

The manufacturer who sells his own products in his retail shop is dealt with in s. 25 of the Finance (No. 2) Act, 1940, which provides :

> " (1) Where a wholesale merchant or manufacturer who is required by this Act to be registered appropriates or applies any chargeable goods . . . or, in the case of a manufacturer, any chargeable goods which have been made by him or which are the result of a process applied by him, either (a) to the purposes of any business carried on by him of selling chargeable goods by retail (otherwise than to registered manufacturers as materials), or (b) to the purposes of any business carried on by him of letting out chargeable goods on hire, or (c) to any other purpose not being a sale of the goods under a purchase which is a chargeable purchase or a sale of the goods to a registered wholesale merchant as stock for his business or to a registered manufacturer as materials, the appropriation or application shall be treated for the purposes of this Part of this Act as if it were a chargeable purchase, he shall be accountable for the tax chargeable in respect of the goods, and the tax shall become due at the time of the appropriation or application."

The defendants are registered under the Act and they must comply with all the requirements of the Act concerning their business, including the making and selling of water softeners. Section 25 (2) provides :

> " A registered wholesale merchant or manufacturer who carries on any business of selling chargeable goods by retail, or of letting out chargeable goods on hire, shall keep such records as the commissioners may require him to keep and in such form as they may require, and if he fails so to do he shall be guilty of an offence against this Part of this Act."

If, therefore, the defendants had not kept proper records, they would have been guilty of an offence.

The commissioners, after having ascertained the various bases of information with regard to water softeners, said that the tax should be based on the cost of production plus fifteen per cent. The defendants maintained that it should be based on the cost only. Have the commissioners approached this matter from a wrong point of view by ascertaining from the trade such information as they could and arriving at a conclusion by means of a percentage addition to the cost to the defendants of manufacturing these water softeners in order to ascertain what would be the wholesale value if they had passed through the wholesale market ? I do not think that they have. I think that they have done their best and that they have conformed with the Act of Parliament. It is said that this Act is so ambiguous that one cannot apply it, and that where there is an ambiguity it must be resolved in the favour of the taxpayer. I agree with that. There is authority which has been expressed in the highest courts that an Act of Parliament which imposes a tax must do so in words which are easily understood. I find no ambiguity in this Act. " Wholesale value " means that, if there is no " open market " (a phrase which is used in s. 21) the commissioners must do the best they can to arrive at an opinion. They did arrive at an opinion as is indicated by the letter of Sept. 7, which says :

> " I am directed by the Commissioners of Customs and Excise to confirm that they are not prepared to accept as satisfying the statutory definition of wholesale value a tax value represented by the actual cost to you of the water softeners in question ".

So there is evidence before me that the commissioners have, in some form or other, considered this matter and have arrived at an opinion.

Next, there is the point whether this is the only way in which this matter could be dealt with. In most of these cases the commissioners are in communication with the trade associations. No question is raised about that. Subject to anything which might be shown to the contrary, it would seem to be a good way in which this matter could be dealt with, for the wholesale value for the purposes of purchase tax to be agreed between the commissioners, on the one hand, and the trade association, on the other. It may be that there is no representative body of manufacturers of water softeners. At any rate they have not emerged in the course of this case.

I come now to the final point, namely, whether there is a dispute here as to the wholesale value of any goods ? I think there is because the commissioners have said : " The wholesale value of these goods is cost plus fifteen per cent." and the defendants say : " No, the wholesale value is cost ", and nothing will bring the parties together on that. Such a question can be referred " to the arbitration of a referee appointed by the Lord Chancellor, who shall not be an official of any government department, and the decision of the referee with respect to the matter in dispute shall be final and conclusive." The defendants, however, said : " We contend that s. 21 (2) of the Finance Act (No. 2), 1940, does not apply to a dispute like this. This is a dispute about principle ". They said that the commissioners had never applied themselves properly to this matter, that there was not any open market, that there never had been an open market, that they were not entitled to arrive at the conclusion at which they did, and that s. 21 (1) required that the commissioners should have facts to go on before they arrived at a conclusion and were not entitled to make guesses. I cannot uphold that contention. In connection with this matter there are some observations which were made by LORD GREENE, M.R., in Carltona, Ltd. v. Works Comrs. (1), in which he said ([1943] 2 All E.R. 563) :

> " The last point that was taken was to this effect, that the circumstances were such that, if the requisitioning authorities had brought their minds to bear on the matter, they could not possibly have come to the conclusion to which they did come. That argument is one which, in the absence of an allegation of bad faith—and I may say that there is no such allegation here—is not open in this court. It has been decided as clearly as anything can be decided that, where a regulation of this kind commits to an executive authority the decision of what is necessary or expedient and that authority makes the decision, it is not competent to the courts to investigate the grounds or the reasonableness of the decision in the absence of an allegation of bad faith. If it were not so it would mean that the courts would be made responsible for carrying on the executive government of this country on these important matters. Parliament, which authorises this regulation, commits to the executive the discretion to decide and with that discretion if bona fide exercised no court can interfere. All that the court can do is to see that the power which it is claimed to exercise is one which falls within the four corners of the powers given by the legislature and to see that those powers are exercised in good faith. Apart from that, the courts have no power at all to inquire into the reasonableness, the policy, the sense, or any other aspect of the transaction."

This was a decision of the commissioners, acting under Act of Parliament. It was right that an opportunity should be given to the defendants to ventilate, without undue limitation, the grievance they feel in having manufactured these water softeners and provided them for the public at a smaller price than the public would have to pay for a water softener which had passed through the usual channels and had been, first, manufactured, then in the hands of a wholesaler and, possibly, in the hands of a second wholesaler, and then in the hands of a retailer before it got to the purchaser. The defendants have taken the view that they ought to bring this matter before the court, but the commissioners are entitled to succeed and I give judgment for the amount which is claimed.

PROCEDURE SUMMONS whereby it was asked that it might be determined whether Sir William Henry Peat, the receiver appointed in a debenture holder's action on Mar. 2, 1937, was bound to send to the Registrar of Companies and others any abstract of his receipts and payments pursuant to the Companies Act, 1948, s. 372 (2), and, if so, whether the first such abstract should be for the period of twelve months ended on Mar. 1, 1949, or for some other and what period.

Welsh Anthracite Collieries, Ltd., was unable to pay the interest on debenture stock which would fall due for payment on Mar. 31, 1937, and the present action was commenced on behalf of all holders of the stock for the enforcement of their security and for the appointment of a receiver and manager. On Mar. 2, 1937, judgment in the usual form was given, and Sir William Peat was appointed receiver and manager on behalf of the debenture stock holders. The receiver was directed by the court to pass his accounts half-yearly made up to Sept. 1 and Mar. 2 in each year. The accounts up to and including the twenty-first account were duly rendered. Owing to a delay in receiving certain information, the twenty-second account covered the period of one year ending on Sept. 1, 1948, and was certified on Mar. 25, 1949.

The present summons as originally drafted asked that the time for filing and circulating the receiver's abstract of receipts and payments pursuant to the Companies Act, 1948, s. 372, for the period ending Mar. 1, 1949, should be extended until July 31, 1949, but by leave of VAISEY, J., it was amended by substituting the question set out above. VAISEY, J., held that s. 372 (2) did not apply to receivers appointed before the Act of 1948 came into operation.

J. G. Strangman for the plaintiffs.

M. M. Wheeler for the second defendants, the Trustees Corporation, Ltd.

D. B. Buckley for the Board of Trade.

The first defendants, Welsh Anthracite Collieries, Ltd., was not represented.

VAISEY, J.: This is a summons in a debenture holder's action which was commenced in 1937. The plaintiffs are the Industrial and General Trust, Ltd., suing on behalf of themselves and all other holders of the series of first mortgage debenture stock of Welsh Anthracite Collieries, Ltd., to which I will refer as " the company ". The defendants are, first, the company, and, secondly, the Trustees Corporation, Ltd., the latter being the trustees of the trust deed securing the said debenture stock, which was dated Nov. 16, 1927. On Mar. 2, 1937, judgment in the form usual in such an action was given, and Sir William Henry Peat was appointed receiver and manager on behalf of the debenture stockholders. A direction was given to him to pass his accounts half-yearly, made up to Sept. 1 and Mar. 2 in each year. This direction has been duly carried out by him and the twenty-second of such accounts, covering a period of one year ending on Sept. 1, 1948, was duly certified on Mar. 25, 1949, the delay in connection with that account being sufficiently explained in the receiver's affidavit filed in support of this summons. Practically the whole of the assets of the company have been realised, only a few small items being left in the receiver's hands or under his control. The judgment has, in fact, been almost fully worked out, and the action itself is now practically at an end.

The Companies Act, 1948, came into operation on July 1, 1948. The question which I have now to decide arises under s. 372 which, for the first time, imposed certain duties on receivers and managers. The short question is whether, and, if so, to what extent, those duties fall to be discharged by receivers and managers appointed before the Act came into operation as well as by those appointed thereafter. The section is divided into seven sub-sections. The marginal heading, which, of course, has no effect on its construction, is in these words : " Provisions as to information where receiver or manager appointed." Sub-section (1) provides :

> " Where, in the case of a company registered in England, a receiver or manager of the whole or substantially the whole of the property of the company (hereafter in this section and in the next following section referred to as ' the receiver') is appointed on behalf of the holders of any debentures of the company secured by a floating charge, then subject to the provisions of this . . . section . . . " certain obligations arise. The definition section in the Act, s. 455, provides that " debenture " includes debenture stock, and there is no doubt that Sir William Peat is receiver of the whole, or substantially the whole, of the property of this company. Pausing there, it should be noted that the words " is appointed " differ in form from the words " has been appointed " in s. 370 of the Act, and in the Act there are other variations of expression in reference to the appointment of receivers to which I need not, I think, particularly refer.

The obligations which I have mentioned are shortly as follows : (a) the receiver is forthwith to notify the company of his appointment ; (b) the company is within fourteen days after the receipt of the notification to deliver a particular form of statement to the receiver ; and (c) the receiver is within two months after receiving the statement to send documents to various authorities and persons. A

So far as sub-section (1) is concerned, it seems to me that it can only apply to the case of a receiver and manager appointed after the coming into operation of the Act because the sequence of obligations begins with and depends on an act to be done forthwith, i.e., at the inception of and as a first step in the receivership. B

The difficulty arises under sub-s. (2) which provides :

> " The receiver shall within two months, or such longer period as the court may allow after the expiration of the period of twelve months from the date of his appointment and of every subsequent period of twelve months, and within two months or such longer period as the court may allow after he ceases to act as receiver or manager of the property of the company, send to the Registrar of Companies, to any trustees for the debenture holders of the company on whose behalf he was appointed, to the company and (so far as he is aware of their addresses) to all such debenture holders an abstract in the prescribed form showing his receipts and payments during that period of twelve months or, where he ceases to act as aforesaid, during the period from the end of the period to which the last preceding abstract related up to the date of his so ceasing, and the aggregate amounts of his receipts and of his payments during all preceding periods since his appointment." C D

Sub-section (3) provides :

> " Where the receiver is appointed under the powers contained in any instrument, this section shall have effect—(a) with the omission of the references to the court in sub-s. (1) ; and (b) with the substitution for the references to the court in sub-s. (2) of references to the Board of Trade ; and in any other case references to the court shall be taken as referring to the court by which the receiver was appointed." E

Sub-section (4) has no immediate bearing on the question which I have to decide, but there is a concluding sentence which I think I ought to read : F

> " Nothing in this sub-section shall be taken as limiting the meaning of the expression ' the receiver ' where used in, or in relation to, sub-s. (2) of this section."

Finally, sub-s. (7) provides that, if the receiver makes default in complying with the requirements of s. 372, he shall be liable to a fine not exceeding £5 for every day during which default continues. G

Counsel for the plaintiffs asks me to say that sub-s. (2) applies only to post-Act receiverships, i.e., receiverships which begin on or after July 1, 1948. He puts his argument in several ways. First, he says that, as the application of sub-s. (1) of the section is admittedly so restricted, it is only reasonable to construe sub-s. (2) as similarly restricted. Secondly, he says that the expression " is appointed " in sub-s. 1 differs in significance and not merely in words from " has been appointed ", and that the expression " the receiver " at the beginning of sub-s. (2) is markedly controlled by its context when it appears in sub-s. (1), and means a receiver in the sense attributed to it on a proper construction of sub-s. (1), i.e., a post-Act receiver. Thirdly, he says that the sub-section would, on the alternative view, have a retrospective effect because it would involve, in H the case of the first so-called abstracts, a reference to transactions effected before the Act came into operation. Fourthly, he points out that the sub-section is a penal provision and ought to be construed so as to impose no greater obligations than are indicated by its unmistakable terms.

In support of his argument counsel cited certain cases which I need not, I think, do more than mention in passing. The first of these cases is Ex parte
A Todd (1). The next is Lauri v. Renad (2) in which LINDLEY, L.J., in the course of his judgment, said ([1892] 3 Ch. 420) :

> "It certainly requires very clear and unmistakable language in a subsequent Act of Parliament to revive or re-create an expired right. It is a fundamental rule of English law that no statute shall be construed so as to have a > B retrospective operation unless its language is such as plainly to require such a construction ; and the same rule involves another and subordinate rule to the effect that a statute is not to be construed so as to have a greater retrospective operation than its language renders necessary."

In Re Pulborough Parish School Board Election (3) there are some possibly relevant observations in the judgments of LOPES and DAVEY, L.JJ., to the effect that
C where a statute imposes a new duty it must be presumed to be intended not to have a retrospective effect ([1894] 1 Q.B. 737, 741). The case is a curious one in some ways because the majority in the Court of Appeal, consisting of LOPES and DAVEY, L.JJ., overruled the decision of the Queen's Bench Division by LAWRENCE and WRIGHT, JJ., LORD ESHER, M.R., dissenting, so that three judges were of one opinion and two judges, whose view prevailed, were of the D other opinion. I have mentioned these cases as my attention was drawn to them, but I am very doubtful whether they are really relevant, because I do not think that on any view of this matter the section in the Act in question can be said to have any real retrospective operation.

Counsel for the trustees was content to support the argument of the plaintiffs, taking the view that in this particular case compliance with sub-s. (2) would
E serve no useful purpose and would merely be a waste of money, time, and paper. With that view I am much inclined to sympathise. Indeed, I was half tempted to say that I would, on a certain view of this matter, be prepared to extend the two months period to such a time, say, ten years, as would have the effect of excusing the receiver in this particular case from any obligation to do anything.

Counsel for the Board of Trade, realising, as I realise, that my decision must F affect a very large number of cases, greatly assisted me by his argument to the contrary. He asks me to say that sub-s. (2) does apply generally to pre-Act receiverships, but only to oblige the receiver to carry out such of its directions as fall to be carried out by him at dates subsequent to the commencement of the Act. Thus, in the present case, where the receiver was appointed on Mar. 2, 1937, he should, according to this argument, compile
G his abstract for the year commencing on Mar. 2, 1948, and send it to the appropriate quarter within two months from the end of that year, i.e., on or before May 2, 1949. When I put to counsel the possible case of the two months expiring immediately, or, say, two days after the Act came into operation, leaving the receiver no time to do anything, counsel could only suggest that the receiver must, to avoid the risk of the penalty of £5 a day, apply to the court for an H extension of time, even if he had no funds out of which to pay the costs of the application. I do not think that that exceptional case has very much bearing on the point or ought to be taken into more than passing consideration by me. However, counsel admits that sub-s. (1) cannot apply to pre-Act receiverships, and that a pre-Act receiver is not obliged to do anything under sub-s. (2) unless the obligation to do it arises under the terms of the sub-section at a date subsequent to the coming into operation of the Act. He contends, and I am inclined to agree with him, that so to construe the sub-section would in no sense make it retrospective in its operation. He further says that the expression "is appointed" has in its context no other meaning than "shall be" or "shall have been" appointed, and that the limited effect of sub-s. (1) is attributable, not so much to the form of that expression as to the nature of the obligations thereby imposed being such that their performance by a pre-Act receiver is, on the face of it, impossible.

It may be that the arguments are somewhat evenly balanced, but on the whole I prefer the view advanced by the plaintiffs. It seems to me that the whole of s. 372 is a code for the guidance and the direction of post-Act receivers. It is noticeable that in the previous section, s. 371, it is provided :

> "(4) This section shall apply whether the receiver or manager was appointed before or after the commencement of this Act, and to periods before, as well as to periods after, the commencement of this Act."

It is significant that there is no corresponding statement applicable to s. 372 (2). That omission appears to me to be significant. I think that the context of "the receiver" in sub-s. (1) and the use of that expression at the beginning of sub-s. (2) point to the fact that the section does not apply to receivers generally, but only applies to receivers who come within the operation of sub-s. (1). The definition in sub-s. 1 is curiously placed and curiously expressed. Sub-section (2) does not say "a receiver shall within two months" and so forth. It says "the receiver", and I think that, although one has in this case rather to grasp at straws in a somewhat choppy sea, that is an indication that the receiver on whom the obligations of sub-s. (2) are laid is necessarily the same kind of receiver as he who is subject to the obligations of sub-s. (1).

In answer to the question in the summons, I will declare that Sir William Peat is not bound to carry out the procedure laid down in sub-s. (2) of the section. If the Board of Trade consider that the consequences of this decision are contrary to the public interest, they will, I hope, carry the matter to a higher court. If any leave is required for such an appeal, I will certainly grant it. My conclusion is, put quite briefly, that there is nothing in s. 372 which affects the position or increases the duties of a receiver who was appointed before July 1, 1948, and I think I am to some extent fortified in that conclusion by sub-s. (6) of s. 372, which provides :

> "Nothing in sub-s. (2) of this section shall be taken to prejudice the duty of the receiver to render proper accounts of his receipts and payments to the persons to whom, and at the times at which, he may be required to do so apart from that sub-section."

Order accordingly. Costs of all parties as between solicitor and client to be taxed and paid out of the assets in the hands of the receiver.

PAYNE v. SCHMIDT AND ANOTHER.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Somervell, Singleton and Jenkins, L.JJ.), October 21, 1949.]

Costs—Counsel's fees—Fee of circuit counsel briefed as junior to counsel appearing on circuit to which he does not belong—R.S.C., Ord. 65, r. 27 (29).

A By R.S.C., Ord. 65, r. 27 (29): "On every taxation the taxing master shall allow all such costs, charges and expenses, as shall appear to him to have been necessary or proper for the attainment of justice or for defending the rights of any party, but save as against the party who incurred the same no costs shall be allowed which appear to the taxing master to have been incurred or increased . . . by payment of special fees to counsel . . ."

B In an action between a plaintiff and two defendants, the plaintiff was successful and the first defendant was ordered to pay the second defendant's costs. The second defendant's solicitors had briefed junior counsel who was not on the circuit where the action was tried, and, in consequence of the circuit rules, that counsel was paid a special fee and a second junior counsel, who was on the circuit, was briefed to appear with him. The C second defendant did not seek to recover on taxation the special fee, but he did claim a proportionate fee for the second counsel.

HELD: where, as here, it appeared that the expense of employing a junior counsel was incurred, not because of the difficulty of the case, but merely by reason of a circuit rule, the master, in the exercise of his discretion, was entitled to refuse to allow the fee of such a second counsel.

D INTERLOCUTORY APPEAL from a decision of BIRKETT, J., sitting in chambers, reversing the order of the taxing master whereby the fee payable to a second junior counsel had been disallowed on taxation.

The second counsel had been briefed in compliance with the circuit rules as the first counsel briefed was not on the circuit. The master took the view on the evidence before him that, apart from the circuit rule, the solicitors who had E briefed the two counsel did not regard the case as justifying the employment of two counsel. The master, accordingly, disallowed the fee to the second counsel, but indicated that, had he thought the matter one that was fit for a noting brief, he would have allowed a fee to the second counsel of £5 10*s.* 0*d.* The judge in chambers reversed the decision of the master and allowed the brief fee to the second counsel, but the Court of Appeal now reversed the judge's order and F restored the order of the master.

Wingate-Saul for the first defendant.
P. M. O'Connor for the second defendant.

SOMERVELL, L.J.: This is an appeal from an order made by BIRKETT, J., in chambers on an application to review the taxation by MASTER HOOD of the G second defendant's costs in certain proceedings. The learned judge's order was that a brief fee of 25 guineas to Mr. Armstrong-Jones should stand, and that a fee amounting to two thirds of that fee be allowed to Mr. McDermott. The first defendant, who was ordered to pay the costs, appeals against that order.

The nature of the proceedings do not matter to any appreciable extent. The plaintiff sued for personal injuries. Originally she proceeded against the Ministry H of Agriculture, who dropped out, and then against a Mr. Schmidt. Finally, a Mr. Slator was added. There was a dispute between the two defendants, Mr. Schmidt and Mr. Slator. An order had been made directing the cause to be tried at Lincoln on the Midland Circuit. The solicitors to Mr. Slator, when he was added, instructed Mr. Armstrong-Jones, who is not on the Midland Circuit, to draft the defence. Under the circuit rule, if, as was desired, Mr. Armstrong-Jones conducted the case at Lincoln, there had to be a special fee paid to him, and he also had to have a junior from the circuit. It was not sought to recover the special fee on taxation. It was recognised that it did not fall within the relevant rules of R.S.C., Ord. 65, which lay down what sums are to be allowed on taxation and the principles on which masters are to exercise their discretion, but the dispute arose as to the junior's fee, and we have before us the reasons put in by the solicitors and the answers by the master. Broadly speaking, the reasons put in by the solicitors were that this was a substantial case, and that if, in the ordinary way and apart from any circuit rule, two counsel had been employed, the junior's fee would have been allowed. The master in his answers, after reciting that Mr. Armstrong-Jones was unable to appear at the trial except with a counsel attached to the circuit, goes on :

> " A brief was, therefore, delivered to Mr. Niall McDermott of that circuit (called November, 1946, and in the same chambers as Mr. Armstrong-Jones) to enable Mr. Armstrong-Jones to conduct the case . . . On taxation of the costs the second defendant's solicitors stated that they did not wish or intend to instruct leading counsel as they did not think the case justified it, but that they wanted specially to have Mr. Armstrong-Jones to conduct the case in court as he was well known to them and often instructed by them in this class of work, and, furthermore, that they knew of no equally strong junior on this circuit. In point of fact, there are a number of eminent juniors attached to this circuit well experienced in this class of work ".

On that the learned master came to the conclusion that the brief delivered to Mr. McDermott was only necessitated by the briefing of counsel who was not a member of the Midland Circuit, and that it was, therefore, not an item properly to be allowed on the party and party taxation. He continues :

> " In any event, if I had thought it a case which merited the employment of two juniors, I do not consider that junior counsel in the particular circumstances of this case is entitled to more than a noting brief of £5 10*s*. 0*d*."

The latter part of that paragraph may not be quite happily worded, but I think it is clear from the opening words of it that he did not think it a case which merited two counsel in the ordinary sense. I think he meant to say : " If, although it did not merit two counsel, I had been asked to allow some small fee for taking notes, I daresay I should have thought it quite reasonable ".

Counsel for the second defendant submits that the answer indicates a wholly wrong approach to the problem, and shows that the learned master was actuated by irrelevant circumstances. He says that the learned master should not inquire as to how the junior came to be employed, but he should have asked : " Is this a case which is fit for two counsel ? ", and, if it appeared to be so, he should have allowed two counsel. Counsel says that, on the broad facts of the case the master should have come to the conclusion that two counsel would have been allowed if employed in the ordinary way, and that he would have come to this conclusion but for the irrelevant matters which he considered. I cannot agree with counsel on this point, because where the learned master says " in any event " he is meaning that on no view did he regard it as a case fit for two counsel. I also disagree with counsel in his submission that the circumstances as set out are irrelevant and such as a master is not entitled to take into consideration. I have no wish to say anything which might fetter the discretion of masters, but, if in a case where it is plain on the facts as they are brought before the master that the expense of employing a junior counsel has been incurred solely because of a circuit rule, in my view, he would be entitled, it may be that he would be bound, to say that that fell outside the principles laid down in the rules as to what items are to be included. In the present case, he was told, according to his answer, by the defendant's solicitors themselves " that they did not wish or intend to instruct leading counsel as they did not think the case justified it ". That, in my view, was a circumstance which he was entitled to take into consideration, and he was entitled to come to the conclusion, as he did, on all the facts that the expense of junior counsel fell outside the rules. Therefore, even if one does not take the paragraph to which I have referred as defeating the second defendant in limine, I do not accept his submission that the matters to which the learned master referred, and on which he relied, were irrelevant to the problem he had to consider. For these reasons, I think the learned judge's order was wrong, and that this appeal should be allowed.

A SINGLETON, L.J. : I agree, and I only wish to emphasise that no question of principle is raised on this appeal. From the reasons and answers which are before us it is clear that the solicitors for the second defendant did not intend or wish to brief leading counsel because they did not think the case justified it, and, furthermore, it is clear that the only reason for the briefing of the second counsel was to enable Mr. Armstrong-Jones to appear on the Midland Circuit.
B The master in the paragraph to which my Lord has referred indicates that he did not regard this case as a case fit for a second counsel. The concluding paragraph of the answer is :

> " In all the circumstances and in exercise of my discretion I have disallowed the costs of second counsel, but have allowed one brief fee of 25 guineas which I consider adequate ".

C That was a matter for the taxing master, and on such a matter I do not think that it is open to a judge to review that taxation. It was entirely within the master's discretion. I agree that the appeal must be allowed.

JENKINS, L.J. : I also agree.

Appeal allowed with costs here and below.

E Re GREENWOOD'S AGREEMENT, PARKUS v. GREENWOOD.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Harman, J.), October 21, 1949.]

Lease—Renewal—Perpetual right of renewal—Lease for three years with option to renew for further period of three years on same terms " including the present covenant for renewal "—Law of Property Act, 1922 (c. 16), s. 145,
F sched. XV, para. 5.

An agreement, dated Jan. 29, 1946, whereby certain premises were let for a term of three years from Jan. 30, 1946, contained an option to renew in the following terms : " The landlord will on the written request of the tenants made three calendar months before the expiration of the term hereby granted and if there shall not be at the time of such request any existing G breach or non-observance of any of the agreements on the part of the tenants herein contained . . . grant to them a tenancy of the . . . premises for the further term of three years from the expiration of the said term at the same rent and containing the like agreements and provisions as are herein contained (including the present covenant for renewal) . . . " The agreement contained the usual covenants by the tenants and also a positive covenant
H in regard to the user of the premises. It was contended by the assignee of the lease that the agreement contained a covenant for perpetual renewal, and, therefore, under the Law of Property Act, 1922, s. 145, and sched. XV, para. 5, there was vested in him a term of 2,000 years in the property.

HELD : on the face of it, the covenant for renewal contained in the agreement was not a covenant for perpetual renewal, but merely a covenant to renew once; sched. XV, para. 5, to the Act of 1922 operated to convey a term of 2,000 years only where the lease contained an express covenant or obligation for perpetual renewal; and, therefore, the agreement did not operate as a demise for a term of 2,000 years.

Adjourned Summons by the assignee of a lease dated Jan. 29, 1946, asking (inter alia) for a declaration that he was entitled to a term of 2,000 years in the C demised property on the ground that, on the true construction of the lease, there was a grant of a term with a covenant for perpetual renewal, within the meaning of the Law of Property Act, 1922, sched. XV, para. 5. Harman, J., held that, on the face of it, the covenant for renewal was not a covenant for perpetual renewal, and, therefore, sched. XV, para. 5, of the Act of 1922, did not apply, and the lease did not operate as a demise of a term of 2,000 years. The facts D and the relevant clauses of the lease appear in the judgment.

Michael Albery for the assignee.
Hesketh for the lessor.

HARMAN, J.: By this summons Daniel Parkus, the plaintiff, claims a declaration that on the true construction of the agreement of Jan 29, 1946, E mentioned in the heading of the summons, there is now vested in him a term of 2,000 years in the property which is the subject-matter of this agreement. The defendant, David Greenwood, is the freeholder of the property and the lessor under the agreement in question. The agreement is one of Jan. 29, 1946, and is expressed to be made between the defendant, hereinafter called the lessor, of the one part, and Mark Lee and Jack Barnett, hereinafter called the tenants, of F the other part. Various things are agreed—first, that the landlord will let and the tenants will take the demised premises, which are 96, Brick Lane, Stepney, with a workshop at the rear, for a term of three years from Jan. 30, 1946, subject to a then existing tenancy of part. By the second clause the tenants agree with the landlord (i) to pay monthly the reserved rent of £383 10*s*. a year; (ii) to pay the rates and taxes; (iii) to keep the interior in tenantable repair G and condition, structural repairs excepted; (iv) to allow the landlord to enter and inspect; (v) not to make alterations; (vi) not to imperil the insurances; (vii) (which is a positive covenant) to use the premises "as and for the tenants' business of tailors or such other mode or business as may be approved by the landlord and the upper portion for residential purposes"; (viii) not to commit or permit a nuisance; (ix) not to part with the possession of the premises H or any part of it without the written consent of the landlord; (x) to deliver up the premises. Clause 11 sets out the covenants by the landlord. Clause 11 (a) is for quiet enjoyment and cl. 11 (b) is in these terms:

> "That the landlord will on the written request of the tenants made three calendar months before the expiration of the term hereby granted and if there shall not be at the time of such request any existing breach or non-observance of any of the agreements on the part of the tenants herein con> tained at the expense of the tenants grant to them a tenancy of the said premises for the further term of three years from the expiration of the said term at the same rent and containing the like agreements and provisions as are herein contained (including the present covenant for renewal) the tenants on the signature of such renewed agreement to sign a counterpart thereof and to pay the proper costs of such agreement and counterpart."

Clause 12 is the usual proviso for re-entry on breach.

The tenants, Mark Lee and Jack Barnett, by an assignment of June 6, 1946, assigned to one Ettie Fordham the premises comprised in the agreement to hold the same unto her for the residue of the term then vested in the assignors :

> " . . . subject to the payment of the rent and performance of the agreement and conditions respectively reserved by and contained in the agreement."

There was no assignment there expressed of the benefit of the covenant for renewal. On Mar. 7, 1947, the assignee, Ettie Fordham, assigned to the plaintiff, Parkus, the premises comprised in and demised by the recited agreement :

> " . . . together with the benefit of the tenant's right of renewal of the term as contained in the recited agreement."

Thus, in so far as she got the benefit of the renewal, she purported to assign it.

It is said that Parkus, as assignee under these two documents of the term of three years, has got, not a three years term, but a 2,000 years term in the property. If that be the result in law, it is one not contemplated by the parties when they made the original agreement, for it is clear that, if people wish to create a term of 2,000 years, they are very unlikely to do it by creating a term of three years with a right to renew. However that may be, the Law of Property Act, 1922, sched. XV, para. 5 (which has effect under s. 145 of the Act), provides :

> " A grant, after the commencement of this Act, of a term, sub-term, or other leasehold interest with a covenant or obligation for perpetual renewal, which would have been valid if this Part of this Act had not been passed, shall (subject to the express provisions of this Act) take effect as a demise for a term of 2,000 years . . . free from any obligation for renewal or for payment of any fines, fees, costs, or other money in respect of renewal."

It is said that this was a grant after 1925 of a term with a covenant for perpetual renewal within the meaning of sched. XV, para. 5, and the first question I have to determine is whether that is so.

The argument of counsel for the plaintiff is as follows. He says that the words in the covenant are the very words in which, under the old conveyancing terms and under the law as it stood until 1925, perpetually renewable leaseholds were, in fact, created. Therefore, in the words of sched. XV, para. 5, to the Act of 1922, he says, this is such a covenant as would before the Act have created a perpetually renewable leasehold, and sched. XV, para. 5, operates accordingly. On the face of it this is certainly not a covenant for perpetual renewal. One can have such a covenant in a lease, and, indeed, it was not uncommon to find it in a lease. An example which has been pointed out to me is contained in Wynn v. Conway Corporation (1), where there was a right to renew a 21 years' term at the conclusion of the first eleven years and it was expressly provided that :

> ". . . so often as every eleven years of the said term shall expire the lessors will grant . . . unto the lessee such new lease of the . . . premises upon surrender of the old lease as aforesaid and paying such fine of £7 10*s*. on the day or time hereinbefore limited or appointed."

There on the face of it there was a right to renew at the end of every eleven years and that was on the face of it a perpetually renewable lease.

Since the Act of 1922, such a document has come before the court in Northchurch Estates, Ltd. v. Daniels (2), where the memorandum of agreement was in these terms :

> " The term shall be for a period of one year certain . . . the tenant having the option to renew the tenancy from year to year on identical terms and conditions . . . "

by notice in writing to be given at or before Christmas in each year. EVERSHED, J., found that he had no option but to say that that was a contract for the grant of a perpetually renewable lease and, therefore, a term of 2,000 years was created in the property, whether that was the result contemplated by the parties or not. Is the position the same in the present case ? Counsel for the plaintiff says that it is, because, where one finds a covenant to renew for a further term, and the grant of such further term is to be :

> " . . . at the same rent and containing the like agreements and provisions as are herein contained (including the present covenant for renewal) . . . "

—which are the words here used—that is the same thing as creating a perpetually renewable lease. He cites Hare v. Burges (3) to support that proposition. That was a case of a demise for a year. The headnote is :

> " Lease for lives, with a covenant on the death of either of the cestuis que vie to execute a renewed lease at the same rent and subject to the same covenants ' including this present covenant' : Held, a covenant for perpetual renewal . . . " on the footing that the lessee was > " . . . entitled to have inserted in the renewed lease a covenant for renewal totidem verbis with that contained in the original lease . . . "

In support of that view, counsel for the assignee tells me that in DAVIDSON'S PRECEDENTS AND FORMS IN CONVEYANCING, 3rd ed., vol. V, pt. I, p. 142, the words " including this present covenant " are used to create a perpetual right to renew, and that a careful conveyancer, if he wished to have no trouble and not to have it said that there might be such a perpetual right, would use the opposite words, namely, " other than this present covenant ". All that I accept, but, none the less, in my judgment, sched. XV, para. 5, to the Law of Property Act, 1922, operates to create a term of 2,000 years only where the lease is on the face of it perpetually renewable. In my opinion, one has to find in the lease or agreement an express covenant or obligation for perpetual renewal. I do not find any such covenant here. All I find is a covenant for renewal once. True that has in it, as counsel for the assignee has said, the seeds of its reproduction. Nevertheless, it is not on the face of it a covenant for perpetual renewal. Consequently, I hold that there is no term of 2,000 years created between these parties.

In Green v. Palmer (4) UTHWATT, J., held, without regard to this present point, that words in something of the same sort of form as these created a right to renew twice and no more. That was an instance of a furnished tenancy for six months, and the improbability that the parties had thought of creating a 2,000 years' term was very high. The learned judge mentioned in his judgment that he was entitled to take into consideration all the surrounding circumstances. How he came to the conclusion to which he did, I find difficult to follow, but I say nothing about it because it does not seem to me to touch the point which I decide here.

Declaration accordingly.

[King's Bench Division (Lord Goddard, C.J., Croom-Johnson and Lynskey, JJ.), October 21, 1949.]

Street Traffic—Offence under Road Traffic Act, 1930*—Obligation to give information—Road Traffic Act,* 1930 (c. 43), s. 113 (3) (b).

By s. 113 (3) of the Road Traffic Act, 1930 : " Where the driver of a vehicle is alleged to be guilty of an offence under this Act—(a) the owner of the vehicle shall give such information as he may be required by or on behalf of a chief officer of police to give as to the identity of the driver, and, if he fails to do so, shall be guilty of an offence, unless he shows to the satisfaction of the court that he did not know and could not with reasonable diligence have ascertained who the driver was ; and (b) any other person shall, if required as aforesaid, give any information which it is in his power to give and which may lead to the identification of the driver, and, if he fails to do so, he shall be guilty of an offence."

A police officer, alleging that the driver of the appellant's motor car had committed an offence under the Road Traffic Act, 1930, on a certain date, requested the appellant to furnish the name and address of the driver on that occasion. The appellant inquired of the police what was the nature of the offence and claimed the right, before complying with the requirements of the Act, to decide for himself whether or not an offence had been committed. On being informed, he refused to give the information asked for. The appellant was charged under s. 113 (3) (b) of the Road Traffic Act, 1930, and convicted. On appeal, Held : (i) s. 113 (3) came into operation as soon as the driver of a motor vehicle was alleged to be guilty of an offence under the Act ; the police were not bound to specify the nature of the offence ; and, therefore, the appellant was under an obligation to supply the information when he was first requested to do so.

(ii) although the appellant was the owner of the car, it was not necessary that he should be charged under s. 113 (3) (a) instead of s. 113 (3) (b).

Case Stated by a metropolitan magistrate.

The appellant was convicted at Bow Street magistrate's court on an information preferred by the respondent, a sergeant of police, under s. 113 (3) (b) of the Road Traffic Act, 1930, for " that he [the appellant] between Feb. 2, 1949, and March 16, 1949, did fail when required by or on behalf of the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis to give information which it was in his power to give and which might lead to the identification of the driver of a vehicle who was alleged to be guilty of an offence under the Road Traffic Act, 1930." The appellant, the owner of the vehicle, on being requested by notice to furnish information as to the name and address of the driver on a certain date, returned the notice endorsed : " I should be glad to know the nature of the alleged offence before giving the name and address as requested." The police gave the appellant some information as to the offence alleged to have been committed and the appellant refused to give the information for which they had asked. The Divisional Court held that the appellant was guilty of an offence when he first failed to give the information and dismissed the appeal.

LORD GODDARD, C.J. : This is a Case stated by a metropolitan magistrate sitting at Bow Street magistrate's court before whom the appellant was summoned under s. 113 (3) (b) of the Road Traffic Act, 1930, for > "that he [the appellant] between Feb. 2, 1949, and Mar. 16, 1949, did fail when required by or on behalf of the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis to give information which it was in his power to give and which might lead to the identification of the driver of a vehicle who was alleged to be guilty of an offence under the Road Traffic Act, 1930".

On Feb. 2, 1949, the following notice was given to the appellant :

> "Road Traffic Act, 1930. Application for name and address of driver. The driver of motor vehicle bearing index mark and identification number CYK 737 which was used at Caxton Street . . . on Jan. 18, 1949, is alleged to have committed an offence under the above-mentioned Act. In compliance with the requirements of s. 113 (3) you are hereby requested to furnish at an early date on this form the name and address of the driver of the vehicle on the above occasion".

That notice was sent back by the appellant, who stated : "I should be glad to know the nature of the alleged offence before giving the name and address as requested".

The appellant had no right to say that. The statute puts on him the obligation to give the information. The police did not summon him there and then for refusing to give the information, but they gave him some information about the offence which they alleged was committed. Before the magistrate the appellant claimed the right before complying with the requirements of the Act to decide for himself whether or not an offence had been committed. That, however, is not provided for by the statute which only requires the police to allege that an offence under the Road Traffic Act has been committed by a driver. Once they allege that, they are entitled to ask anybody who they think can give them information to tell them who the driver was.

Another point is now raised by counsel for the appellant who says that, the magistrate having found that the appellant was the owner of the car, the appellant ought to have been summoned, not under s. 113 (3) (b), but under s. 113 (3) (a). In my opinion, there is nothing in that point. It may well be that the police do not know who the owner of the car is. They, therefore, serve the notice under s. 113 (3) on the appellant as the owner or any other person. The owner is required to give certain specific information; any other person is required to give such information as he can give. The appellant was summoned for an offence under s. 113 (3) (b), which states :

> "any other person shall, if required as aforesaid, give any information which it is in his power to give and which may lead to the identification of the driver . . ."

If there was to be any question raised on this point, it ought to have been taken at the time, and the matter could have been amended, but this case seems undoubtedly within s. 1 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848, which provides that no objection to a summons for an alleged defect, either in substance or in form, is to prevail if it does not do the defendant any prejudice. If it does the defendant any prejudice, the justices can adjourn the case so as to give him an opportunity of setting up some answer which he might not otherwise have. None of those considerations applies here. The points raised have no substance, and the magistrate was quite justified in convicting the appellant.

KESTELL AND ANOTHER v. LANGMAID.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., Somervell, L.J., and Hodson, J.), October 25, 26, 1949.]

Agriculture—Agricultural holding—Compensation for disturbance—Notice to quit—Purchase by landlords of land after Sept. 3, 1939—Prior consent to notice of Minister not obtained—Validity of notice—Agricultural Holdings Act, 1923 (c. 9), s. 12 (1)—Defence (General) Regulations, 1939, reg. 62, para. 4A (as amended).

By the Defence (General) Regulations, 1939, reg. 62, para. 4A : " Where the whole or any part of an agricultural holding is subject to a contract of sale made since Sept. 3, 1939, or has been sold in pursuance of a contract of sale made since that date, any notice to quit that holding or any part thereof given to the tenant so as to expire at any time after the end of the year 1941 shall be null and void : Provided that this paragraph shall not apply to any notice if (whether before or after the giving thereof) the Minister of Agriculture and Fisheries consents in writing thereto."

The landlords, who had purchased an agricultural holding after Sept. 3, 1939, served a notice to quit on the tenant in September, 1945, expiring on September 29, 1946, without obtaining the written consent of the Minister as required by reg. 62, para. 4A. On the expiry of the notice the tenant vacated the holding and claimed that he was entitled to compensation for disturbance under the provisions of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1943, s. 12 (1).

HELD : the notice having been accepted as a good notice by the tenant, who had quitted the holding in consequence of it, the requirements of s. 12 (1) were satisfied although the notice was bad under reg. 62, para. 4A, and the tenant was entitled to claim compensation for disturbance.

APPEAL by the landlords from a judgment of His Honour JUDGE SCOBELL ARMSTRONG, sitting at Bodmin County Court, and dated June 17, 1949.

In a Special Case stated under the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1923, sched. II, para. 10, the arbitrator submitted to the county court as a question of law whether a notice to quit an agricultural holding was a valid notice despite the fact that the landlords, who were landlords within the meaning of the Defence (General) Regulations, 1939, reg. 62, para. 4A, had not first obtained the written consent of the Minister of Agriculture and Fisheries, so that the tenant, who had accepted the notice as legal and vacated the holding, was entitled to compensation for disturbance under s. 12 (1) of the Act on the ground that his tenancy had terminated by reason of a valid notice to quit. The county court judge held that for the purpose of s. 12 (1) the notice to quit was valid and his decision was now affirmed by the Court of Appeal who dismissed the landlords' appeal with costs.

SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R. : This is an appeal from a judgment of JUDGE SCOBELL ARMSTRONG on a Special Case submitted to him by an arbitrator under the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1923. The material facts are set out in the Special Case, and I do not propose to canvass the whole of them in this judgment. The point is raised sufficiently clearly by the question of law submitted by the arbitrator, which is this :

> " The question of law upon which I now ask the opinion of this honourable court pursuant to sched. II, para. 10, to the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1923, is : 'Where reg. 62, para. 4A, of the Defence (General) Regulations, A 1939, is applicable to a notice to quit and the landlords fail to apply for the approval of such notice by the Minister and such notice is, therefore, according to the regulation, " null and void ", but the tenant nevertheless quits on the date named in such notice in consequence of such notice, is such notice effective for the purpose of giving to the tenant who has quitted a right to claim compensation for disturbance pursuant to s. 12 of the B Agricultural Holdings Act, 1923, assuming that the tenant on his part has observed all proper legal formalities in connection with his claim for compensation ? ' "

Section 12 of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1923, under which the claim for compensation arises, is a very long section, but it is only necessary to read a C short extract from sub-s. 1 as follows :

> " Where the tenancy of a holding terminates by reason of a notice to quit given by the landlord, and in consequence of such notice the tenant quits the holding, then . . . " in the absence of certain matters referred to, the tenant is entitled to obtain D compensation for disturbance.

Counsel for the landlords has pointed out in a clear and forceful argument that there are two conditions stated in the section the satisfaction of both of which is required to give rise to the claim for compensation. The first is that the tenancy terminates by reason of a notice to quit given by the landlord, and the second is that the tenant, in consequence of such notice, quits the holding. E It will be observed from the form of the Case which I have read that, so far as we are concerned, we must assume that the second condition is fulfilled, for the arbitrator has found as a fact, and his finding is part of the question submitted, that the tenant did quit in consequence of the notice, but that still leaves the question to be determined : Was the tenancy terminated by reason of the notice to quit ? F

Before I turn to the language of the Defence Regulation which gives rise to the question I should say that the landlords acquired the reversion to this tenant's tenancy at a date after Sept. 1, 1939 ; that at various dates thereafter they attempted to get possession by serving notice to quit, but in each case they failed to obtain the written consent of the Minister of Agriculture required by the Defence Regulation; and that, finally, in September, 1945, they served G another notice expiring on Sept. 29, 1946, in which they stated that the reason for giving the notice was their own requirement of possession of the farm. I assume that they thought that, if they required the farm for their own occupation, the necessity of obtaining ministerial consent was removed. However that may be, they never did obtain it, but, on the expiry of the notice, namely, on Sept. 29, 1946, the tenant quitted the holding. H

In the court below the tenant placed his case on two grounds. First, that on the true interpretation of the Act the first condition, like the second, was satisfied. In other words, not only had he (the tenant) quitted the premises in consequence of the notice, but also his tenancy had been terminated by reason of the notice. Secondly, he alleged that, in any event, the landlords were estopped, or were otherwise disabled, from alleging or asserting the invalidity of their notice. The county court judge decided, I think rightly, in the tenant's favour on the first point, and, therefore, he did not go on to consider the estoppel question. We, taking the same view as the judge, have also thought it unnecessary to pursue the estoppel matter. We have, therefore, heard no argument upon it, and I propose to say no more about it.

I pass now to the terms of the Defence (General) Regulations, 1939, reg. 62, para. 4A, of which is as follows :

A
> " Where the whole or any part of an agricultural holding is subject to a contract of sale made since Sept. 3, 1939, or has been sold in pursuance of a contract of sale made since that date any notice to quit that holding or any part thereof given to the tenant so as to expire at any time after the end of the year 1941 shall be null and void. Provided that this paragraph shall not apply to any notice if (whether before or after the giving thereof) the Minister of Agriculture and Fisheries consents in writing thereto."

B

Counsel for the landlords argued that the words " null and void " leave no room for any doubt that the legislature is saying : " A notice which is embraced within this Defence Regulation is for all purposes to be regarded as without any force, validity or effect." If that be right, it was argued, though the tenant may be found to have quitted the holding because he had received a particular piece of paper, nevertheless it cannot be said that his interest in the land came to an end by reason of something which is, so to speak, wholly proscribed by the law as without any effect. There is considerable force in that argument, but, in considering it, this court is not without substantial guidance, and so I turn at once to a previous decision of the Court of Appeal in Westlake v. Page (1).

It is true, as counsel for the landlords has said, that the particular point in that case which seems to me to be of the highest significance in the present case is not mentioned in the headnote, and, in a sense, is dealt with incidentally in the judgment, but, as I follow the case, the decision on this relevant point was necessary to the result at which the court arrived. The landlord in that case had sought to obtain possession from his tenant by serving a notice to quit, but in the notice to quit he had added certain words to the effect that, if the tenant agreed to proposals which he (the landlord) had made as regards the rent, the landlord would not seek to take advantage of the notice. When the time came the tenant did, pursuant to the notice, quit the holding, and he then claimed that a right to compensation under the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1923, s. 12, had arisen. The landlord thereupon said : " No. This notice to quit was conditional, and, therefore, it was a bad notice." The relevant part of the judgment of BANKES, L.J., is as follows ([1926] 1 K.B. 304) :

F

> " The first point taken by the landlord in this case is a technical one, that the notice to quit given was in law a bad notice, because it was conditional, and that under those circumstances the case does not come within [s. 12 of the Act of 1923] at all, for that section when speaking of a holding being terminated by a notice to quit must presumably refer to a termination by a valid notice. I cannot accept that contention. It seems to me that if a notice to quit is given, whether it be a good or a bad one, and it is accepted as a good notice by the tenant, who quits the holding in consequence of it, the case comes within the language of the section. That technical point, therefore, fails."

H

WARRINGTON, L.J., dealt somewhat differently with this point, but he did not indicate any dissent from the general proposition stated by BANKES, L.J. SCRUTTON, L.J., said (ibid. 310) merely that on this point he " agreed with what his brothers had already said ". It seems to follow that in Westlake v. Page (1) this court, or, at the least, a majority of this court, must be taken to have held that for the tenant to be entitled to compensation under s. 12 it was not necessary to prove that the notice to quit which operated to put an end to the tenancy and in consequence of which the tenant had gone out was a valid notice in the sense that it complied with the requirements of the contractual position between landlord and tenant.

The question which counsel for the landlords has argued here is whether that opinion ought to apply, not to an invalidity vis-a-vis the contractual rights, but to something which is by Parliament declared to be null and void. That there is a distinction between the two, at any rate for some purposes, I will not deny, but it seems to me that, in construing a section such as this and considering the purpose which the section has in mind, it would be pessimi exempli to draw fine distinctions of that character unless we were compelled to do so, and it does not seem to me that there is anything in the use of the words "null and void" in the Defence (General) Regulations, 1939, reg. 62, para. 4A, which compels the court to say that the principle applicable to a notice which is "bad" in the sense that it fails to comply with the contractual obligations of the landlord does not apply to a notice which is bad because it fails to comply with a provision of the regulation. I agree that the words "null and void" are of the strongest import and it would be difficult to conceive of any formula to express the quality of badness which was stronger than they are. At the same time, when one considers para. 4A, it appears to be necessary to read those words with some reservation. That the notice should ever take effect, it must, of course, in a case of the type we are dealing with, be a year's notice expiring at the end of the year. The regulation itself contemplates on the face of it that the consent which is required to give effectiveness to the notice and to make the earlier part of the regulation inapplicable, may be given at any time, both before or after the giving of the notice. It is, therefore, contemplated, whatever the practice of the Minister may be, that a notice given in September, 1945, to expire at Michaelmas, 1946, might not get the necessary imprimatur till the summer, or even the beginning of the autumn, of 1946. During the period from the time the notice was served until the consent was given, what would be its position ? If "null and void" was to be given the widest and most comprehensive significance, it would be difficult, I think, to imagine that it was null and void for nine or ten months and then was suddenly given life and vigour by a consent ex post facto obtained from the Ministry of Agriculture.

I do not wish to pursue that further. I mention it merely to support the view that, in my judgment, the use of the phrase "null and void" here is not sufficient to justify or require the court to say that the principle applicable in Westlake v. Page (1) ought not to be applied in this case. The language of BANKES, L.J., in that case is perfectly general. It seems to me that, if a notice to quit is given, whether it be a good or a bad one, and it is accepted as a good notice by the tenant, the case comes within the language of the section. I decline to say that there are such degrees of badness as would justify the sort of distinction which we are invited to introduce into this case. I would further add that the language of the section is : "Where the tenancy of a holding terminates by reason of a notice to quit . . ." It does not say : "Where the tenancy terminates or is terminated by a notice to quit". The difference in language is not one on which I would wish to place any very great emphasis, but there it is, and, if the question be asked as a matter of ordinary English: "By reason of what did this tenancy terminate ?", it seems to me that on the facts of this case the only possible answer is : "By reason of this document, good, bad or indifferent, namely, the notice to quit served by the landlord."

Finally, I think that the two conditions in s. 12 (1) of the Act, namely, (i), the requirement that the tenancy should be terminated by reason of the notice to quit, and (ii) that the tenant should quit in consequence of the notice, are understandable if the purpose of the section is borne in mind. For it is necessary, if the tenant is to get compensation, that not only should his right as a tenant go, but that he should also leave the premises. Unless both conditions are satisfied, a tenant holding over or having no contractual right might nevertheless prefer a claim to compensation while he still remained in possession.

The result, therefore, is that, in my judgment, the view taken by the county court judge was correct. He referred to another decision by a county court judge, Fox v. Neal (2), in which the view of the county court judge who was then concerned differed from that of himself (JUDGE SCOBELL ARMSTRONG). We have looked at that case, and also at another case, Streat v. Cottey (3), in which the point was raised before a third county court judge. In the last named case the learned judge came to a conclusion contrary to that of Fox v. Neal (2) and in line with that which commended itself to JUDGE SCOBELL ARMSTRONG in the present matter. In my opinion, the view taken by JUDGE SCOBELL ARMSTRONG and by the judge in Streat v. Cottey (3) is to be preferred to the view taken in Fox v. Neal (2), and I think, as I have already indicated, that the decision of the court below was correct and that this appeal accordingly fails.

SOMERVELL, L.J. : I agree that this appeal fails and that, for the reasons that have been given, this case is covered by the reasoning in Westlake v. Page (1). We are bound by that authority, but, if I may say so, I wholly agree with the conclusion that was come to in that case.

APPEAL by the husband from an order of the registrar directing the husband to give security for the wife's costs of a cross-petition for divorce filed by her to the extent of £75 which the registrar estimated as the wife's costs up to setting down and for the hearing of the suit.

Barnard, J., allowing the appeal, held that a sum of £35 which had been deposited by the wife with her solicitors towards her costs should be deducted from the amount of the security ordered by the registrar.

BARNARD, J.: This is an appeal by a husband from an order of the registrar directing the husband to find security for the wife's costs to the extent of £75. The matter first came before Hodson, J., who directed that the summons should be adjourned into open court. The wife had deposited £35 with her solicitors for the prosecution of her cross-petition, and the husband contends that the B registrar, having estimated the costs up to setting down and for the hearing at £75, should have taken into account the £35 which was in the hands of the wife's solicitors. The wife, on the other hand, says that I ought to consider this £35 merely as the wife's separate income. Her contention was before the registrar who, none the less, directed the husband to find security to the full extent.

Counsel for the wife has referred me to Allen v. Allen (1), but I do not think C that that case helps me. There the husband was ordered to find security and appealed to the Court of Appeal. The wife had a separate income of her own of £280 a year, but, none the less, the court had ordered the husband to pay £500 a year alimony pending suit. That makes it clear that the court considered that her own income was not sufficient for her to live on in the station in life to which she was accustomed, and, therefore, they ordered the husband to pay alimony. D The Court of Appeal said that, if they interfered with the order for security and so forced the wife to pay some of the costs of the hearing, they would, in effect, be flouting the order which the court had made that £280 a year plus the £500 were what she needed to live on in her ordinary station in life.

In the present case, if I had not the statement before me that the £35 had been actually paid by the wife to her solicitors towards the expenses of this suit—if E I had merely been told that she had £35 or £50 or some other sum—I should have been very loth to interfere with the registrar's order, because he would be quite entitled to take that figure into account and none the less direct the husband to find the security to the full extent. I do not think, however, that the registrar has acted in accordance with the well-known principles which are to be applied in these matters. Hill, J., makes the position clear in Williams v. F Williams (2), when he says ([1929] P. 118):

> "The main object of security, in recent years at any rate, is that justice may be done by the wife being enabled to procure the assistance of solicitor and counsel and come to court".

So far as the £35 goes, the solicitor is in pocket to that extent towards pre- G senting the wife's case. Therefore, I think it proper, the registrar having estimated that the total costs would be £75, to vary the order made by the registrar by directing the husband to find security to the extent of £40.

Appeal allowed.

By s. 92 of the Constitution of the Australian Commonwealth (contained in the Commonwealth of Australia Constitution Act, 1900): "On the C imposition of uniform duties of customs, trade, commerce, and intercourse among the States, whether by means of internal carriage or ocean navigation, shall be absolutely free."

By s. 74: "No appeal shall be permitted to the Queen in Council from a decision of the High Court upon any question, howsoever arising, as to the limits inter se of the constitutional powers of the Commonwealth and D those of any State or States, or as to the limits inter se of the constitutional powers of any two or more States, unless the High Court shall certify that the question is one which ought to be determined by Her Majesty in Council."

With the object of expanding the Commonwealth Bank, which was publicly-owned, and suppressing private banks, the legislature of the E Commonwealth of Australia enacted the Banking Act, 1947. Part VII of the Act, which is headed "Prohibition of the carrying on of banking business by private banks," consist of s. 46 which provided for the extinction of all private banks, immediately or step by step, at the will of the Treasurer. On the passing of the Act, the respondents (who included eight private banks incorporated in Australia, three private banks incorporated in F England, and the States of Victoria, South Australia and Western Australia) brought actions in the High Court of Australia claiming that the Act was invalid. The appellants (the Commonwealth of Australia, the Treasurer of the Commonwealth, the Commonwealth Bank of Australia and the governor of the Bank) were the defendants in the actions. The respondent banks, who were authorised to carry on the business of banking in Australia G under the Banking Act, 1945, carried on a substantial amount of inter-State business and some of them acted as bankers for certain States. In each of the actions the High Court made an order declaring (inter alia) that s. 46 of the Act of 1947 contravened s. 92 of the Constitution, and, therefore, was invalid. On an appeal by the appellants to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in respect of this part of the orders, the respond- H ents raised the preliminary plea that the relief sought on the appeal could not be granted without the determination of a question "as to the limits inter se of the constitutional powers of the Commonwealth and those of any State or States" within the meaning of s. 74 of the Constitution, and, therefore, no appeal lay without the certificate of the High Court, which had not been sought. The formal orders of the High Court bore on their face no reference to any inter se question, and on the face of them the necessity for a certificate was not apparent, but from the judgments of the judges of the High Court it was clear that inter se questions were raised in the actions, and, although the question whether any of the provisions of the Act of 1947 contravened s. 92 of the Constitution was not itself, apparently, an inter se question, the determination of the inter se questions was a necessary condition of a successful defence of the Act of 1947 in the High Court and of obtaining the relief sought on the appeal. The appellants contended that a certificate was not necessary unless there had been a specific decision adverse to an appellant on an inter se question, and that it was erroneous to contend that a certificate was required merely because an inter se question had been raised in the proceedings before the High Court and might have to be decided on the appeal.

Held : section 74 of the Constitution was not limited to cases where there had been a specific decision adverse to an appellant on an inter se question, but, as the relief sought by the appellants could not be granted without the determination of an inter se question, the section applied and, therefore, no appeal would lie without the certificate of the High Court.

Per curiam : In every case in which the relief sought on an appeal cannot be granted without the determination of an inter se question and the certificate of the High Court has been given no further leave from His Majesty in Council is necessary.

The Board would not express an opinion on any inter se question which, as a certificate had not been given, it was the function of the High Court finally to determine. In the circumstances of the case, however, they thought it right to state their views on the question whether s. 46 of the Banking Act, 1947, offended against s. 92 of the Constitution.

Held : the business of banking was included among the activities described in s. 92 of the Constitution as " trade, commerce, and intercourse " and protected by that section ; as s. 46 of the Act of 1947 authorised the total prohibition of private banking, it directly restricted the inter-State business of banking ; and, therefore, its object was to restrain, and not merely to regulate, inter-State " trade, commerce, and intercourse," and it was contrary to s. 92 of the Constitution.

Consolidated Appeals, by special leave, from orders, dated Aug. 11, 1948, of the Full High Court of Australia (exercising its original jurisdiction), in so far as such orders gave effect to the judgments of the majority of the judges (Rich, Starke, Dixon and Williams, JJ., Latham, C.J., and McTiernan, J., dissenting), that s. 46 of the Banking Act, 1947, offended against s. 92 of the Australian Constitution.

The appellants in each of the five appeals were the Commonwealth of Australia, the Treasurer of the Commonwealth (the Rt. Hon. Joseph Benedict Chifley), the Commonwealth Bank of Australia and the governor of the Commonwealth Bank (Hugh Traill Armitage), and the respondents, who brought the actions against the appellants to test the validity of the Act of 1947, included eight private banks incorporated in Australia, three private banks incorporated in England, and the States of Victoria, South Australia and Western Australia. The States of New South Wales and Queensland were interveners in support of the appellants. On the hearing of the appeals, the respondents raised as a preliminary point the plea that the appeals did not lie without a certificate of the High Court of Australia, as the relief sought by the appellants could not be granted without the determination of a question "as to the limits inter se of the constitutional powers of the Commonwealth and those of any State or States," within the meaning of s. 74 of the Australian Constitution. The Judicial Committee now gave judgment for the respondents on the preliminary point, and dismissed the appeals, but, in view of the fact that a certificate from the High Court might still be obtained, they thought it right to express their opinion on the question, which had been fully argued before them, whether s. 46 of the Banking Act, 1947, offended against s. 92 of the Constitution. Their Lordships held that it did. The facts appear in the judgment of the Board delivered by Lord Porter.

Oct. 26, 1949. The following judgment of the Board was delivered by LORD PORTER: These consolidated appeals from orders of the High Court of Australia raise important and difficult questions in regard to the legislative power of the Commonwealth government under the Australian Constitution and in regard to the limitations expressly or by implication imposed on it by that Constitution. The Act of which the validity is challenged is the Banking Act, 1947, hereafter called "the Act." Its provisions will be referred to later in detail, but its objects as stated in s. 3 may be at once set out. They are as follows:

> "(a) the expansion of the banking business of the Commonwealth Bank as a publicly-owned bank conducted in the interests of the people of Australia and not for private profit; (b) the taking over by the Commonwealth Bank of the banking business in Australia of private banks and the acquisition on just terms of property used in that business; (c) the prohibition of the carrying on of banking business in Australia by private banks."

The legislative power of the Commonwealth is defined in s. 51 of the Constitution [contained in the Commonwealth of Australia Constitution Act, 1900]. By s. 51 :

> " The Parliament shall, subject to this Constitution, have power to make laws for the peace, order, and good government of the Commonwealth with respect to : (i) Trade and commerce with other countries, and among the States . . . (xiii) Banking, other than State banking ; also State banking extending beyond the limits of the State concerned, the incorporation of banks, and the issue of paper money . . . (xx) Foreign corporations, and trading or financial corporations formed within the limits of the Commonwealth." A Purporting to exercise the power thus vested in it the Commonwealth enacted B the Act. It does not touch State banking even within the limits authorised by placitum (xiii). The expansion of the Commonwealth Bank and the suppression of private banks are its aim. By " private banks " is meant the bodies corporate whose names are set out in sched. I to the Act. They are the banks authorised to carry on the business of banking in Australia under the provisions of the Banking Act, 1945, s. 8 and sched. I. They are fourteen in number, eight of them C incorporated in Australia, three of them in England and three elsewhere.

Forthwith on the passing of the Act numerous actions were commenced in the High Court in which the plaintiffs claimed that the Act was invalid. It is unnecessary to state the parties to the several actions beyond saying that the plaintiffs included the eight private banks incorporated in Australia, the three private banks incorporated in England together with, in some cases, a director D and representative shareholder, and, in addition, the States of Victoria, South Australia and Western Australia, while the defendants were the Commonwealth of Australia, the Right Hon. Joseph Benedict Chifley (the Treasurer of the Commonwealth), the Commonwealth Bank of Australia and Hugh Traill Armitage (the governor of that Bank). The defendants are the appellants in the present consolidated appeals, while the plaintiffs in the several actions are E the respondents. In addition, the States of New South Wales and Queensland have, by leave of their Lordships, intervened in the appeal in support of the appellants.

Their Lordships are directly concerned in these appeals with one section only of the Act, s. 46, the terms of which will be presently set out. But in the High Court not only s. 46 but numerous other provisions of the Act were successfully F attacked and in respect of their declared invalidity the appellants have brought no appeal. It will be convenient as an introduction to s. 46 to state briefly the provisions of the Act and to explain what remains of them after the judgment of the High Court. Section 3 stating the objects of the Act has already been set out. Other relevant provisions were of the following character. Section 6 : a severability clause in terms at least as wide as, and possibly wider than, those G to be found in s. 15A of the Acts Interpretation Act, 1901-1941. Section 11 (a) : a declaration that it shall be the duty of the Commonwealth Bank to provide adequate banking facilities for any State or person requiring them. Section 12 : a power to acquire by agreement all or any of the shares in a private bank. Section 13 : powers of compulsory acquisition of Australian shares in any of the private banks where the Treasurer is satisfied that the majority in number H of the shares in that bank are Australian shares, and a consequent provision (s. 15) for the payment of fair compensation therefor. Section 17 : an enactment that, where Australian shares are so acquired, the existing directors shall cease to hold office, and s. 18 et seq : power to the governor of the Commonwealth Bank to appoint other directors in their stead, and certain provisions incidental thereto. Section 22 : power to the Treasurer to invite a private bank to make an agreement with the Commonwealth Bank for the taking over of the business of that private bank. Section 24 : where no such agreement is arrived at by a specified date provision for a compulsory transfer of the business in Australia of that bank to the Commonwealth Bank with the consequent transfer of assets and for the payment of fair compensation (s. 25). Sections 26-36 : the setting up of a Court of Claims to assess compensation and a provision that the computation of its amount should be entrusted to the Court of Claims exclusively and should consequently be withdrawn from the jurisdiction of the High Court. Sections 37-45 : the assessment of compensation.

By orders made by the High Court in each action, it was declared that the following provisions of the Act were invalid, viz., division 2 of pt. IV (which contained ss. 12 to 16 inclusive) except in so far as it related to the voluntary acquisition of shares and without prejudice as therein mentioned, and division 3 of pt. IV (which contained ss. 17 to 21 inclusive) and ss. 24, 25, 37 to 45 inclusive, 46, 59 and 60. As has been already stated, these orders have not been appealed from, except in regard to s. 46. This section is contained in and makes up the whole of pt. VII of the Act. It is entitled " Prohibition of the carrying on of banking business by private banks " and is as follows :

> " (1) Notwithstanding anything contained in any other law, or in any charter or other instrument, a private bank shall not, after the commencement of this Act, carry on banking business in Australia except as required by this section. (2) Each private bank shall, subject to this section, carry on banking business in Australia and shall not, except on grounds which are appropriate in the normal and proper conduct of banking business, cease to provide any facility or service provided by it in the course of its banking business on Aug. 15, 1947. (3) The last preceding sub-section shall not apply to a private bank if its business in Australia has been taken over by another private bank or after that business has been taken over by the Commonwealth Bank. (4) The Treasurer may, by notice published in the Gazette and given in writing to a private bank, require that private bank to cease, upon a date specified in the notice, carrying on banking business in Australia. (5) The date specified in a notice under the last preceding sub-section shall be not more than two months after the date upon which the notice is published in the Gazette. (6) The Treasurer may, from time to time, by notice published in the Gazette and given in writing to the private bank concerned, amend a notice under sub-s. (4) of this section (including such a notice as previously amended under this sub-section) by substituting a later date for the date specified in that notice (or in that notice as so amended). (7) That later date may be a date either before or after the expiration of the period of two months referred to in sub-s. (5) of this section. (8) Upon and after the date specified in a notice under sub-s. (4) of this section (or, if that notice has been amended under sub-s. (6) of this section, upon and after the date specified in that notice as so amended), the private bank to which that notice was given shall not carry on banking business in Australia. Penalty : £10,000 for each day on which the contravention occurs."

It is the validity of this section, divorced from the other sections of the Act which have been declared invalid, that the appellants seek to maintain. In the High Court and before this Board its validity has been challenged on grounds, which, though not all of them will be discussed, it is convenient to set out. It is attacked on the grounds : (i) that its provisions do not constitute a law " for the peace, order, and good government of the Commonwealth with respect to " any of the matters with respect to which the Commonwealth Parliament has, by virtue of s. 51 of the constitution, or otherwise, power to make laws ; (ii) that they contravene s. 92 of the constitution ; (iii) that they are inconsistent with the maintenance of the constitutional integrity of the States ; (iv) that they are inconsistent with s. 105A of the constitution and the Financial Agreement of 1927, made thereunder; (v) that they are inseparable from other provisions of the Act which are themselves invalid. The appellants, contending that on none of these grounds was the decision of the High Court adverse to them except that which was based on the contravention of s. 92 of the Constitution, seek to obtain from the Board a contrary decision on this point, and, as will appear, their Lordships will express their opinion on it. But, before doing so, they must examine and deal with another question of far-reaching importance.

Special leave to appeal against the several orders of the High Court of Australia was granted to the appellants on the footing that at the hearing of the appeals the right should be reserved to the respondents to raise the preliminary plea that such appeals did not lie without the certificate of the High Court. It is this plea, which was duly raised by the respondents, that must now be considered, no such certificate having been sought or given. Chapter III of the Constitution, which is entitled "The Judicature", consists of s. 71 to s. 80 inclusive, of which s. 73 defines the appellate, and s. 75 the original, jurisdiction of the High Court of Australia thereby established. Section 74, which for the present purpose is all important, is in the following terms:

> "No appeal shall be permitted to the Queen in Council from a decision of the High Court upon any question, howsoever arising, as to the limits inter se of the constitutional powers of the Commonwealth and those of any State or States, or as to the limits inter se of the constitutional powers of any two or more States, unless the High Court shall certify that the question is one which ought to be determined by Her Majesty in Council.
> The High Court may so certify if satisfied that for any special reason the certificate should be granted, and thereupon an appeal shall lie to Her Majesty in Council on the question without further leave.
> Except as provided in this section, this Constitution shall not impair any right which the Queen may be pleased to exercise by virtue of Her Royal Prerogative to grant special leave of appeal from the High Court to Her Majesty in Council. The Parliament may make laws limiting the matters in which such leave may be asked, but proposed laws containing any such limitation shall be reserved by the Governor-General for Her Majesty's pleasure."

The question for determination is whether by reason of the provisions of this section the right of His Majesty by virtue of His Royal Prerogative to grant to the appellants special leave to appeal was, in the circumstances to which their Lordships must now refer, abrogated unless the High Court certified in the manner required by the section. It will be convenient to refer to a question of the kind described in s. 74 as an "inter se question."

The relevant circumstances appear to be these. (i) The formal orders of the High Court make no reference to any "inter se" question. Declarations of invalidity are made and injunctions are granted, but on the face of the orders the necessity for a certificate under s. 74 is not apparent. (ii) The several cases were heard without pleadings on motion. It is, therefore, only from the evidence which was given on affidavit, the statements made at the Bar as to the argument, and the contents of the judgments of the learned judges of the High Court, that it can be ascertained what were the issues raised and debated. (iii) A consideration of these matters places it beyond doubt that the validity of the Act in general and of s. 46 in particular was, as has already been stated, challenged on (inter alia) the grounds (a) that its provisions were not a law "for the peace, order, and good government of the Commonwealth with respect to" any of the matters with respect to which the Commonwealth Parliament had power by virtue of s. 51 of the Constitution or otherwise to make laws, (b) that they were inconsistent with the maintenance of the constitutional integrity of the States, and (c) that they were inconsistent with s. 105A of the Constitution and the Financial Agreement made thereunder. These grounds admittedly raise inter se questions. (iv) The determination of each of these inter se questions in favour of the appellants was a necessary condition of a successful defence of the impugned Act in the High Court and it remains a necessary condition of obtaining the relief sought on the appeal to His Majesty in Council. If these inter se questions

A are so determined, the question whether the Act or any of its provisions contravenes s. 92 of the Constitution must then be decided. But this question appears not to be an inter se question. (v) A clear majority of the judges of the High Court were of opinion that s. 46 of the Act contravened s. 92 of the Constitution and was, accordingly, invalid. The present appeal is brought to challenge the correctness of this opinion. On the inter se questions (except that of
B inconsistency with the maintenance of the constitutional integrity of the States) there was a considerable diversity of opinion and in regard to this there was some controversy before their Lordships whether, if, indeed, it became necessary to determine whether a "decision" had been given on any inter se question, a final opinion could be attributed to some members of the court.

It is to these circumstances that the provisions of s. 74 of the Constitution
C must be applied, and it is convenient to state summarily the rival submissions of the parties. By the respondents, who contend that in the absence of a certificate no appeal lies, it is urged that on its true construction the section means that no appeal to His Majesty is permissible without certificate if the relief sought on the appeal cannot be granted without the determination of an inter se question. The appellants, on the other hand, though they agree that it
D may be necessary to look beyond the terms of the formal order, contend that a certificate is not necessary unless there has been a specific decision adverse to an appellant on an inter se question, which he and he alone wishes to challenge, and that it is erroneous to contend that a certificate is required merely because an inter se question has been raised in the proceedings before the High Court and may have to be decided in the appeal to His Majesty in Council.

E Before considering how far these conflicting views accord with the actual language of s. 74, their Lordships would briefly examine the section in a somewhat wider aspect. It is, in the first place, clear that in the establishment of the Federal Constitution of the Commonwealth of Australia it was a matter of high policy to reserve for the jurisdiction of her own High Court the solution of those inter se questions which were of such vital importance to Commonwealth and
F States alike. Reference may be made on this aspect of the matter to the judgment of GRIFFITH, C.J., and BARTON and O'CONNOR, JJ., in Baxter v. Taxation Comrs. (N.S.W.) (1). In its broad outlines s. 74 speaks for itself in this respect and the policy which it embodied is emphasised in later Judiciary Acts: see s. 38A of the Judiciary Act, 1903-1934, which reproduces s. 2 of the Judiciary Act, 1907. It would be a paradoxical result if, in the face of s. 74, the determina-
G tion of inter se questions, which might be of transcendent importance, was left to this Board by the accident that the respondent, having won before the High Court on some other point, yet wished to rely also on a contention which raised an inter se point. To this matter their Lordships will return when they consider the practical aspect of their decision. It is sufficient here to say that this argument appears to weigh heavily against the submission of the appellants. In the H second place there appears to their Lordships to be no ground for suggesting that any new kind of jurisdiction is created by s. 74. It deals with the Royal Prerogative to grant special leave to appeal and imposes certain limitations on, or, in the language of the section, in some degree "impairs," that right. But the appeal by special leave is what it always has been, an appeal from an order or other judicial act which affects adversely the rights claimed by the appellant party. It is in the light of this consideration that the section must, if possible, be construed. To give effect to the appellants' submission would appear to involve the admission of an appeal, not from a judicial act, but from the pronouncement of an opinion on a question of law.

The conclusion to which these broad considerations point is, in their Lordships' opinion, assisted by a closer examination of the section, though its language suggests that the difficulty which now arises had not been in the mind of its authors. As its opening words show, the section deals with " appeals " to His Majesty in Council and, as already observed, an appeal is the formal proceeding by which an unsuccessful party seeks to have the formal order of a court set aside or varied in his favour by an appellate court. It is only from such an order that an appeal can be brought. In s. 74 the appeal is described as an appeal " from a decision of the High Court " and so far no difficulty arises. " Decision " is an apt compendious word to cover " judgments, decrees, orders, and sentences," an expression that occurs in s. 73. It was used in the comparable context of the Judicial Committee Acts, 1833-1844, as a generic term to cover " determination, sentence, rule, or order " [s. 3 of the Act of 1833] and " order, sentence, or decree " [s. 21 of the Act of 1833]. Further, though it is not necessarily a word of art, there is high authority for saying that even without such a context

> " . . . the natural, obvious, and prima facie meaning of the word ' decision ' is decision of the suit by the court . . . "

see Rajah Tasadduq Rasul Khan v. Manik Chand (2), where the question was whether in the Indian Civil Procedure Code, s. 596, " decision " meant the formal expression of an adjudication in a suit or the statement given by the judge of the grounds of a decree or order, and Lord Davey, delivering the opinion of this Board (L.R. 30 Ind. App. 39), used the words that have been cited above. It is, however, on the words next following [in s. 74] that the appellants primarily rely. The appeal which is not permitted is an appeal :

> " . . . from a decision of the High Court upon any question, howsoever arising, as to the limits inter se . . . "

It is said by the appellants that the words " upon any question " are to be read with the immediately preceding word " decision " and that, so read, they qualify the meaning of that word so that it must be interpreted as the expression of an opinion by the court on a particular inter se question, with the result (as their Lordships understand the argument) that the only prohibited appeal is one in which the appellants seek to obtain a reversal of that expression of opinion in an appellate court. In support of this contention the appellants rely also on the repetition of the word " question " at the end of the first paragraph, and again in the second paragraph of the section. It appears to their Lordships to be of little significance whether the words " upon any question " are linked (as the appellants contend) with " decision " or (as the respondents contend) with " appeal." The former is the natural grammatical meaning and is to be preferred. Then, so runs the appellants' argument, the respondents' construction requires that the word " upon " should be read as equivalent to " involving " and this, they say, is an illegitimate straining of language. It may be conceded that the word " upon " is not the word most apt to the occasion. But, if the alternative construction involves (as it appears to involve) giving to both the words " appeal" and " decision " some other than their natural and primary meaning, and further involves a grave departure from the policy which clearly inspires this part of the Constitution, it does not appear to their Lordships that the use of the word " upon," where " involving " would more aptly be used, should deter them from adopting the respondents' construction. It is a somewhat elliptical, but by no means an impossible, use of language to speak of a decision upon a certain question when what is meant is a decision in a suit which cannot be decided without the determination of that question, or, more shortly, a decision involving a certain question or involving the determination of a certain question.

Moreover, if the construction for which the respondents contend may be criticised as departing from the strict meaning of the word " upon," the construction put forward by the appellants cannot escape a similar criticism. It was urged that, if the phrase, " No appeal . . . from a decision of the High Court upon any question," is read as a whole without pausing on its several elements, its meaning is clear. But, so read, it has not, or at least has not clearly, the meaning attributed to it by the appellants unless it is amplified so as to read : A " No appeal from an order of the High Court being a decision adverse to the appellant upon a question " (or " in so far as it is a decision adverse to the appellants upon a question "). For this paraphrase, which is not artistic, nor itself free from ambiguity, there seems to be no justification. To their Lordships it appears preferable to adhere strictly to the proper meaning of " appeal " and of " decision " when it is used in relation to an appeal. If any other interpre- B tation is adopted, the word " decision " is required to do double duty, meaning at the same time the order of the court and an expression of opinion by the court. The appellants, as has already been said, rely on the further references in the section to " the question " ; so also do the respondents who contend that the phrase in the second paragraph, " an appeal . . . on the question," not only supports their view that the words " upon any question " are to be linked with C " appeal " rather than with " decision," but also, since " appeal " can have only one meaning, emphasises the contention that the " question " means the suit in which the question is raised. In their Lordships' opinion, however, little assistance is given by the repetition of the word. The meaning of the first paragraph of the section must be determined by its own language.

In the next place their Lordships must consider what is the scope and meaning D of the section if the respondents' submission is not accepted. They have not found it easy to ascertain or to state precisely what is at this stage of the argument the contention of the appellants. It is clear that no difficulty arises unless it is sought to bring an appeal in a suit in which two pleas are involved, the one a plea which challenges the validity of a statute on an inter se question, the other a plea which may be a challenge of its validity on some other ground, e.g., that E it offends against s. 92 of the Constitution, or may turn purely on some question of fact. Further, it is clear that no difficulty arises if both pleas are decided against the same party. It could not in that case be contended (subject only to a qualification appearing later) that an appeal would lie without a certificate of the High Court. But the difficulty arises where there are two pleas of the kind described and either the inter se plea (as it may briefly be called) is decided one F way and the other plea the other way, or, a decision on the other plea being sufficient to determine the rights of the parties, the High Court think it unnecessary to express any, or any final, opinion on the inter se plea. And, as the present appeal well illustrates, the situation is capable of numerous and by no means fanciful variations. Thus, in a case in which two or three or more pleas, amongst them an inter se plea, were raised, it might well not be possible to say that there G had been in favour of one party or the other a decision, or even an expression of opinion on the inter se plea, by a majority of the judges constituting the court ; yet in such a case it might be clear that the unsuccessful party who sought to appeal could not succeed on his appeal unless the appellate court decided the inter se plea in his favour. It appears to their Lordships that, as soon as it is conceded (as both sides concede) that s. 74 cannot be confined to simple cases of H declaratory judgments where the validity or invalidity of the impugned statute and the reason therefor appear on the face of the order, the limitation of its scope, for which the appellants contend, ought not to be accepted. They have already stated that, in their opinion, the definition for which the respondents contend gives a legitimate meaning to its actual language and is consonant with its obvious purpose.

Their Lordships, in coming to this conclusion, perforce disagree with the views expressed by the majority of the court in Baxter's case (1) as to the meaning of the word "decision" in s. 74, preferring that expressed by Higgins, J. (4 C.L.R. 1172). They would, however, observe that in that case it was unnecessary for the court to consider a case such as the present appeal, in which different pleas have been decided in favour of different parties, and to pursue to its logical conclusion the construction of the section which they favoured. Nor, valuable and important though their observations were, were they necessary to the decision of the case. The appellants further relied on the opinion expressed in Quick and Garran's Annotated Constitution of the Australian Commonwealth, a work published in 1901 in the early days of the Constitution. It does not appear to their Lordships that, however learned and distinguished its authors, they can give authoritative weight to an opinion which was expressed before the construction of the section had been tested before the court.

Before leaving this question, their Lordships think it right to deal with a point that arises on the second paragraph of the section. It is there provided that, if the High Court grants a certificate :

> ". . . thereupon an appeal shall lie to [His] Majesty in Council on the question without further leave."

If, as their Lordships hold, the certificate of the High Court is necessary whenever the appellant cannot obtain the relief that he claims without the determination of an inter se question, does it follow that, when such a certificate has been given, no further leave is required, even though other questions, which are not inter se questions, will have to be determined ? In their Lordships' opinion, it does. On this question no settled practice has or could be established until the scope of s. 74 had been finally determined. It may now be stated that in every case in which the relief sought on the appeal cannot be granted without the determination of an inter se question (a) no appeal will lie without the certificate of the High Court, and (b) when that certificate has been given, no further leave from His Majesty in Council will be necessary. It was suggested that the prerogative right to grant leave to appeal might in this way be unduly restricted, for a litigant might raise an inter se question on some unsubstantial pretext in the hope that thus the way to an appeal to His Majesty in Council would be barred. But the possibility of abuse is no reason for departure from what appears to be the logical procedure, and it can be assumed that the High Court or this Board will deal with such action summarily. Finally, mention should be made of one class of case which requires special treatment. If, for example, a party to a suit contends (i) that the facts of his case do not bring him within the operation of a statute and (ii) that, even if they do, the statute is invalid on some inter se ground, and both pleas are decided against him, there appears to be no reason why he should not accept the decision of the High Court on the inter se question but present a petition to His Majesty in Council for special leave to appeal on the other question. In such a case, if leave were granted, the Board would, on the hearing of the appeal, have no concern with any inter se question and, in harmony with the formula already stated, the appellant could obtain the relief he claimed without the determination by the Board of any such question. The example given is not exhaustive of this class of case. The plea other than the inter se plea might be founded not on fact but on some other ground of invalidity, in which case the same principle would apply.

The view which their Lordships have expressed that no appeal lies to them without a certificate from the High Court of Australia is conclusive of the case and in normal circumstances they would not give any opinion on the many other matters argued before them. Nor do they propose to express any opinion on the "inter se" questions which it is the function of the High Court finally to determine unless a certificate is given under s. 74 of the Constitution. But for two reasons they think it right to state their views on the question to which so large a part of the argument of the appellants was directed, viz., whether s. 46 of the Act of 1947 offends against s. 92 of the Constitution—first, because it might yet be possible to apply for, and if the High Court should think fit to grant it, to obtain a certificate which would enable the appellants to re-argue a case already fully argued, and, secondly, because it appears to them that a large part of the appellants' argument was based on a misapprehension of two cases already decided by this Board which it is their Lordships' duty, so far as they can, to A correct.

The familiar terms of the first part of s. 92 may be set out :

> " On the imposition of uniform duties of customs, trade, commerce, and intercourse among the States, whether by means of internal carriage or ocean navigation, shall be absolutely free."

B Forty years of controversy on these words have left one thing at least clear. It is no longer arguable that freedom from customs or other monetary charges alone is secured by the section. On that the contending parties, while differing on almost every other point, are agreed. The questions remaining are : What is included, and, in particular, is the business of banking included, in the expres-
C sion "trade, commerce, and intercourse"? What is the freedom guaranteed by the section, and is it infringed by the Act ? On these questions the parties put forward conflicting contentions. The appellants (who claim support in the dissenting judgments of LATHAM, C.J., and MCTIERNAN, J.) contend that banking, though it may be carried on by means of inter-State transactions, is not " trade, commerce, and intercourse among the States " within s. 92, and, further, that,
D even if it is, the Act of 1947 does not infringe any guaranteed freedom. The contrary on both points is contended by the respondents whose contention was upheld by the other four judges of the High Court (RICH, WILLIAMS, STARKE and DIXON, JJ.). In considering these rival contentions, their Lordships will examine the decisions in James v. Cowan (3) and James v. Commonwealth of Australia (No. 2) (4), claimed by both sides to be decisive in their favour, and then
E consider the bearing of those decisions and the reasoning which appears to be implicit in them on the present case. Before this is done, however, it remains to complete the statement of relevant facts and to deal with one matter, not indeed of general importance but peculiar to the present case, viz., the question whether s. 46 [of the Act of 1947] as a whole is severable from the parts of the Act which have been declared invalid and the further question whether, if part
F of s. 46 itself is invalid, yet the rest of it is valid.

As may be surmised from what has already been said, the business of banking in Australia is at the present time carried on by three kinds of organisation (i) the Commonwealth Bank of Australia, (ii) State banks, and (iii) the private banks which have been already described. The private banks carry on a substantial volume of inter-State business amounting to about fifteen per cent.
G of their total business and some of them act as bankers for certain of the States. The Act does not differentiate, or authorise a differentiation, between their inter-State and intra-State business. It has not been suggested that it would be possible to do so. They are already under a large measure of control by the Commonwealth Bank under the Banking Act, 1945, the provisions of which Act have not been challenged in these proceedings. The expansion of the Commonwealth Bank is one of the avowed objects of the Act of 1947 and must
H inevitably follow from the prohibition of private banking. Since the appellants rely on it for one part of their argument, it may be well to repeat that s. 11 of the Act imposes on the Commonwealth Bank the duty

> " . . . (a) to provide in accordance with the conditions appropriate in the normal and proper conduct of banking business, adequate banking facilities for any State or person requiring them ; (b) to conduct its business without discrimination except on such grounds as are appropriate in the > normal and proper conduct of banking business ; and (c) to observe, except as otherwise required by law, the practices and usages customary among bankers and, in particular, not to divulge any information relating to, or to the affairs of, a customer of the Commonwealth Bank except in circumstances in which it is, in accordance with law or the practices and usages customary among bankers, necessary or proper for the Commonwealth Bank to divulge that information."

These being the relevant facts, their Lordships turn first to what has been called the severability point. It is enacted by s. 6 of the Act as follows :

> "It is hereby declared to be the intention of the Parliament (a) that if any provision of this Act is inconsistent with the Constitution, that provision and all the other provisions of this Act shall nevertheless operate to the full extent to which they can operate consistently with the Constitution ; (b) that the provisions of the last preceding paragraph shall be in addition to, and not in substitution for, the provisions of s. 15A of the Acts Interpretation Act, 1901-1941 ; and (c) that this section and s. 15A of the Acts Interpretation Act, 1901-1941, shall have effect notwithstanding that their operation may result in this Act having an effect different, or apparently different in substance, from the effect of the provisions contained in this Act in the form in which this Act was enacted by the Parliament."

Taking into consideration the wide terms of this section supplementing those of s. 15A of the Interpretation Act, 1901-1941, their Lordships have come with some hesitation to the conclusion that s. 46 is severable from the invalidated provisions of the Act and that its validity must be tested as if it were a separate enactment. It may be observed, however, that, since, as will appear, so regarded it falls by its own offence against s. 92 of the Constitution, it is an academic question whether it should suffer from association with other sections. The further question, whether the validity of any part of s. 46 can be maintained if other parts of it are invalid, is in the same sense academic. It will not help the appellants, if, for example, sub-ss. (1) to (3) inclusive can be considered as one enactment and sub-ss. (4) to (8) as another. But, since the matter has been argued before them, their Lordships state their opinion that on its true construction s. 46 contains one indivisible scheme, no part of which can be severed from the rest. Sub-section (1) contains the primary enactment, the prohibition of private banking : sub-s. (2), which is barely intelligible except by reference to provisions for compulsory acquisition now excised from the Act, is intended to ensure an orderly continuance of banking facilities, until the private banks are dissolved, by compelling each of them to carry on its business "subject to the section." From the date specified by notice given by the Treasurer under sub-s. (4), or a substituted date (sub-ss. (6) and (7)), the bank to which notice has been given must not carry on business in Australia (sub-s. (8)). There is on the true construction of the section a single indivisible scheme by which the extinction of all private banking is to be brought about immediately or step by step at the will of the Treasurer. It is on this footing that the validity of the section will be examined. As was observed by the learned Chief Justice in the course of his judgment :

> "There is no doubt that the provisions mentioned are directed towards putting the plaintiff banks out of business or that, if put into operation, they will achieve that result."

From this way of stating the problem the appellants do not shrink. The question then is whether an Act which, leaving untouched the Commonwealth and State banks, authorises the total prohibition of all private banking, offends against s. 92 of the Constitution.

The problem being thus stated, the first question that must be answered is whether a prohibition of banking business is, in any view, within the ambit of s. 92. This question can itself be resolved into two questions : (i) Is the business of banking included among those activities described as " trade, commerce, and intercourse " in s. 92 ? (ii) If not, is a prohibition of private banking, involving the denial of a choice of banking facilities to those engaged in trade and commerce among the States, a restriction on the freedom of that trade and

A commerce which is guaranteed by s. 92 ? Concluding, as they do, that the first question must be answered in the affirmative, their Lordships do not think it necessary to discuss the second, which presents many difficulties. It is, in their opinion, clear that such words as " trade, commerce, and intercourse " are not naturally susceptible of such a narrow interpretation as the appellants would put on them. And, if they may say so with all respect to the learned Chief Justice
B who has taken the opposite view, it would be contrary to the trend of judicial decision both in Australia and (so far as that is relevant) in the United States of America to hold otherwise. The view, which at one time appeared to be put forward in argument, that the words in s. 92, " whether by means of internal carriage or ocean navigation," restricted its operation to such things and persons as are carried by land or sea has long since been rejected and cannot be enter-
C tained. The business of banking, consisting of the creation and transfer of credit, the making of loans, the purchase and disposal of investments and other kindred activities, is a part of the trade, commerce and intercourse of a modern society and, in so far as it is carried on by means of inter-State transactions, is within the ambit of s. 92. On this part of the case their Lordships respectfully adopt the language and reasoning of DIXON, J., to which they can add nothing.

D The business of banking being an activity of which the freedom is protected by s. 92 of the Constitution, the next question is whether the Act offends that section, and their Lordships turn at once to James v. Cowan (3) and James v. Commonwealth of Australia (No. 2) (4). Of these two cases the more important, for what it decided, is James v. Cowan (3). The facts in James v. Cowan (3) can only be understood if they are read in conjunction with the earlier case of James v.
E State of South Australia (5). James carried on business in South Australia as a grower and producer of dried fruits and in the course of it sold his products outside that State. For reasons, which have been many times stated in judgments of this Board and of the High Court and need not be repeated, the Commonwealth and certain of the States, including South Australia, had recourse to legislation to deal with the whole question of marketing dried fruits. In 1924
F the South Australian legislature enacted the Dried Fruits Act, 1924. The material provisions of this Act are set out at large in the judgment of James v. Cowan (3). It is essential only to notice that the Act contained two sections, s. 20 and s. 28, each of which authorised an interference with the free disposal by the grower of his products, s. 20 by empowering the Dried Fruits Board, which was established under the Act, in its absolute discretion to determine
G where and in what quantities the output of dried fruits produced in any year should be marketed, and s. 28 (which was expressed to be subject to s. 92 of the Constitution) by empowering the minister to purchase by agreement, or acquire compulsorily, any dried fruits in South Australia grown and dried in Australia, subject to certain exceptions which need not be particularised.

In James v. State of South Australia (5) it was in the first place the validity
H of s. 20 of the Act and of determinations made under it that came in question and it was held by the whole court (ISAACS, A.C.J., GAVAN DUFFY, POWERS, RICH and STARKE, JJ.) that that section, so far as it authorised a determination by the board limiting the quantities of dried fruits which might be marketed within the Commonwealth, was obnoxious to s. 92. From the decision of the High Court no appeal was brought to this Board. But, s. 20 failing him, the Minister of Agriculture in South Australia sought to make use of his powers under s. 28. Once more James invoked s. 92 of the Constitution and in James

v. Cowan (3) challenged the validity of the executive action taken under s. 28, and it was in this case when it came before the Board that the decision was given, which, as their Lordships think, goes far to determine the present case. For, as part of the ratio decidendi of the case and by no means obiter or by way of a historical narrative, the Board expressly affirmed the decision of the High Court in James v. State of South Australia (5). The primary importance of the decision lies in this, that, in regard to s. 20 of the Act of 1924, Lord Atkin, A delivering the opinion of the Board, said ([1932] A.C. 559) :

> " In the result, therefore, one returns to the precise situation created by s. 20 with its determination of where and in what quantities the fruit is to be marketed. Section 20 and the determinations are invalid, and for precisely the same reasons it appears to their Lordships inevitable that the B exercise of the powers of the Minister, crediting him with the precise object and intention found by the High Court, were also invalid."

Before further examining what is involved in this decision, their Lordships think it convenient to note what was actually decided in the other of the two cases which have come before them. In James v. Commonwealth of Australia (4) it was a similar Act, but in this case an Act of the Commonwealth, that was C under attack, and the substantial issue was whether the Commonwealth, as well as the States, was bound by s. 92. If it was bound, then the further question arose whether the Act in question was obnoxious to s. 92 of the Constitution. The decision of the Board was that the Commonwealth was bound by s. 92 and it is significant that the judgment delivered by Lord Wright, M.R., thus proceeds ([1936] 2 All E.R. 1477) : D

> " For these reasons their Lordships are of opinion that s. 92 binds the Commonwealth. On that footing it seems to follow necessarily that the Dried Fruits Act, 1928-1935, must be held to be invalid. On the interpretation of ' free ' in s. 92, the Acts and the regulations either prohibit entirely, if there is no licence, or if a licence is granted, partially prohibit inter-State E trade. Indeed the contrary was but faintly contended if the Commonwealth were held to be bound by the section."

There does not in fact appear to have been any ground for contending that, if the Act which was challenged in James v. Cowan (3) was invalid, that challenged in James v. Commonwealth of Australia (4) could be valid.

It might well appear that these two decisions were a serious obstacle to the F present appellants' case. Section 20 of the South Australian Act was invalid. It was general in its terms. It did not discriminate between inter-State and intra-State trade in dried fruits. But because it authorised a determination at the will of the Dried Fruits Board, the effect of which would be to interfere with the freedom of the grower to dispose of his products to a buyer in another State, it was invalid. And for the same reason the Commonwealth Act fell. The neces- G sary implications of these decisions are important. First may be mentioned an argument, strenuously maintained on this appeal, that s. 92 of the Constitution does not guarantee the freedom of individuals. Yet James was an individual and James vindicated his freedom in hard-won fights. Clearly there is here a misconception. It is true, as has been said more than once in the High Court, that s. 92 does not create any new juristic rights, but it does give the citizen H of State or Commonwealth, as the case may be, the right to ignore, and, if necessary, to call on the judicial power to help him to resist, legislative or executive action which offends against the section. And this is just what James successfully did.

Linked with the contention last discussed was another which their Lordships do not find it easy to formulate. It was urged that, if the same volume of trade flowed from State to State before as after the interference with the individual trader, and, it might be, the forcible acquisition of his goods, then the freedom of trade among the States remained unimpaired. In the first place, this view seems to be in direct conflict with the decisions in the James cases (3) and (4), for there the section was infringed though it was not the passage of dried fruit in general, but the passage of the dried fruit of James, from State to State that was impeded. Secondly, the test of total volume is unreal and unpractical, for A it is unpredictable whether by interference with the individual flow the total volume will be affected and it is incalculable what might have been the total volume but for the individual interference. Thirdly, whether or not it might be possible, if trade and commerce stood alone, to give some meaning to this concept of freedom, in s. 92 " trade " and " commerce " are joined with " intercourse " and it has not been suggested what freedom of intercourse among the B States is protected except the freedom of an individual citizen of one State to cross its frontier into another State or to have such dealings with citizens of another State as his lawful occasions may require.

The bearing of those decisions with their implications on the present appeal is manifest. Let it be admitted, let it, indeed, be emphatically asserted, that the impact of s. 92 on any legislative or executive action must depend on the facts
C of the case. Yet it would be a strange anomaly if a grower of fruit could successfully challenge an unqualified power to interfere with his liberty to dispose of his produce at his will by an inter-State or intra-State transaction, but a banker could be prohibited altogether from carrying on his business both inter-State and intra-State and against the prohibition would invoke s. 92 in vain.

In their Lordships' opinion, there is no justification for such an anomaly. On D the contrary, the considerations which led the Board to the conclusion that s. 20 of the South Australian Dried Fruits Act, 1924, offended against s. 92 of the Constitution lead them to a similar conclusion in regard to s. 46 of the Banking Act, 1947. It is no answer that under the compulsion of s. 11 of the Act the Commonwealth Bank will provide the banking facilities that the community may require, nor, if anyone dared so to prophesy, that the volume of banking E would be the same. Nor is it relevant that the prohibition affects the intra-State transactions of a private bank as well as its inter-State transactions. So also in the James cases (3) and (4), there was no discrimination. His fruit, for whatever market destined, was liable to be the subject of a " determination."

Yet it is on these very decisions and in particular on that in James v. Commonwealth of Australia (4) that the appellants rely. The third of their reasons in their F formal Case is that

> " . . . the decision of the majority of the High Court in relation to s. 92 is inconsistent with the decisions of the Judicial Committee in James v. Commonwealth of Australia (4) and James v. Cowan (3)."

It appears to their Lordships that this contention ignores the actual decisions
G and is based on a misapprehension of certain language used in the judgments of the Board. In James v. Cowan (3) LORD ATKIN speaks ([1932] A.C. 555) of
s. 20 and the determinations made under it as " directed at inter-State commerce as such." Elsewhere (ibid., 559) he speaks of the " objects " of the minister and the Dried Fruits Board and (ibid., 558) of the " real object " of arming the minister with a certain power. It is possible that this language is open to misconception.
H But, in whatever sense the word " object " or " intention " may be used in reference to a minister exercising a statutory power, in relation to an Act of Parliament it can be ascertained in one way only, which can best be stated in the words of LORD WATSON ([1897] A.C. 38) in Salomon v. Salomon & Co. (6) :

> " In a court of law or equity, what the legislature intended to be done or not to be done can only be legitimately ascertained from that which it has chosen to enact, either in express words or by reasonable and necessary implication."

The same idea is felicitously expressed in an opinion of the English Law officers, Sir Roundell Palmer and Sir Robert Collier, cited by ISAACS, J. (43 C.L.R. 409) in James v. Cowan (3) :

> " 'It must be presumed that a legislative body intends that which is the necessary effect of its enactments ; the object, the purpose and the intention of the enactment, is the same . . .' "

ISAACS, J., adds (ibid) :

> " By the 'necessary effect,' it need scarcely be said, those learned jurists meant the necessary legal effect, not the ulterior effect economically or socially."

It was because s. 20 of the Dried Fruits Act of South Australia operated according to the natural meaning of its words to authorise a direct restriction on the manner in which James could dispose of his product by an inter-State transaction that it offended against s. 92 of the Constitution, not because some other extraneous purpose, object or intention was ascribable to the South Australian legislature.

So also, in James v. Commonwealth of Australia (4) LORD WRIGHT in delivering the opinion of the Board uses somewhat similar language. He speaks ([1936] 2 All E.R. 1467) of the " real object " of an Act, of " its admitted object " (ibid., 1470), citing words used by LORD ATKIN in James v. Cowan (3), and, again, of an Act being " directed against " or " aimed at " a particular result. On these expressions the appellants have fastened, contending that an Act cannot offend against s. 92 unless it can be shown that the intention of the legislature was to interfere in some way with inter-State trade, and they go on to say that in the Banking Act, 1947, there is to be found no intention to interfere with inter-State trade. That Act, they say, is not directed or aimed at such trade. To this their Lordships would say that the test is clear : Does the Act, not remotely or incidentally (as to which they will say something later), but directly, restrict the inter-State business of banking ? Beyond doubt it does, since it authorises in terms the total prohibition of private banking. If so, then in the only sense in which those words can be appropriately used in this case, it is an Act which is aimed or directed at, and the purpose, object and intention of which is to restrict, inter-State trade, commerce and intercourse.

It is not, however, only on a misunderstanding of the expressions last mentioned that the appellants base their claim that James v. Commonwealth of Australia (4) is decisive in their favour. They further find support in such phrases as " freedom as at the frontier or . . . in respect of 'goods passing into or out of the State' " ([1936] 2 All E.R. 1475) and " freedom at what is the crucial point in inter-State trade, that is at the State barrier " (ibid., 1476), which are to be found in the course of the judgment in that case. These words must (as must every word of every judgment) be read secundum subjectam materiam. They were appropriate to their context and must be read in their context. They cannot be interpreted as a decision either that it is only the passage of goods which is protected by s. 92 or that it is only at the frontier that the stipulated freedom may be impaired. It is not to be doubted that a restriction, applied not at the border but at a prior or subsequent stage of inter-State trade commerce or intercourse, may offend against s. 92. Nor, as their Lordships hold, in accordance with the view long entertained in Australia, is it in respect of the passage of goods only that such " trade, commerce, and intercourse " is protected.

Lastly, the judgment in James v. Commonwealth of Australia (4) was invoked by the appellants on the ground that it contained expressions of approval of certain decisions previously given by the High Court of Australia, and (so the argument ran), if those decisions were right, then the judgment of the High Court in the present case could not be maintained. This is a dangerous line of argument. It is true that in the course of a narrative of the leading High Court decisions on s. 92 of the Constitution LORD WRIGHT, M.R., observed ([1936] 2 All E.R. 1470) in regard to a passage in the judgment of EVATT, J., in R. v. Vizzard, Ex parte Hill (7) :

> " If this reasoning, which in Vizzard's case (7) was primarily applied to the States, is, as it seems to be, correct, then in principle it applies mutatis mutandis to the Commonwealth's powers under s. 51 (i) . . . "

But it does not appear to their Lordships that the whole of that learned judge's reasoning received the considered approval of the Board. Nor, even if it were otherwise, would it follow that the judgment of the High Court in the present case could not be maintained. As was also said in James v. Commonwealth of Australia (4) (ibid., 1476) :

> " In every case it must be a question of fact, whether there is an interference with this freedom of passage."

The facts in relation both to subject-matter and to manner of restriction or interference are so widely different in the two cases that it is difficult to apply to one case all that was said in the other. In this connection it may be noted that in James v. Cowan (3) their Lordships observed ([1932] A.C. 561) that they found themselves :

> " . . . in accord with the convincing judgment delivered by ISAACS, J., in the High Court."

The decisions in James v. Cowan (3) and in Vizzard's case (7) may be reconciled. It would not be easy to reconcile all that was said by EVATT, J., in the one case with all that was said by ISAACS, J., in the other.

Their Lordships have thought it proper to deal at considerable length with the earlier decisions of this Board because so much reliance was placed on them by the appellants. It is, they think, clear that, far from assisting the appellants, these two decisions are, as the respondents have throughout contended, strongly against them. In observing on the James cases, (3) and (4), and their bearing on the present case, their Lordships noted that the Act now under consideration operated to restrict the freedom of inter-State " trade, commerce, and intercourse," not remotely or incidentally, but directly. On this and on a cognate matter, the distinction between restrictions which are regulatory and do not offend against s. 92 of the Constitution and those which are something more than regulatory and do so offend, their Lordships think it proper to make certain further observations. It is generally recognised that the expression " free " in s. 92, though emphasised by the accompanying " absolutely," yet must receive some qualification. It was, indeed, common ground in the present case that the conception of freedom of " trade, commerce, and intercourse " in a community regulated by law presupposes some degree of restriction on the individual. As long ago as 1916, in Duncan v. State of Queensland (8), SIR SAMUEL GRIFFITH, C.J., said (22 C.L.R. 573) :

> " But the word ' free ' does not mean extra legem, any more than freedom means anarchy. We boast of being an absolutely free people, but that does not mean that we are not subject to law."

Through all the subsequent cases in which s. 92 has been discussed, the problem has been to define the qualification of that which in the Constitution is left unqualified. In this labyrinth there is no golden thread. But it seems that two general propositions may be accepted : (i) that regulation of trade, commerce and intercourse among the States is compatible with its absolute freedom, and (ii) that s. 92 is violated only when a legislative or executive act operates to restrict such trade, commerce and intercourse directly and immediately as distinct from creating some indirect or consequential impediment which may fairly be regarded as remote. In the application of these general propositions, in determining whether an enactment is regulatory or something more, or whether a restriction is direct or only remote or incidental, there cannot fail to be differences of opinion. The problem to be solved will often be not so much legal as political, social, or economic, yet it must be solved by a court of law. For where the dispute is, as here, not only between Commonwealth and citizen but between Commonwealth and intervening States, on the one hand, and citizens and States, on the other, it is only the court that can decide the issue. It is vain to invoke the voice of Parliament. A

Difficult as the application of these general propositions must be in the infinite variety of situations that in peace or in war confront a nation, it appears to their Lordships that this further guidance may be given. In Australian National Airways Proprietary, Ltd. v. The Commonwealth (9), LATHAM, C.J., used these words (71 C.L.R. 61) : B

> " I venture to repeat what I said in the former case [viz., Milk Board (N.S.W.) v. Metropolitan Cream Pty., Ltd. (10) (62 C.L.R. 127)] : ' One proposition which I regard as established is that simple legislative prohibition (Federal or State), as distinct from regulation, of inter-State trade and commerce is invalid. Further, a law which is " directed against " inter-State trade and commerce is invalid. Such a law does not regulate such trade, it merely prevents it. But a law prescribing rules as to the manner in which trade (including transport) is to be conducted is not a mere prohibition and may be valid in its application to inter-State trade, notwithstanding s. 92 '." C

With this statement, which both repeats the general proposition and precisely states that simple prohibition is not regulation, their Lordships agree. And it is, as they think, a test which must have led the Chief Justice to a different conclusion in this case had he decided that the business of banking was within the ambit of s. 92. They do not doubt that it led him to a correct decision in the Airways case (9). There he said (71 C.L.R. 61) : D

> " In the present case the Act is directed against all competition with the inter-State services of the Commission. The exclusion of other services is based simply upon the fact that the competing services are themselves inter-State services. . . . The exclusion of competition with the Commission is not a system of regulation and is, in my opinion, a violation of s. 92." E

Mutatis mutandis, these words may be applied to the Act now impugned, for it is an irrelevant factor that the prohibition prohibits inter-State and intra-State activities at the same time. F

Yet about this, as about every other proposition in this field, a reservation must be made, for their Lordships do not intend to lay it down that in no circumstances could the exclusion of competition so as to create a monopoly either in a State or Commonwealth agency, or in some other body, be justified. Every case must be judged on its own facts and in its own setting of time and circumstance, and it may be that in regard to some economic activities and at some stage of social development it might be maintained that prohibition with a view to State monopoly was the only practical and reasonable manner of regulation and that inter-State " trade, commerce, and intercourse " thus prohibited and thus monopolised remained absolutely free. Nor can one further aspect of prohibition be ignored. It was urged by the appellants that prohibitory measures must be permissible, for otherwise lunatics, infants and bankrupts could without restraint embark on inter-State trade and diseased cattle or noxious drugs could freely be taken across State frontiers. Their Lordships must, therefore, add what, but for this argument so strenuously urged, they would have thought it unnecessary to add, that regulation of trade may clearly take the form of denying certain activities to persons by age or circumstances unfit to perform them or of excluding from passage across the frontier of a State creatures or G H things calculated to injure its citizens. Here, again, a question of fact and degree is involved which is nowhere better exemplified than in the Potato Case (State of Tasmania v. State of Victoria (11)) where the following passage occurs (52 C.L.R. 168) in the judgment of Gavan Duffy, C.J., and Evatt and McTiernan, JJ. :

> " In the present case it is neither necessary nor desirable to mark out the precise degree to which a State may lawfully protect its citizens against the introduction of disease, but, certainly, the relation between the introduction of potatoes from Tasmania into the State of Victoria and the spread of any disease in the latter is, on the face of the Act and the proclamation, far too remote and attenuated to warrant the absolute prohibition imposed."

The same difficulty arises in applying the other discriminatory test, that between a restriction which is direct and one that is too remote. Yet the distinction is a real one and their Lordships have no doubt on which side of the boundary the present case falls. It is the direct and immediate result of the Act to restrict the freedom of trade, commerce and intercourse among the States. Their Lordships will not attempt to define this boundary. An analogous difficulty in one section of constitutional law, viz., in the determination of the question where legislative power resides, has led to the use of such phrases as " pith and substance " in relation to a particular enactment. These phrases have found their way into the discussion of the present problem also and, as so used, are the subject of just criticism by the learned Chief Justice. They, no doubt, raise in convenient form an appropriate question in cases where the real issue is one of subject-matter, as when the point is whether a particular piece of legislation is a law in respect of some subject within the permitted field. They may also serve a useful purpose in the process of deciding whether an enactment which works some interference with trade, commerce and intercourse among the States is, nevertheless, untouched by s. 92 as being essentially regulatory in character. But where, as here, no question of regulatory legislation can fairly be said to arise, they do not help in solving the problems which s. 92 presents. Used as they have been to advance the argument of the appellants, they but illustrate the way in which the human mind tries, and vainly tries, to give to a particular subject-matter a higher degree of definition than it will admit. In the field of constitutional law—and particularly in relation to a federal constitution—this is conspicuously true, and it applies equally to the use of the words " direct " and " remote " as to " pith and substance." But it appears to their Lordships that, if these two tests are applied, viz., (i) whether the effect of the Act is in a particular respect direct or remote, and (ii) whether in its true character it is regulatory, the area of dispute may be considerably narrower. It is beyond hope that it should be eliminated.

Their Lordships will humbly advise His Majesty that these appeals should be dismissed.

Re KELLNER'S WILL TRUSTS. BLUNDELL v. ROYAL CANCER HOSPITAL AND OTHERS.

[Court of Appeal (Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., Somervell, L.J., and Vaisey, J.), October 24, 25, 1949.]

Charity—Hospital—Teaching hospital—Institution taken over by State between death of testatrix and grant of probate—Gift of share of residue—Disposition of gifts—" Rights to which any governing body were entitled immediately before the appointed day "—" Endowment " of hospital—Application of trust property in making payments to board of governors—National Health Service Act, 1946 (c. 81), s. 6 (1), s. 7 (1), (10), s. 60 (1) (a).

By pt. II of the National Health Service Act, 1946, which came into force on July 5, 1948, hospitals and their property were taken over by the State. By s. 6 (1) of the Act : " Subject to the provisions of this Act, there shall, on the appointed day, be transferred to and vest in the Minister . . . all interests in or attaching to premises forming part of a voluntary hospital . . . and in . . . movable property used in or in connection with such premises, being interests held immediately before the appointed day by the governing body of the hospital or by trustees solely for the purposes of that hospital, and all rights and liabilities to which any such governing body or trustees were entitled or subject immediately before the appointed day, being rights and liabilities acquired or incurred solely for the purposes of managing any such premises or property as aforesaid or otherwise carrying on the business of the hospital or any part thereof, but not including any endowment within the meaning of the next following section or any rights or liabilities transferred under that section." By s. 7 (1) : " Where any voluntary hospital to which the last foregoing section applies is, before the appointed day, designated by the Minister under this Part of this Act as a teaching hospital . . . all endowments of the hospital held immediately before the appointed day shall on that day . . . be transferred to and vest in the board of governors constituted under the following provisions of this Part of this Act for the teaching hospital." Section 7 (10) defined " endowment " in relation to a voluntary hospital as " property held by the governing body of the hospital or by trustees solely for the purposes of that hospital, being property of the following descriptions (a) interest in or attaching to land . . . (b) shares, stocks . . . and other securities, and any other personal property held by way of an investment ; (c) money, including any credit in a banking account ; (d) rights under any bill of exchange, promissory note or gratuitous covenant for the payment of money: Provided that an equitable interest held for the purposes of a voluntary hospital in trust property in which there are other equitable interests shall not be deemed to be an endowment of that hospital." By s. 79 (1) the word " property " included rights. By. s. 60 (1) : " Where property, other than property transferred to the Minister or to the board of governors of a teaching hospital or to a hospital management committee under s. 6 or s. 7 of this Act, is held on trust immediately before the appointed day, and the terms of the trust instrument authorise or require the trustees, whether immediately or in the future, to apply any part of the capital or income of the trust property for the purposes of any hospital to which s. 6 of this Act applies, the trust instrument shall be construed as authorising or, as the case may be, requiring the trustees to apply the trust property, to the like extent and at the like times, for the purpose of making payments, whether of capital or income (a) in the case of a hospital designated as a teaching hospital . . . to the board of governors of that teaching hospital."

By her will, dated June 18, 1948, the testatrix gave her property to her trustee on the statutory trusts for realisation and directed him to divide her residuary estate into eight equal shares and to pay one such share to the Royal Cancer Hospital (Free), which was a corporation incorporated by Royal Charter, and another to the Cancer Research Institute, which was owned and controlled by the hospital, both the hospital and the institute being charitable institutions. The testatrix died on June 23, 1948, and probate of the will was obtained on July 31, 1948, i.e., after the National Health Service Act, 1946, had come into force. By the National Health Service (Designation of Teaching Hospitals (No. 2)) Order, 1948 (S.I., 1948, No. 979), made under s. 11 (8) of the Act, the Royal Cancer Hospital (Free) was designated as a teaching hospital, and from July 5, 1948, the affairs of the hospital and the institute were conducted by a board of governors. It was contended by the board that the shares of the residue given by the will to the hospital and the institute vested in them under s. 7 (1) of the Act, or, alternatively, that the trustee was required to apply the shares in paying the capital and income thereof to them under s. 60 (1). The Minister of Health claimed the shares under s. 6 (1).

HELD : (i) the rights of the hospital and the institute, as residuary legatees, were to have the estate administered, and on completion of the administration to have the balance remaining in the executor's hands distributed in due proportions, and such rights were not covered by s. 6 (1).

(ii) the rights were not " endowments " within s. 7 (10), and, therefore, s. 7 (1) did not operate to vest them in the board of governors.

(iii) there was nothing in s. 78 (1) of the Act of 1946, coupled with the definition of " the governing body " in s. 79 (1), which effected the dissolution or disappearance of the chartered corporation of the hospital, and, therefore, prima facie, rights given to the corporation remained in the corporation, but the trust instrument must under s. 60 (1) " be construed as authorising or . . . requiring " the trustee " to apply the trust property . . . for the purpose of making payments . . . to the board of governors."

Decision of HARMAN, J. (ante p. 43), reversed.

[FOR THE NATIONAL HEALTH SERVICE ACT, 1946, see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Vol. 39, p. 515.]

APPEAL by the Board of Governors of the Royal Cancer Hospital from an order of HARMAN, J., dated May 11, 1949, and reported ante p. 43. The originating summons was issued to determine inter alia whether on the true construction of the will of the testatrix and of the National Health Service Act, 1946, (a) the right to receive shares of the residuary estate of the testatrix bequeathed by her will to the Royal Cancer Hospital (Free) and the Cancer Research Institute (i) was vested in the Minister of Health under s. 6 of the Act, or (ii) was vested in the board of governors under s. 7 of the Act ; or (b) the trustee of the will was required to apply the shares in paying the capital and income thereof to the board of governors under s. 60 of the Act ; or (c) the shares (i) were held on some other, and, if so, what, charitable trusts, or (ii) were undisposed of and passed as on the testatrix's intestacy. HARMAN, J., held that neither s. 6 nor s. 7 nor s. 60 applied to the bequests and that they were outside the scope of the Act, but that there had been no lapse and, therefore, the shares should be applied so as to give effect to the testatrix's charitable intent under the Sign Manual. The Court of Appeal now held that s. 60 applied, and that the trustee was, therefore, required to apply the shares in paying the capital and income to the board of governors. The facts and relevant statutory provisions appear in the judgment of SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R.

Ungoed-Thomas, K.C., and H. E. Francis for the Board of Governors of the Royal Cancer Hospital.

J. A. Armstrong for the trustee.

A. F. M. Berkeley for the Ministry of Health.

The Solicitor-General (Sir Frank Soskice, K.C.) and D. B. Buckley for the Attorney-General.

The persons entitled on intestacy were not represented before the Court of Appeal.

SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R. : By her will dated June 18, 1948, Mrs. Mabel Alicia Kellner appointed the plaintiff in the present action, Mr. Blundell, her sole executor and trustee. After certain pecuniary legacies she devised and bequeathed all her real and personal estate not otherwise disposed of and of which she was capable of disposing to her trustee on the administration trusts expressed in Form 8 of the Statutory Will Forms, 1925. In cl. 5 she proceeded to direct her trustee to stand possessed of the resulting investments and cash on trust to divide the same equally between eight named charities of which the first were the Cancer Research Institute, Fulham Road, and the Royal Cancer Hospital (Free), Fulham Road. Mrs. Kellner died on June 23, 1948, and her will was duly proved by the executor therein named on July 31, 1948.

The question that has arisen in the action is in regard to the effect on those testamentary dispositions of the National Health Service Act, 1946. That Act was passed on Nov. 6, 1946, some eighteen months or more before Mrs. Kellner made her will, but nothing, as it has turned out, depends on that fact. The appointed day—that is, for present purposes the day on which the Act came into operation—was July 5, 1948, a date, be it observed, after the death of Mrs. Kellner, but before the probate of her will. The parties to the present proceedings, apart from the plaintiff executor-trustee, were, when the matter was before the learned judge, (i) the board of governors of the Royal Cancer Hospital (which is a body corporate, the creation of the National Health Service Act, 1946), (ii) the Ministry of Health, (iii) Mrs. Norah Cox, who was joined as representing the testatrix's next of kin, and (iv) His Majesty's Attorney-General representing the general interests of charity. In this court Mrs. Cox does not appear. Her claim to participate as next of kin was negatived by the learned judge. She has not herself given any notice of appeal and the matter proceeds in her absence.

The real question, put briefly and, I hope, sufficiently accurately, is whether the terms of the Act of 1946 specifically provide for the destination of Mrs. Kellner's bounty to the Royal Cancer Hospital (Free), and, if they do not, how the property given to that charity should now be disposed of. The learned judge took the view that the Act failed to comprehend this particular gift, but came to a conclusion in favour of the argument of the Attorney-General that there was here a charitable intention to which effect could and should be given by directing the administration of the bequest under the Sign Manual. I think it is important at the outset to observe that, in my judgment, the body corporate designated by the testatrix, the Royal Cancer Hospital (Free), has not (or, at least, has not been proved to have) ceased to exist. I mention that matter at once because, unfortunately, the point does not appear to have been debated in the court below, and, the learned judge having concluded that the corporation had ceased to exist, his general conclusion on the terms of the Act was, naturally, affected by that view. But, as I have indicated, I think that the corporation must be taken still to exist. No one in this court has, indeed, suggested the contrary. The exhibits in the case include a copy of the charter which was granted in 1910 and incorporated the charity which had existed ever since 1851. It would, I think, be surprising if, by some chance phrase in an Act like this Act of 1946 a corporation incorporated by royal charter was wholly dissolved. Such a view is, indeed, inconsistent, if I may anticipate the reference I shall make to the Act presently, with the terms of s. 77 of the Act itself.

The charter provides that the president and governors for the time being shall be a corporation with perpetual succession, and the purposes of the charter also indicate that the management of the affairs of the hospital will be in the hands of a committee of management. I think the distinction between the corporation, on the one hand, and its committee of management, on the other hand, may be of importance when I come to deal with the terms of the Act itself, but I emphasise at the outset of my judgment that, in my view, this corporation has not been dissolved. As I have said, that difference in conclusion in regard to the existence of the old corporation may well underlie the difference in the result at which I arrive from that which commended itself to the learned judge.

I must now turn to the relevant sections of the Act, and I am happy to say that, for myself, I have not found a perusal of these sections so melancholy an experience as did the learned judge, nor do I arrive at so negative and depressing a conclusion. Nor do I think, for myself, that the legislators, and, more particularly, the draftsmen, deserve the very severe strictures which the learned judge directed against them in his consideration of the terms of this statute. The first section, taking in numerical order the sections to which it is necessary to refer, is s. 6. That was the section which directed the transfer to the Minister of Health of, among other things, the hospitals, in the sense of the physical things, the buildings and their equipment, and of what one might describe as the going concerns of those institutions. The terms so far as relevant of s. 6 (1) are :

> " Subject to the provisions of this Act, there shall, on the appointed day, be transferred to and vest in the Minister . . . all interests in or attaching to premises forming part of a voluntary hospital . . . and in the equipment, furniture or other movable property used in or in connection with such premises, being interests held immediately before the appointed day by the governing body of the hospital or by trustees solely for the purposes of that hospital, and all rights and liabilities to which any such governing body or trustees were entitled or subject immediately before the appointed day, being rights and liabilities acquired or incurred solely for the purposes of managing . . . or otherwise carrying on the business of the hospital . . . but not including any endowment within the . . . next following section . . . "

Assuming for the moment that the rights arising under the will in the present case are not excluded as being an " endowment " within the meaning of the next following section, are they covered by the language which I have read ? I am content to take as part of my judgment the statement of HARMAN, J., of what the rights of the hospital, or those representing or claiming to represent the hospital (I am deliberately using inconclusive terms), were. He said (ante p. 48):

> " . . . the rights of the residuary legatees are rights to have the estate of the testatrix administered according to law, either by the personal representatives or by the court, and on completion of the administration to have the balance remaining in the executors' hands distributed in due proportions ".

Are those rights covered by the section ? Are they, in particular, covered by the words

> " rights . . . to which any such governing body . . . were entitled . . . immediately before the appointed day, being rights . . . acquired . . . solely for the purposes of managing " the hospital ? The learned judge concluded that as a matter of plain English those words were not apt to cover such a right as was conferred by the present benefaction, and I entirely agree with him.

I think the matter is not one on which it is possible or useful to dilate, and I, therefore, pass to the next question—whether those rights which I defined by reference to the learned judge's judgment are covered by the terms of s. 7, which deals with endowments as forecast by s. 6 (1). To make the matter more clear, I should state that we are here dealing with a teaching hospital. Under an order made pursuant to the Act on Apr. 7, 1948, by the Minister of Health, known as the National Health Service (Designation of Teaching Hospitals (No. 2)) Order, 1948 (S.I., 1948, No. 979), the Royal Cancer Hospital, was designated a teaching hospital. Section 7 deals specifically, among other matters, with the "endowments" of teaching hospitals and their destination differs from the destination of "endowments" of other voluntary hospitals, but for the purpose of this judgment I think it is unnecessary to go through the whole matter and to explain how in the case of the different kinds of hospitals what are described as endowments are dealt with.

Section 7 (1), dealing with teaching hospitals, provides :

> "Where any voluntary hospital to which the last foregoing section applies is, before the appointed day, designated by the Minister . . . as a teaching hospital . . . all endowments of the hospital held immediately before the appointed day shall on that day, by virtue of this Act, be transferred to and vest in the board of governors constituted under the following provisions of this Part of this Act for the teaching hospital."

I will in due course deal with the constitution of the board of governors there referred to, being the first defendants in this action, but, first, to complete my analysis of s. 7 I turn to sub-s. 10, which sets out what is meant by "endowment". I preface it by recalling that under the later definition section, s. 79, the word "property" unless the context otherwise requires includes "rights". Sub-section 10 provides :

> "In this section the expression 'endowment,' in relation to a voluntary hospital, means property held by the governing body of the hospital or by trustees solely for the purposes of that hospital, being property of the following descriptions—(a) interests in or attaching to land other than the premises referred to in sub-s. (1) . . ; (b) shares, stocks, bonds, debentures and other securities, and any other personal property held by way of an investment ; (c) money, including any credit in a banking account ; (d) rights under any bill of exchange, promissory note or gratuitous covenant for the payment of money."

There is a proviso the reading of which I will for the moment postpone. It is, I think, plain that the four types of property specified show that the word "endowment" is used in a sense much wider and less precise than the sense in which that word is commonly used, meaning something which is treated as a capital asset, not itself to be spent, but the income of which is to be applied from time to time for the purposes for which the endowment was given. "Endowment" here is wider than that, but is it wide enough to include rights of the type here dealt with ? There is no evidence that there is any land involved in this case, but I am not satisfied for myself that, even if there were, it would be possible to bring in the rights here in question under para. (a) for the simple reason that, assuming the assets of the testatrix included land, the beneficiaries under the will would have no rights to or in that specific asset. The argument in favour of the application of s. 7 has really turned on para. (b), and, particularly, on the words "any other personal property"—and I insert "including rights"—"held by way of an investment". Again I share entirely the view of the learned judge that that phrase, as a matter of plain English, does not cover rights of this kind, and that to speak of rights of this kind as being "held by way of an investment" is to abuse the ordinary sense of the words which have been used. Even if it could be said that the rights given by this will were brought within one or other of the paragraphs I have read, or would otherwise be brought within any of those paragraphs, I also agree with HARMAN, J., that they would be excluded by the terms of the proviso, which is as follows :

> "Provided that an equitable interest held for the purposes of a voluntary hospital in trust property in which there are other equitable interests shall not be deemed to be an endowment of that hospital."

It is not, in the view I have taken, necessary to decide it, but it seems to me that the rights which the hospital or those representing it have are fairly covered by the phrase " equitable interest held for the purposes " of the hospital " in trust property ", viz., the testatrix's assets in which other equitable interests also subsist, namely, the interests of the other individual legatees.

The result, therefore, so far is that I share the view which HARMAN, J., expressed, that neither s. 6 nor s. 7 covers this case. The conclusion as regards s. 6 defeats the claim of the Ministry of Health, and counsel for the Ministry has said that since he has served no cross notice it would not really in any case be open to him to argue the contrary. At any rate, I take it that the Minister is satisfied with the result as regards s. 6.

It was, I think, at this point that the gloom descended most heavily on the learned judge. I think he was oppressed by his feeling that since ex concessis the old chartered corporation had gone the result was to leave at this stage entirely in the air, so to speak, the bequest under the terms of the will, but, before coming to the solution of the remaining problem (namely : Is the bequest affected by other and later sections of the Act ?), it is necessary that I should mention those sections of the Act establishing the existing board of governors and that I should also refer to the later sections which deal with the position of the incorporated or voluntary hospitals and the committees or boards of management of those old hospitals after the change which this Act introduces. I can deal with these matters quite briefly. Section 11 (8) of and sched. III to the Act provide in this case—and, as I say, I think it is not necessary to deal at length with the whole matter—for the establishment of a board of governors for each of the designated teaching hospitals. As a matter of fact, we were told that the individuals who compose the board of governors, who are some twenty odd persons, are largely but not exclusively the same persons as formerly managed the old corporation. That, however, is a matter of interest rather than of relevance. The new body is by the terms of the schedule made a corporation, and its name is the Board of Governors of the Royal Cancer Hospital, that is the first defendant. The Board of Governors of the Royal Cancer Hospital is an entity quite different from and distinct from either the Royal Cancer Hospital (Free), the old chartered corporation, or the governing body of that corporation, namely, the old committee of management.

Section 77 provides :

> " (1) Where at the passing of this Act there is in force a . . . charter containing provisions appearing to the Minister either to be inconsistent with any of the provisions of this Act or to be redundant . . . the Minister may by order . . . " repeal, amend or alter the charter. Sub-section (2) is to the effect that any provision of a charter which defines or limits the objects of a hospital to which s. 6 applies (and this is such a hospital) would cease to have effect in so far as that limiting provision would be inconsistent with the objects defined for the hospital by the Act. I refer to s. 77 because, as I have intimated earlier, the presence of such a section would prima facie be inconsistent with the view that automatically any pre-existing chartered corporation disappeared and was dissolved altogether as the result of the passing of this Act and the transfer under s. 6, or other sections of the Act, of the assets and property of the old corporation to someone else. It appears that the Minister has not yet made any order amending or repealing the terms either of this charter or, as far as we know, other charters, and I will assume that there are good reasons for that not having been done so far.

I must then make a reference to s. 78 because there is one part of that section which the learned judge particularly relied on in support of his view that the old corporation had gone. It provides :

> " (1) The following bodies, that is to say . . . (c) governing bodies of voluntary hospitals transferred to the Minister by virtue of this Act whose functions wholly cease in consequence of this Act ; shall as from the appointed day be dissolved . . . "

The governing body is defined by s. 79 (1) as meaning in relation to a voluntary hospital " any body, whether corporate or unincorporate, having the control and management of the hospital ", etc. The learned judge, I think, read that section as saying : " The chartered corporation, being now functus officio, has gone ". I think it may well be that the old committee of management (who I am disposed to think are covered by the definition of " governing body "), since they are functi officio, have been dissolved, but, in my judgment, there is nothing in s. 78 (1), coupled with the definition paragraph which (at any rate on the evidence in this case) has the effect that the old chartered corporation has been dissolved and has disappeared. That has this result, that, if property, by bequest or otherwise, is given to the corporation, however that property should now be administered, it still remains in the corporation unless there is something in the Act which takes it away from the corporation and transfers it to somebody else. If either s. 6 or s. 7 had applied, one would have had that result. The property would have been taken away from the hands of the old corporation and put into the new hands designated by the relevant section. I pause here to note that where those sections do apply, it is also provided that in the new hands the property transferred is free from the old trusts, but at the same time provision is made to the effect, putting it quite broadly, that so far as conditions allow the property will be administered consistently with, or so as not to disregard more than the circumstances require, the old trusts which affected it.

Therefore, in approaching the final and the only point on which I venture to disagree with the learned judge, the position is, as I have stated, that prima facie the property or rights, being given to the corporation, remain in the corporation. The result, if that is right, has led in the course of the argument to alternative suggestions. Either the property or the rights belonging in this way to the old corporation remain in the old corporation but are dealt with or disposed of by virtue of s. 59, or s. 60 comes into play and has the effect of transferring from the corporation to the newly created board of governors the rights which Mrs. Kellner left to the hospital. Of those two alternatives, I myself conclude in favour of the latter, and it is unnecessary for me to say anything on the former. I think that s. 60 does fit the case and, I would add, fits it, to my mind, aptly. The terms of the section are, so far as relevant :

> " (1) Where property, other than property transferred to the Minister or to the board of governors of a teaching hospital . . . under s. 6 or s. 7 of this Act, is held on trust immediately before the appointed day, and the terms of the trust instrument authorise or require the trustees, whether immediately or in the future, to apply any part of the capital or income of the trust property for the purposes of any hospital to which s. 6 of this Act applies [i.e., any old voluntary hospital] the trust instrument shall be construed as authorising or, as the case may be, requiring the trustees to apply the trust property, to the like extent and at the like times, for the purpose of making payments, whether of capital or income—(a) in the case of a hospital designated as a teaching hospital . . . to the board of governors of that teaching hospital . . . ".

Sub-section (2) makes s. 60 in this respect parallel, so to speak, with the earlier sections :

> " Any sums paid as aforesaid to any such board [of governors] . . . shall, so far as practicable, be applied by them for the purposes specified in the trust instrument."

Before I deal with the argument which counsel for the Attorney-General put forward in favour of the view that this section does not apply, it is, I think, proper to observe that s. 60 occurs in pt. VI of the Act, a Part beginning with s. 52 and headed "General". The fasciculus of sections containing s. 60 may, I think, be treated as beginning at s. 57 where there is a cross-heading: "Administrative provisions". It was the view of the learned judge that s. 60, if A it applied at all, must be applied by a kind of side wind, since, when regard is had to the place in the Act where it is found and applying the well-known doctrine that a thing should be recognised by its associates, it is not in its place the sort of section which you could treat as properly intended to cover this kind of case. On that ground the learned judge referred to the attempt of counsel for the board of governors to seize this section to his comfort as being a last resource— B a tabula in naufragio. With all respect, I do not accept that criticism. I think it might, perhaps, have been of assistance to those charged with the administration of this Act if, in the earlier Part of the Act dealing with the transfer of property, there had been some reference to or forecast of the later general sweeping up provisions giving powers to the boards and trustees, and so on, of which this section is part, but it does not seem to me an inappropriate place in C the last Part of the Act called "General" to find provisions of a general character which operate, and, I think, were intended to operate, to bring in, among other things, classes of property not dealt with by the specific provisions as to transfer in the earlier part of the Act. However that may be, on its language I hold that s. 60 does cover and covers precisely this case.

Counsel for the Attorney-General has said that the language used postulates D four tests for the application of this section. I agree, but I think the tests are satisfied. First, according to counsel, there must be identifiable property. I think there was. I think the property was the estate of Mrs. Kellner. Secondly, he says, that property must be held on trust immediately before the appointed day. Though there was at one time some hint of an argument that the fact that probate had not been taken out until after the appointed day might make a E difference, that suggestion has not been pursued, and it seems to me true to say that the estate of Mrs. Kellner was held on trusts which were operative immediately before the appointed day. The matter is not one which requires elaborate argument, but, if that property was not held on operative trusts at that date, how was it held? I think the posing of that question provides the necessary answer. It was held, not as anybody's absolute property, F but on trust in the sense that someone was bound to apply those assets in the due course of administration, and, subject to the statutory obligations thereby imposed, to apply the residue in accordance with Mrs. Kellner's testamentary dispositions. Thirdly, says counsel, the trust must be constituted by a trust instrument. As regards that, if it is meant that the whole of the trusts, i.e., the whole of the duties affecting this property, must necessarily be found in G a single trust instrument as commonly understood, namely, a will or settlement, I do not think that is a requisite of the section. If the trusts which affected this property at the relevant date were partly the statutory duties imposed by the Administration of Estates Act, 1925, and partly the trusts imposed by the will, the latter were comprehended by the former, and the former were in fact expressly introduced into the latter, it may be that the Administration of Estates Act, H 1925, can itself properly be regarded as a trust instrument. Certainly there is nothing which, according to ordinary principles, would necessitate there being but one trust instrument, but it is, I think, sufficient to say that there were at the relevant date trusts affecting this property and that such trusts are to be found in part at least in the testatrix's will. Finally, says counsel, the trusts must be of a kind indicated by s. 60 (1), that is (referring again to the language) the trust instrument must > future, to apply any part of the capital or income of the trust property for the purposes of any hospital . . ."

There was some discussion, in which we were assisted by the Solicitor-General, as to the meaning of that phrase "apply any part of the capital or income . . . for the purposes of any hospital". It was pointed out by Vaisey, J., during that discussion that, were it not for the words "authorise or require", it might be said that the phrase "apply . . . for the purposes of" was not apt to cover the case of direct payment, but, since there is here a reference both to authorising and also to the imperative "requiring", it seems to me that the phrase is quite naturally apt to cover applications in the sense of payment direct to the hospital or to the hands which receive on the hospital's behalf as persons absolutely entitled. It seems to me, therefore, that the sub-section when it is analysed covers both aptly and precisely this case.

If that is so, that is, of course, the end of the matter. The learned judge, when he dealt with this part of the argument, said (ante p. 49):

> "The context of this section requires that the word 'property' should not here include rights, for that which is dealt with is something to be applied for the benefit of (among others) a board of governors. The rights vested in the board of governors here cannot be applied by someone else for their benefit."

With all respect, I venture to think that the learned judge misdirected himself by regarding the property held on trust as being the rights vested in the beneficiaries under the will instead of looking at the assets vested in the executor on trust for the hospital and other beneficiaries. It may be, as I have said more than once, that he was led to this approach by his consideration that the old chartered corporation had gone, so that the only persons who could have any "rights" would be the new board of governors. Once that assumpton is made, I am inclined to agree that the application of the section becomes more complex and artificial, but it seems to me that one must regard the "property held on trust" as being the assets in the hands of the executor subject to the trusts statutory or testamentary on behalf of, among others, the existing chartered corporation. I, therefore, have formed a different view from that entertained by the learned judge on this section for the reasons which I have tried to express, and I think that s. 60 does apply.

The result is that we must now construe the section, not as requiring the plaintiff after completion of his administration to apply or pay an appropriate share of the trust property over to the old chartered corporation, but as requiring him to apply the trust property to the same extent, i.e., to the extent of an equivalent share, to the board of governors of the teaching hospital now known as the Royal Cancer Hospital. If that is so, it follows, in my judgment, that the appeal is entitled to succeed and that counsel for the board of governors is entitled to the declaration which he seeks that the property—that is, the relevant share of the residuary estate—is now payable to the Board of Governors of the Royal Cancer Hospital.

SOMERVELL, L.J.: I agree. I do not wish to add anything to what has been said about the inapplicability of s. 6 and s. 7. With regard to the learned judge's observations based on the fact that this section occurs in pt. VI, I would like to say that, if one looks at the headings of all the other Parts of the Act and then asks oneself the question: Assuming that there is some provision to cover a case of this kind on the basis that it is not an endowment under s. 7 or property transferred to the Minister under s. 6, where would one expect to find it? Having regard to the structure of the Act there is only one answer and that is pt. VI. Therefore, that portion of the learned judge's reasoning does not affect my construction of this section. Nor do I follow when he says (ante p. 49):

> "... the expression 'the trust property' means the residue of the estate, and the question is whether the terms of the trust instrument (i.e., the will) require the trustee (i.e., the plaintiff) to apply a part of the capital for the purposes of the Cancer Hospital. In my judgment, this language is wholly inappropriate, and the section has nothing to do with the case."

That is a very concise statement, but I do not agree with it. On the examination to which s. 60 has been subjected by the Master of the Rolls I find no difficulty in coming to the conclusion that the section covers this case. What the position would have been if it had not, it is unnecessary to consider. I agree with what has been said as to the old corporation remaining in existence. It might have been a question of some difficulty to decide what is to happen when the charity named in the will is having its functions or a substantial part of them carried on by another body, but it is unnecessary to consider that. I think this case clearly falls under s. 60, and for those reasons I agree that the appeal should be allowed.

VAISEY, J. : I am of the same opinion. I agree that s. 60 of the Act is not inaptly placed in the sequence of sections, and does, in fact, cover the present case on a proper interpretation of its terms. Whether it was the primary intention of the legislature that it should have that effect may be doubted. There are, in my judgment, some types of cases to which s. 60 obviously and indisputably applies. Its application to the present case is only to be discovered by a microscopic examination of its terms, though I am myself entirely satisfied that the result of that examination is as indicated by my Lord. I am to this extent, but only to this extent, in agreement with the criticisms directed by HARMAN, J., against the draftsmanship of the Act, that I think the point might without any great difficulty have been dealt with in somewhat less cryptic language.

Appeal allowed. Declaration that the trustee is bound to apply the shares in paying the capital and income thereof to the board of governors under s. 60. Costs of the Attorney-General and of the trustee as between solicitor and client to be paid out of the shares of residue concerned.

Agent—Commission—Estate agent—Contract to pay commission " in the event of business resulting "—Need for conclusion of binding contract—Prospective purchaser of property introduced—Contract for sale subject to purchaser's " being able to arrange a mortgage."

Estate agents wrote to the owner of a hotel inquiring on behalf of a client whether he was prepared to dispose of his interest in the property and adding : " We are not being retained in this matter, and presume that in the event of business resulting we can look to you for the usual scale commission authorised by the recognised institution." In his reply the owner said : " Last paragraph of your letter quite understood." The firm introduced to the owner one G., who signed an agreement under which he undertook to buy the property for £35,000 subject to his " being able to arrange a mortgage " of £25,000 if the owner were not desirous of lending that sum on first mortgage debenture of a proposed private company secured on the premises at four per cent. per annum interest. The owner subsequently changed his mind, and paid G. £1,550 in order to be released from the agreement. The estate agents claimed commission from the owner.

HELD : the words " in the event of business resulting " imported that a right to commission would accrue only when the agents introduced a person who entered into a binding contract to purchase the property, and, as the agreement with G. amounted at most to a contract that he would use his best endeavours to raise the necessary money, a binding contract to purchase had not been concluded, and the agents were not entitled to the commission.

ACTION for commission on a contract for the sale of a hotel.

The plaintiffs, Murdoch Lownie, Ltd., were estate and property agents suing on a contract, entered into with them by the defendant, John Arthur Newman, the owner of a hotel, which provided for the payment by him to them of commission " in the event of business resulting " from the introduction of a prospective purchaser of the premises. The defendant signed an agreement with a person introduced by the plaintiffs for the sale of the hotel for £35,000, subject to the prospective purchaser's " being able to arrange a mortgage of " £25,000. Later, the defendant changed his mind and paid £1,550 to the prospective purchaser to induce him to release him from the agreement. SLADE, J., held that the agreement between the defendant and the prospective purchaser was not such a binding contract as was necessary to constitute " business resulting " from the introduction of the prospective purchaser by the plaintiffs and gave judgment for the defendant. The facts appear in the judgment.

Astell Burt for the plaintiffs.

Cartwright Sharp, K.C., and Neil Lawson for the defendant.

SLADE, J. : The plaintiffs in this action, Murdoch Lownie, Ltd., are estate and property agents. The defendant, Mr. John Arthur Newman, was at all material times, and I believe still is, the freeholder of the Shore Hotel, East Wittering, near Chichester. He is, and was also at the material times, the managing director of a company called Shore Hotel, Ltd. I was told that at the end of 1947 and beginning of 1948, Shore Hotel, Ltd., occupied the Shore Hotel under a tenancy agreement (the terms of which did not emerge) from the defendant as the freeholder. The plaintiffs claim from the defendant £707 10*s*. 0*d*. commission in respect of a contract for the sale of the Shore Hotel. If they are entitled to recover commission from the defendant, it is conceded that £707 10*s*. 0*d*. is the sum which they are entitled to recover.

Four questions arise for consideration : (i) What was the contract between the plaintiffs and the defendant ? (ii) What, on the true construction of that contract, was the event on the happening of which the right to commission accrued to the plaintiffs ? (iii) Did that event happen ? (iv) Was the party who was admittedly introduced by the plaintiffs to the defendant an able purchaser, actual or prospective, according to what I find the contract to require ?

With regard to the first question—" What was the contract between the parties to the action ? "—on Sept. 17, 1947, the plaintiffs wrote to the defendant as the proprietor of the Shore Hotel :

> " Dear Sir, re Shore Hotel, East Wittering. We have been asked by a special client of ours to inquire whether you are prepared to dispose of your A interests in the above hotel. The purchaser is well acquainted with the above premises and would be very willing to make a special journey from London to inspect the property. We are not being retained in this matter, and presume that in the event of business resulting we can look to you for the usual scale commission authorised by the recognised institution."

The defendant replied (omitting immaterial words) : " Last paragraph of your B letter quite understood." The construction of those two letters is purely a matter of law, and, in my judgment, the contract was that the plaintiffs were to be entitled to commission on the scale recognised by the professional institutions in the event of business resulting through their efforts, or, in other words, if they were the effective cause of business resulting. That is the answer to the first question for my consideration.

C I now come to the second question : " What, on the true construction of that contract, is the event on the happening of which the right to commission accrues to the plaintiffs ? " Three constructions were put before me in the course of the argument. Taking them in ascending order they were that the right to commission accrued (a) on the introduction by the plaintiffs to the defendant of a party who was ready, willing and able to purchase the property on terms D acceptable to the defendant, the vendor ; (b) on the introduction by the plaintiffs to the defendant of a party who entered into a binding contract with the vendor for the purchase of the property ; and (c) on the introduction of a party who not only entered into a binding contract for the purchase of the property, but who actually completed the purchase. Counsel for the plaintiffs contended that (a) was the proper construction of the contract, and alternatively, if he failed E on that, that (b) was the proper construction. Counsel for the defendant, on the other hand, contended that (c) was the proper construction, or, if he failed on that, that the proper construction was (b).

In support of construction (a), counsel referred me to a case decided in the Court of Session in Scotland, Dudley Bros. & Co. v. Barnet (1). In that case the operative words of the contract between the agents and the principal as found F by the courts were " in the event of business resulting through our efforts ", and, in my judgment, those words are indistinguishable from the words of the contract as I have found it in this case. If, therefore, I felt myself able to follow the decision of the Court of Session in that case, I should hold that (a) was the proper construction of the contract with which I have to deal. I find myself, however, unable to follow the construction put on those words by the G Court of Session. That any decision of the Court of Session is of the greatest persuasive authority goes without saying, and it equally goes without saying that I differ from such an authority with the greatest diffidence. I would, however, observe that Dudley Bros. v. Barnet (1) was decided in 1937, three years before Luxor (Eastbourne), Ltd. v. Cooper (2) was heard in the House of Lords. Dudley Bros. v. Barnet (1) came first before the sheriff-substitute, H who decerned in favour of the pursuers, holding that, as the pursuers had fulfilled their part of the agreement by introducing a purchaser who was able and willing to implement his contract, the defender was not entitled without just cause to defeat their claim for commission by refusing to complete the contract. The sheriff, on appeal from the sheriff-substitute, recalled this judgment on the ground that, as a contract for sale had not been finally adjusted, the pursuers were entitled only to reasonable remuneration for their services. The Court of Session, on further appeal, recalled the interlocutor of the sheriff and restored the judgment of the sheriff-substitute, holding that an agreement had been concluded by the pursuers and the defender, whereby the pursuers were entitled to commission on finding a purchaser who was willing to complete a formal contract of sale. The Court of Session construed the contract as meaning that the event on which the pursuers' right to commission accrued was merely the finding of a purchaser who was willing to complete a formal contract of sale. The word "purchaser" there must, of course, mean "potential" or "prospective purchaser." A The Court of Session found further that it was an implied term of this agreement that the defender should not, by refusing to complete such a contract, prevent the pursuers from earning their commission and that, as the defender, by preferring another purchaser, had made completion of the contract impossible, the pursuers were entitled to damages, the proper measure of which in the circumstances was the commission which they would have earned had the B contract of sale been completed.

The finding of the implied term and the right to damages would be incompatible with the law of England since the decision of the House of Lords in Luxor's case (2), but the first difficulty I find in understanding the decision of the Court of Session is why, on the view which they took of the matter, the pursuers were not entitled to commission as opposed to being entitled to damages. If the event C on which their right to commission accrued was the mere introduction of a ready, able and willing purchaser, i.e., a person who was prepared to purchase on terms acceptable to the vendor as opposed to a person who had entered into a contract to do so, then it seems to me, in the events which the court found to have happened, they were entitled to commission and not damages. In dealing, however, with the true construction of the contract between the parties D in that case, i.e., the construction of the words which, as I have already said, I find indistinguishable from the words used in the present case, the Lord Justice-Clerk (Aitchison) said (1937 S.C. 637):

> "The immediate question is—What was the contract of employment between the pursuers and the defender, particularly what was meant by the words 'in the event of business resulting through our efforts' in the E pursuers' letter of Nov. 9? I think that these words meant and were intended to mean that, in the event of the pursuers finding a purchaser of the defender's lease within the terms of their employment as agents, the usual scale commission would become payable by the defender to the pursuers in respect of the transaction. The agreement for sale would no doubt be 'subject to contract' F as understood in the law of England, which parties are agreed to mean that the matter remains in negotiation as between seller and purchaser until a formal contract is settled and the formal contracts are exchanged. It will be necessary to consider later whether the refusal of the defender to complete the contract between the purchasers and himself, assuming a contract to have been made, excludes the commission contracted to be paid by the defender to the pursuers as his agents." G

The first observation I would make on that passage is that the Lord Justice-Clerk, in using the words "finding a purchaser", must have meant "finding a person who was ready, willing and able to become a purchaser", because the word "purchaser" used in the context of a contract between principal and agent has now been held by the House of Lords to mean at least a person who actually H enters into a binding contract to purchase, and no binding contract was entered into in the case of Dudley Bros. v. Barnet (1). A little later on the Lord Justice-Clerk says (ibid., 638):

> "The pursuers had succeeded in introducing to the defender a purchaser for his lease upon terms which fell within their employment as agents. The case may be put higher. The pursuers having acted within their authority as agents, an agreement for the sale of the lease had been entered into > between Hurst and Sandler and the defender, subject to contract. As the defender has since preferred another purchaser after the pursuers had introduced Hurst and Sandler, the question is whether the defender is liable to the pursuers in payment of the commission stipulated in the contract."

Again the expression in that passage " agreement for the sale of the lease had been entered into subject to contract " shows that the word " agreement " cannot mean " contract ", because an agreement subject to contract in English law is merely an agreement to make an agreement and has no contractual force. The learned Lord Justice-Clerk proceeds (ibid.) :

> " We take the case upon the footing, which was hardly disputed, that Hurst and Sandler were ready and willing and able to enter into and complete a formal contract with the defender, and that the defender has declined to do so without cause assigned except that he had another purchaser. The question is whether the commission is payable in these circumstances. Treating the question as purely one of construction of the contract between the pursuers and the defender I think, as I have already said, that ' business resulting ' just meant finding a customer who was able and willing and ready to take on the terms authorised by the defender, and did not mean in the event of a sale going through to completion. In the latter sense business did not result, but that was due to the refusal of the defender to carry events to completion, and was not due to any failure of the pursuers to perform their employment, which in fact they had performed as agents of the defender."

I find myself unable to accept that construction of the words " business resulting."

In Luxor's case (2) LORD RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN, in the course of his opinion, said ([1941] 1 All E.R. 46) :

> " If, according to the true construction of the contract, the event has happened upon the happening of which the agent has acquired a vested right to the commission (by which I mean that it is debitum in praesenti, even though only solvendum in futuro), then no act or omission by the principal or anyone else can deprive the agent of that right. Until that event has happened, however, the agent cannot complain if the principal refuses to proceed with, or carry to completion, the transaction with the agent's client. I have already expressed my view as to the true meaning of a contract to pay a commission for the introduction of a purchaser at a specified or minimum price. It is possible that an owner may be willing to bind himself to pay a commission for the mere introduction of one who offers to purchase at the specified or minimum price, but such a construction of the contract would, in my opinion, require clear and unequivocal language."

I emphasise those last words, with which I respectfully agree. It is not infrequently the case that a prospective vendor employs several agents to bring him into business relations with prospective purchasers. If the contract which he entered into with those agents entitled them to commission on the mere introduction by them of persons who were ready, willing and able to purchase the property on terms acceptable to the vendor, it would mean that if, say, five different agents introduced five different persons all of whom were ready, willing and able to purchase the property from the vendor at, for example, the same price or any other price acceptable to the vendor, the vendor would become liable to pay commission to each of those five agents. It is, as LORD RUSSELL says, possible that a vendor might be rash enough to enter into that kind of contract with an agent, but at least the language in which he does so should be, as LORD RUSSELL said, " clear and unequivocal."

In my judgment, the words " in the event of business resulting " are neither clear nor unequivocal. Indeed, I go further and say that they are ambiguous, and, as the argument in this court shows, susceptible of at least three possible constructions. They are, moreover, the words of the plaintiffs themselves, and, if all other canons of construction failed, I should construe them by resolving any ambiguity in favour of the principal and against the agent who proffered them. I do not, however, find it necessary to employ the legal maxim applicable to cases of that kind in the present case, because I am satisfied that the words " in the event of business resulting " on their true construction require at least that the right to commission shall not accrue until the agent has introduced to the principal a person who has entered into a binding contract to purchase the property. I shall deal later with what I mean by " a binding contract to purchase the property." I am fortified in my view that the words " in the event of business resulting " are by no means unequivocal by reference to later passages in the agreed correspondence which seem to me to indicate that the plaintiffs themselves were not sure what the words meant.

I now come to the third question : Did that event happen, i.e., did the plaintiffs introduce to the defendant a party who entered into a binding contract to purchase the property ? I use the word " property " instead of " Shore Hotel " because there was certain other property dealt with besides the Shore Hotel. On this question it was admitted by counsel for the defendant that the plaintiffs introduced a Mr. Graham, and it is common ground that there resulted from that introduction by the plaintiffs the execution of a document dated Dec. 17, 1947. It, therefore, becomes necessary to see whether that document constituted a binding contract to purchase the property. That again may be sub-divided into two questions : (i) Is the document a contract at all ? (ii) If it is a contract, is it a contract—because the term " binding contract " means nothing more than " contract "—to purchase the property ?

Counsel for the defendant did not dispute that the document would have been a binding contract to purchase the property if it had stopped at cl. 9 instead of proceeding to cl. 10. There are three parties to the document, the Shore Hotel, Ltd.,—that is really the defendant's company—who are called " the company," the defendant, and Mr. Graham, called " the purchaser," being the gentleman admittedly introduced by the plaintiffs. By cl. 1 the company agreed to sell and Mr. Graham agreed to purchase what I may compendiously describe as the goodwill and contents of the Shore Hotel for the sum of £2,500. That £2,500 included the stock of wines and spirits and consumable dry stock up to a maximum value of £500. Any dry stock which might be there at completion over and above the value of £500 was to be taken over at a valuation and paid for in addition to the £2,500. By cl. 2 the defendant agreed to sell and Mr. Graham agreed to purchase the freehold of the Shore Hotel for the sum of £35,000. That is to say, the total money which would have to be found on completion, excluding any dry stock over the £500, was £37,500, payable as to £2,500 to the company and as to £35,000 to the defendant, credit, of course, being taken for the deposit of ten per cent. on £37,500 which was paid on the signing of the document. As I shall have to deal hereafter with the question of a mortgage, I note that cl. 3 of the document required that " a good marketable title to the freehold property shall be given." Clause 4 provided for the deposit which I have just mentioned and fixed the date for completion as Mar 1, 1948. Clauses 5, 6, 7 and 8 are not material. By cl. 9 the company agreed to take all the necessary steps to enable the purchaser to incorporate a private company embodying the name " Shore Hotel."

I now come to the important clause, cl. 10 :

> " If Mr. Newman [the defendant] shall not be desirous of lending the sum of £25,000 on first mortgage debenture secured upon the subject-matter of this contract at a rate of four per cent. per annum interest then this contract is subject to the purchaser being able to arrange a mortgage of like amount."

That clause calls for careful consideration. The first thing to notice is that there is no contractual obligation on the defendant to lend £25,000 or any other sum, either at four per cent. per annum or at all. Secondly, if he is desirous of lending it, it is not to be lent to Mr. Graham. It is to be lent on first mortgage debenture. A debenture presupposes the existence of a limited liability company, and it seems clear from cl. 9 that the intention was that Mr. Graham should form a company, obtaining the permission of the existing company, Shore Hotel, Ltd., for the use of that name by the new company. Thirdly, A there is no obligation on the defendant to notify Mr. Graham at any time whether he is or is not desirous of lending the sum of £25,000 to a company if a company were formed, i.e., there is no greater duty on the defendant to notify than there is on Mr. Graham to inquire. I infer from cl. 10—and the inference, indeed, was borne out by the evidence—that Mr. Graham is saying to the defendant: "I cannot find £35,000 myself. I can only find £10,000. The remaining £25,000 B must be found by means of a mortgage. If you are desirous of becoming the mortgagee, well and good, provided you are prepared to accept four per cent. per annum interest and a company to be formed by me as the mortgagor. If you are not, well I must obtain the mortgage elsewhere."

It is, of course, clear from cl. 10 that there is only one way in which the defendant can make this document a contract binding on Mr. Graham to purchase the C property on its terms. That is by himself lending the £25,000 to the company to be formed or even to Mr. Graham himself at four per cent. per annum interest. The clause specifies the loan, as I have pointed out, to a company, but the same purpose would, no doubt, be achieved if the defendant were willing to lend the £25,000 to Mr. Graham personally. I have already emphasised that that is an act which the defendant is under no contractual obligation to perform. If D the defendant is not prepared to do that, what happens? Counsel for the plaintiff has argued with considerable force that this document is, on any view of it, contractual, because, if the defendant is not desirous of lending the money himself, it at least imposes an obligation on Mr. Graham to use his best endeavours to raise the £25,000 on mortgage elsewhere, and without deciding the point—because I find it unnecessary to do so—I will assume in favour of the plaintiffs E that the document is contractual in that sense. But, as I have said, I construe the words "business resulting," the event on which the plaintiffs' title to commission is to accrue, as requiring at least that the person introduced by them—i.e., Mr. Graham in this case—shall enter into a binding contract to purchase. You do not enter into a binding contract to purchase by merely entering into a binding contract to use your best endeavours to raise the necessary money F to enable you to do so.

I find, therefore, that this document does not bind Mr. Graham to purchase the property, that is to say, either the property of the company, Shore Hotel, Ltd., or the freehold property belonging to the defendant; in other words, I find that the execution of this document did not constitute "business resulting." Whatever the expression "binding contract" may mean, it must, in my view, at G least mean a contract which is binding on the party introduced by the agent so that the principal gets something definite from the party introduced by the agent in return for the commission which he is called on to pay. In some of the reported cases a binding contract is looked on from the point of view of whether it binds the vendor. I think that "binding contract" means a contract which binds both parties, i.e., which is a contract and is clothed with the H necessary form required to make it an enforceable contract in law. But whether that be so or not, I am satisfied that the expression envisages a contract which, as against the party introduced by the agent, the vendor is entitled to have specifically performed or for whose breach he is at least entitled to recover damages. In the case of this document it is manifest that the defendant may say nothing and that Mr. Graham may make no inquiry up till the date fixed for completion, and may even not have taken the necessary steps by that date to form a company to become mortgagor to the defendant. That date may arrive and the defendant may attend with his solicitor at the place fixed for completion, only to be met by Mr. Graham with the statement: "I am sorry. I have done my very best to find a mortgagee, but I have not been able to do so." On any view of the matter, it is a highly unsatisfactory position from the point of view of the defendant, and, in my judgment, not the position which was contemplated by the words: "You shall pay us commission in the event of business resulting." What business can be said to have resulted from that state of affairs?

[His Lordship said that this really concluded the case. In view, however, of the possibility of appeal he reviewed the evidence upon the fourth question—whether Mr. Graham would in fact have been able to raise the necessary mortgage in time—and held that he was not satisfied that Mr. Graham could have done so. He, therefore, gave judgment for the defendant.]

Justices—Maintenance order—Discharge—"Resumption of cohabitation"—Decree of divorce granted to wife—Parties subsequently living together—Discretion of justices—Summary Jurisdiction (Separation and Maintenance) Act, 1925 (c. 51), s. 2 (2).

By s. 2 (2) of the Summary Jurisdiction (Separation and Maintenance) Act, 1925: "Where a married woman with respect to whom an order has been made under the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895, resumes cohabitation with her husband after living apart from him, or where she has before the date of the commencement of this Act so resumed cohabitation, and is at that date cohabiting with him, the order shall cease to have effect on the resumption of such cohabitation or at the commencement of this Act, as the case may be."

The parties were married in 1935, but later they separated, and on Sept. 18, 1946, a maintenance order of £2 a week was made against the husband. On Apr. 21, 1947, the wife obtained a decree absolute dissolving the marriage, but in November, 1947, the parties lived together again, and on Nov. 26, 1947, the wife wrote to the justices asking them to stop proceedings which were pending for enforcement of arrears under the order and stating that the parties intended to re-marry. On March 25, 1948, the parties having quarrelled, the husband married the woman named in the wife's divorce suit, but by agreement he paid to the wife the sum of 30*s.* a week until May, 1949. On an application by the husband to discharge the order of Sept. 18, 1946, on the ground that it had ceased to have effect under s. 2 (2) because the wife had resumed cohabitation with him in November, 1947.

Held: (i) section 2 (2) contemplates a resumption of cohabitation by a married woman with a husband to whom she is then married and not a cohabitation between parties who are no longer married because their marriage has been dissolved, and, therefore, the order did not cease to have effect by reason of the provisions of the sub-section.

Bragg v. Bragg ([1925] P. 20), distinguished.

(ii) on the facts, however, the order of Sept. 18, 1946, had been abandoned by the wife on Nov. 26, 1947, and, therefore, it should be discharged.

APPEAL by a husband against a decision of the Blackburn borough justices on Aug. 24, 1949, dismissing his application to discharge an order for maintenance made on Sept. 18, 1946, in favour of the wife. The Divisional Court now allowed the appeal, the facts of which appear in the judgment of LORD MERRIMAN, P.

C Ormrod for the husband.

The wife was not represented.

LORD MERRIMAN, P. : This is a husband's appeal against a decision of the Blackburn borough justices, given on Aug. 24, 1949, whereby they dismissed his application for the discharge of an order made on Sept. 18, 1946, in circumstances which are, so far as I know, unprecedented.

D There is no serious dispute on the facts. The husband's application was based before the justices and here on the allegation that the wife, in whose favour the order had been made, had resumed cohabitation with the husband within the meaning of s. 2 (2) of the Summary Jurisdiction (Separation and Maintenance) Act, 1925. Section 2 (2) provides :

> " Where a married woman with respect to whom an order has been made under the [Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895] resumes cohabitation with her husband after living apart from him, or where she has before the date of the commencement of this Act so resumed cohabitation, and is at that date cohabiting with him, the order shall cease to have effect on the resumption of such cohabitation or at the commencement of this Act, as the case may be." F

That sub-section gives a plain indication of the alternative dates as from which the order is automatically to be vacated, and the wording is to be contrasted with the wording of s. 7 of the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895, which clearly contemplates some substantive application, for the last sentence of that section reads as follows :—

G

> " If any married woman upon whose application an order shall have been made under this Act, or the Acts mentioned in the schedule hereto, or either of them, shall voluntarily resume cohabitation with her husband . . . such order shall upon proof thereof be discharged."

When these two parties began to reside together under the same roof and to H have sexual intercourse with each other, as admittedly occurred, continuously between November, 1947, and the end of March, 1948, their status was that the marriage had been dissolved by a decree absolute pronounced on Apr. 21, 1947. Nevertheless, it is argued that this living together in November, 1947—a decision avowedly taken with a view to a possible re-marriage—can properly be described as the case of a married woman with respect to whom an order has been made resuming cohabitation with her husband after living apart from him. The same argument, admittedly, would have been addressed to us had the intended re-marriage preceded the so-called resumption of cohabitation. It is argued that, if it is possible, as was decided in Bragg v. Bragg (1), for a woman, who, by reason of the dissolution of her marriage, has ceased to be a married woman and has ceased to be able to describe as her husband the man who was her husband at the time of the making of the maintenance order, to continue to hold such an order, it inevitably follows that for all purposes of the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Acts, wherever the words " husband " and " wife " occur, A the parties continue the relationship of husband and wife, although that status has been dissolved. That is a startling proposition which seems to require examination.

The marriage of these parties took place in 1935. On some date between then and 1946 a separation occurred. On Sept. 18, 1946, the wife obtained an order for £1 for herself and 10*s*. for each of her two children. On Feb. 4, 1947, she B obtained a decree nisi against her husband on the ground of his adultery with a named woman. On some date after that there must have been a variation of the order in the husband's favour, because in November, 1947, a fresh order was made restoring the maintenance to the original amount, namely, £1 for the wife and 10*s*. for each of the two children. It is worthy of note that this variation was made some nine months after the decree absolute of divorce. Shortly after that C order was made the parties came together. The husband was a sick man, the wife took pity on him and received him into her home, and it is plain that, not merely did they sleep together as man and wife, but that re-marriage was discussed and contemplated by both parties. However, towards the end of March, 1948, the parties quarrelled, and for a short period, while they were still living under the same roof, they ceased to occupy the same bedroom. On Mar. 25, D 1948, the husband, having left the wife's home, married the woman named in the wife's divorce suit.

It was that period of living together which is said by the husband automatically to bring about a cesser of the effect of this order because it constituted a resumption of cohabitation within the meaning of s. 2 (2) of the Summary Jurisdiction (Separation and Maintenance) Act, 1925. When the parties came together in E November, 1947, proceedings were pending for enforcement of arrears under the order, but on Nov. 26 the wife wrote to the clerk to the justices a letter in which she said :

> " With reference to the letter my former husband has received ordering him to appear in court on Dec. 30, I wish to notify you that I would like to F drop the case against him. He came to me a week ago in a terrible condition. He was so ill that I took him in my home and looked after him. He is still here, and is quite unable at the moment to maintain me. He will not be fit for work for a week or two yet, but when he is we have decided to re-marry and make a fresh start. I want you to notify the magistrates of my decision and to excuse my husband's non-appearance."

Plainly, that letter suggests that while both parties and the court had up to that moment treated this order not merely as a live order notwithstanding the divorce six months before, but as a proper subject of a variation, the wife then regarded the order and all proceedings under it as at an end. Point is added to that view of the matter by what happened when, in March, 1948, they parted. Here again, it is clear that there was a discussion between the parties about the H wife's maintenance in future. There was no suggestion that either the wife or the husband regarded the order as still being in force, but a fresh agreement was made for the sum of 30*s*. a week, and that sum was punctually paid week by week, with one exception, from Apr. 2, 1948, to May 21, 1949. The exception was that for the week ending May 22, 1948, the husband deducted 6*s*. for income tax. This evoked a violent protest from the wife in a letter dated May 26, 1948, in which she says :

> "I am not willing to pay your tax and my own as well. If the full amount is not received by me this week-end the matter will go to court, and then your separate source of income will be stopped . . . I do not want any further correspondence. If I receive the 30*s.* a week you promised, without any deductions whatsoever, you will receive the [income tax] statement you asked for. If, on the other hand, I receive less than 30*s.* this week-end I A will place the matter in the hands of my solicitor, and will have no further dealings with you except through him."

That letter is utterly inconsistent with the idea that the original order, as varied, was regarded as being still in force. By the second variation, restoring it to its original figure, the full amount would have been £2. I emphasise that for a reason which will later become apparent.

B To conclude the facts, in January, 1949, while the husband was still paying the 30*s.* a week punctually, the wife became ill and found it hard to make ends meet. She did not go to court to ask for any increase of the order on the ground that it was now insufficient. On the contrary, on Jan. 19, 1949, she wrote to her husband and asked him to lend her some money to see her through, adding : "I cannot pay out of 30*s.* a week." Finally, in the week ending May 28, 1949, C the husband reduced payment from 30*s.* to 15*s.* and continued that payment until shortly before these court proceedings. The wife reacted unfavourably against this reduction, and in a letter about the husband seeing the children she refers to the fact that he is not supporting them.

That brings me to a consideration of Bragg v. Bragg (1), a case which has consistently been followed in this court, though I am not aware that it has ever D been considered by a higher court. It is, perhaps, not unimportant to bear in mind that Bragg v. Bragg (1) was decided on s. 7 of the Act of 1895, unamended by the Act of 1925. It was a decision, therefore, given on a section which contained, inter alia, the words :

> "If any married woman . . . shall voluntarily resume cohabitation with her husband . . . such order shall upon proof thereof be discharged."

E Without the necessary application to the court and proof of the fact before the court this Act by itself did not discharge the order. With regard to that section the learned stipendiary magistrate had decided in a considered judgment that the mere fact that the marriage had been dissolved did not automatically vacate or discharge a maintenance order obtained by a wife. Towards the end of his F judgment he stated ([1925] P. 22) :

> "I am of opinion that the court has a discretion in these cases, and should not exercise it against a woman who has subsequently obtained a divorce, unless some good cause is shown for such exercise."

Dealing with that argument, SIR HENRY DUKE, P., says (ibid., 24) :

> G "There are grounds of common-sense why an order which dealt with maintenance and not with the general obligations of married life should continue to subsist. That, however, does not conclude the matter at all. It is still necessary to see what are the limits of the justice's jurisdiction. Mr. Frampton [for the husband] made a shrewd remark, which went to the root of his own case. He said that the decree absolute had put an end ipso H facto to the magisterial order, and that the appellant had only gone to the magistrate to call his attention to the fact and to get him to make an order discharging the previous order. Well, if the previous order had ipso facto been discharged, the magistrate, of course, had no jurisdiction to do anything. If it had not been discharged, then the discharge of it depends upon s. 7 of the Act of 1895. As my brother [HORRIDGE, J.] pointed out, the appellant is put into rather a dilemma by the two arguments addressed to us : If the order is discharged ipso facto there is no jurisdiction of the > magistrate to entertain this summons ; if the order is not so discharged, there is a discretionary jurisdiction."

The effect of the decision in Bragg v. Bragg (1) is that it is a matter of discretion whether or not, in the circumstances of any given case, to discharge, as against a wife whose marriage has subsequently been dissolved, an order made while she was the wife of the husband. This court, however, has said over and over again that that is not a discretion to be exercised arbitrarily or capriciously. It must be exercised judicially. This has been said in at least three reported cases, namely, Mezger v. Mezger (2), Kirk v. Kirk (3) and Wood v. Wood (4). In Mezger v. Mezger (2), where the magistrate had refused to discharge an order because the marriage had been dissolved in a foreign country on grounds not recognised by English law and also because the wife's financial position required the continuance of the maintenance, it was held that acting on either of those grounds could not possibly amount to a judicial exercise of the discretion. The same thing was held by this court in Kirk v. Kirk (3), where there had been a Scottish divorce, the husband being a domiciled Scotsman, though the maintenance order had been made in England at a time when, during the marriage, an English court of summary jurisdiction had jurisdiction over the case, and it was held there, reversing the justices, that the proper exercise of the jurisdiction was to leave the wife to such remedy by way of maintenance as she had in the Scots. courts. In Wood v. Wood (4) this court reversed a decision of justices refusing to vary an order when, again, they had, in effect, come to their decision solely on the ground that the wife needed the money. In other words, the case was covered by Mezger v. Mezger (2) in principle. I ought to add that they had completely ignored the essential fact that it was the case of a wife who had been divorced on the ground of her own adultery. In all those three cases this court exercised its own discretion on the ground that it did not consider that the justices had exercised a judicial discretion in such a way that it ought not to be interfered with.

In the present case the only point with which the justices have dealt is that regarding resumption of cohabitation. With regard to that they say :

> " We are of opinion that the resumption of cohabitation contemplated by s. 7 of the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895, and s. 2 (2) of the Summary Jurisdiction (Separation and Maintenance) Act, 1925, means a resumption of cohabitation as man and wife by a husband and wife—a resumption of the consortium. The parties were not husband and wife when they lived together from November, 1947, to March, 1948. A suggestion was made that the resumption of cohabitation might in any case be a mere pretence on the part of Mr. Prest, seeing that he married Mrs. Parker so soon after leaving Mrs. Prest. In view of the decision we had already arrived at, we did not consider that matter."

It is argued that that decision is wrong in law. I think it is right. Because some positive act on the part of the court is required to vacate an order on the ground of dissolution of marriage between spouses in respect of whom the order was made, more particularly when one bears in mind that Bragg v. Bragg (1) was decided under s. 7 of the Act of 1895, and because the original wife and the original husband are treated as being husband and wife for the purpose of the exercise of the discretion whether to continue or to discharge an existing order, it does not seem to me to follow, when a later statute lays down the conditions on which an existing order is automatically vacated, whatever steps may subsequently be necessary to give effect to the automatic cesser of the effect of the order, that for the purposes of the section laying down these conditions parties who are no longer husband and wife in law are to be taken to come within the words " a married woman with respect to whom an order has been made under the principal Act resumes cohabitation with her husband after living apart from him." There does not seem to me to be any necessary logical connection between the two things, and I decline to hold that this order was automatically vacated when the wife and the husband began living together again with a view to being re-married. It seems to me to be making nonsense of the whole thing. On the other hand, in my opinion, there is a ground on which these justices ought to have discharged this order in the exercise of their discretion. I do not blame them for not exercising it in this way, for they appear only to have been asked to deal with the suggested construction of s. 2 (2) of the Act of 1925. Nevertheless, we have the full facts before us, as they did. In my opinion, there was no warrant for keeping this order alive from the moment when the wife wrote the letter of Nov. 26, 1947, to the clerk to the justices. She meant by that letter, as I have suggested, that the order was terminated, and she made that still clearer by the arrangements made when the temporary association between her and her former husband came to an end a few months later. I cannot think that a belated attempt on the eve of these proceedings to re-invoke the existence of the order ought to weigh in the balance. It is a clear case, on the facts, for the exercise of the justices' discretion in only one way, and that is to discharge this order, which had, by both spouses, been regarded as a dead letter ever since November, 1947. At any rate, I think that this court has not only the right but also the duty to exercise its own discretion and that in so doing we are unfettered by any exercise of the justices' discretion, because they have never, apparently, even considered this point. That being so, this appeal, in my opinion, should be allowed, but for the reasons I have stated and not for the reasons on which the appeal was based.

ORMEROD, J. : I agree. The argument put forward by counsel for the husband appears to be as follows. Section 2 (2) of the Summary Jurisdiction (Separation and Maintenance) Act, 1925, provides that where a married woman with respect to whom an order has been made under the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895, resumes cohabitation with her husband after living apart from him, the order shall cease to have effect on the resumption of cohabitation. It is argued that, as s. 7 of the Act of 1895, with which s. 2 (2) of the Act of 1925 must be read, may be applied although the marriage has been dissolved, the provisions of s. 2 (2) should also be so applied, and, if a man and a woman who have been husband and wife, but whose marriage has been dissolved, live together again, there is a resumption of cohabitation within the meaning of the section and any order made in favour of the wife during the subsistence of the marriage can no longer have effect. I can see no justification for this argument. Such a couple merely come and live together in the same way as any other unmarried couple who may choose to live together at any time. Any children born as a result of the association, unless the parties subsequently re-married, would be illegitimate, and I find it impossible to say that what occurred here was a resumption of cohabitation by a wife with her husband. I think, therefore, the reasons given by the justices for their decision are clearly right, but at the same time, I agree with my Lord, for the reasons which he has set out in his judgment, that this is a case where the justices should have exercised their discretion, and, therefore, this appeal should be allowed and the order set aside.

Appeal allowed ; order set aside.

By Jan. 19, 1948, all the goods had been sold, and the proceeds, amounting to £15,619 10*s.* 10*d.*, were received by the defendants and paid into their banking account, being there mixed with their own moneys. Various sums were paid to the plaintiffs, leaving, according to the plaintiffs, £9,269 0*s.* 1*d.* to be accounted for. The plaintiffs had been informed that on Mar. 26, 1948, the defendants had withdrawn from the banking account £15,510 in notes which had been paid to W. for a certain purpose. W. absconded with the money, and in due course the police recovered £10,800 of the notes and they were handed to the liquidator of the defendant company, or to the company itself, which had meanwhile gone into liquidation and was insolvent. The plaintiffs claimed in the action a declaration that they were beneficially entitled to a charge for £9,269 0*s.* 1*d.* on the £10,800 recovered, in priority to all interests of the defendants, or, alternatively, that they were entitled, to the exclusion of the defendants, to £9,269 0*s.* 1*d.*, part of the said £10,800. To be able to trace items through the defendants' banking account, the plaintiffs now sought, before delivering a statement of claim, discovery of the bank pass-sheets of the account from Dec. 24, 1947, to Mar. 27, 1948.

Held : if the order for discovery were not made, it was almost certain that substantial amendments would be required later of the statement of claim, because only the defendants knew what dealings there had been with the money of which they were alleged to be trustees, and the circumstances were exceptional, warranting the exercise of the court's jurisdiction under r. 14.

Procedure Summons for an order that the defendant deliver to the plaintiff copies of certain pass-sheets of the defendants' banking account prior to the delivery of the statement of claim, and for extension of time for the delivery of the statement of claim. On the facts, which appear in the judgment and are summarised in the headnote, Wynn-Parry, J., held that the circumstances were exceptional and that the jurisdiction to make the order, which the court possessed under R.S.C., Ord. 31, r. 14, should be exercised.

J. L. Arnold for the plaintiffs.

J. V. Nesbitt for the defendants.

WYNN-PARRY, J. : This is a summons in the action asking for an order against the defendant company for a limited discovery, namely, the discovery of the bank pass-sheets of the company, which is now in liquidation, covering the period from Dec. 24, 1947, to Mar. 27, 1948. The exceptional nature of the application is that it is made before the delivery of any statement of claim in the action, the writ in which was issued on May 5, 1949.

On Dec. 24, 1947, a considerable number of bottles of whisky were warehoused in the name of the plaintiffs but under the control of the defendants in the sense A that, according to the plaintiffs' case, the defendants were given the documents of title relating to the whisky with endorsements in blank as fiduciary agents on behalf of the plaintiffs to sell the whisky. Between that date and Jan 19, 1948, the whole of the stock of whisky was sold and the proceeds, amounting to £15,619 10*s.* 10*d.*, were received by the defendants and paid into their banking account, being there mixed with their own moneys. Between February and March, B 1948, various sums are said to have been paid by the defendants to the plaintiffs, leaving in March, 1948, according to the plaintiffs, £9,269 0*s.* 1*d.* to be accounted for. On Mar. 26, 1948, as the plaintiffs had been informed, the defendants withdrew from the banking account in question £15,510 in £5 notes which were paid over to a Mr. White for some specified purpose with which I am not concerned. In fact, Mr. White absconded with the money and he was subsequently C apprehended, prosecuted, and convicted. In November, 1948, the police had recovered £10,800 of the original £5 notes which, according to the plaintiffs' information, were handed over by the police to the defendants or the liquidator and are now held to await the outcome of the present action. The plaintiffs' claim in the action is for a declaration that the plaintiffs are beneficially entitled to a charge for the sum of £9,269 0*s.* 1*d.* which I have mentioned on the sum of £10,800 D in bank notes received from the police, in priority to all interests of the defendants in such sum of £10,800, and, alternatively, the plaintiffs claim a declaration that they are entitled to the exclusion of the defendants to £9,269 0*s.* 1*d.*, part of the £10,800 received from the police, and the plaintiffs claim as consequential relief all necessary accounts and inquiries. It is clear, the defendant company being in liquidation, and, as I understand, insolvent, that an action merely for E an account would be of little, or insufficient, avail to the plaintiffs and it is for that reason that the plaintiffs seek in effect to trace through the banking account and to fasten on the sum of £10,800 recovered by the police and handed over in the circumstances which I have mentioned.

The summons, as I have said, asks for the limited disclosure of the relevant bank pass-sheets of the account in question between Dec. 24, 1947, and Mar. 27, F 1948, and asks that that discovery may be ordered at this stage prior to the delivery of the statement of claim on the ground that the plaintiffs' counsel is not in a position, before such discovery, to deliver a satisfactory statement of claim, or, indeed, any other document than one which must be subject to very substantial amendment. The jurisdiction invoked is conferred by R.S.C., Ord. 31, r. 12 and r. 14. By r. 12 it is provided :

G

> " Any party may, without filing an affidavit, apply to the court or a judge for an order directing any other party to any cause or matter to make discovery on oath of the documents which are or have been in his possession or power, relating to any matter in question therein. On the hearing of such application the court or judge may either refuse or adjourn the same, if satisfied that such discovery is not necessary, or not necessary at that H stage of the cause or matter, or make such order, either generally or limited to certain classes of documents as may, in their or his discretion, be thought fit. Provided that discovery shall not be ordered when and so far as the court or judge shall be of opinion that it is not necessary either for disposing fairly of the cause or matter or for saving costs."

Rule 14 provides :

> " It shall be lawful for the court or a judge, at any time during the > pendency of any cause or matter, to order the production by any party thereto, upon oath, of such of the documents in his possession or power, relating to any matter in question in such cause or matter, as the court or judge shall think right ; and the court may deal with such documents, when produced, in such manner as shall appear just."

A It will appear from a mere reading of r. 14 that there must be jurisdiction in the court to make the order asked for if the court should be so minded, and that that interpretation of the rule is correct is borne out by Gale v. Denman Picture Houses, Ltd. (1). There the plaintiff had been the controller of one of the departments of the defendant company. A quarrel arose between him and the defendant company as to whether or not he had ceased to be a director. The plaintiff by his solicitors asked the defendants for a copy of certain minutes relating to an B exchange of shares on an amalgamation, the effect of such exchange being, in the contention of the defendants, an answer to the plaintiff's case. That being refused and the writ having been issued, the plaintiff, before delivering his statement of claim, applied on summons for directions that the defendants should forthwith give him copies of their minutes relating to exchange of shares. The master made an order in favour of the plaintiff which, with slight variation, was confirmed C by MacKinnon, J. The defendants appealed to the Court of Appeal who reversed the order on the basis that the court would not, save in very exceptional circumstances, order a defendant to produce documents in his possession before the plaintiff had delivered his statement of claim, but the court, which consisted of Scrutton and Lawrence, L.JJ., made it clear that jurisdiction to accede to the application was vested in them. They emphasised, however, that the jurisdic- D tion was one which should be sparingly used and only in exceptional circumstances, and they made it clear that they did not regard the circumstances of the particular application as being very exceptional. Without quoting in extenso from their Lordships' judgments, it is, I think, sufficient to refer to a passage from the judgment of Lawrence, L.J., where he says ([1930] 1 K.B. 592) :

> E " Before delivering his statement of claim he [the plaintiff] applied for the production by the defendants of certain minutes of directors' meetings at which he had been present. I have listened in vain for any statement by counsel that the production of these minutes is essential to the statement of the plaintiff's claim. So far as I can see there is no difficulty in the way of the plaintiff stating his claim without the production of those minutes, F though I appreciate that they may have an important bearing upon the question whether the claim is well founded or not. It may well be that after the statement of claim and the defence have been delivered, production of the minutes will not be resisted. At the proper stage of the action all documents relating to any matters in question will have to be discovered. I however deprecate the idea that a plaintiff, after issuing a writ and before G delivering his statement of claim, can apply for discovery. This is entirely contrary to the practice, and such an application should be discouraged."

When the learned lord justice said that he deprecated the idea that a plaintiff, after issuing a writ and before delivering his statement of claim, should apply for discovery, I take him to mean that he only considered that such an application could properly be made in exceptional circumstances and not, as is suggested, H that no such application could in any circumstances be made, because, at the opening of his judgment, he said (ibid., 591) :

> " The jurisdiction of the court to order discovery at any stage of an action is undoubted."

He went on to point out that it was the settled practice of the court not to make an order before the delivery of the statement of claim save in the most exceptional circumstances.

The only question, therefore, which arises for consideration on this summons is whether or not the circumstances of this case are so exceptional as to warrant a departure from what undoubtedly is the settled practice, namely, not to order any discovery, however limited, prior to the delivery of the statement of claim. It has been asserted by counsel for the plaintiffs and it has been admitted by counsel for the defendants that, at any rate so far as can be seen at this stage A of the proceedings, the documents for which discovery is called are documents which at some stage of the action must be the subject of discovery. Counsel for the defendants has with force pointed out that that circumstance of itself affords no guide for making an exceptional order for discovery prior to the delivery of the statement of claim, but it is a point which, in my view, it is relevant for the court to take into consideration. It is manifest that, in such a case as this, time B and costs will be saved if I make the order asked for. I state that because I wish to make it clear that the decision which I have arrived at is not grounded on that reason. I have clear direction both from the relevant rules and from authority that I must discover exceptional circumstances before I can make the order asked for, however strongly every dictate of common sense may press on me the advisability of making it.

C This action, as I have pointed out earlier, is an action to trace. There can be no doubt that, as regards the earlier circumstances, no difficulty stands in the way of the pleader of the statement of claim in setting out clearly, fully, and intelligibly the case on which he relies, and counsel for the plaintiffs quite rightly does not for one moment quarrel with that. There can be no doubt that the claim can be fully stated down to the point where the defendants received D the proceeds of the sale of the whisky and mixed it with their own moneys. From that point onwards different considerations appear to me to arise. It has been urged on me by counsel for the defendants that he is entitled to know what the plaintiffs' case is before any discovery is given. With that as a general proposition I have not the slightest quarrel, but on the other hand, it is urged on me by counsel for the plaintiffs that, although he agrees with what I have E said that he can plead with sufficient particularity up to the point where the proceeds of the sale of whisky were mixed by the defendants in their account, thereafter his statement of claim must in the nature of things be of the sketchiest possible character and one which almost certainly will require amendment, and probably substantial amendment, when the documents in question, the few relevant bank pass-sheets, are later discovered in the action. In my judgment, F there is great force in that submission.

I have had the advantage also of hearing counsel's sketch of the form which the later paragraphs of his statement of claim would have to take in the present circumstances if the order asked for were not made. In my view, a judge is entitled to draw on his own experience as a pleader in addition to considering and weighing the opposing views of the two pleaders before him, and I entertain G not the slightest doubt that the true conclusion is that, if the order asked for is not made, then, unless a miracle of speculation is achieved by the pleader of the statement of claim in the present circumstances, most substantial amendments will have to be made, and this because of the peculiar and unusual nature of the cause of action and the circumstance that, on the allegation, which is the foundation of the action, that the defendants were trustees of the money H in question for the plaintiffs, the defendants, and the defendants alone, know what dealings have taken place with that money. I am, therefore, constrained to the view that this is an exceptional case and one in which I ought to exercise the jurisdiction which I undoubtedly have and make the order asked for.

Rent Restriction—Excessive charge for furniture—" Dwelling-house to which the principal Act applies "—First letting under Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1939—Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1923 (c. 32), s. 9 (1). A

In 1947 the landlords granted a five years' lease of a dwelling-house on condition that the tenant purchased from them certain furniture at a price £585 in excess of its reasonable value. The house had not been previously let, and the provisions of the Rent Restrictions Acts applied to it because its rateable value was below the £100 limit laid down by the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1939, s. 3 (1) (a). B Subsequently the tenant brought proceedings under the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1923, s. 9 (1), to recover the sum of £585 as money required to be paid " as a condition of the grant . . . of a tenancy of a dwelling-house to which the principal Act applies."

Held : the phrase " dwelling-house to which the principal Act applies " C in s. 9 (1) meant a dwelling-house within the economic limits laid down by the Acts, and there was no compelling reason to read the words as meaning " a dwelling-house already let as a separate dwelling-house " ; accordingly, the provisions of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1923, s. 9 (1), applied in the case of first lettings ; and the tenant was entitled to recover the money which he had paid in excess of the reasonable value of the furniture. Appeal of the landlords from a judgment of His Honour Judge Hargreaves, sitting at the West London County Court and dated June 22, 1949. The tenant claimed under the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1923, s. 9, the F return of the excess price paid for furniture. The landlords contended that the section did not apply to the first letting of a dwelling-house. The Court of Appeal now affirmed the finding of the county court judge in favour of the tenant and dismissed the appeal with costs. The facts appear in the judgment of Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R.

Marnham for the landlords (appellants). G

Roger Willis for the tenant (respondent).

SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R. : This appeal has raised a question of some novelty, and (like many questions under the Rent Restriction legislation) not free from difficulty, as to the application to the facts of the case of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1923, s. 9 (1), and the Increase of H Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, s. 8, which is brought into play by s. 9 if the latter section does apply. The relevant terms of s. 9 (1) are these :

> " Where the purchase of any furniture or other articles is required as a condition of the grant, renewal, or continuance of a tenancy or sub-tenancy of a dwelling-house to which the principal Act applies, the price demanded shall at the request of the person on whom the demand is made, be stated > in writing, and, if the price exceeds the reasonable price of the articles, the excess shall be treated as if it were a fine or premium required to be paid as a condition of the grant . . . and the provisions of s. 8 of the [Act of 1920], including penal provisions, shall apply accordingly."

Those last words have the practical effect that if the section does apply then the excess of the price demanded or required over the reasonable price is re-
A coverable by the tenant who paid it.

The facts of the present case are not in dispute. The house is one within the London metropolitan area, and it is one of which the rateable value does not exceed the maximum, namely, £100 a year, stated in the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1939, s. 3 (1). The value exceeded the limit specified in the earlier Acts, so that the house was not subject to the application of the B Acts before the passing of the Act of 1939. The house was let by the present landlords to the tenant in September, 1947, for a term of five years. It is conceded that on the occasion—and I use for the moment a somewhat colourless word—of the grant of this lease the landlords demanded in respect of certain furniture which the tenant was obliged to acquire a price in excess by the sum of £585 of its reasonable value. Finally, it appears that this occasion was the first time on
C which these premises were let. I say that because since, as I have already mentioned, the house was brought within the ambit of the Rent Restrictions legislation by the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1939, the standard rent would fall to be determined (according to the amended provisions of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1920, s. 12 (1) (a), by reference, first, to the rent at which the house was let on Sept. 1, 1939, if it
D was so let; failing that, to the rent at which it was last let before that date; and, failing any letting before that date, to the rent at which it was first let after that date. Since we are told that the rent, which was £225 per annum, specified in this transaction of September, 1947, does, in fact, form the standard rent of the premises, I assume that that was the first occasion of the letting of this house. The tenant, having paid for the furniture the sum of £585 in excess of the reason-
E able price, brought the present proceedings to recover that excess in reliance on the application to her case of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1923, s. 9 (1), and before the county court judge she succeeded.

Upon a first reading of the sub-section I confess that, as a matter of ordinary English, it appeared to me reasonably clear that the present transaction is covered by its language. Here was a dwelling-house to which the principal Act
F (i.e., the Act of 1920) applies in the sense that it was a dwelling-house brought within the Rent Restrictions Acts by the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1939, s. 3 (1), its rateable value being below the maximum there stated. Here also was a sum demanded as a condition of the grant of the tenancy, and that sum demanded was in excess of the reasonable price of the articles specified. At a first reading of the section the answer appeared to
G be a reasonably simple one. Counsel for the landlords, however, has raised an argument of some complexity and ingenuity to the contrary effect, and it depends for its validity on the consideration that the term "dwelling-house to which the principal Act applies" in s. 9 (1) of the Act of 1923, on its true interpretation and having regard to other provisions in other parts of the Acts, must mean "a dwelling-house let as a separate dwelling." It was contended that, since when
H the requirement or demand was made, the dwelling-house was not let as a separate dwelling because at that point of time it was not yet let at all, the section does not apply to this case. To that argument there are, as it seems to me, somewhat serious logical objections. If this section means what it says, it must be reasonably obvious that at the date when the impugned requirement is made in a very great many cases the house will not be in the condition of being let. The section deals with a case where, as a condition of the grant of the lease, a demand for a premium in the shape of excessive price for furniture is made.

I agree that in some cases—perhaps many cases—the negotiations and the transaction of the grant of the new lease will take place during an existing tenancy, but the section obviously contemplates that at the time the negotiations and transaction occur there will be no letting, and it will be the letting in question which gives to the house the character of being let.

Counsel for the landlords seeks to overcome that difficulty by saying that where the house has been let so that the Rent Restrictions Acts have, according to his own interpretation, applied to it, then the terms of what has been described as the " enigmatic " s. 12 (6) of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, preserve the characteristic for the house that the Rent Acts still apply to it during periods when it is in fact untenanted. That sub-section is well-known. It provides :

> " Where this Act has become applicable to any dwelling-house . . . it shall continue to apply thereto whether or not the dwelling-house continues to be one to which this Act applies."

I am happy to think that it is unnecessary to attempt any further consideration of the meaning of that sub-section, and I will assume in favour of the landlords that it would provide an answer to the problem in the case of a house that once had been within the Acts by reason (inter alia) of having been let. That, however, does not completely fill up the gap in this argument. The argument is supported, and, at first sight, fairly and reasonably supported, by this consideration. Counsel for the landlords says that the real object of s. 9 (1) of the Act of 1923 is plainly to prevent a landlord, who is prohibited from charging a rent in excess of the standard rent, from achieving that result by a subterfuge or device such as the charge of a premium or a sale of furniture or other articles at an inflated price. Where, therefore, it is argued, as in this case, there is no pre-existing standard rent, there is no logical reason for the application of this section. If the landlords had chosen, instead of charging £225 per annum as rent and £585 too much for the furniture, to charge £500 a year rent and nothing for the furniture (assuming always the willingness of the tenant to pay) they could have done so without any infraction of the Act. There is, however, still this difficulty. A house which first comes within the scope of the Acts as a result of the Act of 1939 may, nevertheless, have its standard rent fixed by reference to a letting long before and at a time when the house was admittedly not controlled by the Acts. For example, if this house, first brought within the Acts in 1939, had been let, say, twenty years ago at £200 a year, that £200 would have been the standard rent, so that, if counsel for the landlords is right in his construction of s. 9 (1), the landlords would have been able by a subterfuge such as the one employed in the present case to get a consideration for the grant of the new controlled letting which was in excess of the real standard rent.

I do not say that these considerations are fatal to the argument, but they do at least remove what might otherwise appear to be a good logical basis for the argument. I must, therefore, proceed to see whether its premise is well founded, namely, that you must read into the words " dwelling-house to which the principal Act applies " the added words " let as a separate dwelling." I must point out that, even if those words must be read in, I am not to be taken as saying that necessarily the argument would prevail, because I still adhere to the view that this section does not contemplate a division of the transaction mentioned into a strict chronological sequence of particular events, but is dealing with it all as one transaction. On the other hand I think that, even if such a division into points of time were permissible, counsel for the landlords would not succeed, because I am not satisfied that for the purposes of this section the court is compelled to insert after the word " dwelling-house " the words " let as a separate dwelling."

I do not wish to take up time by an elaborate analysis of the provisions of these Acts, which have been, in all conscience, often enough considered by the courts, but I point out that the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, s. 12, which states the type of dwelling-house to which the Act applies, uses, in sub-s. (2), the well-known formula : " This Act shall apply to a house . . . let as a separate dwelling . . . " I do not read that subsection as being, in ordinary language, a definition clause. It is stating to what type of house the provisions of the Act would apply, and, when one considers the A purposes of the Act and its main provisions, it is clear that, though it has been said to give a dwelling-house something in the nature of a status, it is concerned to regulate the relationship between someone who can be described as a landlord and someone who can be described as a tenant. That formula has been changed somewhat in the later enactment. The corresponding paragraph in the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1939, s. 3 (1), is that " subject to the B provisions of this section " the principal Acts shall " apply to every other dwelling-house of which the rateable value on the appropriate day did not exceed . . . " There is no reference, be it observed, in that sub-section to the phrase " let as a separate dwelling," but, by s. 7 (1) of the Act of 1939, the definitions contained in s. 16 (1) of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions (Amendment) Act, 1933, are incorporated in the Act of 1939. Section 16 (1) provides :

> C " . . . unless the context otherwise requires, . . . ' dwelling-house ' has the same meaning as in the principal Acts, that is to say a house let as a separate dwelling or a part of a house being a part so let."

Counsel for the landlords says that that compels the court to treat " dwelling-house " as a term of which there is a definition, and so to read into the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1923, s. 9 (1) and any other place where D you find the phrase " dwelling-house " the words " let as a separate dwelling." I cannot think that the change in the formula used in the Act of 1939 can have been intended to have made a vital change in the general conception of the application of the Acts, but, however that may be, like other interpretation clauses it is introduced with the reservation " unless the context otherwise requires."

Counsel for the tenant drew our attention to instances in the legislation in which E the words " dwelling-house to which this Act applies " cannot sensibly mean a dwelling-house that is at the particular point of time in question let as a separate dwelling. Of the examples given, one was the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, s. 9 (1). That section deals with excessive rents in the case of furnished lettings, and it opens with the phrase :

> F " Where any person lets, or has, before the passing of this Act, let any dwelling-house to which this Act applies . . . at a rent which includes payment in respect of the use of furniture . . . "

Bearing in mind that furnished lettings are in general excluded and the terms of the sub-section itself, I think the words " dwelling-house to which this Act applies " in the sub-section can only sensibly mean a dwelling-house within G what I may call the economic limits provided by the legislation. I do not think that the argument of counsel for the tenant is got over by the fact that in Lederer v. Parker (1) the point was made that the provisions of the Act of 1920, s. 12 (2), proviso (ii) (which exclude from the ambit of the Act furnished lettings), are introduced by " save as otherwise expressly provided," and that s. 9 (1) of the Act of 1923 contains an express provision to the contrary. The point H still remains that you find this phrase " dwelling-house to which this Act applies " in a context which makes it reasonably plain that it can only mean a dwelling-house within the stated economic limits. Another example was cited by counsel for the tenant, and I refer to it because it seems to me to be a good one. It occurs in the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions (Amendment) Act, 1933, s. 3 (3). Sub-section (2) deals with the case of a certificate of a housing authority having been obtained certifying that the authority will provide alternative accommodation. Sub-section (3) provides :

> " Where no such certificate as aforesaid is produced to the court, accommodation shall be deemed to be suitable if it consists either (a) of a dwelling-house to which the principal Acts apply. . . "

If there is one thing that must be as plain as that the night follows the day it is that the accommodation deemed suitable must be a house which is open for occupation. To suggest that accommodation shall be deemed to be suitable if it consists of a dwelling-house already let to somebody else who cannot be got out is on the face of it an absurdity. SOMERVELL, L.J., referred during the argument to the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, s. 12 (1) (a) (dealing with standard rent). He indicated that to treat " dwelling-house " always as meaning " dwelling-house let " gives a very peculiar and artificial meaning to provisions for fixing the standard rent by reference to lettings after certain dates. If a house is brought within the Act and the rent is to be fixed at the sum at which it was let after the date at which it was introduced, so to speak, the Act must contemplate the dwelling-house being within the general ambit of the Acts during the period when it is not so let.

Other illustrations might, if time and ingenuity sufficed, be found of similar instances, but the result of what I have said is, to my mind, that, looking at the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1923, s. 9 (1), which is the section applicable here, I can see no compelling reason for reading into this phrase " dwelling-house to which the principal Act applies " an alleged definition which would have the effect of destroying its ordinary rational meaning and also creating logical inconsistencies which one cannot easily attribute to it.

The last point of counsel for the landlords—it is an important one—was that, if there are two views to be taken of this section, the court must prefer that one which avoids a penal consequence. In Remmington v. Larchin (2) a case in this court, it was laid down that the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, s. 8, which is brought into play if the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1923, s. 9 applies, is a penal section, and the principles which found a place in the judgments of BANKES, L.J., and SCRUTTON, L.J., to be applied in the construction of penal statutes are well-known. If there were here a fairly balanced alternative, I think that the duty of the court would unquestionably be to lean to that meaning which avoided a penalty, but, to my mind, the condition for the application of those principles is absent. Here the choice is between a natural and prima facie meaning of the section and a somewhat unnatural and artificial meaning only arrived at by applying an alleged definition provision which is shown to be in many other cases inapplicable. For these reasons I do not think that there is a case for saying that the penalty ought to be avoided and that we must so construe the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1923, s. 9 (1), as to avoid it. I think that the conclusion reached by the county court judge was correct, and I would, therefore, dismiss the appeal.

SOMERVELL, L.J. : I agree, and I do not wish to add anything to the observations which SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R., has made with regard to the various other parts of these Acts which were relied on by the landlords. All I wish to state is my reasons for thinking that the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1923, s. 9 (1), bears a plain meaning and that there is nothing else in the Acts which substitutes any other meaning or throws any doubt on it. I will start with the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, s. 8, of which this is an extension :

> " A person shall not, as a condition of the grant . . . of a tenancy . . . of any dwelling-house to which this Act applies, require the payment of any fine, premium, or other like sum . . . "

I do not think that one can split up the transaction and regard the requirement of the fine as something which precedes the letting. The section contemplates the whole thing being treated as one. If that is so, what must be considered with regard to a dwelling-house is not its status before the transaction is completed but its status under the transaction. If that is right, then no one disputes that under the transaction of the grant of the tenancy and the exaction of the premium the house is let as a separate dwelling to which the Act applies and the rent, if it is a first letting, will be the standard rent. That seems to me to be A the plain meaning of this section, and, for the reasons which have been given, the various provisions in other Acts which have been referred to do not seem to me to displace that meaning, or, indeed, throw any doubt on it. I have used the words of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, s. 8, but the same argument applies to the words of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1923, s. 9 (1) :

> B "Where the purchase of any furniture . . . is required as a condition of the grant . . . of a tenancy . . . of a dwelling-house to which the principal Act applies . . ."

There again the time when you have to consider whether the premises are a dwelling-house within the Acts is that of the transaction resulting in the letting. I think the appeal fails.

C

HODSON, J. : I agree. I have nothing to add to what has been said by my Lords on the meaning of the section. In my judgment, it is quite plain and to adopt any other meaning would be straining the language, to which this court is not compelled by consideration of other sections in the Acts or any authorities interpreting this or any other section.

R. v. KEELER.

[COURT OF CRIMINAL APPEAL (Lord Goddard, C.J., Hilbery and Birkett, JJ.), F November 7, 1949.]

Criminal Law—Sentence—Supervision order—Duty of court to make order in absence of special reasons—Criminal Justice Act, 1948 (c. 58), s. 22 (1).

By s. 22 of the Criminal Justice Act, 1948 "(1) Where a person is convicted on indictment of an offence punishable with imprisonment for a term of two years or more and that person [has been previously convicted of G certain offences] the court, if it sentences him to a term of imprisonment of twelve months or more, shall, unless having regard to the circumstances, including the character of the offender, it otherwise determines, order that he shall for a period of twelve months from his next discharge from prison be subject to the provisions of this section. (2) Where any such order as aforesaid has been made—(a) the offender shall, on his next discharge from H prison and thereafter from time to time, inform the appointed society of his address in accordance with such instructions as may be given to him by or on behalf of the society . . ."

The applicant was sentenced at quarter sessions to eighteen months' imprisonment. The learned chairman stated that he was not going to make a supervision order under s. 22 (1), but he gave no reasons for that decision.

HELD : (i) the words of s. 22 (1) were mandatory ; it was the duty of a court, after imposing the sentence specified in s. 22 (1), to make a supervision order in the absence of special reasons, which, if they existed, ought to be stated; and in the present case an order ought to have been made.

APPLICATION for leave to appeal against a sentence of eighteen months' imprisonment imposed on the applicant at the Kent Quarter Sessions.

In refusing the application, the Court of Criminal Appeal now held that, if it were intended not to make a supervision order under s. 22 (1) of the Criminal Justice Act, 1948, in a case to which that sub-section applied, the special reasons for taking that course must be stated, and in the present case an order should be made.

No counsel appeared.

LORD GODDARD, C.J., delivered the following judgment of the court. The sentence imposed by quarter sessions was quite a proper sentence, but, in imposing it, the learned chairman said :

> " My attention has been drawn to a requirement of the Criminal Justice Act, 1948, which provides in such a case as yours that the court shall make an order requiring you to notify your address to an appropriate society for dealing with the after-care of prisoners, unless, having regard to the circumstances, including the character of the offender, it otherwise determines. In your case, in the exercise of the court's discretion, I do not propose to make such an order."

The requirement of s. 22 (1) of the Criminal Justice Act, 1948, is that a supervision order shall be made unless on certain specified grounds there is reason why it should not be made. We can see no reason in this case why the order should not have been made, and the court desires to say that where a court refrains from making an order under the sub-section it is desirable that they should state the reasons why they are taking that course. We wish to point out that the words of the sub-section are mandatory in the same way as, in the case of certain offences under the Road Traffic Act, 1930, the offender must be disqualified for holding a driving licence in the absence of special reasons. It has been held by the Divisional Court that, if justices in cases under the Road Traffic Act, 1930, refrain from making the order for disqualification they must state what are their special reasons for doing so, that this court may have an opportunity of considering them on appeal. The same considerations apply under s. 22 (1) of the Criminal Justice Act, 1948. It is the duty of a court to make the order unless they find some special reasons for not doing so, and the court ought to state what those special reasons are.

In the present case we asked the learned chairman to tell us what were the reasons, and he gives as a reason for coming to his conclusion one which ought not to have prevailed, namely, that one of the justices

> " . . . suggested to me that the machinery for tracing prisoners who failed to notify their changes of address imposed an embarrassing burden on the society concerned and might tend to undermine relations between the society and the prisoner."

That might have been a matter to be brought to the attention of Parliament when they were making this provision, but we cannot agree that that is a good reason for refraining from making an order which Parliament has said shall be made unless there are special circumstances, including the character of the prisoner, which would justify the justices in not making the order. The order ought to have been made in the present case. In future, we hope that a court which is refraining from making an order under s. 22 (1) in a case in which the provisions of the section would otherwise apply will state the reasons which move them not to make the order. The order in this case must be made.

Application refused.

[Court of Criminal Appeal (Lord Goddard, C.J., Hilbery and Birkett, JJ.), November 7, 1949.]

Criminal Law—Sentence—Corrective training—Supervision order—Power of court to make—Criminal Justice Act, 1948 (c. 58), s. 22 (1), (2).

The appellant pleaded Guilty at quarter sessions to housebreaking and larceny and was sentenced to three years' corrective training, the previous convictions having been admitted and necessary notices proved. No order was made under s. 22 (1) of the Criminal Justice Act, 1948, which requires that where a person is convicted on indictment of an offence punishable with two years' imprisonment or more and certain previous convictions are established, the court, if it sentences him to imprisonment for twelve months or more, shall, unless having regard to the circumstances, including the character of the offender, it otherwise determines, order that he shall be subject to the provisions of the section requiring him after his discharge from prison to notify his address to an appointed society for dealing with the after-care of prisoners.

Held : that s. 22 (1) applied only where a sentence of imprisonment for twelve months or more, and not where a sentence of corrective training, had been passed, and that the order made by the recorder ought to stand.

Appeal against sentence.

The appellant pleaded Guilty at Winchester City Quarter Sessions to a charge of breaking and entering premises and stealing money therein and was sentenced to three years' corrective training. He was a person who could properly be sentenced to corrective training under s. 21 (1) of the Criminal Justice Act, 1948, but the court granted leave to appeal in order that it might consider whether a supervision order under s. 22 (1) should have been made. The court now dismissed the appeal and held that an order under s. 22 (1) could only be made after a sentence of imprisonment, as distinct from one of corrective training, had been imposed.

No counsel appeared.

LORD GODDARD, C.J., delivered the judgment of the court in which he stated the facts and continued : It is clear that this man is eminently qualified for a period of corrective training, and there is no reason to interfere with the sentence of three years' corrective training which the learned recorder passed, but, in passing sentence, the learned recorder refrained from making a supervision order under s. 22 (1) of the Act of 1948. Section 22 (1) provides :

> " Where a person is convicted on indictment of an offence punishable with imprisonment for a term of two years or more and that person—(a) has been convicted on at least two previous occasions of offences for which he was sentenced to Borstal training or imprisonment ; or (b) has been previously convicted of an offence for which he was sentenced to corrective training, the court, if it sentences him to a term of imprisonment of twelve months or more, shall, unless having regard to the circumstances, including the character of the offender, it otherwise determines, order that he shall for a period of twelve months from his next discharge from prison be subject to the provisions of this section."

The court gave leave to appeal because they desired to consider the question whether or not this was a case in which an order under s. 22 (1) should be made, but we think the learned recorder was right in deciding not to make an order because s. 22 (1) only applies if the court sentences a person to a term of imprisonment of twelve months or more, and imprisonment and corrective training are alternative sentences. An offender who is sentenced to corrective training automatically comes under the provisions of sched. III to the Act, which deals with the release on licence of a person sentenced to corrective training or preventive detention, and, therefore, the provisions of s. 22 (1) do not apply. Accordingly, there is no reason to alter the sentence of the learned recorder by making an order under s. 22 (1), and the sentence which was passed on the appellant will stand. The appeal is dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

R. v. ALLEN.

[COURT OF CRIMINAL APPEAL (Lord Goddard, C.J., Croom-Johnson and Lynskey, JJ.), October 13, 1949.]

Criminal Law—Sentence—Corrective training—Notice of intention to prove previous convictions—Proof of service—Averment of convictions in indictment—Sentence set aside—Criminal Justice Act, 1948 (c. 58), s. 23 (1).

By the Criminal Justice Act, 1948, s. 23 (1) : "For the purpose of determining whether an offender is liable to be sentenced to corrective training or preventive detention . . . no account shall be taken of any previous conviction or sentence unless notice has been given to the offender and to the proper officer of the court at least three days before the trial that it is intended to prove the conviction or sentence ; and unless any such previous conviction or sentence is admitted by the offender the question shall be determined by the verdict of a jury."

The appellant pleaded Guilty to a charge of housebreaking at quarter sessions, and, after hearing evidence of his character and previous convictions, the recorder sentenced him to four years' corrective training. Service of the notice of the two previous convictions required under s. 23 (1) before a sentence of corrective training could be passed had not been proved, nor was the appellant asked if he admitted the convictions.

HELD : no proof of the service of the notice required by s. 23 (1) having been given at the trial, the sentence of four years' corrective training must be set aside, and a sentence of four years' imprisonment would be substituted.

Per curiam : The judges of the King's Bench Division have resolved that, although it is not necessary in point of law that indictments should contain any averments with regard to previous convictions, it is desirable that they should do so in order to direct the attention of courts pointedly to the requirements of s. 23 (1).

APPEAL by leave against a sentence of four years' corrective training passed by the recorder at Plymouth Quarter Sessions.

The Court of Criminal Appeal now allowed the appeal on the ground that the provisions of the Criminal Justice Act, 1948, s. 23 (1), had not been observed and substituted a sentence of four years' imprisonment to date from the date of conviction.

Baerlein for the appellant.

LORD GODDARD, C.J., delivered the following judgment of the court. The appellant pleaded Guilty before the recorder of Plymouth to a charge of housebreaking, and the recorder, having heard his character, which is extremely bad, sentenced him to four years' corrective training. So far as the length of the sentence is concerned, the court thinks that there is nothing to be said. The appellant is 28 years of age, and his convictions began in 1938. In 1939 he was sent to Borstal. He was, apparently, released from Borstal very quickly because in December, 1939, he was charged with larceny and his Borstal licence was revoked. In 1941 he was sentenced for shopbreaking and larceny, and four other offences were taken into consideration. In 1942, at the Woolwich magistrate's court, he received altogether twelve months for the larceny of £27. At quarter sessions in April, 1943, he received twenty-one months' imprisonment with hard labour for shopbreaking and the larceny of property valued at a considerable sum. In 1945 at Coventry he was sentenced to six months for the larceny of cigarettes. At Plymouth, in September of that year, he received eighteen months for shopbreaking, and in 1946 he was again sentenced at Plymouth, on this occasion to nine months' imprisonment with hard labour for storebreaking. In December, 1947, there was a summary conviction. So, he has been convicted time and again, and these sentences have had no effect on him. Obviously, there is need for him to be put away for some time, and the recorder gave him corrective training in the hope that he would benefit by it. He has appealed and the court has to see whether or not the conditions which the statute lays down before a sentence of corrective training can be imposed were fulfilled.

One or two cases have come before this court in which due attention has not been paid to the provisions of s. 23 (1) of the Criminal Justice Act, 1948, with regard to proof of the service of the notice mentioned in the sub-section, and also regarding the necessity of asking a prisoner whether he admits the previous convictions which must be proved before a sentence of corrective training or preventive detention can be given. The judges of this Division, who form the judges of the Court of Criminal Appeal, have recently taken this matter into their consideration, and have resolved that, although it is not necessary in point of law that indictments should contain any averments with regard to previous convictions, it is desirable in future that they should do so*. It is desirable for the reason that, if the indictment contains the averments, which the clerk of the peace or the clerk of assize will in consequence put to the prisoner, the attention of the court will be directed pointedly to the requirements of the sub-section.

There is no doubt that this was a perfectly proper case for corrective training, but, unfortunately, no evidence was given that notice of two previous convictions had been served on the appellant. It is true that a police officer went into the box and proved a great many previous convictions, but the statute requires that before a sentence of corrective training can be passed notice of intention to prove two previous convictions must be served on the offender, and before a sentence of preventive detention can be passed notice of intention to prove three previous convictions and sentences of imprisonment must be so served. It is also provided that an offender must be asked whether he admits the previous convictions. As service of the appropriate notice was not proved in this case, the court has no option but most reluctantly to set aside the sentence of corrective training and substitute for it one of imprisonment. They do not see any reason why, in taking that course, they should reduce the term, because this is obviously a case in which a young man has shown by his conduct that he intends to lead a life of crime. The sentence is, therefore, amended from four years' corrective training to one of four years' imprisonment, to date from the date of conviction, as leave was given.

Sentence varied.

[Court of Criminal Appeal (Lord Goddard, C.J., Hilbery and Lynskey, JJ.), October 31, 1949.]

Criminal Law—Sentence—Corrective training—Preventive detention—Notice of intention to prove previous convictions—Proof of service—Admission of convictions by offender—Attachment of notice to indictment—Criminal Justice Act, 1948 (c. 58), s. 21 (1) (2) ; s. 23 (1).

Before a prisoner can be sentenced to preventive detention or corrective training under the Criminal Justice Act, 1948, s. 21 (1) and (2), certain previous convictions must be proved, but by virtue of s. 23 (1) no account may be taken of these unless the offender and the proper officer of the court have been served with notice, at least three days before the trial, that it is intended to prove such convictions. If the offender does not admit the convictions the question must be determined by the verdict of a jury. The appellant pleaded Guilty to charges of two offences. He had been served with the proper statutory notice setting out the previous convictions it was intended to prove, and had signed a statement admitting them, but at the trial no evidence was given that the notice had been served on him nor were the convictions put to him.

Held : (i) in all cases where the court has to determine whether an offender liable to a sentence of preventive detention or corrective training should be so sentenced (a) the prosecution should prove service on the offender of the notice under s. 23 (1) ; (b) the clerk of assize or the clerk of the peace should put the convictions mentioned in the notice to the offender and ask if he admits them ; (c) the offender, or his counsel, should be handed a copy of the Prison Commissioners' Report provided for by s. 21 (5).

(ii) either an averment of the previous convictions should be included in the indictment or the notice itself should be attached to the indictment.

(iii) the provisions of s. 23 not having been observed in the present case, the sentence of preventive detention could not stand and a sentence of seven years' imprisonment must be substituted.

Appeal against sentence.

The appellant pleaded Guilty at Bristol Assizes to a charge of receiving stolen property and was sentenced by Lewis, J., to ten years' preventive detention. He was not asked in open court whether he admitted the previous convictions in the statutory notice served on him under the Criminal Justice Act, 1948, s. 23 (1), nor was evidence given that the notice had been served. The appeal was allowed and a sentence of seven years' imprisonment substituted. The facts appear in the judgment of Lord Goddard, C.J.

James Burge for the appellant.
Fay appeared for the Crown.

LORD GODDARD, C.J. : The Criminal Justice Act, 1948, provides two new forms of sentence. One, under s. 21 (1), can be passed where a prisoner, who is not less than 21 years of age, is convicted on indictment of an offence punishable with imprisonment for two years or more, he having been convicted since he attained the age of 17 on at least two previous occasions of such an offence. He can be sent to corrective training instead of imprisonment for a term of from two to four years. Under s. 21 (2) a prisoner of not less than thirty years of age, who is convicted on indictment of an offence punishable with A imprisonment for two years or more and has been convicted on indictment on at least three previous occasions since he attained the age of seventeen of offences punishable on indictment with such a sentence and has on at least two of those occasions been sentenced to Borstal training, imprisonment, or corrective training, can be sent to preventive detention for a term of not less than five or more than fourteen years. Section 22 (1) of the Act provides :

> B "Where a person is convicted on indictment of an offence punishable with imprisonment for a term of two years or more and that person—(a) has been convicted on at least two previous occasions of offences for which he was sentenced to Borstal training or imprisonment ; or (b) has been previously convicted of an offence for which he was sentenced to corrective training, the court, if it sentences him to a term of imprisonment of twelve C months or more, shall, unless having regard to the circumstances, including the character of the offender, it otherwise determines, order that he shall for a period of twelve months from his next discharge from prison be subject to the provisions of this section."

By s. 23 it is provided :

> D "(1) For the purpose of determining whether an offender is liable to be sentenced to corrective training or preventive detention or to be ordered to be subject to the provisions of the last foregoing section, no account shall be taken of any previous conviction or sentence unless notice has been given to the offender and to the proper officer of the court at least three days before the trial that it is intended to prove the conviction or sentence ; and unless E any such previous conviction or sentence is admitted by the offender the question shall be determined by the verdict of a jury."

That section does not provide that the admission must be made in court, but it contemplates a notice being served on the prisoner three days before the trial and then provides that, unless a previous conviction is admitted, the question F must be determined by a jury.

It is the duty of courts strictly to follow the section. The question which arises in this case is of a highly technical nature. This appellant pleaded Guilty to two offences of a very serious character, and there is no question that he is just the sort of man whose previous history indicates that he is a very proper subject for a long term of preventive detention. The point that is taken on G his behalf is that the procedure which ought to be followed was not followed. In accordance with the practice which has been standardised, apparently, as police practice (I think at the suggestion of the Home Office), a notice of the convictions which it was proposed to prove against him for the purpose of determining whether he was liable to a sentence of preventive detention was served on the appellant. The three previous convictions alleged were specified H in the notice. The appellant signed a statement at the bottom of the notice admitting the convictions, but, unfortunately, evidence was not given at the trial that the notice had been served and the appellant was not asked the definite question whether he admitted the convictions. LEWIS, J., asked the police officer whether the provisions of s. 21 (5) of the Act had been complied with. That sub-section provides :

> "A copy of any report or representations in writing made to the court by the Prison Commissioners for the purposes of the last foregoing sub> section shall be given by the court to the offender or his counsel or solicitor."

There are, therefore, three things that must be done—the proof of the notice and the admission by the prisoner and the giving of the Prison Commissioners' report. The court finds that in the present case the only thing that was said in court was that the Prison Commissioners' report had been served on the appellant. LEWIS, J., having before him the statement which had been served on the appellant regarding previous convictions, with his signature at the bottom admitting the convictions, probably thought that was enough, forgetting for the moment that, strictly speaking, his signature ought to have been proved.

The court thinks this is a good opportunity for stating what, in its opinion, is the proper procedure to be adopted by all courts in regard to proving the matters which are required to qualify an offender to receive a sentence of corrective training or of preventive detention. After a plea or verdict of Guilty has been returned, a police officer should be called by counsel for the prosecution who should prove that he has served a notice on the offender as provided by s. 23 (1) of the Act three days before the trial. When that has been proved the clerk of assize or the clerk of the peace, as the case may be, should put the contents of that notice to the offender and get his admission or denial in open court. Then the offender or his counsel should be handed a copy of the Prison Commissioners' report. It may be that the offender will have signed the admission on the form to which I have referred. When he comes into court he may say that he disputes one of the convictions and wishes to withdraw the admission. If so, the judge who is presiding at the trial will, no doubt, consider what is to be done. We do not say what should be done as the matter does not arise here. The object of serving the offender with the notice three days before the trial is to give him an opportunity to say that he disputes a particular conviction. If he does, the matter can be dealt with by getting the proper evidence, which is a copy of the conviction and proof of the identity of the offender.

I want to add one word more with regard to this somewhat troublesome matter of the procedure to be followed in these cases. As I stated in R. v. Allen (1), the judges of the King's Bench Division have considered this matter, and, as I notified clerks of assize and clerks of the peace, they have come to the conclusion, because of the mistakes or omissions which we have found to have taken place, that it would be desirable, although it is not required by law, to put an averment in the indictment of the previous convictions so that the attention of the court may be directed to them. It has been pointed out to us by various clerks of assize and clerks of the peace that that may cause difficulty because, especially at a heavy assize or quarter sessions, when the indictments are drawn it is not always known that the police are going to put forward previous convictions with a view to getting an offender qualified for one of these new sentences. The court is of opinion, therefore, that one of two courses can be taken. Either an averment should be put in the indictment in the form the judges have suggested, or (as has been done in this case) the notice which is served on the offender should be attached to the indictment. That has been done, I now find, on other circuits and at other quarter sessions. If that is done, it will be a sufficient record, although it is necessary, of course, that proof should be given that the notice was served, and, above all, it should be borne in mind that the convictions must be put to an offender in open court. Therefore, in future, it will be open to clerks of assize and clerks of the peace either to include the averments in the indictment, or, if they find it more convenient, to attach the notice to the indictment. It must be attached to the indictment, so that, if the case comes up to this court we shall have copies before us.

In the present case we feel obliged to set aside the sentence of preventive detention because we cannot find that the appellant was ever asked in court whether or not he admitted the convictions, nor was any evidence given that the notice had been served on him. It is purely a technical point, because no one has the least doubt that it was served and that he admitted the convictions. If, therefore, the sentence of preventive detention has to be set aside, the question is what sentence should be substituted for it. [HIS LORDSHIP reviewed the facts and the appellant's record and said that the court had come to the conclusion that a sentence of seven years' imprisonment must be substituted.]

Criminal Law—Sentence—Corrective training—When an appropriate punishment C —Fulfilment of statutory conditions not sufficent to justify sentence—Duty of court to consider facts and circumstances of the case—Criminal Justice Act, 1948 (c. 58), s. 21 (1).

The applicant applied for leave to appeal against a conviction of horse-stealing. He was thirty years of age and had four previous convictions, the last being in 1941 when he was sentenced to twelve months' imprisonment D for receiving stolen property, this being his only previous conviction of an offence of dishonesty. The requirements of the Criminal Justice Act, 1948, s. 23 (1), were fulfilled, and he was sentenced to two years' corrective training, against which he did not appeal.

HELD : the application for leave to appeal against conviction must be dismissed. Although there was no appeal against the sentence, which E must, therefore, stand, the court desired to point out that it was not proper, taking into consideration all the facts of the case, to impose a sentence of corrective training. Sentences of corrective training or preventive detention ought not to be passed merely because the statutory conditions with regard to the imposition of such sentences were fulfilled, or because the Prison Commissioners reported that the offender was fit for such a sentence. Such F sentences were designed rather to import an extension of the principles underlying Borstal treatment, and in every case the duty of the court was, not only to see that the requirements of the statute had been fulfilled, but also to weigh up the facts and circumstances.

Case referred to :

(1) R. v. Askew, ante p. 687.

G APPLICATION for leave to appeal against conviction.

The applicant was convicted at Essex Quarter Sessions of stealing two horses, and was sentenced to two years' corrective training. In refusing the application the court made further observations on the imposition of sentences of preventive detention and corrective training and the duty of the court to consider the H particular facts and circumstances before awarding such sentences. The facts appear in the judgment of the court delivered by BIRKETT, J.

No counsel appeared.

BIRKETT, J., delivered the following judgment of the court. The applicant, Bernard Apicella, was convicted at Essex Quarter Sessions on Sept. 1, 1949, of stealing two horses, and he was sentenced to two years' corrective training. He applies to this court for leave to appeal against conviction only. [HIS LORDSHIP stated the facts and continued :] The application for leave to appeal against conviction is dismissed, and strictly, the case should end there because there is no appeal against sentence, but there is one word of some importance I am desired to say on this matter. The applicant is thirty years of age, and there are four previous convictions against him. Notice of intention to prove two previous convictions—in 1939 and in 1941—was given to him under s. 23 (1) of the Criminal Justice Act, 1948. For the first offence he received a sentence of three years' Borstal training on a charge of unlawful wounding and for the second he received twelve months' imprisonment for receiving stolen property. Since 1941 there have been no criminal proceedings against him at all, and the conviction of 1941 is the only one of dishonesty against him up to this moment. These two convictions he admitted. What it is desired I should say is this. The mere fact that the conditions of the statute dealing with corrective training are fulfilled is by no means a reason why a sentence of corrective training should be imposed. The sentence of corrective training under the Criminal Justice Act, 1948, s. 21 (1), is designed, in the view we take, rather to import an extension of the principles underlying Borstal treatment. Section 21 (1), lays down the conditions under which corrective training may be imposed, and there is no doubt that theoretically the applicant could be sent to corrective training because the conditions had been fulfilled. But s. 21 (1) further provides :

> " . . . if the court is satisfied that it is expedient with a view to his reformation and the prevention of crime that he should receive training of a corrective character for a substantial time, followed by a period of supervision if released before the expiration of his sentence, the court may pass, in lieu of any other sentence, a sentence of corrective training . . . "

The present case was one where a man had stolen two horses. He had had no conviction since 1941, a matter of eight years, and he had only one previous conviction of an offence of dishonesty. The view the court takes is that this was not a case in which it was proper for corrective training to be imposed. Before a sentence of corrective training is passed it is not enough that the mere elements of the statute have been fulfilled so that the prisoner is eligible for corrective training. The court must consider all the facts of the case and the design of the statute before imposing the sentence. Here there is no appeal against sentence and therefore the court can do nothing, and this sentence of two years' corrective training must stand, but it is important that the minds of those who are concerned with the administration of the Act should be drawn to this matter and should see that when corrective training is imposed the facts of the case justify it.

I ought to add that this court [see R. v. Askew (1)], when dealing on another occasion with a sentence of preventive detention under s. 21 (2) of the Act, pointed out that when the imposition of such a sentence was being considered it was not enough that the conditions of the statute had been fulfilled and that the Prison Commissioners' in their report under s. 21 (4) had stated that the man was physically and mentally fit for a sentence of preventive detention. The court must consider the facts of the case. Similarly with regard to corrective training. The mere fact that the Prison Commissioners report to the court that there is no reason why a sentence of corrective training should not be imposed if the court thinks fit is no reason of itself why corrective training should be given. With regard to both preventive detention and corrective training, it is the duty of the court not merely to see that the statutory conditions are fulfilled, but also to weigh up the facts and circumstances of the case and then decide the appropriate sentence.

Application dismissed.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., Somervell, L.J., and Hodson, J.), October 28, 1949.]

Rent Restriction—Part of dwelling-house used for business purposes—Tenant's removal to another house—One room still used as a dwelling—Onus of proof—Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920 (c. 17), s. 12 (2), proviso (ii).

In 1938 the tenant was granted the tenancy of premises consisting of a dance hall, cafe, and cloakrooms on the first floor and an upper part which was used as a dwelling-house by him and his family. In 1946 the tenant bought a house in the neighbourhood and moved into it with his family. That house became his home, but he continued to use one of the rooms on the upper floor of the original premises as a bedroom. He slept there on, on an average, two nights of the week and still used the ground floor for the purposes of his business. The landlords issued a summons for possession on the ground that the premises were no longer used as a dwelling-house, and were, therefore, outside the protection of the Rent Restrictions Acts.

HELD : the judge was entitled to consider, as he did in this case, that the premises had been let in 1938 as a dwelling-house and that the onus of proof lay on the landlords to show that that user, which still continued, was not a user of what was originally a dwelling-house entitling the tenant to claim protection ; there was evidence to support the finding of the judge that the premises were still used as a dwelling-house ; and, therefore, the Court of Appeal could not interfere.

APPEAL by the landlords from an order of His Honour JUDGE PEEL, K.C., made at Blackburn County Court on June 27, 1949. The judge dismissed the landlords' application for the possession of the premises, the ground of the application being that they were solely used for business purposes and that their occupation under the Rent Restrictions Acts, 1920 to 1939, had ceased. The Court of Appeal now dismissed the appeal with costs. The facts appear in the judgment of SOMERVELL, L.J.

J. W. Stansfield for the landlords.
Beney, K.C., and Shorrock for the tenant.

SOMERVELL, L.J. : This is an appeal from a decision of His Honour JUDGE PEEL. It was an action for possession, and the question is whether the Rent Restrictions Acts, 1920 to 1939, are available to the tenant in the circumstances which have arisen. The original letting was in 1938, and the premises consist of a dance hall and a cafe and a number of rooms, some on the ground floor, which were mostly used as cloakrooms, and some on the first floor. It is conceded that when the tenant took the lease originally the premises were let as a dwelling-house, and, by reason of proviso (ii) to the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, s. 12 (2), the Act applied to them although part of them was used " for business, trade, or professional purposes." In 1946 the tenant bought another residence into which he and his family moved, and it became their home. The tenant, however, continued to use as a bedroom at the original premises one of the rooms which he and his family had previously occupied. He slept there, the judge found, on an average two nights a week for reasons connected with his business in running the premises—the dance hall and so on. Dances continued to a late hour and sometimes he had to be on the premises early in the morning, and it was convenient for him to sleep and have meals on these two nights a week. The learned judge said :

> "The tenant has done that, not to make a case against the landlords for protection under the Rent Acts, but for convenience—so that he might be on the premises early to cook breakfasts and to clean the premises. He was acting bona fide and in a reasonable manner."

In September, 1948, the present landlords bought the reversion of these premises, and they have brought these proceedings for possession, contending that, in the circumstances, the tenant cannot plead the protection of the Rent Restrictions Acts because the premises are not now let as a dwelling-house.

The county court judge decided in favour of the tenant, holding that he was entitled to claim the protection of the Acts. The judge refers to proviso (ii) to s. 12 (2) which deals with the position where a part of a dwelling-house is used for business or professional purposes, and he refers also to a decision of this court in Langford Property Co., Ltd. v. Athanassoglou (1). The question is whether there was any evidence on which the judge could come to the conclusion that these premises were let as a dwelling-house on the material date having regard to their size and the number of rooms and the fact that only one room was occasionally used for dwelling in the ordinary sense. Can it be said that the premises properly come within the expression in the proviso, a dwelling-house part of which is used "... for business, trade, or professional purposes"? I can imagine a case where the part used as a shop or offices is so large compared with what is used as a dwelling-house that it could not be said that those words applied. In the present case I think that the judge was entitled to take into consideration the history of the matter and the fact that these premises were originally let as a dwelling-house. The onus was on the landlords to show that the user, which still continued, was not a user of what was originally a dwelling-house which entitled the tenant still to claim the protection of the Acts. The case is near the borderline, but there was some evidence on which the judge could come to a conclusion favourable to the tenant, and, therefore, we cannot interfere with his decision. This appeal should be dismissed.

HODSON, J. : I agree.

SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R. : I also agree. I venture to add that the basis of the decision must be that there was some evidence, when regard is had to all the circumstances, including the earlier user, on which the judge could hold that this property at the material date was still let as a dwelling-house. I should also add that there was a second point, which counsel for the landlords indicated, that, even if the premises were a dwelling-house, nevertheless the character of the tenant's personal occupation was not such, having regard to his other home, as entitled him now to claim the protection of the Acts, and, accordingly, that this case was distinguishable from such cases as Langford Property Co., Ltd. v. Athanassoglou (1). The point was not pressed, but it seems to me that, once it is conceded that this was a dwelling-house at the material date, there is no ground for quarrelling with that part of the judge's judgment. The appeal will be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Lynskey, J.), October 26, 27, 1949.]

Landlord and Tenant—Requisition—Land—Requisition during lease—Covenant to repair—Breach—Assessment of damages—Damage to reversion—"Damage" —Landlord and Tenant (Requisitioned Land) Act, 1944 (c. 5), s. 1 (1)—Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927 (c. 36), s. 18 (1).

A By s. 1 (1) of the Landlord and Tenant (Requisitioned Land) Act, 1944: "Where, in the exercise of emergency powers, possession of any land comprised in a lease is taken on behalf of His Majesty, then, during the period while possession so taken is retained, no remedy for breach of any repairing covenant contained in the lease shall be enforced, whether by action or otherwise, in respect of any damage to the land occurring during that period; B and if the lease determines while possession of the land is so retained, or if upon possession of the land being given up, compensation in respect of the taking of possession thereof becomes payable for any such damage to the person entitled to the benefit of the covenant, no remedy for breach of the covenant shall at any time be enforced as aforesaid in respect of that damage."

C On Dec. 20, 1944, leasehold property, the subject of a covenant to "sufficiently repair . . . and . . . yield up . . . all the said demised premises in . . . good thorough and substantial repair", was requisitioned under the Defence (General) Regulations, 1939, and was so requisitioned at all material times. In January, 1945, a schedule of the condition of the premises was prepared on behalf of the plaintiff landlord and the then tenant jointly D which showed the dilapidations existing at the date of requisition. The lease was assigned to the defendant on May 11, 1945, and on June 24, 1947, it expired while the property was still requisitioned. In estimating the cost of making good the dilapidations for which the defendant was liable the surveyors for both the parties based their figures on the schedule of condition of 1944 and referred to the actual condition at the date of expiration of the E lease only for the purpose of measuring up disputed items. They agreed the cost of making good the dilapidations at £585. On a claim for this sum as damages for breach of the covenant to repair,

HELD: (i) in view of the provisions of s. 1 (1) of the Act of 1944 the cost of making good the dilapidations should be assessed by reference to the schedule of condition at the date of requisitioning in order to exclude all F damage occurring thereafter, but from the cost of the dilapidations at the date of requisitioning must be deducted the cost of any subsequent repairs of such dilapidations, whether effected by the defendant or by the requisitioning authority, up to the date of the expiration of the lease, the defendant only being bound to pay for dilapidations existing at the time of the requisition which still existed at the end of the lease.

G (ii) although the property was under requisition at the expiration of the lease and was likely to continue to be requisitioned thereafter, there might still be damage to the reversion under s. 18 (1) of the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927, such damage being the difference between the value of the reversion subject to requisition with the dilapidations for which the defendant was responsible and its value if there had been no such dilapidations. H

(iii) damage within the meaning of the Landlord and Tenant (Requisitioned Land) Act, 1944, s. 1 (1), meant physical damage to the property and not a breach of covenant resulting in damages; the sub-section, therefore, excluded liability only for actual damage or dilapidations occurring during the period of requisition and not the defendant's breach of covenant to repair or deliver up in a good state of repair which had occurred only during that period.

(iv) the plaintiff, therefore, was entitled to recover the sum claimed, less the value of repairs to the pre-existing dilapidations which had been carried out by the requisitioning authority during the requisition.

FOR THE LANDLORD AND TENANT (REQUISITIONED LAND) ACT, 1944, s. 1 (1), s. 5, see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Vol. 37, pp. 338, 340.]

ACTION for (inter alia) damages for breach of covenant in a lease to deliver up premises in a good state of repair.

The parties were successors in title to the parties to a lease of premises for 98 years as from June 24, 1849. The premises had been requisitioned under the Defence (General) Regulations, 1939, before the assignment of the lease to the defendant, and they continued under requisition until after the expiration of the lease. At the time of the requisition the cost of dilapidations was agreed by surveyors acting on behalf of both the landlord and the then tenant at £585.

LYNSKEY, J., held that the plaintiff landlord was entitled to recover that sum, less the value of repairs to such dilapidations carried out by the requisitioning authority during the requisition.

H. J. Phillimore for the plaintiff.
L. A. Blundell for the defendant.

LYNSKEY, J.: The plaintiff, David de Crespigny Smiley, claims from the defendant, John Somerville Townshend, damages for breach of a covenant to repair and to deliver up certain premises known as 31, Montpelier Square, Knightsbridge, at the termination of his lease in a good state of repair. The plaintiff is the successor in title to a Mr. Thomas Weatherly Marriott, who, on June 24, 1849, granted to one William Henry Atkinson (of whom the defendant is a successor in title) a lease of these premises for a term of 98 years at a yearly rent of ten guineas. That term expired on June 24, 1947. One of the terms of the lease was :

> "The said Henry William Atkinson his executors administrators or assigns also will at all times during this demise well and sufficiently repair uphold support glaze pave tile slate plaster whitewash paint paper cleanse empty amend and otherwise keep the said messuage or tenement and premises hereby demised and every part thereof and all vaults fences waterclosets sewers drains and appurtenances belonging or to belong thereto in good thorough and substantial repair and will at the expiration or other determination of this demise peaceably yield up unto the said Thomas Weatherley Marriott his heirs and assigns all the said demised premises in such good thorough and substantial repair and condition as aforesaid together with all chimney pieces hearths covings slabs windows casements shutters doors fastenings waterclosets partitions fixed presses shelves drawers cisterns pipes pumps posts pales rails and all other fixtures and things which shall be affixed or fastened to the said demised premises at any time during the said term and particularly will once in every third year during the said term paint all the outside wood iron and other painted works of or belonging to the said demised premises twice over with proper oil colour in a good and workmanlike manner and in like manner paint all the inside wood iron and other painted work of or belonging to the same premises once in seven years of the said term."

It is for breach of the terms of that covenant that these proceedings are brought.

The defendant became the assignee of this lease on May 11, 1945, but on Dec. 20, 1944, the premises had been requisitioned under the powers contained in the Defence (General) Regulations, 1939, by the Westminster City Council acting on behalf of the authorised Minister. The premises have remained under requisition ever since. In January, 1945, on the instructions of both the then lessor and the then lessee, Messrs. Harrods made a schedule of the condition of the premises. It was agreed by the parties that that schedule correctly set out the description of the premises with its existing dilapidations at the date of requisition. At the time of the assignment to the defendant there had been a sub-lease in existence to a Mrs. Yeathered made on July 11, 1912, and she had been in actual occupation of the property, but on Oct. 24, 1945, she gave up the lease to the defendant, who thereupon became entitled to possession subject to the Crown requisition. When the lease expired on June 24, 1947, the plaintiff required payment by the defendant of the cost of repairing the dilapidations which, he said, existed at that time. A surveyor, Mr. Ward, was instructed by the plaintiff to examine the premises and prepare a statement of the cost of repairing the dilapidations. Mr. Ward priced out this cost on the basis of the dilapidations shown in the schedule of condition of January, 1945, regard being had to the compensation the Westminster City Council would pay in respect of damage, additional damage, or lack of repair, which might result during their period of occupancy. On Oct. 23, 1947, Mr. Ward met Mr. Ling, the surveyor acting for the defendant. Mr. Ling adopted the same method of dealing with claims for dilapidation when premises had been requisitioned and both surveyors agreed that the cost of making good the dilapidations as shown in the schedule of condition, allowance being made for any further lack of repair for which the council might have to pay, was the sum of £585. Mr. Ling stated that from a practical point of view, whatever the law might be, that would represent the damage to the plaintiff's reversion.

The case originally came before the court by means of a specially endorsed writ claiming the sum of £585 as on an account stated. In the meantime the defendant had taken the view that, while he might be responsible for dilapidations of a structural character, namely, dilapidations in the actual structure itself, he was not and could not be responsible for dilapidations to decorations. The accounts agreed between Mr. Ward and Mr. Ling were then separated into items in respect of structural dilapidations and items in respect of decorative dilapidations. The total of the agreed structural dilapidations was £141 10*s.* 6*d.*, and the defendant paid the plaintiff that sum.

The plaintiff puts forward his case purely on the basis of breach of the covenant to deliver up in a good state of repair. When Mr. Ward was cross-examined it appeared that the defendant disputed the figures on which the claim was based. It was clear that Mr. Ward and Mr. Ling had based their figures entirely on the schedule of condition of 1944, and, though not entirely disregarding the actual condition of the premises on June 24, 1947, when the lease expired, they had only examined the premises then for the purpose of measuring up disputed items. The question arises whether the two surveyors applied the right principle in arriving at their figure. In my view, they have not. One has to assess the cost of making good dilapidations as at the date of the expiration of the lease. That seems to be settled by authority. The only way to arrive at what the dilapidations are and their extent is by examining the actual condition of the premises at the expiration of the lease.

The matter is complicated by reason of the Landlord and Tenant (Requisitioned Land) Act, 1944, s. 1 (1) of which provides:

> "Where, in the exercise of emergency powers, possession of any land comprised in a lease is taken on behalf of His Majesty, then, during the period while possession so taken is retained, no remedy for breach of any repairing covenant contained in the lease shall be enforced, whether by action or otherwise, in respect of any damage to the land occurring during that period; and if the lease determines while possession of the land is so retained, or if upon possession of the land being given up, compensation in respect of the taking of possession thereof becomes payable for any such > damage to the person entitled to the benefit of the covenant, no remedy for breach of the covenant shall at any time be enforced as aforesaid in respect of that damage."

Prima facie it would seem that there is excluded from any claim for damages for breach of covenant to deliver up in a good state of repair any damage which arose during the period of requisition. "Damage," by s. 5 of the Act of 1944, includes dilapidations, so that an examination alone of the premises at A the expiration of the lease would not be enough, because that would show damage which had occurred during the period of requisition as well as lack of repair which existed at the date of the requisition. What Mr. Ward and Mr. Ling did was to take the schedule of condition as at the date of the requisition and assume that any damage occurring thereafter was not recoverable under the lease and also that during the period of requisition no repairs had been done B in respect of the dilapidations which existed at the date of the requisition. It seems to me, apart from the other question which arises in this case, that it is right to use the schedule of condition as a starting-point to find out what are the amounts payable for breach of the covenant, but one must also take into account the condition at the end of the lease to find out how far those dilapidations which existed at the commencement of the requisitioning were C still in existence and whether repairs had been carried out to them, either by the tenant, who was enjoying the benefit of the requisitioning, or by the requisitioning authority. The defendant is only bound to pay for dilapidations which exist at the termination of the lease. To arrive at the true amount of these dilapidations one must first take the damage or disrepair existing at the commencement of requisitioning, see how far that damage has been repaired or D ameliorated by the time the lease expires, and so assess the damage which has not been caused during the requisitioning period for which the local authority may or may not be responsible.

In answer to that contention counsel for the defendant relies on the provisions of the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927, s. 18 (1), and says that, even if there has been a breach of the covenant to repair and deliver up in a good state of repair, in E fact there has been no damage to the reversion because the premises are still under requisition and there is no immediate likelihood of the requisition ending, and, even if the defendant had carried out his obligations under his covenant to repair, the benefit of those repairs would have disappeared by the time the plaintiff was able to take possession since the premises would then be just as bad as if the defendant had not repaired them. In those circumstances, says F counsel, there can be no damage to the reversion, because the reversion would not have benefited if the obligations had been fulfilled. It seems to me that that argument is based on the fallacy that it looks on the reversion as a reversion expectant on the period of requisition. In other words, it takes as the test how the value of the property will be affected when it is released by the Westminster City Council. In my view, that is not the proper test to apply. To ascertain G whether there has been any damage to the reversion here, the proper course is to find out what is the degree of repair for which the defendant is responsible and by what amount approximately is the value of the existing reversion, subject to requisition, reduced by reason of that lack of repair. In other words, one has got to ask oneself first, supposing this covenant had been complied with and the premises were on sale subject to requisition immediately after the expiration H of the lease, what price would they have brought, and, secondly, what would have been their value in the state of disrepair for which the defendant is responsible? The difference would be the damage to the reversion for which the defendant is responsible. It seems to me that is the correct answer because the person who is buying the reversion subject to requisition is buying it subject to a liability and that tends to depreciate the price compared with what he could have got if he could have had vacant possession. Would the price be depreciated more by reason of the lack of repair for which the defendant may be responsible and so induce the prospective purchaser to offer a less price ? I am satisfied on the evidence, both of Mr. Ling and of Mr. Ward, that there would be a reduction in that price in those circumstances. The amount of it is another question, but I am satisfied that there would be damage to the reversion by reason of the lack of repair for which the defendant, as distinct from the Westminster City Council, is responsible.

The next point taken by counsel for the defendant is that under the Landlord and Tenant (Requisitioned Land) Act, 1944, s. 1 (1),

> " . . . no remedy for breach of any repairing covenant contained in the lease shall be enforced, whether by action or otherwise, in respect of any damage to the land occurring during that period . . . "

Counsel says that damage there does not mean physical damage to the structure or decorations, but that it means a breach of covenant the result of which causes damage, and, therefore, the breach is itself damage to the land within the meaning of that sub-section. On that basis he argued that, as the defendant became the assignee of the lease only during the period of the requisition, and, as his breach of covenant could not arise before he became assignee, his breach at that stage would be damage to the land, and, therefore, the plaintiff's claim would be excluded by reason of the sub-section. He goes on to argue that the covenant to deliver up in a good state of repair would also be covered as damage to the land, because the lease expired during the period of requisition and, as the damage flowed from the breach of covenant and was not the physical damage to which the Act refers, therefore the plaintiff's claim is destroyed under the sub-section. By s. 5 of the Act of 1944 :

> " ' Damage ' includes dilapidations, but does not include war damage within the meaning of the War Damage Act, 1943."

In my view, under the Act of 1944, and under the Compensation (Defence) Act, 1939, to which reference is made in the Act of 1944, both war damage and matters for which compensation is given are matters of physical damage to the property and the words " any damage to the land " in s. 1 (1) of the Act of 1944 mean damage of a physical nature, actual structural damage or damage to decorations, all of a nature which injures the land, the building, the decorations to the building, or the fitments, and not something in the nature of a breach of obligation by the lessee to the lessor.

[HIS LORDSHIP assessed the value of the repairs of dilapidations carried out by the Westminster City Council during the requisitioning up to the termination of the lease at £150, and deducting that sum and the sum of £141 10*s*. 6*d*. already paid from the figure of £585 claimed, gave judgment for £293 9*s*. 6*d*.]

Rent Restriction—Possession—Dwelling-house left by tenant—Wife remaining in occupation—Tenant's furniture remaining on premises—Purported surrender by tenant of premises by agreement.

A statutory tenant living with his wife in a flat which constituted the matrimonial home left the premises following a quarrel with his wife, and purported to surrender them to the landlords by agreement. His wife remained in occupation with the use of his furniture. On the wife's refusing to quit the premises, the husband gave her written notice revoking any authority which she might have from him to occupy the flat. In proceedings by the landlords against the tenant and his wife for possession,

HELD : the tenant had not given up possession, as he remained in occupation through his wife and furniture, and, accordingly, his statutory tenancy had not been terminated.

APPEAL by the tenant and his wife from an order of His Honour Deputy JUDGE GORDON CLARK sitting at Marylebone County Court, on June 2, 1949, whereby he granted to the landlords possession of certain premises within one month. The Court of Appeal allowed the appeal. The facts appear in the judgment of BUCKNILL, L.J.

Share for the tenant and his wife.
David Lloyd for the landlords.

BUCKNILL, L.J. : This is an appeal against an order for possession within a month of a flat, made by DEPUTY JUDGE GORDON CLARK sitting at Marylebone on June 20, 1949. The landlords own a block of flats called Dudley Court, Upper Berkeley Street, and they let Flat No. 100 unfurnished to the tenant, Mr. Alexander, on Aug. 19, 1941, for a term of three years at a rental of £130 per annum. After the end of that term the tenant continued in occupation as a statutory tenant with his wife and the rent was raised to £150. There is no dispute that the furniture belonged to the tenant. In November, 1948, the tenant and his wife had a matrimonial dispute which ended in the tenant leaving his wife and the furniture in the flat. On Dec. 18, 1948, he wrote to the landlords saying that he was giving up the tenancy and that he would not be responsible for the rent on and after Dec. 25. The landlords replied by saying that it was necessary, under the Rent Restrictions Acts, for him to give three months' notice to determine his tenancy, but he could, if he wished, give up possession of the premises, and they asked him to sign an enclosed letter. The tenant signed this letter which read as follows :

> " As arranged with you I confirm that I have given up possession of the above flat to you, and enclose the key relating to the premises."

He did not enclose the key. After a futile attempt by the landlords to persuade the tenant's wife to leave the flat—she claimed that she was the tenant and was willing to go on paying the rent—on Mar. 8, 1949, the landlords' solicitors wrote an important letter to the tenant :

> "Dear Sir, We refer to our interview with you of the 3rd instant. As we then explained it is not possible for you to effectively deliver up possession of the flat you formerly occupied at Dudley Court by giving notice to quit or signing a statement that you are in fact giving up possession, since there A remains in the flat your furniture and your wife, who in this respect is impliedly there with your authority. We understand that it will not be possible for you to remove your furniture. As a result we regret that in the event of proceedings being taken as is our clients' intention, it will be necessary to join you as a party as well as your wife. It would materially assist our clients if you would sign a revocation of your wife's authority. B In the hope that you will be prepared to do this, we enclose a document for this purpose and if it meets with your approval, perhaps you will sign it and return it to us."

At the end of April, 1949, the tenant returned to the flat and resumed occupation of it.

C The whole point is whether the tenant ever did effectively deliver up possession of the flat. The landlords themselves seem to think that in March he had not given up possession, and, having regard to the facts that the furniture was his, that it and his wife were in the flat, and that he did not even give up the key, it seems to me that at that time he had not given up possession. On Mar. 11 he signed the document referred to in the letter of Mar. 8, which was addressed to D his wife and was as follows :

> "Please take this as formal notice of the revocation of any authority or leave which I may have at any time granted or given to you to occupy the said flat."

Nothing effective happened after that, and the summons for possession was issued E on Apr. 1 against both the tenant and his wife. It is clear that, if the tenant had given up possession of the flat by the time the summons was issued, this case does not fall within the Rent Restrictions Acts. On the other hand, if he had not given up possession, the case comes within the Acts and the judge should not have granted possession. The learned judge has dealt with the case on the assumption that the Rent Acts did not apply and that this was an ordinary F case in which the husband had given up possession and the wife was in effect a trespasser.

The authorities on the point which were reviewed by the learned judge laid down propositions which are familiar in this court. The case which helps us the most is Brown v. Draper (1) where the facts were somewhat similar. A husband was the tenant of a house on a weekly tenancy. As in this case, he left G the house in a dispute with his wife, and his wife and child remained in occupation of the house with the use of his furniture and he continued to pay rent. He received notice to quit from the landlord and he then stopped paying the rent, but he did not revoke his leave to the wife to reside in the house nor did he remove his furniture. Later the landlord brought proceedings against the wife for trespass and at the hearing, the husband, who was not made a party to the proceedings, H gave evidence that he had no interest in the house. It was held by the Court of Appeal that the husband was still in possession of the house, and the only way he could be deprived of the protection of the Rent Acts was by his going out of possession or having an order for recovery of possession made against him. There are obviously differences between that case and this, because the proceedings there were merely against the wife for trespass, but the passage which I think does throw some light on the present case is where LORD GREENE, M.R., reading the judgment of the court, said ([1944] 1 All E.R. 246) :

> "This appeal raises a novel and interesting point under the Rent Restrictions Acts . . . It is convenient to pause here and consider the position of Joseph Draper himself under the Acts, in the light of the facts as above stated. If he had given up possession of the house to the respondent [landlord] on the expiration of the notice, or subsequently, he would have placed himself outside the protection of the Acts, since that protection is based on the statutory restriction on the power of the court to make an order for recovery of possession. If the tenant voluntarily gives up possession, no occasion for the operation of the statutory restriction arises. The landlord takes possession without the necessity of obtaining an order of the court ; and there is nothing in the Acts which prevents him from doing so. But Joseph Draper did not give up possession. He not only left the appellant [wife] in occupation without taking any steps to revoke the licence which he had given her to continue living there, but he left his furniture in the house in her charge."

Lord Greene, M.R., continued (ibid., 248) :

> "This argument raises an important question, the answer to which will affect many cases of common occurrence. We will take one example. The tenant of a house held for a fixed term goes abroad on military service, leaving his wife in the house. While he is abroad, the lease comes to an end. At common law the wife thereupon becomes a trespasser and the landlord can take proceedings to recover possession from her. Do the Rent Restrictions Acts prevent the landlord from taking this course ? In our opinion, they do. If the contrary were true, the consequences would be lamentable. In such a case the possession of the wife must, we think, be regarded as the possession of the husband and cannot be treated as unlawful so long as the husband has the right to claim the protection of the Acts. As we have already pointed out, the only ways in which the husband can lose the protection of the Acts are by giving up possession, which in the case assumed he can only do by removing his wife (or, perhaps, by revoking his permission to her to live there) and removing any furniture, etc., which belongs to him ; or by having an order for possession made against him. The right conferred on the husband to claim the benefit of the Acts entitles him, if at the expiration of the tenancy he remains in possession (and possession by his licensee or by leaving, for example, his furniture in the house is sufficient for that purpose), to remain in possession of the house unless and until an order is made against him ; and the landlord is no more entitled to treat his licensee as a trespasser than he is entitled to treat the tenant himself as a trespasser."

That passage is very appropriate to the present case because, in the first place, the tenant did nothing towards removing the furniture in the flat, and so long as it was there he retained possession to that extent. It was not open to the landlords to let the flat unfurnished while the furniture was there and the tenant could not remove his wife otherwise than by breaking the law and forcibly carrying her out. It is not necessary for this court to decide whether he could lawfully revoke his permission for her to live there, but in the absence of circumstances showing that she was in the wrong and had forced him to leave her I should have very great doubt whether any revocation of permission to an innocent wife to live in the matrimonial home in which the husband had lived with her and from which he had deserted her would have any valid legal effect. In my judgment, the learned judge was wrong in holding, as he did, that the tenant had given up possession. I think he did not. That being so, I think that this appeal should be allowed.

SOMERVELL, L.J. : I agree with the learned judge that the point in this case is whether possession was given up by the tenant before the summons was issued because, in my view, if possession was not given up then, the landlords clearly cannot rely on what I may call the Skinner v. Geary (2) principle in the events which have happened, namely, the return of the tenant to the flat and his wife before the date of the hearing. The learned judge on the point whether possession had been surrendered said :

> " The second point taken by counsel for the defendant was that Mr. A Alexander never effectively gave up possession ; that he remained, so to speak, a statutory tenant in possession malgré lui, by virtue of the presence in the flat of his wife and his furniture ; and that, consequently, this vicarious possession enured to his benefit when he changed his mind and resumed occupation."

I do not propose to read the letters which my Lord has already read. It seems B plain to me on them that the landlords took the line which one would have expected, that, having got the tenant to sign the document purporting to give up possession of the flat, they then discovered that the wife and the furniture were still there and that the wife was unwilling to go, and they, therefore, could not get possession of the premises to which they were entitled on the termination of the tenant's possession, whether as original contractual lessee or as C statutory tenant. Counsel for the landlords admits that it could not be suggested that possession had been effectively surrendered up to Mar. 8, 1949, but he submitted that the formal revocation of the licence which was signed by the tenant must be regarded as amounting in law in itself to a surrender of possession. One thing is clear, namely, that in the letter of Mar. 8 the landlords did not so regard it and did not ask the tenant to sign the document on the basis that it D would enable him to say that he had surrendered possession. I think that in taking up that line they were perfectly right. The wife and the furniture remained in the house. It is unnecessary to decide what would be the position if a husband had cleared the house of furniture, and his wife had insisted on remaining in the unfurnished house, and he had then given to the landlords a revocation of the licence to his wife. That case can be dealt with when it arises E and it might turn on the question whether the landlords accepted that position as a proper surrender. The fact that the furniture was left in the house, however, seems to me in itself sufficient to prevent this tenant being able to establish that possession was surrendered, and for these reasons I think the appeal must be allowed.

F DENNING, L.J. : If a statutory tenant goes out of occupation, leaving lodgers or sub-tenants or no one in the house, he ceases to be entitled to the protection of the Rent Restrictions Acts, but he does not, in my opinion, lose the protection if he goes out leaving his wife and furniture there. The reason is because the wife has a very special position in the matrimonial home. She is not the sub-tenant or licensee of the husband. It is his duty to provide a roof G over her head. He is not entitled to tell her to go without seeing that she has a proper place to go to. He is not entitled to turn her out without an order of the court : see Hutchinson v. Hutchinson (3). Even if she stays there against his will, she is lawfully there, and, so long as she is lawfully there, the house remains within the Rent Acts and the landlord can only obtain possession if the conditions laid down by the Acts are satisfied. I agree that the appeal should be allowed.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Vaisey, J.), November 1, 1949.]

Family Provision—Fund on which provision to be charged—Division of burden between legacies and residue—Duty of executor where application to be expected A —Duty of executor to file evidence—Need to join legatees as defendants—Inheritance (Family Provision) Act, 1938 (c. 45), s. 1 (1).

By his will, a testator bequeathed legacies amounting to £6,100 to Mrs. B., who had been his housekeeper up to the date of his death, legacies of £2,600 in value to his wife from whom he had for many years lived apart, £500 B to each of two nephews, and the residue, amounting to some £3,000, to his two children. The widow, who had been receiving £200 a year under a separation agreement, asked that the court should make reasonable provision for her maintenance under the Inheritance (Family Provision) Act, 1938, s. 1 (1).

HELD: assuming that the bequests to the widow would produce £104 per annum it was proper that she should be awarded under s. 1 (1) £96 C per annum, to be borne as to two-thirds thereof rateably by the legacies other than the widow's and as to one-third by the residuary estate.

Per curiam : In cases under the Inheritance (Family Provision) Act, 1938, it is the paramount duty of an executor to avoid embarrassing the court and to think carefully before allowing any part of the estate to be paid out to any beneficiary while an application under the Act is either D pending or impending. During the time within which an application under the Act can be made, i.e., during the six months from the date on which representation is first taken out, and there is a possibility of an application being made, the executor distributes the estate at his risk. Duties and debts can be paid, but no distribution to beneficiaries should be made while there is any possibility that an application under the Act will be made. E

Although it is not desired to lay down a definite rule that in every case the executor must always file an affidavit on these applications, it should be the normal thing that the executor should do so and put the court in possession of the facts so far as known to him, or, in the case of a bank, so far as known to its officials.

There is far too widespread an idea that legacies are bound to be paid in F full and that provision under the Act will be made at the expense of the residue, but legatees need not always be made defendants to these applications. If the court thinks that a legatee may be affected, it will direct an adjournment and that notice be given to an absent legatee, who may possibly be joined as a party.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS by which a widow applied for reasonable provision to be made for her maintenance out of the testator's estate under the Inheritance (Family Provision) Act, 1938, s. 1 (1).

VAISEY, J., held that the widow should be paid, in addition to her benefits H under the will, £96 per annum to be charged rateably on the legacies and the residuary estate. As, however, the widow had stated, through her solicitor, when the summons was before the master, that she made no claim against certain persons who were entitled together to pecuniary legacies amounting to £1,000, VAISEY, J., ordered that the widow should be paid only £87 per annum, the difference of £9 being the proportion of £96 which he would have charged on the said legacies. The facts appear in the judgment.

W. F. Waite for the widow.
A. F. M. Berkeley for the executor.
Rees-Davies for Mrs. Burgess, a pecuniary legatee.
T. A. C. Burgess for the residuary legatees.

VAISEY, J. : The plaintiff, Mrs. Lilly Louisa Simson, is the widow of the testator, James Tudhope Simson. The first defendant, the National Pro- A vincial Bank, Ltd., is the executor of his will. The second defendant, Mrs. Kathleen Beryl Burgess, is a legatee under the will, and so are the last two defendants, James Alexander Simson and Irene Mary Simson, who are the only children of the testator and the plaintiff. The summons asks that such reasonable provision as the court may think fit shall (subject to any conditions or restrictions) be made out of the testator's net estate for the maintenance of the plaintiff.

B In substance the will of the testator gives to the second defendant, Mrs. Burgess, bequests of a total value of £6,100 net after paying legacy duty. It gives to the widow legacies amounting in value to £2,600, again after discharging legacy duty. There are two legacies of £500 each to two nephews of the testator. Subject to those gifts the estate is divisible in equal shares between the two children. The total net value of the estate is some £14,000. It will be observed C that the available residue for division between the children is not much more than £3,000. The story is a not unfamiliar one. The testator and his wife separated, and they entered into an agreement for separation which contains some elaborate provisions in regard to financial matters. It will suffice for me to say that, as a result of those provisions and in the events which have happened, the widow was in receipt of £200 a year from her husband down to the date of D his death which happened on Apr. 24, 1948.

It has been suggested to me that the capital amounting to £2,600 of which the widow has been placed in control under the will has to be taken into consideration by me, not in any strictly arithmetical way, but as part of the circumstances which I have to consider, and with that I agree. It has also been suggested to me by counsel for the widow that, if that sum of money is considered to have an E income value of some £78 a year, taking the return at three per cent., his client ought in fairness to have that sum, namely, £78 a year, made up to the £200 which she has been receiving hitherto by granting her under the provisions of the Inheritance (Family Provision) Act, 1938, s. 1 (1), an annual sum of £122. I say at once that I think that is about the limit of what the widow ought to ask in the circumstances. I do not overlook the fact that the £2,600 might well be F invested or made use of at a higher rate of interest than three per cent. I think possibly it might be invested at four per cent. and bring her in £104 per annum. The defendant, Mrs. Burgess, who, under the terms of the will, takes nearly half of this not very large estate, had been the testator's housekeeper for many years before and down to the date of his death. She repudiates the idea that she was living with him in any sense which she might regard as offensive, and she says G that she was his housekeeper and nothing else, and I deal with the situation on that footing.

I have, first, to decide what the widow ought to have out of the estate by way of proper maintenance, but I have also to decide out of what part of the estate the provision should be made, because it is an illusion all too prevalent that these provisions are always, or primarily, made out of residue. That is a mistake. H There may be cases, for instance, in which the testator has left a very large pecuniary legacy to a perfect stranger and a small residue to members of his family to whom he has some moral obligation. It is obvious that, if any such provision as I am now asked to make has to be made, it ought not in every case to come out of the residuary estate, but may well be directed to fall on some particular portion of the estate. Indeed, I consider I have a free hand in the matter, because by the Inheritance (Family Provision) Act, 1938, s. 3 (1), it is provided that where an order is made under the Act, then, for all purposes, the will shall have effect, and be deemed to have had effect as from the testator's death, as if it had been executed with such variations as may be specified in the order for the purpose of giving effect to the provisions for maintenance thereby made. In the present case Mrs. Burgess, who had no such moral claim on the testator as she might have had if she had been living with him as his wife, receives benefits under the will amounting to more than £6,000, while the testator's own children, who are obviously not in affluent circumstances receive much less. A The daughter is said to be earning her living as private secretary to the visiting medical staff of a hospital. She is 31 years of age and her salary is, in the mother's belief, sufficient to keep her. Her savings appear to amount to no more than £100 of War Loan which was left to her by her grandfather (the widow's father), and a few National Savings Certificates. The son is a captain in the Royal Engineers and is married, living on his army pay and a small B disability pension as a result of wounds in the last war. He also has had a legacy from his maternal grandfather of £200. None of these people is in affluent circumstances, and I cannot regard the position as one in which those to whom the testator is under a paramount obligation, i.e., his wife and children, were in any way so situated that that paramount obligation could be, or should be, disregarded. Mrs. Burgess, no doubt, served the testator very faithfully as house- C keeper, though as nothing else. She appears to have been given board and lodging by the testator, but to have received no salary from him, and it may be that these bequests to her are to some extent compensation for something in the nature of what I may call "back pay."

This case involves all sorts of considerations which I find very difficult to bring to a conclusion which is altogether satisfactory, but I am going to assume D that the widow has within her power, from the legacies which were left to her by her husband, to provide for herself an income of £104 a year, i.e., four per cent. on £2,600. That leaves £96 to be made up, and that is the sum which I should propose to award to her. From what source has that to come ? In my judgment, the proper allocation of that sum is that two-thirds of it, i.e., £64 a year, should come out of the pecuniary legacies, i.e., those given to the nephews and to Mrs. E Burgess, and the remaining £32 should come out of the residue. The proportions in which the pecuniary legacies are given are, roughly, one-seventh, that is to say, £1,000 to the nephews, and six-sevenths, that is to say, £6,000 to Mrs. Burgess, and it seems to me that that £64, which I think should fall on the pecuniary legacies, ought to fall as to one-seventh on the nephews and six-sevenths on Mrs. Burgess. F

The order which I should make, but for a matter to which I am about to refer, is that the will should be read as taking effect from the testator's death as if there had been a preliminary bequest of an annuity during widowhood of, taking round figures, £55 a year charged on and payable out of the income of the bequests given to Mrs. Burgess, £9 a year charged on the income of the bequest given to the nephews, and £32 a year charged on the income of the benefits given to the G two children by way of residue. Unfortunately, a step was taken, which, in my judgment, was very ill-advised. When the parties were before the master (I quote the master's note) : "The [widow] by her solicitor concedes that she makes no claim against the nephew legatees and is willing that they should be paid in full." That may have been done without due consideration of the consequences, but I think that, while the widow will take £55 a year charged H on Mrs. Burgess's interests and £32 a year charged on the children's interests, her disclaimer before the master has deprived her of, and she has given up any right to, the £9 which I think ought to be charged against the interest of the nephews. I wish it to be made quite clear that in these cases it is the paramount duty of the executor to avoid embarrassing the court and to think carefully before allowing any part of the estate to be paid out to any beneficiary while any application under this Act is either pending or impending. If these legacies to the nephews have been paid, as I understand they have, the matter comes before me in a form which adds further embarrassment to an already embarrassing jurisdiction. I wish it to be distinctly understood that during the time within which an application under the Inheritance (Family Provision) Act, 1938, can be made, i.e., during the six months from the date on which representation is first taken out, and there is a possibility of an application being made, the A executor distributes the estate at his risk. Duties and debts can be paid—there is no question about that—but no distribution to beneficiaries should be made while there is any possibility that an application under this Act will be made.

Another thing I want to say is this. In this case the executors have not filed any evidence, and I am told that the master said that he did not think any evidence was necessary provided the executors furnished the parties with all B proper particulars on a piece of paper. That may be all right in very simple cases, but here, where there were several matters which wanted clearing up, it seems to me not a very convenient course. I will instance one such matter. In the separation deed a provision was inserted as to events conditional on what certain policies were worth at the date of the deed, i.e., Feb. 18, 1929. When I asked counsel for the executors to tell me what the figure was, he could not do C so. In my judgment, in a case like this with obvious complications and doubts and difficulties about that and other matters, it is the duty of the executors to file an informative affidavit telling the court what is known to them, and what it is necessary for the court to know in order to deal properly with the matter. I think it is very unfortunate that, with an estate of £14,000, the parties should have been left to find out as best they could from slips of paper what the executor D thought was the net value of the estate for the purposes of the Act. Although I do not want to lay down a definite rule that in every case the executor must always file an affidavit on these applications, I cannot help feeling that it should be the normal thing that the executor should do so and should put the court in possession of the facts so far as known to him, or, in the case of a bank, so far as known to its officials. I regret that there is no affidavit in this case, and I E think that it would have been much better if I had been fortified with that information which I have had rather to drag out from the parties on points on which they were not very clear themselves.

It does not follow from what I have said that all the legatees must always be made defendants to these applications. It may well be that sometimes the court is given a little trouble because it thinks that there are legatees who, perhaps, F are not fully aware of the risk they run of having some part of the provision sought for thrown on them, and it may well be that the court will direct an adjournment and that notice be given to absent legatees and, possibly, that other legatees be joined as parties. I agree that sometimes it is difficult to know whether legatees should be made parties or not, but I cannot help observing from my experience in these applications that there is far too widespread an idea that G the legacies are bound to be paid in full and that provision under the Act will be made at the expense of residue. Residue, of course, is the normal and obvious place from which provision shall be made, but there are a large number of cases—and I think this is one—in which it is plain that residue ought not to be asked to shoulder the whole of the burden.

Order accordingly. Costs of all parties as between solicitor and client to be taxed H and paid out of the estate.

KELLY v. BATTERSHELL AND ANOTHER.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Bucknill, Cohen and Asquith, L.JJ.), October 18, 19, 20, 1949.]

Landlord and Tenant—Derogation from grant—Implied covenant—Common scheme—Top floor of house let as residential flat by oral tenancy agreement—Other floors originally let as flats by written agreements containing similar covenants as to user—User as private dwelling only—Whole house, excepting top floor, converted into hotel—Rights of tenant of top floor.

In June, 1937, F. became the tenant of 86, Lancaster Gate, and, by the agreement, dated Dec. 20, 1937, granting him the lease, he agreed inter alia (a) not to use the premises for any purpose other than that of a private dwelling-house, except in accordance with the provisions of two licences which permitted their user as a private residential club, (b) not to allow on the premises any sale by auction or entertainment to which the public could obtain admittance, and (c) not to cause or suffer to be done on the premises any act which might be an annoyance, damage or disturbance to the superior landlords or their other tenants or neighbours. F. retained the ground floor and basement of the premises for use as a club, and sub-let the other floors as flats, and in 1940 he granted a tenancy of the top floor to the plaintiff at a rent of £60 a year. All the tenancies, except that of the plaintiff, were by formal written agreements containing covenants in substantially similar terms, and among the covenants by the tenants were (a) " Not to allow any sale by auction on the premises nor exhibit on any part thereof any sign . . . that apartments are to be let . . . but shall use the same as a private dwelling only," and (b) " Not to do or suffer to be done any act or thing which may be or grow to the annoyance of the landlord or other occupants of the said premises . . . or which may be contrary to the terms of the lease under which the landlord holds the property . . . " Although there was no written agreement in regard to her tenancy, the plaintiff alleged that in taking the tenancy she had relied on a statement, made to her by F. during the negotiations, that he required the tenants to use their flats for residential purposes as he proposed to maintain the house for private residents. In November, 1946, F. sold his interest in the whole house to the defendants, who were already conducting a hotel in the next house. The whole of No. 86 was empty at the time, except for the first floor and the premises occupied by the plaintiff on the fifth floor. In 1947 the defendants began to use No. 86 as part of the hotel, and in June, 1948, they incorporated the whole house, except for the top floor, into the hotel. By the erection of a door, the premises occupied by the plaintiff were turned into a self-contained flat by the end of 1948. In an action by the plaintiff in the county court claiming damages and an injunction to restrain the defendants from using the premises, or any part of them, for any purpose other than that of private residence, or in such a manner as might be detrimental to the quiet enjoyment by her of her flat.

HELD : (i) the user of the lower part of the house was merely an interference with the plaintiff's convenience, amenity or privacy and was not of such a serious nature as to frustrate the use of the premises for the purpose for which they were demised ; and, therefore, the fact of the incorporation of the premises in a hotel did not amount to a derogation from the grant made to the plaintiff.

(ii) in any event, the question whether particular circumstances amounted to a derogation from the grant as distinct from a mere interference of amenities was a question of fact, and there was evidence on which the county court judge could decide in favour of the defendants.

(iii) even assuming that there had been a statement of intention by F. during the negotiations for the tenancy that he would not permit the user of any of the other floors of the premises except as private dwellings, a covenant to that effect could not be implied in the tenancy agreement between F. and the plaintiff. why? pg 837 B

(iv) a letting scheme could not be inferred in regard to the house in question, which was originally built as one dwelling and never physically split into separate dwelling-houses; the covenants in the written agreements between F. and the other tenants of the house were inserted, not by reason of a letting scheme, but to ensure, so far as possible, that the terms of the head lease were not infringed; and, therefore, the plaintiff's claim failed.

Appeal by the plaintiff from an order of His Honour Judge Bensley Wells, at Marylebone County Court, dated Apr. 13, 1949.

The plaintiff was the tenant of the top floor of 86, Lancaster Gate, London, W., the defendants being her present landlords. The defendants, who were running a hotel in the adjoining house, bought No. 86 in 1946 and proceeded to incorporate it, except for the top floor, into their hotel. The plaintiff brought an action against them, claiming damages for alleged breaches of covenant and an injunction to restrain them from using the premises for any purpose other than that of private residence, or in such a manner as was detrimental to the quiet enjoyment by her of her flat. She contended (a) that there was a derogation from the grant made to her by her original landlord, and (b) that there was a breach of a letting scheme. The county court judge held (a) that there was no derogation from grant, and (b) that there was no letting scheme in regard to A the premises, and he refused the plaintiff's claim for damages and an injunction. The plaintiff's appeal from the judge's order was now dismissed by the Court of Appeal. The facts appear in the judgment of COHEN, L.J.

Salt, K.C., and Michael Hoare for the plaintiff.
R. E. Megarry for the defendants.

BUCKNILL, L.J. : I will ask COHEN, L.J., to give the first judgment.

COHEN, L.J. : The plaintiff, Miss Kelly, claims to be the tenant of a private flat consisting of the top floor (the fifth floor) of 86, Lancaster Gate, under a tenancy alleged to have started in about June, 1940. She alleges that the tenancy is a tenancy from year to year of unfurnished premises at a rental of £60 per annum. The landlord from whom she claims to hold was Mr. Stephen C Foster, who had himself acquired his lease in 1937, the term starting from June 24, 1937, although the agreement granting it was only executed on Dec. 20, 1937. The lease of Dec. 20, 1937, contained a covenant restricting the user of the premises which in its original form was in these terms :

> "The lessee shall not nor will during the continuance of the term hereby D granted carry on or permit or suffer to be carried on any trade profession or business on the said demised premises or any part thereof (except for professional purposes of a doctor or a dentist provided no lunatics are kept thereon and no dispensing is done on the demised premises) or use the same for a school or academy or permit the said messuage or dwelling-house to be occupied in any other manner than as a private dwelling-house only except E in strict accordance with the provisions of the two licences copies whereof are set out in sched. II hereto."

Shortly speaking, those licences permit the user of the premises as a private residential club. The lease also contains one or two other restrictive covenants to which counsel for the defendants referred us, the first of which is :

> "Not to hold or permit any sale by auction or exhibition or any meeting or dance, concert or other entertainment to which the public or any section thereof can obtain admittance otherwise than by personal unsolicited invitation of the tenants or any resident on the demised premises."

Another is to the effect that the lessee would not at any time during the term cause or suffer to be done on the demised premises any act or thing which might G be or grow to be an annoyance, damage or disturbance to the superior landlords or any of their other tenants or lessees or other neighbours of the adjoining or neighbouring houses or premises.

At the time of the commencement of the plaintiff's tenancy, the third and fourth floors were separately occupied, the fourth floor by a Miss Pesterre and the third floor by a Mrs. Trew, who had apparently obtained her tenancy agree- H ment on Aug. 31, 1937, before the actual lease to Mr. Foster was signed, but after the date on which his tenancy in fact commenced. The first and second floors were occupied by Lady Cobham, while the ground floor and basement were occupied by Mr. Stephen Foster, the landlord, and were used by him to carry on a kind of club. There are one or two things to be observed about these tenancies. The tenancy to Mrs. Trew of the third floor does not appear to have been of a self-contained flat, as the premises are described as :

> " . . . the third floor of the premises known as No. 86, Lancaster Gate, Hyde Park, in the county of London, comprising three rooms and kitchenette, the bathroom on the half landing below and cupboard on second floor landing."

So, too, the lease of the fourth floor contained three rooms and a kitchenette and the bathroom and w.c. on the half landing below. There were two tenancy A agreements affecting the fifth floor before the plaintiff obtained her tenancy. All the tenancies I have mentioned, other than the tenancy to the plaintiff, were the subject-matter of formal agreements reduced into writing, and the covenants contained therein were substantially in the same terms. The covenants by the tenant in each of the agreements were seven in number. The first was the usual covenant to pay rent, the second was a covenant in the not unusual B form against assigning or under-letting, and the third was to repair and deliver up in good repair. The fourth, which is the first of the important covenants, is in these terms :

> " Not to allow any sale by auction on the premises nor exhibit on any part thereof any sign plate placard or bill that apartments are to be let or that any business is carried on upon the said premises, but shall use the C same as a private dwelling only."

The fifth covenant, on which counsel for the plaintiff also relied, is in these terms :

> " Not to do or suffer to be done any act or thing which may be or grow to the annoyance of the landlord or other occupants of the said premises or D of the surrounding neighbourhood or which may be contrary to the terms of the lease under which the landlord holds the property or whereby the current fire insurance may be invalidated."

The sixth was not to keep any animals on the premises without the consent in writing of the landlord, and the seventh was to keep the windows clean and properly curtained and the chimneys regularly swept and not to place any E articles or thing on the landings or staircase.

So far as the plaintiff was concerned, no written agreement was entered into as regards her tenancy. The plaintiff says that Mr. Foster offered her the premises by a letter or letters which she has lost and cannot now produce. She says that he first offered her the premises at £105 per annum, but that she refused to consider that rental and it was finally agreed that she should take the premises F at a rent of £60 per annum. I must refer in a little more detail to her evidence on this point. She said :

> " I agreed to take the flat at that rent [£60 per annum]. This was for an unfurnished flat, but it included electric light. There was only one meter in the house. Gas not included as I had my own meter. Mr. Foster told me that all the tenants in the house were occupying their flats as private G dwelling-houses and that it was his intention to maintain the house as such. I agreed to use my flat only as a private dwelling. I regarded the undertaking re user of the flats in the building as important."

She had not previously called it " undertaking ".

> " I would not have taken the flat if the other parts of the house had been H business premises or usable otherwise than as private dwelling-houses."

She said that in 1940 her flat was an open flat, i.e., just the rooms and the landing and the flight of stairs from the floor below, and was in no sense a self-contained flat. In cross-examination she said that it was in May or June, 1940, that Mr. Foster told her he required the tenants to use their flats for residential purposes as he proposed to maintain the house for private residents, that this statement had been made during the negotiations for her tenancy, and that she relied on it when she decided to take the tenancy.

It appears that after the plaintiff had taken the tenancy and entered into possession there was some alteration in the situation, in that some of the flats were no longer let as flats but the rooms were let off singly, as individual rooms, with furniture and meals. At that time, Mr. Foster was retaining the ground floor and basement as a club. In his evidence on that subject he said :

> " From about 1937 I used part of the premises as a club or lecture centre— a membership club which gave members the right to attend lectures and use a library on my premises at 86. I used the entire ground floor and basement for this purpose. The club averaged 800 members every year. Membership 10*s*. per annum. There were lectures or social or concert every night. I provided about 500 teas a week, that is, units of light refreshment. The club continued throughout my occupation of the house. Plaintiff never complained about my activities—she was a member of the club."

The plaintiff, on the other hand, said that she did not know he was running a club. She only knew he had a library of psychic books which many people came to borrow.

On Nov. 4, 1946, Mr. Foster contracted to sell his interest in the whole house to the defendants, who were running a hotel, called the Dominions' Hotel, next door, at Nos. 87 to 89, Lancaster Gate, and wished to include No. 86 in the hotel. At the date of completion of the sale, on Nov. 11, 1946, the whole of No. 86 was empty except for the first floor and the premises occupied by the plaintiff on the fifth floor. The plaintiff suspected the purpose for which the sale took place, and on Jan. 6, 1947, she wrote to the town clerk endeavouring to persuade the local authority to prevent the user of the premises as a hotel or for any other purposes than as private dwelling-houses. In March or April, 1947, according to the plaintiff's evidence, the defendants commenced to use No. 86 as part of the hotel, but at that time there were no through communications on the various floors between Nos. 86 and 87. In March or April, 1948, the defendants commenced to incorporate the whole of No. 86, except for the top floor, into the hotel, and I think that by June, 1948, the incorporation was complete. There can, I think, be no doubt that as soon as the work commenced the plaintiff knew what the defendants were doing. She was undoubtedly dissatisfied with the effect of the change from private residences, or private rooms, to the hotel, and in the course of her evidence she refers to certain incidents of which she complains. [HIS LORDSHIP dealt with the plaintiff's evidence in regard to these incidents, and also with her complaint in regard to the temporary closure of the front door of No. 86, but this complaint was not pressed, as the door had now been re-opened.] The plaintiff became aware of the user of the premises as a hotel as early as March, 1947, but at that time there was no incorporation. She became aware of the incorporation as soon as it was made, but it was not until Jan. 3, 1949, that she took any active steps to put a stop to that of which she complained. On that date the plaint in this matter was issued.

E

Paragraph 1 of the particulars of claim states the alleged tenancy. Paragraph 2 states the nature of the building, which I have already sufficiently described except for the fact that it had, as the plaintiff said

> " a single staircase affording access to all floors and a single exterior entrance door affording access to and from the street on the ground floor with private letter boxes at the said door."

Paragraph 3 is in these terms :

> " During the negotiation of the said tenancy the said Foster who was himself in occupation of the said ground floor and basement orally represented to the plaintiff that it was his intention to maintain the character of the said premises as a private dwelling-house for carefully selected tenants only and the plaintiff accepted the said tenancy in reliance upon the said representation. In the circumstances aforesaid the said Foster as landlord > impliedly covenanted both for himself and his successors in title to permit the plaintiff quietly to enjoy the amenities of her said flat and to enjoy in common with the other occupants of the said premises the use of the front entrance and its appurtenances and staircase and to maintain the character of the said premises as a private dwelling-house as aforesaid and that he would not use or permit the use of the said premises or any part thereof for any purposes other than that of private residence or in such a manner as to cause any detriment or inconvenience to the plaintiff in the use and enjoyment of her said flat."

In para. 4 the plaintiff sets out the breaches of which she complains, including the incorporation of the four lower floors into the hotel and other matters, to which I need not at the moment refer. In para. 6 she alleges that by reason of the matters she has stated she has been and continues to be put to inconvenience and has suffered damage, and has been and is being deprived of the quiet enjoyment of her flat and of the amenities appurtenant thereto, and she claims damages and an injunction to restrain the defendants from using or permitting the use of the premises, or any part thereof, for any purpose other than that of private residence, or in such a manner or for such purpose as is, or may be, detrimental to the quiet enjoyment by her of her flat. A defence was put in which sets up an entirely different tenancy, alleging a furnished tenancy of, I think, only one room, and containing a number of denials. I think the only portion of the defence to which it is necessary for me to refer is the allegation in para. 4, which is in these words :

> " At the time of the said assignment and the said grant neither the representation nor the covenant referred to in para. 3 of the particulars of claim was registered as a land charge and the defendants took both the said assignment and the said grant in good faith and without notice either of the said representation or of the said covenant."

On those pleadings the matter came before the learned judge, but the plaintiff did not rely on the covenant for quiet enjoyment. She based her case on two grounds, the first being that there was a derogation from the grant to her made by Mr. Foster. She said that, by letting the premises to her for a private dwelling-house only, he was under an obligation not to use the remainder of the premises in such a way as to derogate from the grant which was a grant for a particular purpose, namely, the use of the house as a private dwelling. She also said that there was a letting scheme, and that it was a breach of the obligations of the defendants under that letting scheme to use the premises otherwise than as private residences. The learned judge ultimately dismissed both the action and the counterclaim, which was for a declaration that the the tenancy under which the plaintiff held was a furnished monthly tenancy.

In dismissing the action he dealt first, on Mar. 18, with the allegation of a letting scheme, but no order was drawn up on that date. On Apr. 13 he dealt with the remainder of the claim and dismissed both the action and the counterclaim. The way this was dealt with led counsel for the defendants to raise a preliminary point. He said that on Mar. 18 the learned judge had dismissed the claim for an injunction based on the letting scheme argument and that, therefore, notice of appeal from that judgment should have been given within the permitted time calculated from that date. He cited in support of his argument a decision of the Divisional Court in Rawnsley v. Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Co. (1), the headnote to which is in these terms :

> " When the finding of a jury in a county court is complained of, the 21 days within which an appeal may be entered is to be calculated from the time when the verdict was given, although the judgment upon it was not given until a subsequent date."

In that case the verdict of the jury had been given, but the aggrieved party applied to the county court judge for a new trial. The judge dismissed the application and directed the order to be drawn up, and the Divisional Court held that the time must be calculated from the date on which the verdict of the jury was given. That, counsel for the defendants suggested, was analogous to the present case, but his argument, which I must say was not strenuously pressed, breaks down, as I do not think the county court judge in the present case disposed in any way of the claim for an injunction on Mar. 18, but merely gave his reasons for rejecting one of the grounds on which counsel for the plaintiff tried to support that claim. I might add that, had we taken a different view, I do not think we would have felt much difficulty in extending the time for an appeal. On Apr. 13 the judge dismissed the action and counterclaim, holding that the plaintiff was a tenant from year to year, and he held that the rateable value of the plaintiff's flat did not exceed £100 a year. From this finding the defendants have not appealed, and we are only concerned now with the question of what covenants expressed or implied were binding on the landlords as against the plaintiff.

As I have said, before the learned county court judge only two things were discussed, first, derogation from grant, and, secondly, scheme. As to the first, the argument was that, as the premises were let for use as a private dwelling-house only, the defendants, as successors in title to Mr. Foster, could not derogate from that grant by so using or permitting the user of the adjoining premises as to render the demised premises materially less fit for the purpose for which they were demised. The county court judge dealt with that argument in this way. First, he referred to a passage from the judgment in Browne v. Flower (2) where PARKER, J., said ([1911] 1 Ch. 226) :

> " Thus, if the grant or demise be made for a particular purpose, the grantor or lessor comes under an obligation not to use the land retained by him in such a way as to render the land granted or demised unfit or materially less fit for the particular purpose for which the grant or demise was made."

The county court judge then said that it was clear, from the judgment of PARKER, J., that a user of the lower part of the house which merely interfered with convenience, amenity, or privacy, was not a breach of the implied covenant not to derogate from the grant unless the interference was of such a serious nature as to frustrate the use of the premises for the purpose for which they were demised. He then cited these words of PARKER, J. (ibid., 227) :

> " Much as I sympathise with the plaintiffs, it would, in my opinion, be extending the implications based on the maxim that no one can derogate from his own grant to an unreasonable extent if it were held that what has been done in this case was a breach of an implied obligation."

Having stated the law in those terms, the county court judge then turned to the facts and said :

> " Even if all the facts relied on by the plaintiff in this case were proved up to the hilt, they would not, in my view, amount to derogation from grant, either individually or collectively. At the highest they would amount to an interference with the plaintiff's amenities. The plaintiff has for the past two years been, and is still, occupying the flat as a private residence and is desirous of continuing to do so ; in these circumstances the suggestion that what has been done by the defendants frustrates the use of the premises for the purpose for which they were demised is putting the case far too high."

I agree with the conclusion of the learned county court judge. I am unable to take the view that the mere fact of incorporation in a hotel necessarily involves a derogation from the grant made to the plaintiff. I would add that some of the incidents referred to in the statement of claim have, in fact, been rendered impossible by the erection of a door at about Christmas, 1948, which turns the plaintiff's premises into a self-contained flat, an advantage which it did not previously possess. Moreover, the fact that the third and fourth floors are now bedrooms would make a noisy party less likely than when they were used as sitting rooms. Be that as it may, it seems to me plain that the judge did not

A misdirect himself as to the law, and the question whether particular circumstances amount to a derogation from a grant, as distinct from mere interference of amenities, seems to me to be a question of fact. Even, therefore, if I did not agree with the conclusion of the judge, as I do, I do not think it would be competent for us to disturb his finding.

I turn, therefore, to the second ground, and before us that has been split into
B two parts, (i) implied covenant, and (ii) alleged letting scheme. First, as to implied covenant, the covenant which counsel for the plaintiff asks us to imply is to be inferred, he says, from the following elements: (i) the obligation binding on her to use the premises as a private dwelling-house only; (ii) the terms of the other written tenancy agreements, all of which, including the previous tenancy agreements relating to the fifth floor, contain provisions in similar terms restrict-
C ing the user for the purposes of private dwelling; and (iii) the surrounding circumstances—and I think this was the most important and the one on which he most relied—and the fact that the plaintiff had lived on the premises and knew when she became a tenant that all the floors were occupied as private dwellings. I must, of course, add that her evidence—I will deal later with the question how far it was accepted—was that Mr. Foster said that it was his
D intention to use the whole building as private dwellings.

It is important to bear in mind the principles that govern us as to the implication of covenants which are not expressed in the agreement between the parties. Counsel for the defendants called our attention to the principle as stated in Luxor (Eastbourne), Ltd. v. Cooper (3), where Lord Wright said ([1941] 1 All E.R. 52):

> E "The general presumption is that the parties have expressed every material term which they intended should govern their agreement, whether oral or in writing. It is well-recognised, however, that there may be cases where obviously some term must be implied if the intention of the parties is not to be defeated, some term of which it can be predicated that 'it goes without saying,' some term not expressed, but necessary to give to the > F transaction such business efficacy as the parties must have intended. This does not mean that the court can embark on a reconstruction of the agreement on equitable principles, or on a view of what the parties should, in the opinion of the court, reasonably have contemplated. The implication must arise inevitably to give effect to the intention of the parties."

What is the term that it is sought to imply here? It is a term that the landlord
G will covenant not to permit the user of any of the other floors except as a private dwelling-house. The effect of such a clause would be to tie the hands of the landlord so long as Miss Kelly's tenancy continued. I have already read the passages of the evidence which deal with this matter. I think it is fairly plain that the highest that it can be put is that, according to Miss Kelly, Mr. Foster stated that it was not his intention to use the rest of the building except as private dwelling-
H houses. Mr. Foster denies that he said anything of the kind, though he admits that it was in accordance with his then practice not to permit such user except for the purpose indicated. We are asked to turn a statement of intention into an implied covenant. The passage I cited from Lord Wright's speech indicates how difficult it is to imply a covenant into a written agreement. It seems to me that one must be even more careful before implying a covenant into an oral tenancy. First, in such a case you have to decide what was said, and then imply something from what you find to have been said. A test commonly applied is that suggested by SCRUTTON, L.J., in Reigate v. Union Manufacturing Co. (Ramsbottom) (4), cited by LORD WRIGHT ([1941] 1 All E.R. 57) in the Luxor case (3) and by MACKINNON, L.J. ([1940] 1 All E.R. 612) in Broome v. Pardess Co-operative Society of Orange Growers (Est. 1900), Ltd. (5). SCRUTTON, L.J., said ([1918] 1 K.B. 605) :

> " A term can only be implied if it is necessary in a business sense to give efficacy to the contract ; that is, if it is such a term that it can confidently A be said that if at the time the contract was being negotiated someone had said to the parties, ' What will happen in such a case,' they would both have replied, ' Of course, so and so will happen ; we did not trouble to say that ; it is too clear.' Unless the court comes to some such conclusion as that, it ought not to imply a term which the parties themselves have not expressed."

B Counsel for the plaintiff, in his able argument in reply, applied that test. He said that the officious bystander would have said : " Surely you intend to include a covenant by the landlord that he will not permit the user of the rest of the building for any other purpose than a private dwelling." He added : " Can there be any doubt that both Miss Kelly and Mr. Foster would have answered that question in the affirmative ? " He said that at that stage Mr. Foster would C have been most anxious, with bombing raids about to start, or already started, to secure a tenant for the top floor of his building and would agree to almost any condition to secure that, even at the low rent of £60 per annum. I find it quite impossible to reach that conclusion. I think it is much more likely that Mr. Foster would have said : " How can I possibly say how I shall use the rest of the building when the war is over? " I do not think, applying the D officious bystander test, that it is possible to be sure that both parties would have agreed that the covenant, which it is now sought to imply, should be included in the tenancy.

I pass, therefore, to the other aspect of this second question, and that is the question whether there was a letting scheme. It is common ground that letting schemes are based on the same principles as building schemes, and the principle E in regard to building schemes is conveniently stated by PARKER, J. ([1908] 2 Ch. 384) in Elliston v. Reacher (6) :

> "In my judgment, in order to bring the principles of Renals v. Cowlishaw (7) [a proper building scheme case] and Spicer v. Martin (8) into operation it must be proved (1.) that both the plaintiffs and defendants derive title under a common vendor ; (2.) that previously to selling the F lands to which the plaintiffs and defendants are respectively entitled the vendor laid out his estate, or a defined portion thereof (including the lands purchased by the plaintiffs and defendants respectively), for sale in lots subject to restrictions intended to be imposed on all the lots, and which, though varying in details as to particular lots, are consistent and consistent only with some general scheme of development ; (3.) that these restrictions G were intended by the common vendor to be and were for the benefit of all the lots intended to be sold, whether or not they were also intended to be and were for the benefit of other land retained by the vendor ; and (4.) that both the plaintiffs and the defendants, or their predecessors in title, purchased their lots from the common vendor upon the footing that the restrictions subject to which the purchases were made were to enure for the benefit H of the other lots included in the general scheme whether or not they were also to enure for the benefit of other lands retained by the vendors. If these four points be established, I think that the plaintiffs would in equity be entitled to enforce the restrictive covenants entered into by the defendants or their predecessors with the common vendor irrespective of the dates of the respective purchases. I may observe, with reference to the third point, that the vendor's object in imposing the restrictions must in general be > gathered from all the circumstances of the case, including in particular the nature of the restrictions. If a general observance of the restrictions is in fact calculated to enhance the values of the several lots offered for sale, it is an easy inference that the vendor intended the restrictions to be for the benefit of all the lots, even though he might retain other land the value of which might be similarly enhanced, for a vendor may naturally be A expected to aim at obtaining the highest possible price for his land. Further, if the first three points be established, the fourth point may readily be inferred, provided the purchasers have notice of the facts involved in the three first points ; but if the purchaser purchases in ignorance of any material part of those facts, it would be difficult, if not impossible, to establish the fourth point."

B The first difficulty in applying that principle to the present case is this. The pleadings contain no reference to or suggestion whatever of a letting scheme, and it was that, no doubt, which led the learned judge to say, at the commencement of his judgment on Mar. 18 :

> "In my view no facts necessary to found a scheme have either been C pleaded or proved."

That the point should be properly pleaded is, I think, clear. There are observations to that effect in Grant v. Derwent (9), to which counsel for the defendants called our attention. I think the general principle is quite plain that the facts relied on must be pleaded before the court can properly deal with the matter, particularly, as in the present case (as counsel for the defendants pointed out), D there was nothing in the agreement to show what was the area alleged to be covered by the scheme, and it was only before us that counsel for the plaintiff made it quite plain that he contended that the whole house was subject to the scheme. Nevertheless, the learned judge did go into the matter and held that it was not proved, and I should be reluctant to deal with this matter on the basis that it failed on a point of pleading. I think the proper course when the point E was raised would have been—I can well understand how this course was not adopted—to insist on the plaintiff amending her pleading so as to make it quite plain what was the scheme which she relied on, and what was the area covered by that scheme. Be that as it may, counsel for the plaintiff made it quite clear that the scheme, which, he alleges, is a scheme affecting the whole of the house, including the basement and the ground floor, and that the restrictive covenants, F which he alleges, are embodied in the scheme and are to be found in the covenants contained in the written document of which the one between Mrs. Trew and Mr. Foster, which I have read, can be taken as an example. Counsel for the plaintiff agreed that certain of those covenants could not be said to be part of the scheme. They were the ordinary landlord and tenant covenants, but he said that cl. 4 (dealing with sales by auction and user as private dwelling-house only) and cl. 5 G (dealing with nuisance and annoyance to the landlord or other occupiers) were scheme covenants, and part of the scheme. I do not think that he particularly relied on the covenant not to keep any animals on the premises without the consent in writing of the landlord, but it might be possible that he could rely to some extent on that covenant.

In support of his case on this point counsel for the plaintiff called our attention H to Hudson v. Cripps (10), Alexander v. Mansions Proprietary, Ltd. (11) and Newman v. Real Estate Debenture Corporation, Ltd., and Flower Decorations, Ltd. (12). He also mentioned Gedge v. Bartlett (13), though he did not actually refer us to the report of that case. In Hudson v. Cripps (10) the building in question, known as Oxford Mansions, was a large block containing at least 21 flats. After considering the provisions of the agreement between the parties, NORTH, J., came to the conclusion that there was a scheme for the general management of the building. I do not think I need refer to that case in detail. It is sufficiently referred to in Newman's case (12), to which I shall have to turn later. In Alexander v. Mansions Proprietary, Ltd. (11) the building in question was St. Ermin's Mansions, a large block of flats in Westminster. There again, STIRLING, J., was of the opinion that there was a scheme, but he did not grant an injunction. The report (16 T.L.R. 432) states that the learned judge said:

> "Having regard, however, to a certain amount of delay on the part of the plaintiffs and to all the facts of the case, his Lordship thought he might, in accordance with the law as stated in Sayers v. Collyer (14), exercise his discretion by saying that justice would best be done by directing an inquiry as to damages."

Both these cases dealt with buildings of substantial size, and the sheet anchor of the argument of counsel for the plaintiff was Newman v. Real Estate Debenture Corporation, Ltd. (12), a decision of ATKINSON, J. In that case the court was dealing with a single building in South Audley Street, the ground floor of which was used as a shop. The shop was shut off from the upper floors, and the upper floors were, and always had been, used as residential flats. There were other points besides the question which is relevant to this matter, viz., whether there was a scheme under which the building could be used only for residential purposes, but this question was thoroughly examined by ATKINSON, J. He stated the facts and he read covenants from the head lease under which the lessor to Mr. Newman held, and which contained (inter alia) a covenant restricting the user of the premises against carrying on a business, a covenant against keeping any fowls, and a covenant against making or permitting to be made any alterations. It was plain that, while the ground floor was designed as a shop, the rest of the building was designed for, and laid out as, high-class residential flats. The whole building had always been so used. The leases of the premises had always been in the same form and contained a series of covenants which bound each of the lessees and were in identical terms. Those covenants are set out in the report ([1940] 1 All E.R. 136, 137), and I need not read them all in full. It is to be observed that covenant (i) was a covenant :

> "... to occupy and use the demised premises as private dwelling-rooms only and not to use the same or any part thereof or permit the same or any part thereof to be used for any trade business or calling whatsoever ..."

Covenants (j) and (k) were :

> "(j) Not to permit any public auction or sale. (k) To observe and comply with all reasonable regulations and arrangements which may from time to time be made by the lessor for the proper management of the building or for the general comfort and convenience of the tenants and occupiers thereof and not to do or permit anything which may be contrary to or inconsistent with such of the covenants and conditions of head lease of the building from His Grace the Duke of Westminster as appear herein and to indemnify the lessor in respect of any breach by the lessee of such covenants and conditions."

There were other covenants, but I do not think I need read them in full, except that I should observe that ATKINSON, J., said (ibid., 138) :

> "There were, in fact, no written regulations, because the lease itself contains a number as to washing, coal and one thing and another."

In other words, the lease contained all those kind of regulations which one generally finds applicable to flats forming part of a block of flats. ATKINSON, J., said (ibid., 137) :

> "It is plain that each lease shows on the face of it that it was made in respect of a residential flat forming part of a building which was used for > the same particular purpose. The restrictions were clearly intended to be, and were in fact, for the benefit of the flats and their tenants. The restricted user cannot be explained as being necessary to secure compliance with covenants in a head lease. I have no doubt that each lessee either knew or took it for granted that the restrictions imposed on him were also imposed on the other lessees, and were so imposed for their mutual benefit inter se. A I have no doubt that the various lessors knew that their lessees so believed, and that it was upon that basis that they took their leases. Mr. Ritchie, who acted for Mrs. Turrill, and who was called as a witness, said they wanted all the lessees to take it for granted that the only permitted user of all the flats was for residential purposes, and that the appearance of the building would itself create that impression. A general observance of the B restrictions was certainly calculated to enhance the value of the various flats, and would enure for the benefit of their occupiers as well as for that of the lessors."

After referring to Hudson v. Cripps (10), Gedge v. Bartlett (13) and Jaeger v. Mansions Consolidated, Ltd. (15), ATKINSON, J., dealt with Elliston v. Reacher (6). He set out the passage which I have already read, and said ([1940] 1 All E.R. C 140) :

> " If one applies what is there said to a block of flats, a scheme certainly is established and a covenant implied binding the lessor not to act in contravention of it where it is established that, previous to the demise to the plaintiff, the lessor or his predecessors in title had designed and constructed the building for letting as residential flats, subject to restrictions D intended to be imposed on all the flats, which, though possibly varying in detail, were consistent, and consistent only, with a general scheme of management, that these restrictions were intended by the lessor to be and were in fact for the benefit of all the flats, and that the plaintiff took his lease upon the footing, or in the belief, that the restriction would enure for the benefit of the other flats, and on the well-founded assumption that E there were similar restrictions binding the other flats, which would in turn enure for his benefit. Undoubtedly a general observance of these restrictions would in fact enhance the value of the flats, and it is, therefore, an easy inference that the lessor intended the restrictions to be for the benefit of all the flats. I think that everything there applies to this case."

F I do not think there is anything more in the judgment of ATKINSON, J., to which I need refer. I will observe that there is an editorial note on that case ([1940] 1 All E.R. 132) in which it is said :

> " The principle generally known as the building scheme is commonly applied to a substantial area. It has in the past been applied to blocks of flats of considerable size, but not, apparently, to a building of the size here G considered. However, no lower limit to the size of the ' building estate ' has ever been suggested, and it seems logical that the principle should be applied even to a small number of flats in a single building, since the user of any one part of the premises must materially affect the comfort of the remainder."

I think it may fairly be said that Newman's case (12) represents the high-water H mark of cases where a scheme can be inferred. It certainly represents the high-water mark of reported cases in which it has been inferred. Counsel for the defendants says that he would, if necessary, have been prepared to challenge the correctness of the decision in that case. I see no reason for us to do so, as, even if we accept it as correct law, in my opinion, it does not govern the case now before us.

When the matter was before the learned county court judge he rejected the argument that there was a scheme on two grounds. First he said :

> " Newman v. Real Estate Debenture Corporation, Ltd. (12) was something of an innovation. It would be a great innovation to apply it to a small house not converted into separate self-contained flats but where each floor is let to a separate tenant."

Secondly, he said :

> " The various tenancy agreements of which evidence has been given are consistent with the desire of the landlord to protect himself because of terms in his own lease. In Newman's case (12) there were no covenants in the head lease to explain the restrictive covenants in the leases to the various tenants."

With both those comments I respectfully agree. Counsel for the plaintiff said that the conclusion based on the alleged desire of the landlord to protect himself because of terms in his own lease broke down on fact because the covenants in the sub-leases went much further than was necessary to secure compliance with the covenants in the head lease—first, because they were absolute covenants against user other than as a private dwelling-house, whereas the superior landlord had wider powers of user than as a private dwelling-house, and, secondly, because there were clauses included to which there were no corresponding clause in the head lease. He referred in particular in this connection to the provision that the landlord was not to exhibit on any part of the premises any sign, placard or bill saying that apartments were to be let. I agree with the contrary submission made by counsel for the defendants. It seems to me that, although the terms of the tenancy agreement do not agree absolutely with the provisions of the head lease, they are such as could reasonably and would naturally be put into a tenancy agreement relating to a small flat in order to ensure, as far as possible, that the terms of the head lease were not infringed. I say " as far as possible," because the very splitting up of this building into separate leases was of itself, I think, a technical breach of the head lease, in that the covenant therein was for user as a single private dwelling-house. I also agree with the learned judge that it would be a strong order to extend the principle of the cases brought to our attention to an amorphous building of this kind, originally built as one dwelling and never physically split into separate dwelling-houses. It seems to me that we should be straining the principles applicable to a scheme far beyond what is reasonable or natural if we were to apply the principle of Newman's case (12) to the present case.

I would observe in particular that in Newman's case (12) there was in each of the tenancy agreements a clause binding the tenants to observe and comply with all reasonable regulations and arrangements which might from time to time be made by the lessor for the proper management of the building. Now that necessarily suggests to one's mind that some general scheme, intended to be applied to the whole building, is contemplated. There is no such clause here. There are only seven covenants all told, and only two of them, it is suggested, could formally constitute part of a scheme. In those circumstances it seems to me that it would be very wrong to infer (I quote again from the judgment of PARKER, J. ([1908] 2 Ch. 384) in Elliston v. Reacher (6)

> " . . . that these restrictions were intended by the common vendor to be and were for the benefit of all the lots intended to be sold whether or not they were also intended to be and were for the benefit of other land retained by the vendor."

For the words " common vendor," I should say, in this case, " common lessor."

I would add that the scheme is alleged to be a scheme for user as private dwelling-houses only, but from the very beginning ground floor and basement were used by the common lessor for the purpose of carrying on a club of some kind or another. I would further add that this is not a case where we are dealing only with the intention to be inferred from the surrounding circumstances. Mr. Foster gave evidence and deposed to the fact that he had no intention of carrying out a scheme, and that his only intention was to grant tenancies of some kind to the various parties. The learned judge thought that that evidence was inadmissible. I see no reason why, if the fact that has to be decided is the intention of someone, his own evidence of what that intention was should be excluded. Be that as it may, I think that counsel for the plaintiff was justified in his comment that in a case of this kind, where a witness is giving evidence in 1949 in regard to something that happened in 1940, the surrounding circumstances in 1940 may be a better guide to the man's intention than what he says on the subject in 1949, nine years later, without any documents to corroborate the evidence he then gives. But, applying the test of surrounding circumstances, for the reasons I have given I think it is impossible to come to the conclusion that in this case we can attribute to Mr. Foster the intention required in order to establish a letting scheme.

As we have come to this conclusion, it necessarily follows that the appeal should be dismissed. It is, therefore, unnecessary for me to deal with the interesting question which was raised as to what the position would have been had we reached a contrary conclusion, and, in particular, it is not necessary for us to deal with the two points mentioned by counsel for the defendants at the end of his argument, viz., (i) Is the plaintiff entitled to enforce the scheme ? (ii) Does the burden bind the present defendants who claim under Mr. Foster ? It is also unnecessary for me to say what would have been the relief we would have granted had we been of a contrary conclusion. I think there would have been a good deal of force in an argument based on Alexander v. Mansions Proprietary, Ltd. (11) that this is not a case where an injunction might have been granted.

BUCKNILL, L.J. : I agree that the appeal will be dismissed for the reasons given by COHEN, L.J.

PARIS v. STEPNEY BOROUGH COUNCIL.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Lord Goddard, C.J., Asquith, L.J. and Vaisey, J.), October 27, 1949.]

Master and Servant—Injury to workman—Liability of employer—Garage fitter—Need to provide goggles—Workman with only one eye—Injury to other eye.

A workman who, owing to a cataract, only had the use of one eye, was employed as a fitter in the garage of the defendant Borough Council. On the day in question, while he was using a hammer to remove a bolt on a vehicle, a chip of metal flew off and entered his good eye, so injuring it that he became totally blind. The defendants did not provide goggles for the workman to wear while he was engaged in such an operation.

HELD : the operation on which the workman was engaged was not a dangerous operation and there was no general duty on the defendants to provide goggles for their workmen ; the fact that the consequences of an accident to an eye would be more serious to him than to a man with normal sight did not impose a greater duty on the Borough Council to provide protection for him than the duty owed by them to other employees ; and, therefore, the Borough Council could not be held liable for the injury.

[AS TO MASTER'S DUTY AT COMMON LAW, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 22, pp. 187-194, paras. 313-328; and for Cases, see DIGEST, Vol. 34, pp. 194-220, Nos. 1580-1824.]

Appeal by the workman and Cross Appeal by the employers, the Stepney Borough Council, from a judgment of Lynskey, J., dated Apr. 11, 1949, who held that the employers were negligent in not providing goggles to the workman, a one-eyed man, who on May 28, 1947, while working in the employers' garage suffered an injury causing total blindness. The learned judge awarded the workman £5,250 damages. The Court of Appeal now allowed the cross appeal holding that, the fact that the workman had only one effective eye, did not enlarge the duty owed by the employers towards him. The court directed that the workman's appeal should stand over for three months with liberty to apply under s. 29 (2) of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1925.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: This is an appeal from a judgment of Lynskey, J., in an action brought by a workman against his employers, the Stepney Borough Council, for an injury which he received to his eye. The learned judge gave judgment for the workman.

When the workman entered the service of the employers he had one eye which was useless owing to cataract, and the accident has rendered his other eye useless, so that the man is blind. The point which has been argued is one of some general importance, because it affects the duty which is owed by an employer to his workmen.

The workman was employed in the employers' garage as a fitter and part of his duty was to attend to the maintenance and cleaning of motor vehicles. The vehicle on which he was engaged at the time of the accident was what is known as a gulley cleanser. A 'U' piece that had to be removed from the back axle, was fastened on by a bolt, and owing to rust, the workman used a hammer to knock out the bolt. In doing so a piece of metal flew off the bolt and entered his good eye. It is said that there was a breach of duty on the part of the employers because they did not supply goggles, it being well-known that specks of metal will fly off bolts of this description, but the evidence fell far short of showing that there was any duty on an employer to supply goggles in the ordinary way. There is no finding by the learned judge that this was a dangerous operation, and on the evidence it seems to be clear there could not have been such a finding. To knock out a metal bolt is an operation which any chauffeur who is attending to his employer's car might be called on to do at any moment. Of course, if a hammer is used in knocking a piece of metal it is always possible that a chip of the metal will fly off, but to say that it is, therefore, a dangerous operation would be extravagant. The operation is not to be classed as dangerous because very occasionally, or in the course of years, an accident may happen.

The way that the learned judge has decided the case and the ground on which counsel for the workman has endeavoured to uphold the judgment is that as this workman had one eye only a greater duty was owed to him than was owed to other persons because the consequences of an accident would be so much more serious. The judgment is summed up in one passage which is to this effect:

> "The result is, in my view, in this case on the evidence, even of the defendants [employers] apart from that of the plaintiff [workman], that I am satisfied here that there was so far as this particular plaintiff was concerned, a duty on the employers to provide goggles and require the use of goggles as part of their system. In these circumstances it seems to me that the employers have failed in their duty and the plaintiff is entitled to recover."

In other words, the learned judge is deciding that there was a duty on the employers to provide a particular protection for this particular man, but, with great respect to the learned judge, I think he is confusing the obligation of the employers with the damage which may result to this particular workman. Before it is established that there was an obligation on the employers to provide goggles, or any particular protection, to the workman, it has got to be shown that he was engaged in a dangerous operation. He was not. If two men had been employed on the operation, one with two good eyes and one with only one good eye, the risk would have been exactly the same, and, as there was no particular risk or danger in this operation, neither man would have been exposed to an unusual danger. The duty of the employer is not to expose his workmen to unusual danger and to supply them with proper plant for the carrying out of their duties. If, therefore, there was no unusual danger, and if it was a matter of ordinary working in the ordinary course of business and trade which does not require the use of goggles, there was no obligation on the employers to provide them. The fact that if an accident does happen, the damage which a particular workman will suffer will be greater, does not seem to me to be the test in this case. So far as I can see, there was no unusual danger to which the workman was exposed. He was not exposed to any greater danger than any other man who was employed in the garage ; it was not in itself a dangerous operation ; the goggles were not a thing which it was the duty of the employers to provide in carrying out this particular operation, and I cannot see, therefore, that there was a duty to provide goggles because if an accident did happen the consequences would be greater to one man rather than to another.

For these reasons I regret that I cannot agree with the judgment of the learned judge, and, in my opinion, this appeal should be allowed.

ASQUITH, L.J. : I am of the same opinion. It is not entirely clear whether the learned judge is holding that the duty to provide and enforce the use of goggles applies to all men doing this particular job and a fortiori to a man with a particular disability as the workman suffered from, or whether he is saying it is only a duty owing to this particular employee. On the whole I am satisfied that he means the latter, and, if he did, I respectfully agree with the views stated by my Lord. The disability can only be relevant to the stringency of the duty owed to the workman if it increases the risk to which the workman is exposed. A one-eyed man is no more likely to get a splinter or a chip in his eye than is a two-eyed man. The risk is no greater, but the damage is greater to a man using his only good eye than to a man using two good eyes. The quantum of damage, however, is one thing, and the scope of duty is another. The greater risk of injury is not the same thing as the risk of greater injury, and the first thing seems to me to be relevant here. For these reasons I agree with my Lord that the appeal should be allowed.

VAISEY, J. : With great respect to LYNSKEY, J., it seems to me that his judgment involves a certain confusion of thought. For myself I cannot see how the fact that the workman had only one eye can really have been material to the point which he had to decide. The consequence of an accident to him would certainly be liable to be specially serious, but the risk of danger was precisely the same to him as it was, or would have been, to a workman with two eyes. The learned judge did not find that the risk of danger here was of such a character that it was the general duty of the employers to take precautions against it, and I cannot for myself see that they were under any particular duty in the case of a particular employee merely because the personal consequences to that employee would be greater than they would be to some of his fellow employees. I agree that the appeal should be allowed.

Appeal allowed.

INLAND REVENUE COMMISSIONERS v. DUNCANSON.

[King's Bench Division (Croom-Johnson, J.), October 27, 1949.]

Income Tax—Annuity "free of income tax and surtax"—Computation of annuitant's total income for surtax purposes—Inclusion of amount of repaid income tax returned by annuitant to trustees—Income Tax Act, 1918 (c. 40), s. 27, All Schedules Rules, r. 19.

By a will and deeds of family arrangement an annuitant was entitled to an annuity of £2,000 free of income tax and surtax. In accordance with the rule in Re Pettit ([1922] 2 Ch. 765), she handed over to the trustees of the will £68 17*s.* 6*d.* representing that proportion of the income tax reliefs to which she was entitled which the annuity bore to her total income. She claimed that, in computing her total income for surtax purposes, the amount of such payment should be excluded.

Held : the sum so handed over to the trustees was not money to which the annuitant was beneficially entitled, and, therefore, it was properly excluded in computing her total income for surtax purposes.

Case Stated by the Special Commissioners of Income Tax.

The Special Commissioners had found that the grossed equivalent of the sum of £68 17*s.* 6*d.* paid over by the annuitant to the trustees did not form part of the gift of the annuity under the will and did not fall to be included in the annuitant's total income for surtax purposes. The Crown appealed, and Croom-Johnson, J., before whom it was agreed to consider only the net figure of £68 17*s.* 6*d.*, held (without prejudice to the question of the amount to be deducted from the assessed figure) that the amount handed to the trustees should be excluded.

Graham-Dixon for the taxpayer.

CROOM-JOHNSON, J. : This is a Case stated by the Special Commissioners on an appeal by the taxpayer, Mrs. Duncanson, against an assessment to surtax in the sum of £5,481, for the year ending Apr. 5, 1947, made on her under the Income Tax Acts. The only question raised by the appeal is whether the sum of £68 17*s.* 6*d.* is properly included in the taxpayer's total income for surtax purposes, which, I suppose, can be taken to be that described in the Income Tax Act, 1918, s. 27 (1). I confess that I have found the question a difficult one, and my mind has been in a state of indecision through most of the argument. The amount involved is small, but I was told that a serious question of principle is at stake.

Under the will of her husband, who died on Oct. 19, 1933, the taxpayer became entitled to an annuity of £5,000 expressed to be "free of income tax and surtax." By subsequent deeds made, as I understand, by way of family arrangement, the taxpayer released a part of the annuity, and at the material time the estate of her late husband was liable to pay to her only an annuity of £2,000 per annum free of income tax and surtax. On paying her the annuity, the trustees deducted income tax at the standard rate pursuant to r. 19 of the All Schedules Rules. Accordingly, she made a claim under the Income Tax Act, 1918, s. 27, alleging that, having regard to her total income, including whatever was the right income from this tax-free annuity, more tax had been deducted at the source than she was liable to pay. That repayment claim was ultimately allowed in the sum of £68 17*s.* 6*d.* It was said in the Case that that was attributable to the "said annuity of £2,000," but it has been agreed at the Bar that the real meaning of that word "attributable" is that it is so much of the deductions and allowances to which she was entitled in a claim under s. 27 in respect of the annuity in question. On receiving that £68 17*s.* 6*d.* the taxpayer paid it to the trustees of her husband's estate, and claimed that, rightly regarded, the amount of her annuity was only to be arrived at after deducting the £68 17*s.* 6*d.* from the totality of the tax which she had suffered by way of deduction. The point really arises in the course of assessing surtax, but it has been agreed before me that all I need have regard to is that £68 17*s.* 6*d.*, and what flows from that, according to which way the decision should ultimately be, will be dealt with between the parties in the appropriate way so far as liability to surtax is concerned. The Special Commissioners came to the conclusion that the grossed equivalent of £68 17*s.* 6*d.* ought not to have been included, and, accordingly, they reduced the assessment to the sum of £5,373. The Crown appeals.

The question of the proper construction of a bequest in a will of such an annuity has had to be examined on many occasions, but I do not think that I need look further than Inland Revenue Comrs. v. Cook (1). In that case VISCOUNT MAUGHAM, who made the leading speech, said ([1945] 2 All E.R. 380) :

> "Gifts by will of annuities free from income tax have been common in both Scotland and England for many years, and have given rise to a large number of reported decisions. At an early stage there was a little hesitation in dealing with them, for it was and is apparent that a named annual sum cannot literally be given free from income tax, since the annuitant must normally pay income tax on his or her income, and what is sometimes called a benevolent construction had to be applied if the plain intention of the will was to be carried out. That intention could be achieved by the simple means of holding that the testator must have intended to give, in addition to the fixed annuity, such a sum as would enable the trustees in each year to discharge the income tax on the total amount of the fixed annuity and the additional sum and to pay the balance which in the normal case would be the exact amount of the stated annuity to the annuitant. Unless there is something special in the language of the will, which prevented that construction being adopted, that became the recognised construction in cases of gifts of annuities of fixed amounts free of income tax both in England and Scotland."

The noble Lord then cites a Scottish case, Hunter's Trustees v. Mitchell (2), particularly a passage (1930 S.C. 982) in which LORD SANDS made certain observations which LORD MAUGHAM quotes.

It has to be borne in mind that, in the normal way, trustees in such a case, receiving the general income of so much of the estate as has not been distributed among the parties entitled under the devises and bequests in the will, pay income tax out of the general fund of income, and then, out of the net fund of the income, after paying tax, they have to pay the net amount of the annuities. As the fund out of which an annuity is paid is a fund achieved after the payment of tax, it follows that, in effect, the tax in respect of the annuity has been paid. Applying the benevolent construction spoken to by LORD MAUGHAM, it follows, in arriving at the true benefit which the annuitant gets from the estate, if the bequest of the annuity is to be upheld as not offending against the general principle of the Income Tax Acts, that it is necessary to go through a process which is called "grossing," not a word which I much admire, but one which is now used to explain a well-known process. It starts with the problem : What is the sum of money which, after it has suffered tax at the standard rate, will provide the net annuity free of tax given by the will ? Once that has been found, there is not much difficulty about the matter. A

If I were left to deal with this question as res integra, I might have come to a certain view under the Income Tax Act, 1918, All Schedules Rules, r. 19, which applies in the case of an annuity in a will. A person liable to make a payment of an annuity :

> ". . . shall be entitled, on making such payment, to deduct and retain thereout a sum representing the amount of the tax thereon at the rate or rates of tax in force during the period through which the said payment was accruing due. The person to whom such payment is made shall allow such deduction upon the receipt of the residue of the same, and the person making such deduction shall be acquitted and discharged of so much money as is represented by the deduction, as if that sum had been actually paid." B C

There is no provision, so far as I am aware, under which the person making the payment—in this case the trustees—has any power or any right to make a claim to repayment on behalf of the annuitant of tax so deducted from his or her income except in a way which I will indicate when I come to look at the authorities on a somewhat similar branch of the subject. Rule 19, of course, does not prevent the annuitant making his claim under s. 27 of the Act for the return of tax alleged D to be overpaid. As I have already explained, that is what happened in this case. It might have been possible, perhaps, to say that, but for the authorities, when the trustees had deducted tax at the standard rate pursuant to r. 19 and paid the annuity as provided in the will, the terms of the will had been satisfied, leaving it to the annuitant to make his claim for repayment and entitling him to say that the money which he was allowed by way of repayment was his own money. E In other words, it might have been attractive at one time to say that "free of tax" could be construed to mean "free of such tax as the trustees were entitled, and, indeed, bound to deduct, and the annuitant bound to allow, pursuant to r. 19", but this matter is, I think, governed, among other things, by what was said in Cook's case (1), to which I have referred. In that case the whole question of this grossing principle came up for examination. The annuitant was F entitled to an annuity at the rate of £100 per annum payable "free of all deductions including income tax and government duty." The annuity was paid wholly out of income which had been brought into charge to income tax, and, therefore, out of a fund which had borne income tax. The trustees then paid the £100 in accordance with the terms of the will by two payments of £50 each at two periods of time in the course of each year. Miss Cook, the annuitant, then claimed G repayment of income tax, and the Crown took the point, among others, that she had not paid tax and was not liable to pay tax, because her income was under the exemption limit of £125, if it was right to assume that the actual amount of the tax free income was to be regarded, namely, £100, and that she could not make a repayment claim. The House of Lords, affirming the decision of the majority of the General Commissioners at Edinburgh, ultimately held H that she was so entitled. The method adopted there was to look and see what truly was the income which was derived by the annuitant from this gift of a tax free annuity. It is perfectly true, as counsel for the Crown has pointed out to me, that the claim for repayment was in that form and that the basis of it was by putting in a figure of income grossed by adding tax at the standard rate, which then was seven shillings. Without going in detail through the speeches which were delivered in the House of Lords, I think, by three of their Lordships, and an opinion from which I have derived some assistance, of the Lord President, LORD NORMAND, in the Court of Session, it is plain that the House of Lords held that that was the right method of approach, but I think they did more than that. I think that at least two of their Lordships accepted the view that the deduction under r. 19 of tax at the standard rate was, as LORD MAUGHAM called it (ibid., 381), " a provisional calculation." LORD MAUGHAM seems to have held A (ibid.) that the amount of the annual benefits given on the true construction of the will was £100 plus the sum which might ultimately be proved to be payable by the annuitant for income tax for that year so as to leave £100 for her personal behoof. In other words, I gather that on that basis one would add back the real amount of tax which had been suffered, and not the notional figure, which I have suggested, based on r. 19. If that is right, it would follow, as I judge from B some observations by LORD PORTER at the end of his speech (ibid., 390), that, if the annuitant does make a claim for repayment—that is for adjustment of tax to acertain the right amount—and recovers something on the basis that what has been deducted under r. 19 is too much, that money is caught, as it were, by the words of the will " free of tax " and must be handed over to the trustees, who had paid the tax by paying the tax on the fund out of which the C annuitant was paid.

If that is the right view of this case, it would seem to follow that, if the Revenue got tax at nine shillings in the pound, for the purpose of grossing the value of the tax free annuity one would add back nine shillings in the pound, but, if it turns out that the annuitant is not ultimately proved to be liable to pay that amount of tax, but must pay something less, to that extent the trustees are D entitled to receive the repaid money so that it falls into the balance of the income of the residuary estate and remains in their hands for whomsoever is entitled to it.

This certainly adds a complication, and, but for three cases which have been cited to me, I might have been tempted, if the matter had come to me as a new matter, to have held that the amount in question is one which the annuitant E would be entitled to put into her own pocket, and would be something which would leave her with the full amount of tax grossed and added back for the purpose of making a return of her true income under s. 27. The matter is not, however, free from authority, even apart from LORD PORTER's observations in the Cook case (1). In Re Pettit (3), a case decided by ROMER, J., this point as to who was entitled to money which an annuitant obtained by way of repayment F came up for decision. Incidentally, I observe that Re Pettit (3) was cited in Cook's case (1). The decision was that the annuitant did not take the money for himself, but was entitled only to such proportion of the amount repaid as was not referable to the annuity. To be quite certain that I am putting it accurately, I take this from the headnote :

> " Held, that the residuary estate of the testator is entitled to such pro- G portion of the sum so repaid as the annuity bears to the total income of the annuitant."

It is true that, apparently, the only question really litigated in that case was whether these sums, or any part thereof, formed part of the residuary estate of the testator. It is also true, as far as I have been able to discover, that r. 19 was not cited to the learned judge. ROMER, J. ([1922] 2 Ch. 769) says that in H an earlier case, Re Hutty (4), where it had been agreed that some of the repaid money had to go back to the estate, SARGANT, J., had decided :

> " that the trustees were entitled in each case to such proportion of the total sum repaid as the annuity bore to the total income of the annuitant."

But in Re Pettit (3), when the whole question was raised and dealt with, ROMER, J., came to the conclusion that it was not money which the annuitant was entitled to have in his own pocket and keep, for he says (ibid., 770) :

> "... I cannot understand on what ground it can be suggested that such excess should be retained by the annuitant who has not paid it, and not be handed back to the residuary legatees who have."

I think by "residuary legatees" he means the trustees, who are ultimately liable to account to the residuary legatees.

That case was examined by Eve, J., in Re Jones (5). In that case r. 19 was cited. The question was whether, on the language of the particular bequest of the annuity, the reasoning of the judgment in Re Pettit (3) applied. It was held that it did not. The language there was "such an annuity as after deducting therefrom income tax at the current rate for the time being would amount to the clear yearly sum of £350 free of duty." The learned judge not only accepted Re Pettit (3) as being a decision which bound him, but he appears to have accepted its correctness, and the case was apparently argued on that basis. In 1936 Bennett, J., had to solve the problem of what was to happen if the annuitant declined to make a claim for repayment of tax notionally overpaid under s. 27. After all, why should the annuitant make a claim if the money has to be handed over to the trustees ? That point came up for decision in Re Kingcome (6). Again I need not cite passages from the judgment, but the learned judge, accepting the law as laid down by Romer, J., in Re Pettit (3), took the view that, in the circumstances, the court ought to do everything it could to enable the income tax that had been overpaid to be recovered, and held that the annuitant was a trustee of her statutory right

> "to recover for the benefit of the testator's estate the tax overpaid in respect of her annuity and was bound at the request of the trustees to sign a proper application form for that purpose."

I do not think that I shall serve any useful purpose, as a judge of first instance, in examining the reasoning of that case or coming to any independent conclusion of my own about it. The case binds me.

It seems to me that the result in the present case is this. Here is a sum of money, £68 17*s*. 6*d*., which this annuitant has succeeded in getting back from the Revenue. That sum was handed over by her to the trustees of the estate. I think, on the authorities, she was bound to hand it over. Accordingly, it was not money to which she was beneficially entitled. It was money which she received as a bare trustee for the trustees. She had no other duty to perform, once she had it, other than the duty to hand it over to them. In those circumstances, I do not think it is correct to say that it was her income at all. It follows that the answer to the question is that the Special Commissioners came to a right conclusion. I can see no trace of any misdirection, or of the consideration of anything which is improper for them to consider. The result is that the appeal fails and there must be an order in favour of the taxpayer. I understand the parties have made an agreement about this matter, which raises a question of some public importance, by which the costs of the taxpayer will in any case be paid by the Crown. In those circumstances, it is unnecessary that I should make any formal order about it.

Appeal dismissed.

STONE v. BOLTON AND OTHERS.

[Court of Appeal (Somervell, Singleton and Jenkins, L.JJ.), October 13, 14, November 2, 1949.]

Nuisance—Negligence—Sport—Cricket—Injury from ball hit from ground into highway.

During a cricket match a batsman hit a ball which struck and injured the plaintiff who was standing on a highway adjoining the ground. The ball was hit out of the ground at a point at which there was a protective fence rising to seventeen feet above the cricket pitch. The distance from the striker to the fence was about seventy-eight yards and that to the place where the plaintiff was hit some ninety-eight yards. The ground had been occupied and used as a cricket ground for about ninety years and there was evidence that on some six to ten occasions in a period of thirty-five years a ball had been hit into the highway, but no one had been injured. The plaintiff claimed damages from the defendants, as occupiers of the ground, in nuisance and, alternatively, negligence.

Held : (i) the fact that occasionally a ball had been hit into the highway did not create a sufficient interference with the use and enjoyment of the highway as to constitute a nuisance.

(ii) (Somervell, L.J., dissentiente) there being a foreseeable risk of a ball being hit into the road, the defendants were under a duty to take reasonable care to avoid injury to anyone on the road ; they had failed to carry out this duty ; and, therefore, they were liable in negligence to the plaintiff.

Per Jenkins, L.J. : The case is, I think, one to which the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur can be fairly applied : Byrne v. Boadle (1863) (2 H. & C. 722). The plaintiff is struck and injured by a cricket ball hit out of a ground occupied and controlled by the defendants. Surely that circumstance in itself suffices to place on the defendants the burden, at least, of showing either that the event was one which they could not reasonably have foreseen as a consequence of their use of the ground for cricket, or that the event was one which they had taken all reasonably practicable steps to prevent. This burden the defendants have, as it seems to me, wholly failed to discharge.

Appeal of the plaintiff from a decision of Oliver, J., at Manchester Assizes, dated Dec. 20, 1948, dismissing the plaintiff's claim for damages for negligence and nuisance.

The plaintiff claimed damages for injuries received when she was struck by a cricket ball while standing in a road adjoining a cricket field occupied by a cricket club of which the defendants (who were sued on behalf of themselves and all other members of the club) were members. Oliver, J., held that there was no evidence of negligence and that nuisance had not been established. The Court of Appeal, by a majority, now allowed the appeal. The facts appear in the judgments.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 2. SOMERVELL, L.J. : I will ask Singleton, L.J., to deliver the first judgment.

The following judgments were read.

SINGLETON, L.J. : The defendants are occupiers of a cricket ground which has been used as such for eighty or ninety years. An alteration was made in the ground about the year 1910. A builder wished to have some of the ground at the northern end. An arrangement was arrived at under which the club allowed the builder to have the land he wanted, and, in return, the builder gave the club a strip of land beyond what was up to that time, their southern boundary. Beckenham Road was constructed on part of the land which had been given up by the club and at a later stage houses were built on that road. The plaintiff lives at 10 Beckenham Road, and on Aug. 9, 1947, she was standing on the roadway by her garden gate when she was struck on the head and injured by a cricket ball, the result of a hit by one of a visiting side engaged in a Saturday afternoon match against the Cheetham 2nd XI. She brought an action against the defendants claiming damages for personal injuries, alleging that the defendants were negligent, and, also, that the striking of a cricket ball into the road was, and constituted, a nuisance for the consequences of which the defendants were responsible in law. Oliver, J., gave judgment for the defendants with costs.

On the appeal counsel put nuisance in the forefront of the plaintiff's case, and in support of it he relied, not only on the allegation as framed in the statement of claim, but on the fact that, over a long period, balls had from time to time being hit into Beckenham Road, alleging that the defendants were causing a public nuisance thereby, and that, as the plaintiff had suffered damage therefrom, she was entitled to succeed. It seems to me that an answer to the nuisance claim as pleaded is that the striking of the ball which hit the plaintiff was not the act of the defendants or of any servant or agent of theirs or of anyone for whose acts they are responsible. The player who struck the ball is not a party to the action. The claim that the defendants caused a public nuisance in promoting or arranging cricket matches on this ground causes greater difficulty. There is no doubt that balls were hit over the fence and into Beckenham Road from time to time over a long span of years. The evidence of both sides shows that. There is, however, nothing to show that, before this accident, any discomfort or interference had been caused. There is no evidence of any complaint or of any inconvenience to anyone before Aug. 9, 1947. In these circumstances, I am not disposed to hold that the playing of cricket on this ground constituted a public nuisance by reason of the fact that occasionally—and it was very seldom—a ball was hit into Beckenham Road. Reliance was placed by counsel for the plaintiff on the decision in Castle v. St. Augustine's Links, Ltd. (1). In that case the evidence was to the effect that golf balls were very frequently sliced on to or over the public highway. There was evidence of substantial interference with the use and enjoyment of the road. In that respect the case is distinguishable from the one before this court.

I now come to deal with the claim based on negligence, which is in effect an allegation that the defendants failed to exercise the care which the circumstances demanded. The ground is surrounded by a hoarding. On the western side, adjoining Waterloo Road, the hoarding is twelve feet high and it is useful in providing revenue from advertisements. On the northern, or Beckenham Road, end the hoarding is approximately seven feet high, but it is on higher ground so that the top of it is seventeen feet above the level of the wicket.

The plan shows that the length of the ground from north to south measured to the boundary, is 413 feet. Beyond that there is a short distance at each end between boundary and hoarding. The wickets are pitched nearer to the northern end than to the southern end of the ground. It would appear from the evidence of Mr. Milsom, one of the defendants, that this resulted from the alteration of the ground in 1910 or 1911. The wickets were left opposite the pavilion which A is on the western side of the ground. The result is that the northern wicket is 152 feet from the northern boundary whereas at the other end there is a distance of 195 feet between the southern wicket and the southern boundary, and in each case a further seventeen feet or thereabouts between boundary and hoarding. The ball which caused the injury was hit by the batsman at the southern wicket. OLIVER, J., in the course of his judgment, said that the distance from the striker B to the fence was about ninety yards. I cannot make it so much as this. Allowing sixty-six feet, the length of the pitch, I make it 152 plus 66 plus 17 = 235 feet or about seventy-eight yards. From the northern end wicket to the southern hoarding is about ninety-two yards.

At the time she was injured the plaintiff was on the highway. An accident of this kind does not happen in the ordinary course of things if proper care is C exercised, and it seems to me that the defendants are called on to explain it. Whether that be so or not, evidence was given on behalf of the plaintiff by a Mr. Brownson, who lives at 11, Beckenham Road, and said that on some five or six occasions cricket balls had struck his house or had fallen in his garden, that is to say, they had been hit over the hoarding. He was speaking of the last year or two before the accident. On behalf of the defendants, Mr. Newbold, captain D of the home side on Aug. 9, 1947, said he remembered hits into Beckenham Road, " but I should say I have never seen it hit into Beckenham Road during a match more than half a dozen times in all the years I have been to the ground—28." He described the offending hit as quite the biggest he had seen on the ground. Mr. Milsom, one of the defendants, thought the hit was the best he had ever seen on the ground. Mr. Bolton, another of the defendants, recollected E balls having been struck into Beckenham Road from six to ten times in a period of 33 years, and he appeared to indicate that it might have been when they were practising at that end. On this evidence it is clear that the defendants knew that there was a risk that any day a ball might be hit over the northern hoarding and into Beckenham Road. Such a hit involved danger to anyone on the road. That is obvious. In such circumstances there was a duty on those responsible— F the occupiers—to take reasonable care to avoid or prevent injury or damage to anyone on the highway. Clearly they ought to have considered how this could be done. They are not justified in sitting down and doing nothing until someone is injured. I am unable to find from the evidence that there was ever any consideration given to the matter from the time the hoarding was erected in 1910 or 1911. If they had considered it, they might have decided to raise the G height of the hoarding at the northern end. That would have reduced the risk of a hit into Beckenham Road though it might not have been sufficient to prevent this one carrying into the road. They might have decided on a change in the position of the wickets longitudinally. If they had placed them at equal distances north and south a hit over the northern hoarding would have had an additional carry of twenty-one feet. This would have added to the safety of H those using Beckenham Road, and, incidentally, the plaintiff would not have been hit on the head if it had been done. It is most undesirable that a high standard should be applied in a case of this kind. If the defendants had considered the matter and decided that the risks were very small and that they need not do very much, there might have been something to be said for them. So far as the evidence shows, they did nothing. That being so, they were failing in their duty and the burden ought to fall on them and not on a person injured on the highway.

In dealing with the question of negligence, OLIVER, J., said ([1949] 1 All E.R. 238) :

> " On the evidence before me I cannot find the defendants were negligent. In my opinion, this ground is quite large enough for all practical purposes of safety, particularly having regard to the height of the fence above the pitch. In thirty-eight years' experience no one has ever been injured before. Therefore, I acquit the defendants of negligence."

He had already said that the distance from the striker was about ninety yards which, as I have pointed out, was an error. I do not know that he would have taken another view if he had had the correct measurement, though he might have done so. With respect to the learned judge, I do not think he applied the proper test. The ground may have been quite large enough for all practical purposes of safety, but with the wickets as pitched a ball was driven into Beckenham Road now and then, and the defendants were aware of this. In those circumstances, they had a duty to take reasonable care, a duty to consider how the risk to anyone in Beckenham Road could be reduced, and, further, a duty to take reasonable steps to reduce a danger which could be foreseen. They failed to carry out their duty in any one of these respects. It is true to say that the plaintiff was injured through a big hit, but I cannot see from the evidence given that it was of so exceptional a nature that one like it could not be anticipated. There was, indeed, little evidence of an expert character on this head, or as to the lay-out of a cricket ground. In my view, the defendants failed to exercise the care which the circumstances demanded and they are responsible in damages for negligence.

I would allow the appeal and order that judgment be entered for the plaintiff for the sum provisionally assessed.

JENKINS, L.J. : In the afternoon of Aug. 9, 1947, the plaintiff, a Miss Bessie Stone, was standing on the pavement just outside the front garden of her house 10, Beckenham Road, Cheetham Hill, Manchester, when she was struck on the head by a cricket ball and injured. It is not in dispute that the offending ball came from the adjacent ground of the Cheetham Cricket Club, having been hit out of the ground by one of the batsmen of a visiting team in the course of a match against the Cheetham Club's 2nd XI. It is further not in dispute that the members of the Cheetham Cricket Club—an unincorporated association—are the occupiers of the ground in question, use it as a cricket ground, and organise games of cricket on it. In these circumstances the plaintiff sued three individuals—Messrs. Bolton, Milsom and Thompson—on behalf of themselves and all other members of the Cheetham Cricket Club for damages in respect of the injuries caused to her by the blow from the ball. The batsman whose stroke was the direct cause of the mishap was not sued, and, accordingly, we are not concerned with any claim the plaintiff may have against him. The plaintiff's claim against the club is put on the alternative grounds of nuisance and negligence, the nuisance being alleged to consist of the striking of the ball into Beckenham Road, and the negligence being alleged to consist of pitching the cricket pitch too near the Beckenham Road, failing to erect a hoarding or fence of sufficient height to prevent balls being struck into the road, and failing to ensure that cricket balls would not be struck into the road.

It appears from the evidence that the Cheetham Club's cricket ground has been occupied and used as such for a matter of ninety years. It originally included the site or part of the site of what is now Beckenham Road which was constructed in or about the year 1910. In or about that year the club gave up some yards of the northern end of the ground for Beckenham Road, receiving in exchange some additional ground to the south. The practice of the club before 1910 seems to have been to pitch the wickets north and south opposite the pavilion, which was on the west side of the ground, and to move them laterally east or west as the state of the ground might demand. This practice seems to have been continued after the alterations made in the northern and southern boundaries in 1910, with the result that the wicket at the Beckenham Road end is some forty feet nearer to the northern boundary than the other wicket is to the southern boundary, this difference roughly representing the shortening of the northern boundary effected by the alterations. According to a plan which was in evidence, the southern wicket (from which the ball was struck) was on the material date about seventy-five yards from the fence separating the ground from Beckenham Road and some ninety-eight yards from the point in Beckenham Road where the plaintiff was struck. Beckenham Road runs parallel with the northern boundary of the ground from its north-west corner to a point roughly due north of the wickets as pitched on the date in question, and thence turns in a north-easterly direction. The plaintiff's house is the second on the left after this turn, which accounts for the distance of some twenty yards between the northern fence of the ground and her front gate. The northern fence of the ground, which seems to have remained in all material respects the same since the boundary was moved in 1910, is a board fence six feet eleven inches high set on a bank which gives an additional height of some ten feet above the level of the pitch, the combined effective height of bank and fence being thus some seventeen feet.

A Mr. Brownson, who gave evidence for the plaintiff and lives at 11 Beckenham Road on the opposite side from the plaintiff, said that balls had been hit into his back yard or against the side of his house on several occasions during the 1946 and 1947 seasons. He put the number of occasions at perhaps five or six, but was obviously not prepared to commit himself to any exact number of occasions or to any precise dates. The back of Mr. Brownson's premises is some fifteen or twenty yards nearer the wicket from which the ball was struck than the spot on which the plaintiff was standing when she was hit. The plaintiff herself said in evidence that she had lived at 10 Beckenham Road for twelve years and that the occasion on which she was hit was the first time she had seen a ball struck out of the ground. On the defendants' side evidence was given by a Mr. Newbold, the captain of the Cheetham 2nd XI in the match of Aug. 9, 1947, to the effect that the hit in question was quite the biggest hit he had ever seen on the ground during his twenty-eight years' membership of the club. He could not say by how much it cleared the fence. He remembered previous occasions on which the ball had been hit into the Beckenham Road, but estimated that he had never seen it hit into the Beckenham Road during a match more than half a dozen times in all his twenty-eight years' membership of the club. The defendant, Milsom, a member of the club of over thirty years' standing, thought the hit in question was the best hit he had ever seen on the ground, and that it cleared the fence at the Beckenham Road end by "many, many feet." The defendant, Bolton, who had been a member of the club for thirty-three years, put the number of times the ball had been hit out of the ground in that period at six to ten times, "probably not ten," but may have intended to include in this estimate balls hit from practice nets placed nearer the Beckenham Road boundary than the regular pitch. There appear to have been no previous complaints to the club about balls being hit out of the ground, though Mr. Brownson said he had complained "to the man who fetched the ball" when hit into his premises. On these facts the learned judge rejected the plaintiff's claim both as to nuisance and as to negligence and dismissed the action, but for the assistance of this court, in the event of an appeal, he assessed the damages at £104 19*s.* 6*d.*

With the learned judge's reasoning and conclusion on the issue of nuisance I agree. I do not think a single isolated act causing direct damage such as the striking of a person on the highway by a cricket ball hit from adjacent premises can properly be brought under the head of nuisance on a highway. The gist of such a nuisance as it seems to me is the causing or permitting of a state of affairs from which damage is likely to result. If damage does, in fact, result to some individual on the highway, the person causing or permitting the state of affairs is liable because the state of affairs from which the damage flowed was due to his act or omission. It follows, in my view, that the plaintiff could only succeed in nuisance on the footing that the playing of cricket on the Cheetham Club's ground amounted to a nuisance which resulted in damage to herself in the shape of the blow she received from the errant ball. A claim in this form, although not pleaded, was argued before us, and also, apparently, before the learned judge. I am satisfied that it cannot succeed on the facts, which clearly establish that balls have been hit out of the ground only on rare occasions, and, accordingly, that the use of the ground for cricket with the fences as they are, and pitch sited as it is, cannot in itself be said to constitute a continuing source of danger to the neighbourhood or the public. Castle v. St. Augustine's Links, Ltd. (1), in which golf balls were shown to have been repeatedly sliced into the highway by players hitting from the adjacent tee of a hole running parallel with the road, was rightly distinguished by the learned judge.

If I am wrong in my view that the isolated act of hitting the ball which struck and injured the plaintiff cannot rightly be brought under the head of nuisance, I do not think the members of the Cheetham Club can be held to have caused or permitted the batsman concerned to make the particular hit constituting the nuisance so as to make them liable under this head.

On the issue of negligence the learned judge said ([1949] 1 All E.R. 238):

> " On the evidence before me I cannot find the defendants were negligent. In my opinion, this ground is quite large enough for all practical purposes of safety, particularly having regard to the height of the fence above the pitch. In thirty-eight years' experience no one has ever been injured before. Therefore, I acquit the defendants of negligence."

He also considered the applicability of the doctrine of Rylands v. Fletcher (2), and held, in my view quite rightly, that this doctrine had no application. He further accepted an argument for the defendants to the effect that, inasmuch as the cricket ground was in existence at the time Beckenham Road was dedicated as a public highway, the dedication took effect subject to any risks arising from the presence of the ground and its user for playing cricket. This argument was abandoned by the defendants before us, and I need, therefore, say no more about it.

Reverting to the issue of negligence, I find myself unable to accept the learned judge's conclusion on this aspect of the case. To support the claim in negligence it must be shown: (a) that the defendants were under a duty (absolute or qualified) to prevent balls being hit out of their ground to the danger of persons on the adjacent highway, and (b) that the hitting out of the ground of the ball which struck the plaintiff involved a breach of that duty. That the defendants, being the occupiers of the ground, and using it as they did for the purpose of playing cricket matches organised by them, were under some duty to prevent balls being hit out of the ground to the danger of persons in Beckenham Road, I have no doubt. It is less easy to define the precise extent of the duty. To hold the defendants under an unqualified duty to prevent balls being hit into the road in any circumstances would, I think, be to place an unreasonably heavy burden on them. The playing of cricket is, after all, a perfectly legitimate use of land, and if on the facts of the case the distance of the wicket from the Beckenham Road boundary and the height of the fence on that side of the ground were such as to make the hitting of a ball into the Beckenham Road an occurrence which could not reasonably have been foreseen, then I think it would probably have been right to absolve the defendants from liability for the hit by which the plaintiff was injured. Legitimate as the playing of cricket may be, however, a cricket ball hit out of the ground into a public highway is obviously capable of doing serious harm to anyone in the highway who may happen to be in its course, and I see no justification for holding the defendants entitled to subject people in Beckenham Road to any reasonably foreseeable risk of injury in this way. Accordingly, I am of opinion that the defendants were under a duty to prevent balls being hit into Beckenham Road so far as there was any reasonably foreseeable risk of this happening.

The case as regards negligence, therefore, seems to me to resolve itself into
A the question whether, with the wickets sited as they were, and the fence at the Beckenham Road end as it was, on Aug. 9, 1947, the hitting into Beckenham Road of the ball which struck and injured the plaintiff was the realisation of a reasonably foreseeable risk, or was in the nature of an unprecedented occurrence which the defendants could not reasonably have foreseen. On the evidence this question seems to me to admit of only one answer. Balls had been hit into
B Beckenham Road before. It is true this had happened only at rare intervals, perhaps not more than six times in thirty seasons. It was known, however, from practical experience, to be an actual possibility in the conditions in which matches were customarily played on the ground from about 1910 onwards, that is to say, with the wickets sited substantially as they were, and the fence at the Beckenham Road end, I gather, exactly as it was as regards height and
C position on Aug. 9, 1947. What had happened several times before could, as it seems to me, reasonably be expected to happen again sooner or later. It was not likely to happen often, but it was certainly likely to happen again in time. When or how often it would happen again no one could tell, as this would depend on the strength of the batsmen playing on the ground (including visitors about whose capacity the defendants might know nothing) and the efficiency
D or otherwise of the bowlers. In my opinion, therefore, the hitting out of the ground of the ball which struck and injured the plaintiff was a realisation of a reasonably foreseeable risk, which, because it could reasonably be foreseen, the defendants were under a duty to prevent. The defendants had, in fact, done nothing since the re-arrangement of the ground on the making of Beckenham Road in or about 1910, whether by heightening the fence (e.g., by means E of a screen of wire netting on poles) or by altering the position of the pitch, to guard against the known possibility of balls being hit into Beckenham Road. It follows that, if I have rightly defined the extent of the defendants' duty in this matter, the hitting out of the ground of the ball which injured the plaintiff did involve a breach of that duty for the consequences of which the defendants must be held liable to the plaintiff in damages.

F I should add that, I attach some importance to the onus of proof. The case is, I think, one to which the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur can be fairly applied : Byrne v. Boadle (3). The plaintiff is struck and injured by a cricket ball hit out of a ground occupied and controlled by the defendants. Surely that circumstance in itself suffices to place on the defendants the burden, at least, of showing either that the event was one which they could not reasonably have foreseen
G as a consequence of their use of the ground for cricket, or that the event was one which they had taken all reasonably practicable steps to prevent. This burden the defendants have, as it seems to me, wholly failed to discharge. The hitting of a ball into the road was a reasonably foreseeable event, and no steps at all had been taken to prevent it beyond the erection and subsequent maintenance in its original form of the fence put up in or about 1910, which had
H been shown by experience to be inadequate.

We were, in effect, invited to hold that inasmuch as the hitting of a ball into Beckenham Road was a rarity, and the odds were against anyone in Beckenham Road being struck on one of the rare occasions when this did happen, the risk of anyone being injured in this way was so remote that the defendants were under no obligation to take any further precautions at all, but were entitled to subject people in Beckenham Road (whether cricket enthusiasts or not) to this remote risk, so to speak in the interests of the national pastime. I see no justification for placing cricketers in this privileged position. It was further, in effect, argued that the carry of some 98 yards achieved by the ball which hit the plaintiff, was so exceptionally long as to make at all events the particular hit in question, as distinct from the ordinary run of occasional hits into the road, an unforeseeable occurrence. I am by no means satisfied that this was the case, and, in the absence of more definite and authoritative evidence as to the distance a cricket ball can be hit, I decline to assume in the defendants' favour that it was. Even if it was the case, I do not think this circumstance would assist the defendants. The material point, in my view, is that the hitting of the ball far and high enough to go out of the ground into Beckenham Road was an event which could reasonably be foreseen. Once the ball was out of the ground the mischief was done so far as the defendants could do anything to prevent it. I do not see how their liability for any resulting damage can be made to depend on any nicely calculated less or more of distance outside the ground to which the ball might happen to fly or bound before striking the injured party. It was also, I think, suggested that no possible precaution would have arrested the flight of this particular ball, so high did it pass over the fence. This seems to me an irrelevant consideration. If cricket cannot be played on a given ground without foreseeable risk of injury to persons outside it, then it is always possible in the last resort to stop using that ground for cricket. The plaintiff in this case might, I apprehend, quite possibly have been killed. I ask myself whether in that event the defendants would have claimed the right to go on as before because such a thing was unlikely to happen again for several years, though it might happen again on any day on which one of the teams in the match included a strong hitter. No doubt, as a practical matter, the defendants might decide that the double chance of a ball being hit into the road and finding a human target there, was so remote that, rather than going to expense in the way of a wire screen or the like, or, worse still, abandoning the ground, they would run the risk of such an occurrence and meet any ensuing claim for damages if and when it arose. However, I fail to see on what principle they can be entitled to require people in Beckenham Road to accept the risk, and if hit by a ball put up with the possibly very serious harm done to them as damnum sine injuria, unless able to identify, trace, and successfully sue the particular batsman who made the hit. For these reasons I am of opinion that the plaintiff is entitled to succeed on her claim in negligence, and I would allow the appeal with judgment for the plaintiff in the sum of £104 19*s.* 6*d.*, damages as assessed by the learned judge, and costs here and below.

SOMERVELL, L.J. : The plaintiff was struck and injured by a cricket ball while standing on the highway outside her house 10, Beckenham Road. The ball was hit by a batsman playing in a match on the Cheetham cricket ground, which is adjacent. The striker of the ball is not sued. The claim is made against the defendants as members of the Cheetham Cricket Club and occupiers of the ground. The learned judge dismissed the claim, and the plaintiff appeals. I will read the second paragraph of OLIVER, J.'s, judgment ([1949] 1 All E.R. 237) :

> "The club has been in existence, and matches have been regularly played on this gound, since about 1864. Beckenham Road was constructed and built up in 1910. For the purpose of this work the contractors arranged with the club that a small strip of land at the Beckenham Road end of the ground should be exchanged for a strip at the other end. The match pitches have always been and still are, kept along a line opposite the pavilion, i.e., along the mid-line of the original ground. The effect of the exchange in 1910 is that in the case of a straight drive—the hit in the case before me—Beckenham Road for some years has been a few yards nearer the batsmen than the opposite end."

The learned judge refers to the dimensions of the ground and admittedly makes a mistake in stating that the distance from the striker to the fence above which the ball went was ninety yards. It was in fact about seventy-five yards, the top of the fence being seventeen feet above the pitch. I do not myself get much assistance from the dimensions.

The plaintiff had lived in Beckenham Road for twelve years and had never herself seen a ball come over from the ground into the road. A Mr. Brownson was called on her behalf who lives on the other side of Beckenham Road, the side adjacent to the cricket field. He gave evidence that on several occasions in the years 1946 and 1947 cricket balls were struck into the back yard, or on to the side of his house. He seemed more definite about the back yard than the side of the house. We are not deciding in this case whether on Mr. Brownson's evidence the defendants would be liable if damage was done by a ball driven into his back yard, which is definitely nearer to the pitch than was the plaintiff. The evidence as to balls going into Beckenham Road came from the defendants' witnesses. Mr. Newbold, a defendant, had been a member of the club for twenty-eight years. He said that in that period he had seen a ball hit into the road perhaps half a dozen times. "It requires a terrific hit." The hit which caused the damage he described as the biggest hit he had ever seen on the ground. Mr. Bolton, also a defendant, had been a member of the club for thirty-five years and of the committee for a number of years. He said in his thirty-five years there had been, perhaps, six to ten occasions when a ball had been struck into the road. It is not clear whether this included a short period when the practice nets were at that end of the ground. I will assume in the plaintiff's favour that he was speaking of matches. There had been no previous accident and no complaint to his knowledge. The evidence of these witnesses was accepted by the learned judge.

The case for the plaintiff before us was put, first, on the ground of public nuisance to a highway. This is, of course, an indictable misdemeanour. This is pleaded as follows:

> "Further the plaintiff will contend that the striking of the said cricket ball into the said road was and constituted a nuisance for the consequences of which to the plaintiff the defendants are in law responsible."

I do not think that the striking of a cricket ball by an individual batsman, whether he was, as here, a visitor or whether he had been one of the joint occupiers, could be an indictable misdemeanour by all the occupiers. If the plaintiff is to succeed on this ground it must be put, as counsel for the plaintiff put it, in the alternative, namely, that the organising and carrying on of a game on property adjacent to a highway, so that the public right of passage is rendered dangerous, is a public nuisance. The question, therefore, as it seems to me, is whether the fact that once every three or four years a very exceptional hit takes a ball into this highway constitutes a public nuisance. As the tort relied on is an indictable offence it is unfortunate that it was not pleaded in the only way in which, in my opinion, it can be put. I have derived assistance from the reasoning of SANKEY, J., in the somewhat analogous case of Castle v. St. Augustine's Links, Ltd. (1). In that case the plaintiff on a highway was injured by a sliced golf ball driven from a tee. SANKEY, J., found that the tee and lay-out of the hole constituted a public nuisance for which the club was responsible. He found that the hole was so laid out that balls were frequently landed in the highway and that the directors knew or ought to have known this. He found that the highway was much frequented by motors and taxicabs and that on previous occasions balls had struck vehicles passing along the highway. If counsel for the plaintiff is right, it would have been sufficient if on very rare occasions an altogether exceptional shot had reached the highway. SANKEY, J., was, of course, dealing with the facts of that case and with golf, not cricket, but, in considering the number of occasions and the amount of traffic on the road—in other words the degree of risk—he was, I think, applying the law correctly in dealing with this class of problem, namely, games near highways. Applying this test, namely, one of degree, to the question whether the lay-out of this cricket field was such as to render the highway dangerous in a way that amounted to a public nuisance, I think that it was not. There is a curious absence of authority on cases of this kind. We were referred to the Scottish case, Ward v. Abraham (4), but I do not think that that decision helps in the present case. A

There remains the question whether the plaintiff has established that her injuries were due to the negligence of all the occupiers of this cricket ground. I conceive myself entitled to take judicial notice of the fact that games, notably cricket, are part of ordinary life, and that available fields will often and necessarily be adjacent to highways. Counsel for the plaintiff invited us to say that occupiers of a field or ground where games were played were negligent if, in B any foreseeable circumstances, however exceptional, a ball might reach any highway. This would, I think, be unreasonable, and the fact that the occupiers could insure their liability is irrelevant. Whether a man is or is not a tortfeasor cannot depend on whether others are willing to insure his liability. The steps that a reasonable occupier would take depend on the circumstances. If the field is in the heart of a city surrounded by roads on which there is constant C traffic it may well be that the reasonable occupier would have to see that in no foreseeable circumstances could a ball reach a highway. For a village playing field adjacent to a little frequented highway the duty would be less. I think this is a borderline case. On the one hand, it can be said that there was no evidence that the defendants, knowing that on very exceptional occasions a ball was hit out into the road, directed their minds to the question whether D any reasonable steps could be taken to prevent this ever happening. On the other hand, the plaintiff had to establish that, if reasonable steps had been taken, this accident would not have occurred. The case is not wholly satisfactory in that it was in the main pleaded and argued on the basis that the fact that this ball came into the road—and, after the defendants' evidence, that on rare occasions other balls had entered the road—was sufficient to establish liability. E I think this is not enough. I have referred to Mr. Newbold's evidence that this was the biggest hit he had ever seen on the ground. Mr. Milsom agreed with this and said that it cleared the fence by many, many feet. Comment was made on the fact that the pitch was nearer to the northern boundary than to the southern boundary, but there was no cross-examination on the lines that this showed a failure to take due care. There was, as I have said, this fence seventeen F feet above the pitch at the Beckenham Road end and no evidence as to the bank, if any, or fence at the other end of the ground. The case is difficult, partly because the real issue does not seem to me to have been clearly raised either in the pleadings or cross-examination. This may have been because the plaintiff's advisers thought they could not succeed except on the case as they put it.

On the whole, I have come to the conclusion that the appeal fails. Counsel G for the plaintiff criticised the sentence in the judgment in which the learned judge said that, in his opinion, this ground is quite large enough for all practical purposes of safety. I agree this goes beyond what is necessary to decide this case. The question is whether the plaintiff has shown that the damage which she suffered was due to the failure of the defendants to take due and reasonable care. On the evidence as a whole and as accepted by the learned judge, I think H she has failed to establish this. The principle of Rylands v. Fletcher (2) has, in my opinion, no application, and this point, though taken, was not seriously argued. I, therefore, would dismiss the appeal. Appeal allowed with costs.

STANDINGFORD v. PROBERT.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., Cohen and Asquith, L.JJ.), November 4, 1949.]

A Rent Restriction—Alternative accommodation—"Suitable to the needs of the tenant and his family"—"Family"—Inclusion of married sons and their wives living with tenant—Lodger—More than one house as alternative accommodation—Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions (Amendment) Act, 1933 (c. 32), s. 3 (3).

B By s. 3 of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions (Amendment) Act, 1933, it is provided: "(1) No order or judgment for the recovery of possession of any dwelling-house to which the principal Acts apply . . . shall be made or given unless the court considers it reasonable to make such an order . . . and . . . (b) the court is satisfied that suitable alternative accommodation is available for the tenant or will be available for him when the order . . . takes effect . . . (3) . . . accommodation shall be deemed to be suitable if it consists . . . (a) of a dwelling-house to which the principal Acts apply . . . C and is, in the opinion of the court, reasonably suitable to the needs of the tenant and his family as regards proximity to place of work, and either—(i) similar as regards rental and extent to the accommodation afforded by dwelling-houses provided in the neighbourhood by any housing authority for persons whose needs as regards extent are, in the opinion of the court, similar to those of the tenant and his family; or (ii) otherwise reasonably D suitable to the means of the tenant and to the needs of the tenant and his family as regards extent and character."

The landlord claimed possession of a dwelling-house to which the Rent Acts applied and offered accommodation in other houses to the tenant as alternative accommodation. With the tenant, a widow, were living her two married sons and their respective wives, a married daughter who was separated from her husband, and a lodger.

E HELD: section 3 (3) laid down the conditions which must be satisfied if the provisions as to alternative accommodation in sub-s. (1) were to be fulfilled and did not merely afford a guide as to what normally would be suitable; the word "family" within the meaning of s. 3 (3) included, in addition to the daughter, the tenant's sons and their wives; and, in the circumstances, the alternative accommodation offered was not suitable.

F Dictum of WRIGHT, J., in Price v. Gould (1930) (143 L.T. 334), applied.

Quaere (i) whether the lodger should be included in the term "family."

(ii) whether the court was bound by Sheehan v. Cutler ([1946] K.B. 339) to hold that in no case could two dwelling-houses constitute suitable alternative accommodation within the meaning of s. 3 (3).

APPEAL by the tenant from an order of His Honour DEPUTY JUDGE DE FERRARS, sitting at Windsor County Court, dated July 13, 1949, granting to the landlord possession of a dwelling-house to which the Rent Acts applied.

The Court of Appeal, allowing the appeal, held that two married sons and their wives, who were living with the tenant, were to be regarded as members of the tenant's family within the meaning of s. 3 (3) of the Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1933, and that in the circumstances the alternative accommodation offered by the landlord was unsuitable. The facts appear in the judgment of Cohen, L.J.

R. G. Dow for the tenant. A
Comyn for the landlord.

SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R. : I will ask Cohen, L.J., to deliver the first judgment.

COHEN, L.J. : This is an appeal from an order of the deputy county court judge sitting at Windsor in which he granted possession of a house, 12, Westcroft, Slough, to the landlord. B The landlord bought the house after Dec. 6, 1937, the material date for the purposes of sched. I to the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions (Amendment) Act, 1933, as amended by the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1938, sched. II, so that he could only succeed if he could bring himself within the terms of s. 3 (1) of the Act of 1933, the material parts of which provide : C

> "No order or judgment for the recovery of possession of any dwelling-house to which the principal Acts apply . . . shall be made or given unless the court considers it reasonable to make such an order . . . and . . . (b) the court is satisfied that suitable alternative accommodation is available for the tenant or will be available for him when the order . . . takes effect."

Sub-section (2) provides : D

> "A certificate of the housing authority for the area in which the said dwelling-house is situated, certifying that the authority will provide suitable alternative accommodation for the tenant by a date specified in the certificate, shall be conclusive evidence that suitable alternative accommodation will be available for him by that date." E

Sub-section (3) is in these terms, so far as material :

> "Where no such certificate as aforesaid is produced to the court, accommodation shall be deemed to be suitable if it consists . . . (a) of a dwelling-house to which the principal Acts apply . . . and is, in the opinion of the court, reasonably suitable to the needs of the tenant and his family as F regards proximity to place of work, and either—(i) similar as regards rental and extent to the accommodation afforded by dwelling-houses provided in the neighbourhood by any housing authority for persons whose needs as regards extent are, in the opinion of the court, similar to those of the tenant and his family ; or (ii) otherwise reasonably suitable to the means of the tenant and to the needs of the tenant and his family as regards G extent and character."

Those were the provisions which the learned judge had to construe, and the two questions which he had to consider were (i) whether suitable alternative accommodation had been provided, and (ii) whether, if that was established, it was reasonable or not to make an order.

The facts may be considered under two main headings. First, as to the families H of the respective parties. The tenant, Mrs. Probert, had living with her at 12 Westcroft, which she had occupied since 1937, two married sons and their wives, a married daughter whose husband had deserted her, and a lodger. The first son, Reginald, had married before the war. During the war he was away on war work, but he kept on his room in his mother's house, paying rent for it. His wife spent part of her time there. After the war was over they came back to live with the tenant, but then wen taway for a time, finally returning in June, 1948, and they have been living with her ever since. They paid rent throughout. The second son, Francis, was away in the army during the war. There is authority that absence in the services is, for the purposes of s. 12 (1) (g) of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, to be disregarded in considering whether a person is a member of a family residing at the premises in question. He was invalided out of the army in 1946. He married and brought A his wife to live with his mother, and they have been living there ever since. He has to occupy a separate room because he is tubercular. The landlord was living in 76, Northcroft, Slough. He had living with him his wife and two little children, both girls, aged four and three years. One of those children was an invalid, and had to be carried up and down stairs, which was a great burden on the landlord's wife.

B As to the accommodation, at 12, Westcroft there were three bedrooms, two living rooms, a kitchenette and a bathroom. The three bedrooms were occupied as follows. The big room upstairs was occupied by the tenant and her daughter, Elsie, and Francis's wife. Reginald and his wife occupied one of the sitting rooms, which was converted into a bedroom. The other bedrooms were occupied, the better one by Francis, and the small bedroom by the lodger. 76, Northcroft, on C the other hand, had only two bedrooms and one living room, a kitchenette and a bathroom. It cannot be disputed that, if the alternative accommodation had to provide for the whole of the occupants of Westcroft, Northcroft was obviously not suitable alternative accommodation.

The landlord had bought Westcroft in 1948. He gave the tenant notice to quit, which expired on Apr. 11, 1949, when these proceedings were commenced. D The first question that arose for the learned county court judge's consideration was whether or not all the occupants of Westcroft were persons who were within the description, " the tenant and his family." Counsel for the landlord submitted that s. 3 (3) does not lay down conditions which have to be satisfied in order that the accommodation should be suitable, but merely affords a guide as to what would normally be suitable. I do not know whether that point was or E was not taken before the learned judge. If it was, he did not find it necessary to consider it. I will deal with it later in my judgment and will now turn to the judgment of the learned judge which reads as follows :

> " In this case the question of hardship is irrelevant. I hold that the [tenant's] family for the purposes of s. 3 comprises the defendant and her separated daughter, Elsie, the two married sons and their wives being F excluded for that purpose. I hold that the accommodation offered at 76, Northcroft is alternative accommodation within the meaning of the Rent Acts sufficient for the defendant's family so constituted, and I further hold the same to be sufficient alternative accommodation within that section should it be that the defendant's family also includes the lodger Rennell."

G

If he was right in those conclusions, I think it plain that there was evidence on which he could find it was reasonable to make the order that he made. The first question to be considered, however, is whether he was right in excluding the two married sons and their wives from the description, " the tenant and his family." There is no reported decision on s. 3 (3) as to the meaning of those H words, but the question of the meaning of " family " has been considered in connection with s. 12 (1) (g) of the Act of 1920 which is a definition section and states :

> " . . . the expression ' tenant ' includes the widow of a tenant . . . who was residing with him at the time of his death, or, where a tenant . . . leaves no widow or is a woman, such member of the tenant's family so residing as aforesaid as may be decided in default of agreement by the county court."

In that connection it has been held that blood relations, at any rate as distant as nephews and nieces, and adopted children are within the meaning of the section, provided, of course, they satisfy the conditions of residence. It is true that we are now considering a different section, but I think there are some observations which are made in the course of the judgments which have dealt with s. 12 (1) (g) which are of assistance to us in reaching a conclusion as to the meaning of the word " family " in s. 3 (3) of the Act of 1933.

The first case to which I would refer is Price v. Gould (1). That case was cited by Bucknill, L.J., in Brock v. Wollams (2), and the passage ([1949] 1 All E.R. 717) to which I wish to refer is sufficiently set out in that case. Bucknill, L.J., cites Wright, J., as saying (143 L.T. 334) :

> " ' It has been said in a number of equity cases, relating principally to wills or to settlements under powers of appointment, that the word " family " is a popular, loose, and flexible expression, and not a technical term. It has been laid down that the primary meaning of the word " family " is children, but that primary meaning is clearly susceptible of wider interpretation, because the cases decide that the exact scope of the word must depend on the context and the other provisions of the will or deed in view of the surrounding circumstances. Thus, in Snow v. Teed (3), it was held that the word " family " could be extended beyond not merely children but even beyond the statutory next-of-kin.' Wright, J., went on to say (ibid.) that : ' I hold that in the section now under consideration [s. 12 (1) (g)] the word " family " includes brothers and sisters of the deceased living with her at the time of her death. I think that that meaning is required by the ordinary acceptation of the word in this connection, and that the legislature has used the word " family " to introduce a flexible and wide term.' "

I was a member of the court which decided Brock v. Wollams (2) and I said this ([1949] 1 All E.R. 718) :

> " Counsel for the landlords submitted that there were only two possible meanings of the word ' family ' in s. 12 (1) (g) of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920—the first ' relations by blood or marriage ' and the second ' household,' including all living on the premises, relatives, servants and lodgers. He excluded, and, I think, rightly, the second sense. I do not think it can have been the intention of the legislature to protect servants and lodgers, but I am not prepared to hold that the two meanings suggested by counsel for the landlords are exhaustive. I think that there is a third meaning. I respectfully agree with what was said by Wright, J., in Price v. Gould (1) in the passage which my Lord has already read. I think the question the learned county court judge should have asked himself was : Would an ordinary man, addressing his mind to the question whether Mrs. Wollams was a member of the family or not, have answered ' Yes ' or ' No ' ? "

I think that is a fair test to apply when considering the meaning of the words, " the tenant and his family ", in s. 3 (3) for the purposes with which we are now concerned. Obviously, having regard to the subject-matter, no member of the family who is not permanently residing—I will use that expression for the moment, though it is not entirely accurate—with the tenant would fall within the meaning of the word " family," but, subject to fulfilling the conditions of residence, I think that the proper question to ask oneself is : If an ordinary man was told that the tenant had living with her the relations of whom we know, would he or would he not say : " Those are the members of her family " ? If he would—and I think he would—I see no reason why they should not be treated as " family " for the purposes of s. 3 (3).

I said, " permanently residing." By that I do not mean, as counsel for the landlord asked us to say, that they intended to live there for the rest of their lives. I think a fair test would be this. Supposing anybody said to a married son : "Have you made your home with your mother or are you just staying with her temporarily ?", would he or would he not reply : "I am making my home with her and I have no present intention of making any change" ? If he would answer in that way, as I think the sons plainly would in this case, then it seems to me that the only proper course in the absence of other relevant circumstances is to treat them and their wives as members of the family. Counsel for the landlord asked us to say that this was a question of fact, and so in part it is, but I am satisfied that the learned county court judge did not direct himself properly in applying his mind to this question. I think it is plain from the form of his judgment that he accepted counsel's argument, which I do not accept, that once the sons are married they must be treated as having set up a separate family and must be excluded from the expression "family" when we are considering the application of this section.

For these reasons I think the learned judge was wrong. It is plain from his judgment that, had he given what I consider to be the correct answer to the question, he would have refused to make the order for possession. Counsel for the landlord, however, asks us to take a different view and to say that, even on this view, the landlord offered adequate alternative accommodation because, in addition to 76, Northcroft, he had also offered two rooms and a bathroom in 12, Westcroft, which the landlord would have been taking over. I very much doubt whether it is open to us to accept that argument because of the decision of this court in Sheehan v. Cutler (4), where the court had to consider the meaning of "suitable alternative accommodation available for the tenant," within the meaning of the Act of 1933. The facts in that case were not identical with those of the present matter, but in the course of his judgment MORTON, L.J., said ([1946] K.B. 343) :

> "It seems to me that in this sub-section the legislature is regarding the tenant and his family as one unit and is providing that that unit is to be accommodated in one dwelling-house under sub-cl. (a) or in premises to be let as one separate dwelling on terms which answer the description given in sub-cl. (b). The provisions which follow, and in particular the provisions of sub-cl. (ii) in reference to 'the needs of the tenant and his family' in regard to the extent and character of the accommodation, point in the same direction."

I appreciate that there is much force in what counsel for the landlord said as to the disadvantages of applying that ruling literally in a case where there are, so to speak, two sub-families in the one family living in the premises. In such a case it would obviously be convenient—as on the facts of the present case it would have been convenient—if the landlord had been in a position to offer a separate flat to Reginald and his wife. I do not, however, think it is necessary for us to decide whether we are bound by the decision in Sheehan v. Cutler (4) to hold that in no case can two dwelling-houses constitute a separate dwelling-house within the meaning of s. 3 (3) since I think that, even if it were possible to treat two dwelling-houses as complying with the obligation to provide suitable alternative accommodation, on the facts of this case these two rooms, having regard to the family and the illness of one of the sons, could not possibly constitute adequate alternative accommodation.

What I have said would, I think, be enough to dispose of this case, but there are two matters to which I think I should refer. The first is the question of the lodger. The learned judge seems to have thought that the lodger could be treated as a member of the family. I do not think it is necessary to reach a conclusion whether he was right. It may well be that the question whether or not a lodger should be included in "the family" may depend on all the circumstances of the particular case. The other point with which I want to deal is the argument adduced to us by counsel for the landlord that s. 3 was not exhaustive, but merely indicative, and that it was open to the learned judge to make an order for possession even though the conditions laid down in sub-s. (3) were not complied with. He relied, in support of this argument, on the language of sub-s. (2), which provides that the certificate of the housing authority is conclusive on the question whether suitable alternative accommodation will be available for the tenant. I think counsel was right in saying that, if that certificate was given, the only way in which the court could pay any attention to other members of the family would be under the provisions as to reasonableness. However, I am not by any means satisfied that the housing authority would ignore sub-s. (3) in considering the question whether they should or should not give the certificate which the tenant sought to obtain. Be that as it may, I am unable to read sub-s. (3) in the limited sense in which counsel asks us to read it. I think it has always been treated in this court as laying down the conditions which must be satisfied if the provisions as to alternative accommodation in sub-s. (1) are to be fulfilled, and I gather that hitherto nobody has even sought to argue the point which counsel has boldly undertaken to argue in the present case. In my view, the assumption which the parties made in the earlier cases was well founded. For these reasons I would allow the appeal.

ASQUITH, L.J. : I agree, and would only add a few words. On the main point counsel relied strongly on the fact that, on marrying, a son becomes the head of a new family. It does not follow that on marrying he ceases to be a member of the original family. Nothing short of that will avail the landlord. This seems to me no more to follow from counsel's premise, than it follows from the fact that a man on marrying becomes his wife's husband that he ceases to be his mother's son. One can be a member of two families simultaneously. That is a circumstance which I think is fatal to counsel's main argument, and I agree that the appeal should be allowed.

SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R. : I also agree. Although we are differing from the learned county court judge's opinion, I should, I think, be guilty of mere repetition if I traversed again the arguments and matters fully dealt with by my brethren, with whose judgments I find myself in entire agreement. As regards the question whether, on the footing that the family here does include the sons, it might have been a sufficient provision on the landlord's part to have offered accommodation not all under one roof or forming part of one physical unit, I am inclined to think, as COHEN, L.J., has said, that the matter may be governed by the decision of this court in Sheehan v. Cutler (4) though I would like to leave open the possibility that in some cases it might be held that such a requirement was not always and for all purposes sensible or necessary. However that may be, on the facts in this case, as COHEN, L.J., has pointed out, once the view is taken that the unit (to use the phrase of MORTON, L.J., in Sheehan v. Cutler (4)) comprehends here all the children, and, in the case of two of them, their wives, it seems to me inevitably to follow from the learned judge's own reasoning in his judgment that he would not have held, as we do not hold, that the accommodation offered here was suitable. I agree, therefore, that the appeal should be allowed, with the result that the order made is discharged and no order is made for possession.

R. v. MURPHY.

[Court of Criminal Appeal (Lord Goddard, C.J., Hilbery and Lynskey, JJ.), October 31, 1949.]

Criminal Law—Sentence—Corrective training—Preventive detention—Previous convictions—Conviction in Northern Ireland—Convictions in Scotland and abroad—Criminal Justice Act, 1948 (c. 58), s. 21 (1) (2) ; s. 23 (1).

In the notice of intention to prove three previous convictions served on the appellant under the Criminal Justice Act, 1948, s. 23 (1), a conviction in Northern Ireland was included. Quarter sessions held that this conviction could not be taken into account and imposed a sentence of imprisonment instead of one of preventive detention under s. 21 (2).

Held : a conviction in Northern Ireland could not be a previous conviction within s. 21 (2), and, therefore, the appellant could not have been sentenced to preventive detention.

Per curiam : A conviction in Northern Ireland is not a previous conviction for the purpose of founding a sentence of corrective training under s. 21 (1). Convictions in any of the dominions or colonies, in a foreign country, or before a court martial, are not " previous convictions " within either s. 21 (1) or s. 21 (2). A previous conviction in Scotland on an indictment can, however, be proved : see s. 80 (2) of the Act.

Appeal against a conviction of garage breaking and a sentence of four years imprisonment imposed by the recorder of Cambridge.

In pronouncing sentence the recorder stated that he was unable to take into account a previous conviction of the appellant in Northern Ireland so as to enable him to inflict a sentence of preventive detention under the Criminal Justice Act, 1948, s. 21 (2). The Court of Criminal Appeal affirmed the recorder's statement of the law with regard to convictions in Northern Ireland, and made observations regarding convictions in Scotland, abroad, and before courts martial.

Donald C. Bain for the appellant.
Anthony Hawke and E. Garth Moore for the Crown.

LORD GODDARD, C.J., delivered the following judgment of the court. The appellant appeals against his conviction at Cambridge Quarter Sessions of garage breaking and against the sentence which was passed on him. He has at least twenty previous convictions, and he would, therefore, have been a proper subject for preventive detention if his previous convictions could be taken into account under the provisions of the Criminal Justice Act, 1948, s. 21 (2). In the notice served on him under s. 23 (1) one of the convictions set out was in Northern Ireland, and the recorder of Cambridge came to the conclusion that he could not deal with the appellant as a proper subject for preventive detention because the court was not entitled to take into account such a conviction. The recorder, accordingly, sentenced the appellant to four years' imprisonment. If he could have given preventive detention, no doubt he would have given a longer sentence. There is nothing in the appeal against conviction, and in the circumstances, the sentence of four years' imprisonment cannot be considered excessive for a man of the appellant's character. Therefore, the appeal fails.

The court gave leave to appeal because the recorder not only said that he could not take into account a conviction in Northern Ireland as one of the convictions which would qualify a man for preventive detention, or, for that matter, corrective training, but he also, per incuriam, said that the same would apply to a conviction in Scotland. In saying that, the recorder had not in his mind the Criminal Justice Act, 1948, s. 80 (2), which provides :

" . . . and any such reference to a previous conviction or sentence shall be > construed as a reference to a previous conviction by a court in any part of Great Britain and to a previous sentence passed by any such court."

Northern Ireland is not part of Great Britain. It is part of the United Kingdom which consists of Great Britain and Northern Ireland. The combined kingdoms of England and Scotland were designated as Great Britain in the Union with Scotland Act, 1706, art. I, and ever since the two kingdoms of England and Scotland have been known by that name. The United Kingdom was first brought A into being when the Act of Union with Ireland was passed in 1800.

It, therefore, appears that for the purpose of the previous convictions which must be proved under s. 21 (2) of the Act of 1948 a conviction in Northern Ireland does not fall within the sub-section. The court has no doubt that a conviction and sentence in Scotland can be proved because s. 80 (2) obviously means that a conviction in Scotland should be provable in England. On the B other hand, for this purpose a conviction in Northern Ireland cannot be proved any more than a conviction in South Africa or one of the other dominions or colonies or a foreign country can be proved. It is also worth mentioning, because I know the point has been raised, that a conviction before a court martial cannot be proved for this purpose.

WELCH v. NAGY.

[Court of Appeal (Bucknill, Cohen and Asquith, L.JJ.), October 12, 13, 14, 17, 18, November 2, 1949.] E

Rent Restriction—Furnished letting—Purchase of furniture by tenant—Effect on tenancy—Conversion into unfurnished letting—Estoppel—Conduct of tenant leading to belief letting was unfurnished.

In July, 1939, a house was let to the tenant by J. who then owned the freehold. The house contained furniture provided by J. of such amount that a substantial portion of the whole rent was attributable to its user, and, F accordingly, the house was outside the protection of the Rent Restrictions Acts. In July, 1940, the tenant bought all this furniture (except six pieces) from J. who, on Aug. 27, 1940, sold the freehold and in the same transaction fraudulently purported to sell to the new landlord the furniture which had already been sold to the tenant. Under the original agreement with J. the tenancy was for a year from Nov. 1, 1939, with an option G to renew for a further year in October, 1940, and the tenant exercised this option against the new landlord. The tenant at no time indicated to the landlord that he claimed the furniture, and by asking in a letter dated Oct. 25, 1940, for an extension of his tenancy of the "house, furnished" confirmed in the landlord's mind the belief that he, and not the tenant, owned the furniture. On Nov. 1, 1941, the landlord granted the tenant H a new lease of the dwelling-house, under the impression that it was a furnished letting, whereas the tenant then believed that it was an unfurnished letting, the house being at the material time within the ambit of the Rent Restrictions Acts by reason of its rateable value. In September, 1948, the landlord issued a plaint in the county court asking for a declaration that the tenancy was a furnished tenancy and that the furniture in the premises was identical with that purchased by him from J.

Per curiam: if during the currency of a lease of a furnished house the tenant buys all the furniture, the effect is not, while that lease is still on foot, to convert the tenancy into an unfurnished one for the purposes of the Rent Restrictions Acts, and, therefore, the tenant was not protected by the Acts in respect of his tenancy up to Oct. 31, 1941.

Held: (i) the new lease granted from Nov. 1, 1941, was made at a time when the tenant owned the furniture he was purporting to rent from the landlord and that tenancy was in existence when the plaint was issued; it was not possible for the parties, by describing, whether by accident or design, an unfurnished letting as a furnished letting, to confer on the court a jurisdiction which it did not possess, viz., a jurisdiction to make an order for possession unfettered by the Rent Restrictions Acts; and, therefore, the letting was an unfurnished letting which was protected by the Acts.

(ii) in the circumstances the tenant was not estopped from asserting or proving the true fact that the letting was protected by the Acts.

Appeal by the tenant from an order of His Honour Judge Blagden made at Chesham County Court on Mar. 1, 1949, whereby he granted to the landlord a declaration that the tenancy held by the tenant of Manor Lodge, Chesham, was a furnished tenancy and that the furniture comprised the articles described in a list of furniture purchased by the landlord from the former freeholder. The Court of Appeal now allowed the appeal of the tenant and refused the declaration and ordered the landlord to pay the costs of the appeal. The facts appear in the headnote.

The tenant appeared in person.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 2. The following judgments were read.

BUCKNILL, L.J., stated the facts, held that the county court judge had found on sufficient evidence that the tenant had purchased the furniture before the purported sale to the landlord, and continued : As regards the substance of the appeal the tenant argued : (i) The judge was wrong in holding that the tenant was estopped from now asserting his own title to the furniture and from disputing the proposition that it formed a substantial part of that for which he paid rent. (ii) The doctrine of estoppel does not apply in a case such as this where a statutory duty is cast on the court to ascertain whether the provisions of the Rent Restrictions Acts apply to any particular dwelling. (iii) Even if the tenant's letter of Oct. 25, 1940, referring to the " dwelling-house, furnished," amounted to an estoppel as regards the furniture, such estoppel was not operative at the time when the plaint was issued, because during the preceding two years the tenant had asserted that the furniture belonged to him. (iv) The estoppel, if any, created in October, 1940, did not apply in 1941 when a new tenancy agreement was entered into, and there was then no reference by the tenant to the house being taken furnished. (v) The value of the furniture when the tenancy was granted was such that the judge was wrong in holding in effect that the amount of rent fairly attributable to its use formed a substantial part of the rent : see Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1923, s. 10 (1).

The first question, as I see it, is whether the doctrine of estoppel applies to the present case. To answer this question, I think, one must first answer the question : Did the tenant offer to rent Manor Lodge furnished with the intention (actual or presumptive) and with the result of inducing the landlord on the faith of that statement to alter his position to his detriment ? The judge has held, and I think it is a finding of fact, that " the landlord shaped his whole subsequent course, including his commencement of this action, in reliance on, inter alia, the second letter " [i.e., the letter of Oct. 25, 1940, exercising the option to renew the tenancy of the house.] There is evidence to support that finding, and I do not think it can be disturbed in this court.

Then comes the question : What was the intention (actual or presumptive) of the tenant in making this statement ? Having regard to the judge's finding that the tenant had bought the furniture from Jacobson [the original landlord] before Jacobson purported to sell it to the present landlord, I think it is clear that when he wrote the letter in October, 1940, he never intended to assert that the furniture in the house belonged to Jacobson. There is no evidence, or no clear evidence, that by that time the landlord had told the tenant that he had bought the furniture, and no finding to that effect by the judge, but, as the judge pointed out in his judgment, " the effect of a document is not that which the writer inintends, but that which the document reasonably conveys to the recipient." I think that these words " house, furnished," must be taken to mean that the furniture in the house belonged, not to the tenant, but to the landlord. I do not agree with the conclusion of the judge that the tenant should be taken to have intended to admit, regard being had to the value of the furniture to him, that the amount of rent fairly attributable to its use formed a substantial portion of the whole rent. There is nothing to show that the tenant intended to make any such admission, and I do not think that the use of the word " furnished " should be taken as carrying such a meaning. I think, therefore, that in any case the learned judge extended the doctrine of estoppel too far, and that the tenant was not estopped from asserting that the furniture did not bring the case within the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1923, s. 10.

I agree with the judgment of Asquith, L.J., which I have had the opportunity of reading, as to the effect of the Rent Restrictions Acts on the doctrine of estoppel, to the effect that a tenant could not, by representing himself as tenant under a fully furnished tenancy when the house was in fact let unfurnished (because the only furniture in it was his own), confer on the court an unfettered jurisdiction to make orders for possession. In my opinion, therefore, the judgment should be amended by striking out that part of it which contains the declaration as claimed by the landlord. The result of this will be that the tenant will not be precluded from asserting in any future proceedings by the landlord or his successors in title for an increase of rent beyond the statutory rent or for possession that the furniture in the house when the tenancy agreement was made in 1941, or when the option was exercised in 1940, belonged to him, and that in any case it was not such as to satisfy the test of "substantial" within s. 10 of the Act of 1923. I think that to that extent the appeal should be allowed.

A COHEN, L.J.: I have had the opportunity of reading the judgment which my Lord has just delivered and the judgment which ASQUITH, L.J., is about to deliver. I agree with the reasons they give for allowing this appeal to the extent they indicate, and I have nothing to add of my own.

ASQUITH, L.J.: I agree that the appeal should be allowed and the declaration asked for refused. I had some difficulty in interpreting the B county court judge's findings of fact. On careful examination I think they resolve themselves into the following: (i) When the tenant first entered under a "furnished" tenancy in July, 1939, the house contained certain furniture. This furniture was provided by the then landlord, Mrs. Jacobson, though owned by her husband. Its amount was such that a substantial proportion of the whole rent was attributable to its user, and the house was, accordingly, outside the C protection of the Rent Restrictions Acts. (ii) In or about July, 1940, the present landlord bought all this furniture (except six pieces) from Jacobson. (iii) Later, on Aug. 27, 1940, Jacobson (fraudulently) purported to sell this same furniture to the landlord to whom on the same date he sold the house. (iv) This furniture was the furniture inventoried in what has been called the "Catesby list."

D The judge accepted the tenant's evidence to the extent that he claimed to have bought certain furniture from Jacobson before Jacobson purported to sell the same furniture to the landlord. He rejected the tenant's evidence so far as the tenant said the furniture in question was an assortment entirely distinct from that in the Catesby list—inferior in quantity, quality, and value—and was the furniture contained in an inventory compiled by the tenant himself shortly E after he entered and produced by him at the trial, notwithstanding that the tenant's evidence on this point was positive, precise and circumstantial. However this may be, it cannot, I think, be suggested of any one of these findings that there was no evidence to support it. They must be accepted, and, if they are, it follows that in July, 1940, when the tenant bought the furniture, his tenancy became a de facto unfurnished tenancy since the only furniture the F house contained was his own. Did it then and there become an unfurnished tenancy de jure, so as to attract the protection of the Rent Restrictions Acts? This is a difficult question. If the tenant's purchase of the furniture did not alter the character de jure of the current tenancy to that of an unfurnished letting, then the tenancy retained, till it terminated, its original character in law of a "substantially furnished" letting. If, however, immediately on the tenant's G purchase of the furniture (or, indeed, at any subsequent time before the plaint), his tenancy ceased in law to be a substantially furnished, and became an unfurnished, one, then the landlord can succeed, if at all, only by establishing an estoppel. It is, therefore, a crucial question what effect in law, if any, is to be attributed to the sale of the furniture to the tenant. In my view, if during the currency of a single lease, which is originally a lease of a substantially furnished H house, the tenant buys all the furniture, the effect is not, while that lease is still on foot, to convert the tenancy into an unfurnished one for the purposes of the Rent Restrictions Acts.

There is no direct authority for this, but it would seem to be a corollary of the principle on which this court proceeded in Jozwiak v. Hierowski (2) and Bowness v. O'Dwyer (3). The problem raised in the first of these cases was whether a rise during the tenancy in the amount of rent, the amount of furniture remaining constant, or an increase in the amount of furniture, the rent remaining constant, could alter the character of the tenancy from substantially furnished to unsubstantially furnished, and vice versa. The Court of Appeal held it could not, and that the relevant time for ascertaining whether the amount of rent attributable to the use of the furniture was " substantial " was, and remained throughout the tenancy, the time when the tenancy started. (I say " the tenancy " for the court in that case did not accept the contention that there were a succession of tenancies). By parity of reasoning if, as was the case here, the tenancy started as a substantially furnished one, it retained that character so long as it lasted, notwithstanding the sale of the furniture during its currency, and the important question is how long it did last. If it did not last till the plaint was issued and the lease then on foot was a different one, the question will be whether the tenant was estopped from denying that the lease on foot at the time of the plaint was one of a substantially furnished house. The judge has held that he was so estopped. Indeed, he holds that the estoppel originated and operated before the lease which was on foot at the time of the plaint was entered into, and continued operative thereafter.

The original tenancy agreement was oral, was made in July, 1939, and was for a furnished letting. On Oct. 4, 1939, the lessor, Mrs. Jacobson, wrote to the tenant's sister a letter which has been called " the first letter," beginning :

> " I let you herewith my furnished dwelling-house Manor Lodge, for a year beginning Nov. 1, 1939, and ending Oct. 31, 1940 . . . After the expiration of the above-mentioned year you have an option for a further year, under the same conditions."

This proposal was accepted in terms by a letter of Oct. 7 from the tenant's sister acting as her brother's agent, or possibly for her brother and herself. On Aug. 27, 1940, the landlord buys the freehold (and purports to buy the furniture) from the Jacobsons. On Oct. 25, 1940, when the first year is about to expire, the tenant, by letter of that date (which has been christened " the second letter "), exercises his option to extend the tenancy for another year till Nov. 1, 1941, " on the same conditions." The letter refers to the house as " the above-mentioned dwelling-house (comma) furnished (comma) with garden." When this additional year is about to expire—on Oct. 30, 1941—the defendant writes to the landlord :

> " Confirming our agreement to the continuation of our tenancy for the duration of the war under the same conditions as up to the present."

One of the conditions of the original agreement had been that the letting was a furnished one, the amount of the furniture being " substantial." This agreement " for the duration of the war ", though void for uncertainty when made, was validated ex post facto by the Validation of Wartime Leases Act, 1944, which, while extending the term of such leases to ten years subject to a month's notice, incorporates in the statutory lease all the terms of the invalid contractual lease other than those relating to the duration of the term : see s. 3 (3). Pausing there, I think it is probable that the original tenancy of July, 1939, endured till Oct. 30, 1941, through the exercise of the option to extend for one year. However that may be, on any view the agreement of Oct. 30, 1941, is a new tenancy distinct from any earlier one. Although it speaks of " continuing " the old tenancy for the duration of the war, it does not derive from any option or other provision contained in the original agreement.

The position, therefore, is that the lease under which the tenant held at the time of the plaint (and through its statutory prolongation holds today) was not the original lease, and that this lease was made at a time when the tenant himself owned the furniture he was purporting to rent from the landlord. In 1946 the tenant at last claims the furniture as his property, which, on the facts found by the judge, it had been since July, 1940. In these circumstances the question is whether the tenant can say : " From Oct. 31, 1941, on, at least, my tenancy has been an unfurnished one, and, since the rateable value was under £100 per annum, has been within the protection of the Rent Restrictions Acts," or whether he is precluded by estoppel from saying this. The landlord claims, and the judge has held, that he is estopped from doing so. The suggested estoppel is based on the following circumstances. The landlord, when, on Aug. 27, 1940, he purported to buy the furniture from Jacobson, had, of course, no idea that Jacobson had already sold it to the tenant. The tenant as clearly did know this, but so acted, it is said, as to induce or confirm in the landlord's mind the belief that the furniture was not his, the tenant's, but the landlord's, and the landlord changed his position on the faith of that belief. The following acts or omissions of the tenant are relied on as constituting a representation inducing or confirming that belief: (i) At some time later than Aug. 9, 1940, but before Aug. 27, the landlord and his wife had gone over to view Manor Lodge and in the presence of the tenant had checked the furniture on the premises with a list of some sort (it was, in fact, the Catesby list). The tenant saw this going on, but did not inform the landlord that it was not the landlord's but his, the tenant's, furniture. (ii) In the "second letter" (Oct. 25, 1940) the tenant purports to exercise his option "and rent the above-mentioned dwelling-house, furnished, with garden, under the same conditions as fixed up to the present—for a further year, till Nov. 1, 1941." This, it is said, is a representation that the furniture in the house (which the landlord and his wife had inspected in August and must have observed to be "substantial") was not the property of the tenant and was the property of the landlord. (iii) Later, when this extension expired, and the tenant made the agreement contained in the letter of Oct. 30, 1941, for a new tenancy "for the duration of the war," he said it was to be "under the same conditions" as previously, namely, it was to be a "furnished" lease. This, it is said, further reinforced the belief which the tenant's previous letter had entrenched in the landlord's mind, a belief of which the tenant did nothing to disabuse him till 1946 at the earliest. Meanwhile it was said that the landlord had acted on this representation to his detriment, inter alia, by not suing Jacobson before Jacobson evanesced some time in the autumn of 1940.

The Rent Restrictions Acts compel the courts to treat an unfurnished lease of a dwelling-house within the statutory limits of rateable value in a certain way. They are not to permit more than the standard rent and permitted increases to be charged, nor (except under certain conditions laid down in the Acts) have they jurisdiction to make orders for possession. The court must take these points even if the parties do not raise them, as they go to jurisdiction. The court's power, on the other hand, to make orders for possession in the case of leases of "substantially" furnished houses is left unfettered by the Rent Restrictions Acts. In my view, the parties cannot, by describing (whether by accident or design) what is, in fact, an unfurnished tenancy as a furnished or substantially furnished one, alter the fact that the furniture is actually the tenant's and that such a tenancy cannot be a furnished or substantially furnished one. To treat the tenant as estopped from denying that the tenancy is furnished when it is, in fact, unfurnished is to confer on the courts by the act of one of the parties a jurisdiction (namely, an untrammelled power to make orders for possession of premises in fact unfurnished) which Parliament has said the courts shall not have.

In Stone (J. & F.) Lighting and Radio, Ltd. v. Levitt (4) the court dealt with a counterclaim with which, having regard to the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, s. 12 (7), (which excludes from the protection of the Acts houses let at less than two-thirds of their rateable value) it had no jurisdiction to deal. It was held that no estoppel by matter of record could arise between the parties. LORD THANKERTON said ([1946] 2 All E.R. 655):

> " . . . it is idle to suggest that either estoppel or res judicata can give the court a jurisdiction under the Rent Restrictions Acts which the statute says it is not to have."

These words seem closely in point. A similar principle was applied by the Privy Council in Maritime Electric Company, Ltd. v. General Dairies, Ltd. (5), where a statutory company which by mistake had demanded and been paid by a customer over a considerable period only one-tenth of the proper charge for services supplied was held not estopped from claiming the balance : compare also Anctil v. Manufacturer's Life Insurance Company (6) and Re A Bankruptcy Notice (7). Just as, in general, parties are not competent to contract out of the protection of the Acts (see Barton v. Fincham (8) and Brown v. Draper (9)) where the true facts attract that protection, so here the tenant cannot, in my view, be estopped from proving the true facts where those facts attract that protection.

By the somewhat artificial rule (based on convenience) laid down in Jozwiak v. Hierowski (2), when a transfer, or change in the quantity, of the furniture rented takes place during the currency of a lease, regard is had, not to the position at the time of the transfer or change, but to the position at the beginning of the tenancy. When a new tenancy supervenes, I see no reason why the court should not have regard to the actual position as to ownership of the furniture, and, if this is such that a furnished lease (let alone a substantially furnished one) is impossible, the court must give effect to the rights which the statutes confer on a tenant under an unfurnished lease. Apart from this general principle I doubt whether in the present case the representation relied on is either unambiguous or a representation of pure fact. It is a representation that the lease is furnished, which may mean furnished to some extent or furnished " substantially " within the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1923, s. 10. If it means the latter, it may well be a representation of mixed fact and law, the question what is a substantially furnished lease having been widely canvassed in the courts and forming the subject of decisions by the House of Lords.

In these circumstances I am of opinion that the appeal should be allowed, and the first limb of the declaration refused. I have assumed throughout that the declaration asked for is that the tenancy is not only a furnished tenancy but a substantially furnished one within s. 10 of the 1923 Act. A declaration that it is a furnished tenancy to some unspecified extent would be of no value to a landlord, and would in any case, on the view I take (namely, that this was a tenancy furnished to no extent), equally have to be refused. The second limb of the declaration runs as follows : " and that in particular the furniture comprised in such tenancy is that set out in the so-called Catesby list." This limb should, in my view, also be refused because such tenancy must mean the furnished tenancy referred to in the first limb of the declaration, and there was, according to my view, no such furnished tenancy and no estoppel precluding the tenant from saying so. On the other hand, the judge has found (and there was evidence on which he could find) that the furniture in the house was that in the Catesby list, and was the tenant's property. For these reasons I agree that the appeal should be allowed to the extent specified.

Appeal allowed with costs. No order as to costs below.

BACON v. GRIMSBY CORPORATION.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Bucknill, Somervell and Denning, L.JJ.), November 3, 1949.]

Housing—House unfit for human habitation—Notice to execute works—Duty of public authority to consider "estimated cost of the works necessary"—Detailed estimates of cost of works not before local authority before notice issued—Value of house—Whether value to ground lessee or freehold value to be considered in determining whether estimated expense of repairs reasonable—Housing Act, 1936 (c. 51), s. 9 (1), s. 9 (3).

By the Housing Act, 1936, s. 9 (1): "Where a local authority . . . are satisfied that any house which is occupied, or is of a type suitable for occupation, by persons of the working classes is in any respect unfit for human habitation, they shall, unless they are satisfied that it is not capable at a reasonable expense of being rendered so fit, serve upon the person having control of the house a notice requiring him . . . to execute the works specified in the notice . . ." By s. 9 (3): "In determining for the purposes of this Part of this Act whether a house can be rendered fit for human habitation at a reasonable expense, regard shall be had to the estimated cost of the works necessary to render it so fit and the value which it is estimated that the house will have when the works are completed."

Notices under s. 9 (1) of the Act of 1936 were served by the local authority on the agent of the ground lessees of nine houses, which were let on weekly tenancies, at a rent of about 10*s.* a week each, to tenants protected by the Rent Restrictions Acts. Two of the ground leases had twelve years to run, and the other seven had 21 years to run. In issuing the notices the local authority acted on a report of their sanitary inspector who had stated that the repairs could be done at a reasonable cost, but they did not have before them any detailed estimates showing the cost of the individual items of repair necessary. In some of the cases the estimated cost of the works, though reasonable in regard to the freehold value of the house, was not reasonable in regard to the ground lessees' interest therein. It was contended (inter alia) on behalf of the ground lessees (a) that the notices were bad in that the local authority, before issuing them, did not have before them for consideration detailed estimates of the costs of the works, and (b) that, in determining whether the expense of the works was reasonable within s. 9 (3) of the Act, the value of the house to the ground lessee, and not its freehold value, should be considered.

HELD: (i) consideration by the local authority of the detailed items of the estimated cost of the works required was not a condition precedent to the issue of a notice under s. 9 (1) of the Act of 1936.

Cohen v. West Ham Corporation ([1933] Ch. 814), applied.

(ii) in determining, under s. 9 (3) of the Act, whether a house could be rendered fit for human habitation at a reasonable expense, regard was to be had, not to its value to the ground lessee, but to its freehold value, on the basis that it was occupied by a tenant entitled to the benefit of the Rent Restrictions Acts.

(1) Cohen v. West Ham Corpn., [1933] Ch. 814; 102 L.J.Ch. 305; 149 L.T. 271; 97 J.P. 155; Digest Supp.

APPEALS by the agent of the ground lessees from orders of His Honour JUDGE SHOVE, at Grimsby County Court, dated May 26, 1949, whereby he dismissed the agent's appeals under the Housing Act, 1936, s. 15 (1), from notices issued by the local authority, under s. 9 (1) of the Act, requiring the execution of specified works to the nine houses, which were the subject-matter of the appeals, to render them fit for human habitation. It was contended by the agent that the notices were bad in that detailed estimates of the costs of the works required were not before the local authority before they issued the notices. The county court judge held (a) that the notices were good, and (b) that, in determining whether the expense of the necessary repairs was reasonable, within the meaning of s. 9 (3), regard should be had to the freehold value of each house, and not to its value to the ground lessee. The agent's appeals from the orders of the county court judge were now dismissed by the Court of Appeal. The facts appear in the judgment of SOMERVELL, L.J. A Lamb, K.C., and Sells for the agent of the ground lessees.

Melford Stevenson, K.C., and Scarman for the local authority. B

BUCKNILL, L.J. : SOMERVELL, L.J., will deliver the first judgment in this case.

SOMERVELL, L.J. : These are nine appeals from a judgment of His Honour JUDGE SHOVE, sitting at Grimsby County Court. He delivered one judgment and, although in certain respects there is, as will emerge, at any rate C one point which arises in respect of three of the cases and not of the others, in the main the questions raised affect all nine cases in the same way. They are appeals by Mr. Bacon, the agent of the two ground lessees of the nine houses to which these appeals relate, against notices, served on behalf of Grimsby Corporation under s. 9 (1) of the Housing Act, 1936, in respect of repairs which those notices required to be done. It is agreed that the agent was the proper D person to serve, in that, although the nine houses fell into two groups concerning two ground lessees, the agent was the person in control of both sets of properties. Section 9 (1) is in these terms :

> " Where a local authority, upon consideration of an official representation, or a report from any of their officers, or other information in their possession, are satisfied that any house which is occupied, or is of a type suitable for E occupation, by persons of the working classes is in any respect unfit for human habitation, they shall, unless they are satisfied that it is not capable at a reasonable expense of being rendered so fit, serve upon the person having control of the house a notice requiring him, within such reasonable time, not being less than 21 days, as may be specified in the notice, to F execute the works specified in the notice and stating that, in the opinion of the authority, those works will render the house fit for human habitation."

Section 9 (3) provides :

> " In determining for the purposes of this Part of this Act whether a house can be rendered fit for human habitation at a reasonable expense, regard shall be had to the estimated cost of the works necessary to render G it so fit and the value which it is estimated that the house will have when the works are completed."

Section 11 deals with a different and more drastic power which the local authority may have to consider in certain cases where houses are unfit for human habitation. Section 11 (1) provides : H

> " Where a local authority, upon consideration of an official representation, or a report from any of their officers, or other information in their possession, are satisfied that any house which is occupied, or is of a type suitable for occupation, by persons of the working classes, is unfit for human habitation and is not capable at a reasonable expense of being rendered so fit, they shall serve upon the person having control of the house, upon any other person who is an owner thereof, and, so far as it is reasonably practicable to > ascertain such persons, upon every mortgagee thereof, notice of the time (being some time not less than 21 days after the service of the notice) and place at which the condition of the house and any offer with respect to the carrying out of works, or the future user of the house, which he may wish to submit will be considered by them, and every person upon whom such a notice is served shall be entitled to be heard when the matter is so taken into consideration."

That may result in the local authority changing their mind or it may result in a demolition order. Section 13 deals with the position when a demolition order is made. Section 15 provides for appeals. By section 15 (1) :

> " Any person aggrieved by (a) a notice under this Part of this Act requiring the execution of works . . . may, within 21 days after the date of the service of the notice, demand or order . . . as the case may be, appeal to the county court . . ."

We are concerned with seven houses in Charlton Street and two houses in Ayscough Street, the ground lessees of the two sets of properties being in each case a Mr. Ricketts. In the case of the Ayscough Street property there was a ground lease of 75 years, with twelve years to run, and in respect of the Charlton Street property there was a ground lease of 99 years, with 21 years to run. All of the houses were let on weekly tenancies at about 10*s*. a week.

The learned judge decided that these notices were proper notices under the Act. From that decision there is an appeal by the agent to this court, and the notice of appeal sets out with clearness the points which we have to consider. The first ground of this appeal is that > " . . . the learned judge was in error when he held that no point was taken by the appellant that the respondents had failed to make proper inquiries before sanctioning the service of the notice which was the subject-matter of this appeal, and that, having regard to the fact that the respondents' expert witness gave evidence that he had laid no estimate of the cost of carrying out the repairs set out in the said notice before the respondents, the said notice was bad in law and cannot be enforced."

That contention arises in this way. Evidence was called on behalf of the local authority and Mr. Parkinson, a sanitary inspector who had reported in respect of these houses to the sanitary sub-committee (who in turn reported to the health committee and then to the full council), gave evidence to this effect, which I read from the judge's note :

> " I made a report on each of these houses . . . I did not give estimates to the committee. All that I did was to make general report that those repairs could be done at a reasonable cost."

The first point that we have to consider is the contention of counsel for the agent of the ground lessees that the failure to submit to the housing committee of the local authority estimates (by which must be meant detailed estimates, showing the cost of the individual items of repairs necessary to these houses) makes these notices bad. Counsel for the agent says that under s. 9 of the Act of 1936 the local authority have to address their minds to the question, as set out in sub-s. (3), whether the expense is reasonable, regard being had :

> " . . . to the estimated cost of the works necessary to render it so fit and the value which it is estimated that the house will have when the works are completed."

He then asks : How can one have regard to the estimated cost of the works unless one has an estimate before one ? Before referring to a decision of this court, which, I think, is of assistance on, and possibly covers, this point, I wish to state that, in my opinion, s. 9 (3) does not refer back to s. 9 (1). The estimated cost of the works and the estimated value of the house when they are completed form the criterion which has to be applied when the question whether the house can be rendered fit for human habitation at a reasonable expense has to be determined. In considering whether regard to the estimated cost of the works is a condition precedent to the notices under s. 9 (1), I am also struck by the difference of wording in s. 9 (1) and in s. 11 (1). Under s. 11 (1), which deals with demolition orders, the local authority have to be satisfied that the house A

> "... is unfit for human habitation and is not capable at a reasonable expense of being rendered so fit."

It seems to me that a lesser burden is placed on the local authority by the words of s. 9 (1):

> "... unless they are satisfied that it is not capable at a reasonable expense of being rendered so fit ..." B

The general point, as it seems to me, came before this court, though in somewhat different circumstances, in Cohen v. West Ham Corporation (1). In that case notices were served under the Housing Act, 1930, s. 17, which was the equivalent of, and for all present purposes identical with, s. 9 of the Act of 1936. No appeal was entered against them (as was done in this case), 21 days (the time C for appeal) elapsed, and there was a provision in the Act that on the expiration of 21 days the notices were to become final and conclusive as to any matters which could have been raised on such an appeal. In that case the minute showing what had happened before the local authority was before the court, and it is recited in these terms:

> "On Apr. 1, 1932, the council's medical officer of health made a report D to their housing committee, cl. (d) of which was: 'Under s. 17 of the Housing Act, 1930, I report the following houses as being in certain respects unfit for human habitation and capable at a reasonable cost of being rendered fit ...' The committee reported that, having considered the representation contained in cl. (d), they recommended that notices under s. 17 of the Housing Act, 1930, be served upon the landlords, requiring them, E within reasonable time, not being less than 21 days, to execute such works as would render the houses fit for human habitation. At a meeting held on Apr. 26, 1932, the council resolved that the committee's report be received and adopted and its recommendations carried into effect."

On that the notices were served. The point was taken that the council had not F directed their minds to the matters to which they had to direct their minds under s. 17. What I may call the main basis of the argument in that case was different from the argument in the present case. It was said in that case that they had merely, as it were, rubber-stamped the report of their officer, and there was no evidence that they had themselves directed their minds to the matter at issue. The point there was not, therefore, the same point as is being raised G in the present case, but there are observations which, I think, are of assistance. I think that it is quite clear, both from the judgment of LORD HANWORTH, M.R., and also from the judgment of LAWRENCE, L.J., first that that minute was taken as recording what happened and as meaning that neither the committee nor the full body had before them what we have called in this case an estimate, but what is referred to by LORD HANWORTH, M.R. ([1933] Ch. 833) as "a schedule H of dilapidations." After referring to the word "regard" in s. 17 (4) of the Act of 1930 (the forerunner of s. 9 (3) in the Act of 1936), LORD HANWORTH, M.R., said (ibid.):

> "That word 'regard' is intended to be a loose and indefinite term, and I think it enables the local authority to take into account not merely an accurate estimate made by a surveyor or an estate agent with a schedule of dilapidations, but to take into account what would probably be the cost > of the outlay required, and to consider whether, after that outlay had been incurred, it would be possible to let the house and get a return for the total expenditure upon the premises. I am, therefore, of opinion that what has been done here is abundantly sufficient to justify the notices being served under s. 17, and not under s. 19, which is to apply where it is not possible to repair the house within the limits that I have specified."

A LAWRENCE, L.J., said (ibid., 834) :

> " . . . the phrase that ' regard shall be had ' to the estimated cost and the estimated value of the property, does not imply that the council is bound to have a certificate from a surveyor and valuer before it can come to the requisite conclusion."

B To succeed on this point, I think that counsel for the agent has to satisfy us that, as a matter of necessary implication, one must imply into s. 9 (1) of the Act of 1936 a provision to the effect that the consideration of the detailed items of estimate is a condition precedent to the issue of a notice under that section. I find no words in the sub-section which would justify that, and, indeed, I think that the form of words used makes it impossible to imply what would be a C drastic provision and one which, I think, in fairness to local authorities, it would be quite wrong to imply unless the context made it absolutely necessary. In coming to that conclusion, I think that I am following the decision on the point argued in the Cohen case (1), although, as I have said, the argument was somewhat different.

The second point taken in the notice of appeal is that

> " . . . the learned judge was in error when he ascertained whether the said house could be rendered fit for human habitation at a reasonable expenditure by reference to its freehold value and that he should have done so by reference to its value to the appellant, that is to say, its leasehold value."

The words of s. 9 (3) are these :

> " . . . regard shall be had to the estimated cost of the works necessary to render it so fit and the value which it is estimated that the house will have when the works are completed."

I would have said that the words " value of the house " there point, prima facie, to an objective standard, though I agree that the word " value " is one which F has to be construed according to its context and in certain contexts may well be construed as meaning a value to a particular person, although that is not expressly so stated, but I do not myself think that it is possible to construe it in that way in this case. Counsel for the agent of the ground lessees submits that in a case where the ground lease has only two years to run the house may be of very little value to the ground lessee and it may be a hardship if he is G called on to spend £30, £40 or £50 on a cottage in which his interest is so slight. I can well see that. On the other hand, unless the Act has provided that his interest is to be considered, he will have to suffer the hardship which Parliament has imposed in such cases as that. It may well have been thought that in a case of that kind—at any rate, in the vast majority of cases—there would be another factor which, if one is considering fairness, it would be relevant to consider, H namely, that under nearly all leases the lessee has at the end of the lease to deliver up the house in good condition. We are dealing with a house which is thought to be worth repairing at the time in question. It would be unlikely that, under the terms of the lease, the lessee would not have to do repairs such as are being contemplated in this class of case, viz., repairs necessary to make the house fit for human habitation. Therefore, in all cases where those considerations apply, it is not some new burden, such as would never otherwise fall on him, which is being put on the lessee, but a burden which in the normal case, if he did not do the repairs now, would fall on him later, in that either he would have to undertake the repairs before the conclusion of his lease or pay a sum in respect of his failure to do so.

What chiefly influences my mind in rejecting this second ground in the notice of appeal is that, in my opinion, if in this class of case it had been intended that the local authority, in so far as they have to consider it, and the courts, when they have to deal with the matter, should have regard to the value to the particular lessee and how much of his term is still to run and, possibly, the covenants in his lease, that would have been made plain on the face of s. 9 (3), whereas the sub-section merely uses the words I have quoted. I have come to the conclusion that the learned judge was right in taking, as he did, the freehold value, on the basis that these houses contained, as they did, tenants who had the right to claim the benefit of the Rent Restrictions Acts. I, therefore, think that on that point the learned judge was right.

There was then taken a third point, which arises in respect of three only of these houses. In the main the learned judge accepted with regard to the costs of these repairs the evidence of Mr. Maslin and Mr. Newton, who were called on behalf of the agent for the ground lessees. Mr. Maslin gave certain figures in regard to what, in his view, was the value to the two ground lessees respectively of the outstanding periods of their leases. He brought out the present value at £41 in respect of the Charlton Street houses, and at £22 10*s*. in respect of the Ayscough Street houses. He said that, on the basis of that being the value which has to be considered, he thought that £25 per house, as an overall figure for the houses, was the limit which it would have been reasonable to expend, and, in the face of that evidence, in so far as the figures fell below £25, they are not challenged in this court. In three cases, however, the judge has found as " reasonable," within s. 9 (3) of the Act, figures above £25, and in one case as much as £64. I do not think that what the learned judge said in regard to this point can be challenged in this court. Accepting Mr. Maslin's evidence, he put £25 as a reasonable figure, on the basis that the value of the house when the works were completed would be not more than £41, but, on the learned judge's view and on the view which I think is right, that is not the proper value of the house. The proper value on the freehold basis, with the rent restricted tenants, is £70 or £80, and, therefore, as I see it, there would have to be a substantial increase in Mr. Maslin's figure, having regard to the basis on which he put it forward. If you double the figure, you are in the neighbourhood of £50.

The learned judge put the matter in this way and, with respect, I think that this is right. Taking the case of the £64, he said :

> " It is true that after the expenditure on repairs a landlord could not obtain any higher rent than the lessees are receiving now, but, as I have pointed out, that rent will probably no longer be obtainable unless the repairs are executed. Is, then, the expenditure of even as much as £64 reasonable in order to secure the continuance of an annual return of £8 or £9 or rather more ? Looking at the position in that way, it seems to me impossible to say that such expenditure is not a reasonable proposition."

I think that the learned judge was entitled and, indeed, bound to consider what is really a most important matter in applying s. 9 (3), namely, the fact that, if these repairs were not carried out, the house might be demolished and disappear altogether as a rent producing asset. Counsel for the agent suggested that the learned judge had not considered the loss of interest on the £64 or the interest that would have to be paid in order to raise the money. I cannot accept that. I think that he did. He was considering the expenditure of £64. Obviously, if you are to expend £64, you have to borrow it, unless you already have it, or, if you already have it, you will lose what it might otherwise earn. In my view, the learned judge directed his mind to the proper matters, having regard to all those three items, and there are no grounds on which his decision can be challenged in this court. For these reasons, I think that the appeals should be dismissed.

BUCKNILL, L.J.: I agree.

DENNING, L.J.: I agree. In the county court it was suggested that
A the local authority were influenced by extraneous considerations in serving the notices. If that suggestion had been made good, the notices would, no doubt, be bad, but it was not made good. It was quite plain that the local authority were not influenced by extraneous considerations. Next it was said that the local authority had not considered matters which they ought to have considered, and that on that account the notices were bad. That is the main point which has
B been brought before us. It is said that they ought to have had before them estimates of the cost of the works and estimates of the value of the houses. That depends on the construction of the Act. In my opinion, once the local authority are satisfied that a house is in any respect unfit for human habitation, they must serve on the person having control of the house either a notice requiring him to repair it (a repairs notice) or a notice preliminary to a demolition order (a demo-
C lition notice). Of those two alternatives, they can only serve a demolition notice if they are also satisfied that the house is not worth the cost of the repairs. Unless they are so satisfied, they must serve a repairs notice. In determining which of the two notices they should serve, they must consider whether the repaired value of the house will justify the cost of the repairs, but they need not have precise estimates before them. Take, for instance, the houses in this case.
D In one of the houses all that was necessary was to remedy a broken water closet pan and seat; in another to repair the wash-house boiler and flue; in yet another to put in a new kitchen range because the other had become worn out. Those were plainly cases where a repairs notice, and not a demolition notice, should be served. It would be quite wrong to serve a demolition notice and pull down houses when work of such a comparatively small amount would make
E them fit. Cases might arise, of course, where it would be desirable to have figures showing the estimated cost of the work and the value of the house, but the local authority are the people who determine whether figures are necessary. The absence of figures does not mean that they did not do their duty. It seems to me that there is no evidence that they did not consider matters which they ought to have considered, and on that point the appeal fails. On the remaining
F points it seems to me plain that the value of the house to be considered is the freehold value. The question is whether the house is worth the cost of the repairs. Is it worth spending the money on it? The application of this test to the individual houses is a question of fact, with which we should not interfere. I agree that the appeals fail and should be dismissed.

Appeals dismissed with costs.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Tucker, Singleton and Jenkins, L.JJ.), November 8, 1949.]

Negligence—Dangerous article—Inflammable material—Delivery by defendants to plaintiffs by mistake—Explosion caused by cigarette of plaintiffs' employee —Novus actus interveniens—Liability of defendants.

Five packing cases containing dangerously inflammable celluloid film scrap were delivered in error by the defendants to the plaintiffs' premises. No warning of their dangerous contents was given, but the plaintiffs' foreman recognised the material as inflammable and dangerous when some of it was taken out of one of the cases. He warned the workmen in charge of the cases not to smoke near them, instructed them to replace the scrap and remove the cases to the yard, and arranged with the defendants to deliver the cases to their proper destination 150 yards away. Before the cases were moved a typist employed by the plaintiffs approached the scrap while holding a lighted cigarette, and it exploded causing serious damage.

HELD : it was the duty of the defendants not to deliver this inflammable material without warning in such circumstances that damage might result from some mischievous or foolish act of a person on the plaintiffs' premises ; the onus was on the defendants to prove that the damage was caused, not by their negligence, but by a novus actus interveniens ; in the absence of evidence that the typist deliberately set the scrap alight, they had not discharged that onus ; and the plaintiffs were entitled to succeed.

Per TUCKER, L.J. : Assuming that there was evidence that what the typist did was not merely accidental, she did not appreciate the nature of the substance which she was igniting and did not intend to do any damage, and her behaviour was not such a conscious act of volition as would relieve the defendants of liability for their negligence.

APPEAL by the defendants from a judgment of JONES, J., dated May 17, 1949, and reported [1949] 2 All E.R. 129, awarding damages to the plaintiffs for negligence.

A carter employed by the defendants by mistake delivered five packing cases
B to the premises of the plaintiffs who were wireless manufacturers. The cases contained highly inflammable celluloid film scrap, but no indication of the character of their contents was given. Two of the plaintiffs' employees started to unpack the cases when the plaintiffs' foreman, recognising the nature of the material, warned the men not to smoke, instructed them to put back the scrap taken out, and communicated with the defendants, asking them to have the
C cases removed. In the meantime, a Mrs. Brady, a typist in the plaintiffs' office, approached the cases with a lighted cigarette and an explosion occurred causing serious damage. The defendants admitted that they had been negligent in delivering the cases to the wrong address, but they alleged that the proximate cause of the accident was Mrs. Brady's act, which, they alleged, was deliberate, in applying a lighted cigarette to the material and that the chain of causation
D was broken by her conscious act. The Court of Appeal now dismissed the appeal.

Glynn-Jones, K.C., and Ryder Richardson for the plaintiffs.
Aiken Watson, K.C., and Colin Duncan for the defendants.

TUCKER, L.J. : This is an appeal from a judgment of JONES, J., in which he decided the issue of liability in favour of the plaintiffs, leaving the amount of E damages to be assessed. [HIS LORDSHIP recited the facts, reviewed the evidence, and continued :] The learned judge said ([1949] 2 All E.R. 131) :

> " I am not in possession of full information as to exactly what happened here, but the inference I draw with regard to [Mrs. Brady] is that she had no intention of doing any damage. I cannot conceive that she should have
> F desired to injure the premises of her employers, and that in that sense she was unconscious rather than conscious of doing anything that was negligent. I cannot believe that she meant more than to perpetrate a joke. The conclusion I draw is that there cannot have been very much of this material outside the case when [Mrs. Brady] came along and that probably all she meant to do was to make a small and innocuous bonfire of some of the > G material which she probably took to be ordinary packing. Taking that view of the facts and drawing those conclusions from them and from what evidence there is, I hold that this behaviour on her part was not such a conscious act of volition as to relieve the defendants from liability for their admitted negligence."

It is not in dispute that the defendants were negligent in delivering this
H highly inflammable material at the wrong address without any kind of warning or indication of its contents or its dangerous nature. The defendants say, however, that the damage which took place to the plaintiffs' premises was not a natural and probable result of their negligence, but that it was due to a novus actus interveniens on the part of the typist, namely, her act of conscious volition in intentionally setting light to this material. Counsel for the plaintiffs, on the other hand, says that the onus is on the defendants to escape liability for their negligence and to show that what occurred was due to an act of conscious volition on the part of Mrs. Brady, and that they have failed to discharge that onus. Counsel says that if it was necessary, to discharge that onus, that Mrs. Brady's evidence should be given, it was for the defendants to call her, and not for the plaintiffs. Counsel further says that in any event what is proved here, taken at its worst against the plaintiffs does not amount to an act of conscious volition within the language used by LORD DUNEDIN in Dominion Natural Gas Co., Ltd. v. Collins and Perkins (1), which was referred to by JONES, J., in his judgment. The facts of A that case were these. The appellants had installed a gas apparatus and were supplying natural gas in certain machine shops under an agreement with a railway company. The appellants installed inside the blacksmith's shop of the railway company a regulator for the purpose of controlling the pressure of the natural gas, which regulator, it was contended, should have been placed outside the building, and a pipe should have been connected from the brass safety B valve attached to the regulator to the outside of the building, to permit the gas which might proceed from the safety valve to escape to the outside atmosphere. The jury found that that contention was made out, and that the appellants were guilty of negligence. It was, however, contended on behalf of the defendants that some of the workmen of the railway company had tampered with the safety valve, and that the escape which took place must have been due to improper C practices on the part of the railway company's servants, for which they were not responsible. LORD DUNEDIN, dealing with that matter, said ([1909] A.C. 645):

> "The machine itself was examined, and it was found that there was an accumulation of dirt which prevented the portcullis door closing tight. It was also proved that the railway company's servants had inserted a tap valve D with a controlling cock in the pipe just before it enters the regulator, i.e., on the high-pressure side; also that some workers of the railway company, annoyed by the noise which it made, had put a punch on top of the safety valve and hammered it."

That is what the learned and noble Lord was referring to later, when (ibid., 647), he used the expression "the tampering with the machines by the railway com- E pany's workmen." After having found that there was negligence by the appellants, LORD DUNEDIN, delivering the judgment of the Privy Council, said (ibid., 646):

> "What that duty is will vary according to the subject-matter of the things involved. It has, however, again and again been held that in the case of F articles dangerous in themselves, such as loaded firearms, poisons, explosives, and other things ejusdem generis, there is a peculiar duty to take precaution imposed upon those who send forth or instal such articles when it is necessarily the case that other parties will come within their proximity. The duty being to take precaution, it is no excuse to say that the accident would not have happened unless some other agency than that of the defendant had G intermeddled with the matter. A loaded gun will not go off unless someone pulls the trigger, a poison is innocuous unless someone takes it, gas will not explode unless it is mixed with air and then a light is set to it. Yet the cases of Dixon v. Bell (2), Thomas v. Winchester (3) and Parry v. Smith (4) are all illustrations of liability enforced. On the other hand, if the proximate cause of the accident is not the negligence of the defendant, but the conscious H act of another volition, then he will not be liable. For against such conscious act of volition no precaution can really avail."

Counsel for the plaintiffs says that the learned lord is obviously contrasting a conscious act of volition with an intentional act of intermeddling. In each of the cases which he cited there was an intentional act of a third party which amounted to intermeddling, but in all those cases the acts were held to be of a nature which the defendants should or could have contemplated as reasonably likely to follow. Counsel says that one must attach to the words "a conscious act of another volition" some meaning other than the mere intentional doing of some act, and he argues that the key to the problem is to be found in the last sentence of the passage which I have read, where LORD DUNEDIN says: "For against such conscious act of volition no precaution can really avail." He quotes as examples the case of the man who, knowing that a gun is A loaded, deliberately fires it at somebody with the intention of killing him, or the man who, knowing that the substance in question is poisonous, deliberately administers it to somebody else. Against acts of that kind no precaution will avail. On the other hand, says counsel, an act which is careless and mischievous and done by a person without intending to produce the consequences which in fact follow, is not a novus actus interveniens within the meaning of the language B used by LORD DUNEDIN.

In this connection counsel for the plaintiffs also relies on a passage in the speech of LORD SUMNER in Weld-Blundell v. Stephens (5). LORD SUMNER said ([1920] A.C. 984):

> "Again, between the negligence of a defendant and the infliction of hurt or C loss on a plaintiff, the action of human beings may intervene in a great variety of ways, the action of children or other irresponsible creatures, of persons in a state of excusable ignorance acting without any intention to injure others (Elkins v. M'Kean (6)); of persons in a state of excusable alarm produced by the wrongful acts of the defendant (Scott v. Shepherd (7); Jones v. Boyce (8)); of persons acting in the exercise or the defence of their D rights and without intention to injure others (Clark v. Chambers (9); The Sisters (10); Halestrap v. Gregory (11)); of persons acting as the defendant meant them to act or acting as the defendant must have foreseen that they would act, in consequence of things done by him for his own purposes or in a state of indifference as to the result to others (Scott's Trustees v. Moss (12); R. v. Moore (13)) . . . Equally we may lay aside the cases where E dangerous things, or things capable of being dangerous if left exposed to the interference of others, have been treated as imposing special duties of care on those who are responsible for their being left where strangers can make them a source of danger to persons brought into contact with them. Such cases are Illidge v. Goodwin (14) and Lynch v. Nurdin (15)."

LORD SUMNER continues (ibid., 986):

> "In general (apart from special contracts and relations and the maxim respondeat superior), even though A. is in fault, he is not responsible for injury to C. which B., a stranger to him, deliberately chooses to do."

I think that that is probably the foundation for the use of the word "deliberately" in the admissions which were sought to be obtained from the plaintiffs, G and I think that "deliberately" there means the same thing as LORD DUNEDIN meant when he talked about a conscious act of volition.

That being the law, the question is how it is to be applied to the facts in the present case. I think that these questions of causation and of novus actus interveniens are always difficult, and this is certainly a case which is on the borderline. The conclusion which I have reached is that it was the duty of the defendants H not to deliver this dangerous, inflammable material without warning, in such circumstances that damage might result from some mischievous or foolish act of some person on the plaintiffs' premises. Those foolish or mischievous acts might be accidental or they might be intentional. It was not established that Mrs. Brady knew or appreciated the nature or qualities of this particular substance. That it would burn is, on the evidence, established. Wood shavings and paper will also burn, but, none the less, the consequences of their burning are very different from setting light to a high explosive or petrol or any substance of that kind. In my view, there was no evidence to show that this lady knew and appreciated the nature of this substance and the results which would almost inevitably follow from setting light to it. Therefore, although I will assume that there was sufficient evidence that what she did was not merely accidental, I think the learned judge, although some criticism can, perhaps, be directed to some of his language, came to the right conclusion, namely, that the behaviour on her part was not such a conscious act of volition as to relieve the defendants of the liability which arose from their admitted negligence. He was there seeking to apply the language of Lord Dunedin to the facts proved before him, and, applying the proper test, in my view he came to the right decision. For those reasons I think that this appeal fails.

SINGLETON, L.J. : It was conceded that the defendants were negligent, but the answer to the plaintiffs' claim was contained in the defence as follows :

> " Further or alternatively the said explosion and conflagration (if any, which is not admitted) were caused by the deliberate act of the said Brady, the servant or agent of the plaintiffs, in placing the glowing end of a cigarette against the said scrap."

That plea raises an issue which has been before the courts on many occasions. The case on which both learned counsel placed most reliance was Dominion Natural Gas Co., Ltd. v. Collins and Perkins (1). It becomes clear if one reads that authority that in such a case the onus is on the defendants to show that there was a new act intervening which relieves them from responsibility. It was held in the Privy Council ([1909] A.C. 640) :

> " that the initial negligence having been found against the appellants in respect of an easy and reasonable precaution which they were bound to have taken, they were liable unless they could show that the true cause of the accident was the act of a subsequent conscious volition, e.g., the tampering with the machine by third parties."

In that case it was put forward by the appellants (the defendants) that the cause of the accident was that certain workmen had tampered with the machine. Lord Dunedin, in the judgment, said this ([1909] A.C. 647) :

> " That being so, have the defendants been able to show affirmatively that the true cause of the accident was the conscious act of another volition, i.e., the tampering with the machines by the railway company's workmen."

I read the opinion of Lord Dunedin, and, in particular, that passage, as saying that, if there was proved to have been a conscious act of another volition, the tampering with the machines by the railway company's workmen, then the defendants would have been freed from responsibility if it was proved that that tampering was the cause of the accident. In the same way, in the present case, counsel for the defendants set out to show that the cause of the accident which gave rise to this claim was not negligence on the part of the defendants, but was the conscious act of Mrs. Brady in applying a lighted cigarette to material the nature of which she could at least see and which was, indeed, highly inflammable. It was for counsel for the defendants in those circumstances, to prove that case.

Having listened to the argument and looked at the authorities to which we have been referred, I should have said that, if it was shown that Mrs. Brady intentionally or deliberately and knowingly put her cigarette to this material, intending to make only a little fire, and this damage resulted from that act, there was a new cause intervening, and that the damage flowed not from any negligence on the part of the defendants, but from the act of Mrs. Brady. Counsel for the plaintiffs submitted that this was the sort of thing that anyone might do, and that the defendants ought to have contemplated it as likely to happen if they were negligent. He relied on two passages from the judgment of Greer, L.J., in Haynes v. Harwood (16). In the first passage ([1935] 1 K.B. 153) the learned lord justice said :

> “The next point involves a consideration of the maxim ‘novus actus interveniens,’ but before dealing with the authorities I wish to point out that it is not true to say that where a plaintiff has suffered damage occasioned by a combination of the wrongful act of a defendant and some further conscious act by an intervening person, that of itself prevents the court coming to a conclusion in the plaintiff’s favour if the accident was the natural and probable consequence of the wrongful act. That seems to me to be the necessary result of the decided cases which are accepted as authorities.”

In the second passage (ibid., 156), GREER, L.J., said :

> “If what is relied upon as novus actus interveniens is the very kind of thing which is likely to happen if the want of care which is alleged takes place, the principle embodied in the maxim is no defence. The whole question is whether or not, to use the words of the leading case, Hadley v. Baxendale (17), the accident can be said to be ‘the natural and probable result’ of the breach of duty. If it is the very thing which ought to be anticipated by a man leaving his horses, or one of the things likely to arise as a consequence of his wrongful act, it is no defence ; it is only a step in the way of proving that the damage is the result of the wrongful act.”

I can appreciate that people supplying dangerous goods ought to contemplate that others may be careless, but I fail to see that defendants in a case such as this ought to have in mind that a grown woman should go into the place where these things were, smoking, and then should deliberately put a lighted cigarette to material of this kind. I do not think that that is something which anyone ought to anticipate as being likely to happen. Therefore, if I were satisfied that there was proof of an intentional setting fire to this material by Mrs. Brady I should be of opinion that the defendants’ appeal ought to succeed.

A difficulty which arises is to ascertain precisely what the learned judge has found. I refer to two paragraphs towards the end of his judgment. This is the first ([1949] 2 All E.R. 131) :

> “ . . . the inference I draw with regard to [Mrs. Brady] is that she had no intention of doing any damage. I cannot conceive that she should have desired to injure the premises of her employers, and that in that sense she was unconscious rather than conscious of doing anything that was negligent. I cannot believe that she meant more than to perpetrate a joke.”

Whether the learned judge means “ to perpetrate a joke ” when she said something or whether he means more than that, I am not sure, but from that passage it seems to me that he was not finding that she was doing anything in the nature of a conscious act, because he finds that she had no intention of doing any damage. Later the learned judge says (ibid.) :

> “ The conclusion I draw is that there cannot have been very much of this material outside the case when [Mrs. Brady] came along and that probably all she meant to do was to make a small and innocuous bonfire of some of the material which she probably took to be ordinary packing. Taking that view of the facts and drawing those conclusions from them and from what evidence there is, I hold that this behaviour on her part was not such a conscious act of volition as to relieve the defendants from liability from their admitted negligence.”

When the learned judge said that probably all she meant to do was to make a small innocuous bonfire, I am not sure that that is a finding that she did so intentionally. It may be that she was doing something like that, the learned judge is saying, and no more than that, but, if he has found that there was an intentional act on her part in the making of a bonfire, I am not sure that there was any evidence on which he could so find. The onus is on the defendants. They must show that Mrs. Brady intentionally caused a fire. As the evidence stands I cannot find that that is proved. I agree that the appeal must be dismissed.

JENKINS, L.J. : I also agree that this appeal fails. The question, to adapt the passage ([1935] 1 K.B. 153) in the judgment of GREER, L.J., in Haynes v. Harwood (16), is whether, notwithstanding that the immediate cause of the conflagration was some act of Mrs. Brady, nevertheless the conflagration was, notwithstanding that intervening act, the natural and probable consequence of the defendants' wrongful act in negligently misdelivering five cases of this inflammable scrap to the plaintiffs' premises. That their act in so doing was wrongful is not in dispute, and that they must be responsible for the natural and probable consequences of their negligence is also admitted. The question is how far, in the circumstances of the case, the chain of causation can fairly be said to carry their liability.

A negligent carrier who does an act of this sort, that is to say, who delivers to a factory crates of inflammable material which are not consigned to that factory and not expected there and about which the persons in the factory know nothing must be taken to assume the possibility of someone setting the material alight by mistake. There might be two kinds of mistake. First, it might be unintentionally ignited by cigarette-ends, matches, or something of that sort thrown down by somebody not knowing the inflammable nature of the material. Secondly, it might be intentionally ignited by somebody who was doing, as far as he knew, a reasonable and proper thing, having selected for the purpose a place appropriate for the burning of material not of an exceptionally inflammable character. Those possibilities, I think, the negligent carrier must be assumed to foresee or to be able to foresee. This not being a case in which the inflammable material was deposited in a place frequented by children or pyromaniacs, I do not think that the possibility of some mischievous person deliberately setting light to the material for the purpose of seeing what kind of a fire it would make can be regarded as a reasonable and probable consequence of what was done. Therefore, if I were satisfied that it was established on the evidence that what Mrs. Brady did here was intentionally to set fire to the scrap to see what sort of blaze it would make, I should not be disposed to hold the defendants responsible for the consequent conflagration.

It has been said that the devil himself knoweth not what is in the mind of man, and it is to be noted that, in the passage ([1909] A.C. 646) from the judgment of the Privy Council in Dominion Natural Gas Co., Ltd. v. Collins and Perkins (1) referred to by the learned judge, LORD DUNEDIN, after saying that "if the proximate cause of the accident is not the negligence of the defendant, but the conscious act of another volition, then he will not be liable," goes on to say, "for against such conscious act of volition no precaution can really avail." If one is to assume in a case of this kind the possibility of somebody deliberately indulging in the making of bonfires inside a factory, that is a type of conduct against which no precaution can really avail. The packages might be labelled, in letters a foot high, "Inflammable. Danger. Keep away from lights," but that might make the prospective pyrotechnic display even more attractive to anyone who wanted to see what kind of a flare could be produced. Therefore, if I was satisfied that Mrs. Brady had deliberately set the scrap alight out of mischief, I should be disposed to hold the defendants absolved, without going meticulously into the precise state of her knowledge as to the inflammability of celluloid. On that view of the facts Mrs. Brady meant to produce a conflagration and, if she meant to produce one, for my part it seems irrelevant that the conflagration she did produce may have exceeded her wildest expectations. On the evidence, however, I am not satisfied that it is made out that she did intentionally set fire to the scrap. There is really no evidence except her observation: "What a lovely bonfire that would make!" or words to that effect. Nobody else there was able to see what happened. The learned judge, making bricks without straw, drew certain conclusions, which have already been read, about the state of Mrs. Brady's mind and her intentions in the matter, and he was able to infer that probably all she meant to do was to make a small and innocuous bonfire of some of the material, which she probably took as ordinary packing. That may be right or wrong, but it is not, as far as I can see, based on anything in the evidence. It does suggest that the learned judge was of opinion that Mrs. A Brady intended to make some sort of a bonfire, although not a very ambitious one. If there was evidence to support that view, I should be disposed to find in favour of the defendants, but, I cannot find that the evidence justifies the learned judge's conclusion about Mrs. Brady's intentions. That being so, it follows that his decision in favour of the plaintiffs was right. For these reasons I agree that the appeal should be dismissed.

INLAND REVENUE COMMISSIONERS v. COCK, RUSSELL & CO., LTD.

D [KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Croom-Johnson, J.), November 3, 1949.]

Excess Profits Tax—Profits of trade—Stock in trade—Valuation—Cost or market value—Need to value all items on same basis.

A company carrying on the business of wine and spirit merchants purchased certain pipes of port as part of their trading stock. At the end E of their accounting year the pipes had fallen in market value to a figure below their cost. In valuing their trading stock for the purpose of computing their profits for the year for assessment to excess profits tax, the company brought these pipes in at the market value, but valued the rest of their stock at cost which was less than the market value.

HELD : profits for income tax purposes (and, consequently, for excess F profits tax : see Finance (No. 2) Act, 1939, s. 14 (1) and sched. VII) were to be computed as a business man employing sound principles of commercial accountancy would compute them, subject only to any statutory modifications of such principles ; the evidence had shown that it was in accordance with those principles to value each item of stock at cost or market price, whichever was the lower ; no statutory modification of that G practice existed ; and, therefore, the method of valuation adopted by the company was right.

Donovan, K.C., and Coen for the company.

CROOM-JOHNSON, J. : This case raises a short, but important, point B relating to the assessment of the profits of a company for excess profits tax. By s. 14 (1) of the Finance (No. 2) Act, 1939, profits for the purposes of excess profits tax are to be computed on income tax principles, and r. 3 of the Rules Applicable to Cases I and II of sched. D to the Income Tax Act, 1918, has to be borne in mind.

Early in 1945 the company bought five pipes of port at £810 per pipe in bond. C
When the company came to make up its accounts for the year ended Dec. 31, 1945, it was found that three of the five pipes had been sold, and the remaining two pipes had been transferred to London and were kept in bond there. Being, as I assume, in bond to the order of the company, they became a part of the company's stock in trade. In October and November, 1945, and in January, 1946, the price of port began to fall. There were no recorded sales in December, 1945, and, D therefore, nothing by which the market could be tested. For the purpose of its profit and loss account for the accounting year ended Dec. 31, 1945, the company valued the two pipes of port in hand at their market value as at Dec. 31, 1945. The rest of the company's stock in trade was valued for the purposes of the account at cost which was very much less than the market value of it on Dec. 31, 1945. The Inland Revenue Commissioners took the point that the company E were not entitled to value part of their stock in trade by one method, namely, by reference to the cost, and another part of it by another method, namely, by reference to the value, but that they must be consistent and apply the same measuring rod to all their stock in trade and were not entitled to go through the stock in trade item by item and look to see what in truth was the position. Accordingly, an assessment to excess profits tax was made on the company on F the basis that the two pipes of port which had been affected by a rapidly and continuously falling market should be put into the accounts at cost. There was an appeal against that assessment, and the only point taken was that which I have mentioned—that the profit must be ascertained for income tax purposes on cost price all round, the fall in value of this particular stock being, not a realised actual loss, but only an anticipated loss. The General Commissioners, G having had a great deal of professional evidence about the matter, accepted the evidence and came to the conclusion that the method of valuation which had been adopted by the company was in accordance with the practice of the trade, and that the company was justified in valuing each item of stock at the cost or market value, whichever was the lower, and they allowed the appeal. On those facts this Case has been stated, and the same points have been argued before me. H

It is admitted that, unless it can be established that the General Commissioners have applied some wrong principle in reaching their conclusion, it was a conclusion of fact, and that this appeal would fail. I have listened to a careful argument to see whether it is established that there is anything in the Income Tax Acts or the rules which disentitles the commissioners to find as they did. There is nothing relevant to this topic in the rules which govern assessments under sched. D, or in the sections of the Act itself. There are no decided authorities which are precisely in point. Counsel for the Crown has admitted that the principle which is contended for by the company has hitherto been applied as a matter of practice in assessing profits and gains, but he says that the time has come when the Inland Revenue Commissioners must ascertain what is the strict legal position, and if that establishes that the practice is wrong, the practice must go.

A Has the Crown succeeded in establishing that the principle contended for by the company is wrong, it being established that the principle is not merely sound and right from the point of view of commercial accountancy, but that it is the principle which is used in commercial circles ? In seeking to establish that the practice of adopting this principle is wrong after so many years, counsel for the Crown have taken on themselves a heavy burden. It has long been recognised B that the right method of assessing profits and gains is to take into account the value of the stock in trade at the beginning and end of the accounting period, and that the ordinary principles of commercial accounting should be applied so long as they do not conflict with any express provision of the relevant statutes. In Whimster & Co. v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (1), the LORD PRESIDENT (Clyde) says (12 Tax Cas. 823) :

> " For example, the ordinary principles of commercial accounting require that in the profit and loss account of a merchant's or manufacturer's business the values of the stock in trade at the beginning and at the end of the period covered by the account should be entered at cost or market price, whichever is the lower ; although there is nothing about this in the taxing statutes."

D

In the same case, LORD SANDS says (ibid., 826) :

> " Where a trader sits down to ascertain from his books his profits or losses for the year, it is not enough that he should set on one side the money he has paid out, other than capital outlay, and on the other the money he has received in respect of the year's business plus the price he paid for commodities now in his possession." E

Later LORD SANDS said (ibid., 827) :

> " Though the losses are not realised in the year, they are losses incurred by the conduct of the business during the year, in respect that it was during the year and in the conduct of the business that the contracts are entered F into. The consideration of how it would be prudent for a trader to act does not solve the question here presented to us as one of revenue law. Under this law the profits are the profits realised in the course of the year. What seems an exception is recognised where a trader purchased and still holds goods or stocks which have fallen in value. No loss has been realised. Loss may not occur. Nevertheless, at the close of the year he is permitted to G treat these goods or stocks as of their market value. This exception to the general rule has never, however, been extended to the case of probable or indeed apparently inevitable loss to be incurred in the execution of future contracts entered into during the year in question, and the authorities are against it."

That was a case dealing with a ship.

H In Collins (Edward) & Sons, Ltd. v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (2), there are other observations on the subject by LORD SANDS. This case is an authority for the proposition that an anticipated loss cannot be brought into computation for the purpose of finding out the profits and gains in a particular year, but the court there was dealing, not with stock in trade, but with contracts for the supply of future goods which had not been delivered, which were not in the possession of the taxpayer, and which might or might not have produced a loss if and when they were delivered under the contracts for future delivery, although the goods in question had been appropriated to the particular contract by the persons who were going to supply them. The principle that the court applied in that case is intelligible and concluded, and I must follow it. LORD SANDS, in his judgment, said (12 Tax Cas. 784) :

> " It is common ground in this case that if the goods here in question had been taken into stock and had, at the end of the accounting period, fallen in value, allowance for this loss would have been made in estimating the profits of the year, although the loss was not a realised one in money, and its ultimate amount might be uncertain. The distinction may not be very clear between such a case and the present one where the merchant came under obligation to take delivery of goods which have fallen in value below the price which he is bound to pay for them. But, be that as it may, a distinction is well recognised and no deduction is allowed in ascertaining the profits of the year in respect of unprofitable contracts which have been entered into during the tax year but have not been executed by way of payment or receipt of goods or otherwise during this year."

It seems to me that those two cases, and a third case, J. H. Young & Co. v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (3), furnish no answer to the particular point which falls for determination here, namely, has the same principle to be applied to all the stock in trade in finding out its value, or can the persons who are going to be assessed estimate the value item by item to find out what the result may be ? During the argument I indicated several illustrations of unjust results which might follow from applying the general flat rate method for which the Crown contends. There is no authority which has been called to my attention which indicates that there is any legal principle which is applicable to the present case other than the general principle regarding the application of ordinary commercial principles. In Absalom v. Talbot (4), LORD PORTER said ([1944] 1 All E.R. 650) :

> " What has to be ascertained are the profits and gains of the business, or, as the wording originally stood, the balance of profits and gains—a difference in language which does not affect the meaning of the provision. In order to ascertain that balance one has to determine what sums are to be credited and what debited in the annual accounts. No directions are given in the Income Tax Acts as to how those profits are to be ascertained and in default of direction they must, I think, be arrived at on ordinary commercial principles, subject to such provisions of the Income Tax Acts as require a departure from such ordinary principles."

In these circumstances, it is impossible for me to say that the General Commissioners have failed to have regard to any principle of law which is applicable or that they have misdirected themselves. On the contrary, they appear to have directed themselves accurately and properly. They have accepted the evidence which was before them which was all one way. Profits for income tax purposes are to be computed as a business man, employing sound principles of commercial accountancy, would compute them, subject only to any statutory modification of such principles. I cannot imagine anything which is more clearly a question of fact than what is the value of stock in trade at a particular time and I can see nothing to indicate that the General Commissioners have gone wrong in deciding this matter. There is no justification for a departure now from what admittedly has been the long continued practice of the Inland Revenue Commissioners and their officials. The result is that this appeal fails and must be dismissed with costs.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

Re GILLETT'S WILL TRUSTS.
BARCLAYS BANK, LTD. v. GILLETT.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Roxburgh, J.), October 21, 26, November 4, 1949.]

Will—Future defeasible gift—Inclusion of intermediate income.
Will—Legacy—Payment—Fund for payment—Undisposed of property—No implied intention to exclude.

A testator, who died on Dec. 24, 1942, by his will, after bequeathing numerous pecuniary legacies, gave all his residuary real estate to his wife for her life and directed that thereafter the trustees were to sell the same and that the proceeds should form part of his residuary trust funds. The testator gave all his residuary personal estate to his trustees on trust to sell the same and after paying the funeral and testamentary expenses, debts, and duties to invest the balance of the proceeds of the said sale (called his "residuary trust funds") and stand possessed thereof and the income arising therefrom on trust to raise and pay the following annuities as from the date of his death : (i) to his wife, an annuity of £3,000 during her life ; (ii) to his sister E., an annuity of £300 during her life ; (iii) to his sister M., an annuity of £50 during her life ; (iv) to his sister M.G., an annuity of £300 during her life ; (v) to his sister S., an annuity of £300 to be paid to her, if living, until the death of the survivor of the above-named four annuitants, and on the death of such survivor he directed his trustees to purchase for S. an annuity of £300 during the remainder of her life. Power was given to the trustees to utilise and employ capital or income or both for the purpose of paying the said annuities. The will continued : "And as to any balance remaining of my residuary trust funds after the provision and payment of all the aforesaid annuities my trustees shall stand possessed thereof In trust for or all or such one more . . . of my brothers sister nephews nieces great nephews and great nieces" as his wife should by deed or will appoint. In default of and subject to such appointment, the testator directed that the said balance should be held in trust on the death of the survivor of the first named four annuitants, subject to the provision for S.'s annuity in certain shares for various named persons. The testator made no express disposition of income of the residuary trust funds not required to answer the annuities until the death of the survivor of the four first-named annuitants. On June 17, 1947, the testator's widow died without having exercised her power of appointment. Two of the said annuitants were still living at the date of the issue of the summons, and a large fund of surplus income had arisen.

HELD : (i) the rule that a contingent gift carries with it the gift of the intermediate income could not be extended in order that the deferred defeasible gift of capital on the death of the last of the four first-named annuitants to die might be construed as including the surplus income, and the said surplus income was undisposed of, and must devolve as on the testator's intestacy.

Dictum of JENKINS, J., in Re Oliver ([1947] 2 All E.R. 166), applied.

Dictum of KAY, J., in Re Lindo (1888) (59 L.T. 463), not applied.

(ii) as there was no express intention to the contrary and as, especially since it was clear that the testator did not intend to leave property undisposed of, no such contrary intention could be implied, the legacies ought primarily to be paid out of the undisposed of property.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS to determine, inter alia, in what manner and for whose benefit surplus income arising from the residuary trust funds of Joseph Ashby Gillett, deceased, should be applied ; and, if the surplus income were undisposed of by the will of the testator, whether it ought to be applied in or towards discharge of the pecuniary legacies bequeathed by the said will. ROXBURGH, J., held that the surplus income was undisposed of by the will, and that it ought to be applied in payment of the legacies if and so far as it was sufficient for the purpose. The relevant part of the will is set out fully in the judgment.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 4. ROXBURGH, J., read the following judgment. The will of Joseph Ashby Gillett, who died on Dec. 24, 1942, contained the following dispositions :

> " I give and devise to my wife Sarah Beatrice Gillett all the remainder of my real estate for her life she keeping the same properly insured against loss or damage by fire and after her death I give and devise the same to my trustees upon trust to sell call in and convert the same into money and the net proceeds of sale shall fall into and form part of my residuary trust funds. And I declare that my said wife shall at any time after my death have the option of purchasing all or any part of my real estate referred to in the last preceding clause hereof from my trustees at the same value as the property was valued for purposes of probate at the date of my death. I give devise and bequeath unto my said trustees all the remainder of my personal estate Upon trust to sell call in and convert into money the same or such part thereof as does not consist of money and out of the proceeds thereof and out of my ready money to pay my funeral and testamentary expenses and debts and all the duties due to the government and the expenses of proving this my will and invest the balance of the said monies (hereinafter called ' my residuary trust funds ') with power to vary such investments as are hereinafter authorised by me and to stand possessed thereof and the income arising therefrom Upon trust as follows :—To raise and pay the following annuities as from the date of my death, namely :—To my wife the said Sarah Beatrice Gillett an annuity of £3,000 during her life. To my sister Elizabeth Rachel Gillett an annuity of £300 during her life. To my sister Mary Catherine Gillett an annuity of £50 during her life. To my sister Margaret Gillett an annuity of £300 during her life. I give to my sister Sarah Mabel Warner an annuity of £300 to be paid to her, if living, until the death of the survivor of the above-named four annuitants and on the death of such survivor I direct my trustees to purchase for the said Sarah Mabel Warner if living an annuity of £300 during the remainder of her life. And I declare that in order to meet the said annuities my trustees shall in their absolute and uncontrolled discretion have power to utilise and employ capital or income or both for the purpose of paying > the said annuities or any of them or for purchasing the said annuity for the said Sarah Mabel Warner as aforesaid. And as to any balance remaining of my residuary trust funds after the provision and payment of all the aforesaid annuities my trustees shall stand possessed thereof In trust for all or such one or more exclusively of the others or other of my brothers sister nephews nieces great nephews and great nieces at such time and if more than one in such shares and with such gifts over and such provisions for maintenance advancement and benefit as my wife shall by deed revocable or irrevocable or by will or codicil from time to time or at any time appoint and in default of and subject to any such appointment In trust on the the decease of the survivor of the above first named four annuitants and the provision of the annuity for the said Sarah Mabel Warner as follows :—As to one equal sixth part thereof for my brother Edward Gillett absolutely but if he shall not then be living for his children in equal shares absolutely and if there shall be only one child the whole to be in trust for such one child. As to one other equal sixth part thereof for my sister Richenda Gillett for her own use absolutely but if she shall not then be living for her children in equal shares absolutely and if there shall be only one child the whole to be in trust for such one child. As to one equal twelfth part thereof In trust for my brother Henry Tregelles Gillett for his own use absolutely but if he shall not then be living for his children in equal shares and if there shall be only one child the whole to be in trust for such one child. As to one other equal twelfth share thereof In trust for my nephew John Bernard Gillett and Cora Gillett or the survivor of them but if they neither shall be then living In trust for their adopted child David G. Gillett for his own use absolutely And as to the remaining one equal half part thereof In trust for the following in equal shares, namely :—Francis Gillett, Joseph Adlington Gillett, Gertrude Margaret Dobrashian, Theodore Henry Dobrashian, Agnes Grace Corder, Richenda Winifred Minchin, James Cooper Gillett, Agnes Wolff, Esther Curtis, Roger Gillett, Arnold Gillett, Daphne Gillett and Mario Dobrashian for their own respective uses and benefits absolutely. But I declare that if any of them shall not then be living and shall leave a husband or wife then such husband or wife shall take such share which his wife or her husband would have taken if living, but if such husband or wife is also dead then his or her children shall take his or her share equally between them and if there shall be only one child the whole shall be paid to such one child."

The testator made no express disposition of income not required to answer the annuities until the death of the survivor of the four named annuitants beyond giving to his widow a life interest in his residuary real estate. She died on June 17, 1947, without exercising her power of appointment. Two of the four named annuitants are still living. I am asked to determine the destination of a large fund of surplus income which has arisen and will arise between the death of the widow and the death of the survivor of the four named annuitants. I can quickly dispose of two of the claimants.

The first defendant, Charles William Gillett, who is an object of the power of appointment, by his counsel contended that the trusts declared in default of appointment do not wholly exhaust the property subject to the power, and that, accordingly, I ought to imply a gift in favour of the objects of the power of so much of the property as is not expressly disposed of in default of appointment. This I decline to do in the absence of any authority for so doing. The second defendant, Joseph Adlington Gillett, who would be entitled to a share of residue if the survivor of the four named annuitants were now dead, asks for immediate payment to himself, though whatever gift is made in his favour is deferred and defeasible. To this I cannot accede.

The real question is whether the income in question ought to be accumulated until the expiration of 21 years from the testator's death or until the survivor of the four named annuitants dies (whichever event first happens) for the benefit of those who become entitled to receive the residuary trust fund under the deferred defeasible vested gift, or whether it ought to be paid as it becomes available to the persons entitled on an intestacy. In Re Oliver (1), JENKINS, J., said ([1947] 2 All E.R. 166) :

> " The question, in substance, is whether the accumulations made during the period of 21 years are undisposed of by the will, or whether they pass under cl. 7 so as to become divisible between the settled shares of the two daughters. I think it is right to begin one's consideration of that question by remembering what I think is well settled, namely, that a gift expressly limited to take effect on a future date does not carry the intermediate income, and the gift in cl. 7 is a vested gift limited to take effect at a future date, as opposed to an immediate gift on a contingent event. If authority is needed for the proposition that a gift of that character does not carry the intermediate income, it is to be found in the authorities cited to me, the first of which was Weatherall v. Thornburgh (2)."

Counsel for the third defendant submits (i) that that pronouncement is against the weight of authority ; (ii) alternatively, that it is to be confined to an indefeasible future interest, and should not extend to a defeasible future interest, which ought to be treated as belonging to the same category as a contingent interest.

It is true that the industry of counsel, which has been very considerable, has not disclosed any prior statement in terms of the proposition which JENKINS, J., treats as settled. JARMAN ON WILLS, 7th ed., p. 1006, indeed, states a contrary proposition without qualification. He says :

> " A residuary bequest which is deferred or contingent in its terms carries the income which accrues before it vests in possession."

Of the cases referred to by JARMAN, the only one which appears to relate to a deferred or future gift is Re Lindo (3). That case, however, did relate to such a gift, though it was also contingent, and KAY, J., said (59 L.T. 463) : " a future gift of residue carries with it previous income not expressly disposed of." Re Lindo (3) was not cited to JENKINS, J. I must, therefore, examine the position anew.

Counsel for the third defendant naturally enough lays great emphasis on a well-known passage in the speech of LORD WESTBURY, L.C., in Bective v. Hodgson (4). He said (10 H.L. Cas. 665) :

> " Consequently, if by a will the whole of the personal estate, or the residue of the personal estate, be the subject of an executory bequest, the income of such personal estate follows the principal as an accessory, and must, during the period which the law allows for accumulation, be accumulated and added to the principal."

If, says counsel, that is the true principle, why should it apply to a contingent gift but not to a deferred gift ? I should find this question difficult to answer but for the subsequent course of authority. In many reported cases when (either by the operation of statute or under the terms of the will itself) a trust for accumulation has stopped at the end of 21 years and before a deferred gift was timed to take effect an intestacy as to intermediate income has resulted. The two most important of them [Weatherall v. Thornburgh (2) and Re Blake (5)] are, in fact, cited by JENKINS, J., and form the basis of his pronouncement. The testator left a gap, and yet intermediate income was not added to the deferred residuary gift. Accordingly, the principle laid down in Bective v. Hodgson (4) was not applicable to them. After carefully studying the speech of LORD MAUGHAM, L.C., in Re Blake (5), I am convinced that I ought to accept the proposition laid down by JENKINS, J., even if by so doing I refuse to follow KAY, J., and I will give my reasons for this conviction.

It may be straining language and logic to treat a contingent gift as an immediate gift to take effect only on a certain event, and this is not the way in which the rule is stated in Bective v. Hodgson (4). However this may be, it would be impossible (in the absence of a special context) to construe a gift timed to A take effect on the happening of an event which must happen sooner or later as a gift of anything before that time, because such a construction is excluded by necessary implication, and, accordingly, a deferred or future gift could not carry intermediate income unless there were a rule of law that intermediate income not otherwise disposed of passed with the principal as accessory thereto. Re Blake (5) shows that no such rule is applicable to future or deferred gifts which are B indefeasible. Counsel for the third defendant, however, points out that no case cited to me deals with defeasible future gifts, and he contends that they are so similar to contingent interests that I ought to classify them with contingent interests and not with future interests. It is to be observed, however, that there are important differences between them. A contingent gift fails if the contingency does not happen ; a defeasible gift becomes absolute if the condition C of defeasance does not happen. I cannot see on what principle of logic or construction the introduction of a clause of defeasance could make a gift carry intermediate income which otherwise would not do so. Nor am I quite sure why the rule of law applicable to contingent gifts was deemed to be inapplicable to future indefeasible gifts. In these circumstances I feel unable to extend into this new field of defeasible future gifts a rule of law which, though applicable D to contingent gifts, is not applicable to indefeasible future gifts. It is, indeed, strange to find a new field in this area of legal territory. The Law of Property Act, 1925, s. 175, clearly does not cover this case. This omission is, in my judgment, not inadvertent but intentional. Undoubtedly, words may be found in a will which would be apt to attach intermediate income to a future gift whether defeasible or indefeasible, and counsel for the third defendant submitted that E apt words are to be found in this case. The gift is of any balance remaining of the residuary trust fund after providing for annuities out of capital or income or both, and at one time I was inclined to hold that such a gift extended to the balance of a mixed fund of capital and past income not required to answer the annuities, but counsel for the fourth and fifth defendants has convinced me that, as the residuary trust fund is expressly defined in such a manner as to exclude F income, I must construe the balance of that fund as meaning so much of the capital thereof as has not been required to answer the annuities. Such a construction cannot aid the third defendant. Accordingly, in my judgment, there is an intestacy as to the income in question.

[There followed argument on the second question raised by the summons.]

ROXBURGH, J. : The point which I now have to decide is whether the G legacies bequeathed by the will ought to fall on the income to which the judgment which I have just given relates, in the first instance, if and in so far as it is sufficient for the purpose. Counsel for the fourth and fifth defendants submits that they should not. He concedes, I think, that they must unless I can find a contrary intention in the will. He concedes, and, indeed, it is obvious, that there is no express contrary intention in the will, but he submits that I ought H to imply a contrary intention. His first submission is that the fact that the testator has disposed of the whole, or probably the whole, income of the residue for an undefined period shows that he did not want the legacies to be paid out of income other than possibly any surplus income available in the first year from his death. His alternative submission is that where a testator has made express dispositions which make it legally impossible to retain a fund out of the undisposed of interest, he must be taken to be varying the order of the application of assets set out in the Administration of Estates Act, 1925, sched. I, pt. II. I must confess that it seems to me that the answer to both these submissions is the same. If anything is clear, I think it is that the testator was not consciously leaving property undisposed of. In those circumstances, I think it is difficult to imply from anything that he has said what he would have said if he had been aware that some property was undisposed of. The legacies have, in fact, been paid, and the necessary adjustments will have to be made, but, in my judgment, the legacies ought to be paid out of the property undisposed of, if and so far as it is sufficient for the purpose.

Order accordingly. Costs of all parties as between solicitor and client to be paid out of the whole fund in due course of administration.

Re HART'S WILL TRUSTS. PUBLIC TRUSTEE v. BARCLAYS BANK, LTD. AND OTHERS.

[Chancery Division (Danckwerts, J.), November 2, 1949.]

Perpetuities—Limitation by reference to "the statutes for the distribution of" personal estate of intestates—Administration of Estates Act, 1925 (c. 23), s. 47 (1).

By his will, dated July 16, 1923, a testator, who died on Apr. 8, 1927, gave his real and residuary personal estate to his trustees on trust to sell and to pay the income of the trust premises for the time being representing his residuary estate (called "the trust fund") to his wife C. during her life. Subject thereto, by cl. 13 he directed his trustees to appropriate two equal sixth parts of the trust fund (which he called "the Reith portion") between and to such of his stepchildren A. and S. as should survive him, and if both survived him (as happened) and then one should die "and the trusts declared by cl. 15 hereof concerning the property appropriated to such stepchild so dying shall fail then provided I die without leaving issue the whole of the Reith portion shall be appropriated to the surviving stepchild." Subject thereto, and to the intent that the Reith portion, subject to the trusts for the stepchildren, their spouses and issue therein declared, should sink into the trust fund, by cl. 14 the trustees were directed to appropriate the trust fund equally between and to such of the testator's children as should survive him or die in his lifetime leaving issue him surviving "and so that if the trusts declared by cl. 15 hereof concerning any property appropriated to any child of mine shall fail then subject to the trusts powers and provisions in such clause declared and contained . . . such property shall fall back into the trust fund and be held on the same trusts that would have been applicable thereto if the child to whom the premises shall have been appropriated had died in my lifetime without ever having been married." Clause 15 provided that the property appropriated to any child or stepchild should be retained by the trustees on certain discretionary trusts (in effect those in the Trustee Act, 1925, s. 33 (1)), and declared that the objects of the discretionary trusts were the beneficiary and the wife, if any, of the beneficiary, and the testator's children and remoter issue for the time being in existence, and the said stepchildren and any issue of theirs for the time being in existence. Clause 15 also contained a power in a beneficiary to appoint a life interest to a spouse, and, finally, subject as thereinbefore declared, a power in a beneficiary to appoint by deed or will to his issue, and, subject thereto, the trust property was directed to be held "in trust for all or any of the children or child of the beneficiary who shall be living at my decease or born afterwards and who being male attain the age of 21 years or being female attain that age or marry." Clause 16 provided: "In the event of the failure or determination of the trusts hereinbefore A declared and subject to the trusts powers and provisions hereinbefore declared and contained and to every or any exercise of such powers and to any statutory provisions which may be applicable my trustees shall hold the trust fund and the income thereof in trust for the persons or person who would at the time of the failure or determination of all the prior trusts hereinbefore declared and contained have been entitled to my personal B estate under the statutes for the distribution of the personal estate of intestates if I had died at the time of such failure or determination intestate such persons if more than one to take as tenants in common the shares in which they would have taken under the same statutes." Having regard to the Administration of Estates Act, 1925, s. 50 (1), the reference in cl. 16 to statutory distribution was to be construed as referring to s. 47 (1) of that C Act which provides that the residuary estate shall be held: "... (i) In trust, in equal shares if more than one, for all or any the children or child of the intestate, living at the death of the intestate, who attain the age of 21 years or marry under that age, and for all or any of the issue living at the death of the intestate who attain the age of 21 years or marry under that age of any child of the intestate who predeceases the intestate, such issue D to take through all degrees, according to their stocks, in equal shares if more than one, the share which their parent would have taken if living at the death of the intestate, and so that no issue shall take whose parent is living at the death of the intestate and so capable of taking." The testator was survived by (besides his stepchildren A. and S.) his wife C., and a sister, who, apart from C., was his sole next of kin at the date of his death. E He had no issue of his own. On June 1, 1948, C. died.

HELD: (i) on the true construction of the will, cl. 16 was intended to take effect on the total failure of all the trusts declared in respect of the trust fund, including both those in respect of the four-sixths and of the Reith portion, but, having regard to s. 47, the clause could designate a person to succeed to the fund who would not have a vested interest within F the perpetuity period, and it was, therefore, void.

(ii) there was clearly a hiatus in the will in that the testator had neglected to provide for the disposition of the four-sixths share of the trust fund in the event, which had happened, of cl. 14 and cl. 15, so far as they depended on his having children or issue, not taking effect, and it was proper in these circumstances to imply a clause to carry over the four-sixths share as an G an addition to the Reith portion.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS to determine whether, on the true construction of the will of Cyril Ernest Hart, deceased, and in the events which had happened, the ultimate trust of the testator's residuary estate contained in cl. 16 of the will failed by reason of the rule against perpetuities, and whether a cross-limitation ought to be implied in order to dispose of a share of the residuary estate the trusts of which had failed, or whether the said share was undisposed of and passed to the next of kin. Danckwerts, J., held that the ultimate trust was void for perpetuity, and that a cross-limitation should be implied. The relevant parts of the will and the facts are set out in the judgment.

DANCKWERTS, J. : This case concerns a will which has been, it appears, drafted with some care, but at the same time I cannot help feeling that the future possibilities have been overlooked by the testator or his draftsman in the events which have happened. The date of the will was July 16, 1923. The testator, Cyril Ernest Hart, died on Apr. 8, 1927. On June 1, 1948, the testator's widow died, and her executors are the defendants, Barclays Bank Ltd., and the testator's two stepchildren, Sylvia Lucy Robertson Riall and Major Anthony John Reith. Their name is, or was, Reith, and this is material in regard to the dispositions in the will. The testator had one sister only, a Mrs. Evelyn Julie Kann, who survived the testator and died on Jan. 13, 1948, having had three children, two of whom died in the testator's lifetime without issue, the other being a son, Leonard Eustace Kann, who is fourth defendant to these proceedings. He was appointed by her sole executor and beneficiary under her will. The last two defendants, Jane Kann and Michael Edward Victor Kann, are the infant children of the fourth defendant, Leonard Eustace Kann. It would appear that at the date of the testator's death his next of kin, subject to the interests of his widow, would have been his only sister. The testator had no children or issue of his own.

I now turn to the provisions of the will. The plaintiff, the Public Trustee, was not an executor of the will, but in the events which have happened he is at the present time the sole trustee of the will. Passing over the bequests of various legacies and other clauses, in cl. 7 there is the usual devise and bequest of all the testator's real and personal property, and in cl. 8 a trust for sale with certain administrative provisions following. Clause 11 gives power to the trustees to keep up certain periodical payments, which is material because those payments are allowed to be made > " out of the income of the said trust premises for the time being constituting or representing my residuary estate (hereinafter called ' the trust fund ') ".

There we find the definition of the trust fund which is mentioned afterwards in the will. By cl. 12 the testator directed that, subject to the provisions of cl. 11, his trustees should pay the income of the trust fund to his wife, Caroline, during her life without power of anticipation during coverture. Under cl. 13 of his will the testator proceeds to direct certain provisional appropriations of his residuary estate under the name of the trust fund :

> " My trustees shall appropriate two equal sixth parts of the trust fund (hereinafter called ' the Reith portion ') between and to such of my stepchildren Anthony John Robertson Reith and Sylvia Lucy Reith as shall survive me or die in my lifetime leaving issue me surviving in such manner that the share appropriated to either stepchild shall be equal to that appropriated to the other and if there shall be only one such stepchild the whole of the Reith portion shall be appropriated to such stepchild and if both such stepchildren survive me and then one dies and the trusts declared by cl. 15 > hereof concerning the property appropriated to such stepchild so dying shall fail then provided I die without leaving issue the whole of the Reith portion shall be appropriated to the surviving stepchild."

Clause 14 provides :

> "Subject as aforesaid and to the intent that the Reith portion and every part thereof shall (subject to the trusts powers and provisions hereby A declared and contained of and concerning the same in favour of my said stepchildren their respective spouses children and remoter issue and others) sink into the trust fund and be subject to this present direction for appropriation my trustees shall appropriate the trust fund between and to such of my children as shall survive me or die in my lifetime leaving issue me surviving in such manner that the share appropriated to any child of mine B shall be equal to that appropriated to every other child of mine and if there shall be only one such child of mine the whole of the trust fund shall be appropriated to such child of mine and so that if the trusts declared by cl. 15 hereof concerning any property appropriated to any child of mine shall fail then subject to the trusts powers and provisions in such clause declared and contained and to the powers by law vested in my trustees concerning C the same and to every or any exercise of such respective powers such property shall fall back into the trust fund and be held on the same trusts that would have been applicable thereto if the child to whom the premises shall have been appropriated had died in my lifetime without ever having been married."

D Clause 15 provides that the property appropriated to any child or stepchild shall "be retained and held by my trustees upon the following trusts . . ." Then follow trusts which are similar to those found in the Trustee Act, 1925, s. 33, and, in sub-cl. (iii), a declaration that :

> "The objects of the foregoing discretionary trust are the beneficiary and the wife if any of the beneficiary and my children and remoter issue E for the time being in existence and my said stepchildren and any issue of theirs for the time being in existence whether minors or adults and the person or persons in whose company or under whose care or control or by or with whom the beneficiary may from time to time be residing travelling or employed and such other person or persons as the beneficiary with the previous consent in writing of my trustees shall from time to time in writing F declare to be an object or objects of such discretionary trust and I request but do not require my trustees to treat the beneficiary and the issue of the beneficiary as the primary objects of the foregoing discretionary trust."

It is a very wide clause which I have seen before in wills, and which seems to be possibly open to attack. Paragraph (e) of cl. 15 of the will contains a power in a beneficiary, prior to or in contemplation of marriage, to appoint a subsequent G life interest to a spouse. By para. (f) there is a declaration :

> "subject as hereinbefore declared the said trust property shall be held in trust for all or any to the exclusion of the others or other of the children and remoter issue of the beneficiary if more than one in such shares and in such manner in all respects as the beneficiary shall by deed revocable H or irrevocable or by will or codicil appoint and in default of and subject to any such appointment in trust for all or any of the children or child of the beneficiary who shall be living at my decease or born afterwards and who being male attain the age of 21 years or being female attain that age or marry."

There are certain provisions in the proviso, a hotchpot clause and another provision which do not seem to me to be very material. There is a power of advancement again in para (g).

Clause 16, on which the present question turns, provides :

> " In the event of the failure or determination of the trusts hereinbefore declared and subject to the trusts powers and provisions hereinbefore declared and contained and to every or any exercise of such powers and to any statutory provisions which may be applicable my trustees shall hold the trust fund and the income thereof in trust for the persons or person who would at the time of the failure or determination of all the prior trusts hereinbefore declared and contained have been entitled to my personal estate under the statutes for the distribution of the personal estate of intestates if I had died at the time of such failure or determination intestate such persons if more than one to take as tenants in common the shares in which they would have taken under the same statutes."

The death of the testator was after Dec. 31, 1925, and, accordingly, by reason of the Administration of Estates Act, 1925, s. 50, the reference to statutory distribution is in effect a reference to the provisions of that Act. That section provides :

> " (1) References to any Statutes of Distribution in an instrument inter vivos made or in a will coming into operation after the commencement of this Act, shall be construed as references to this Part of this Act ; and references in such an instrument or will to statutory next of kin shall be construed, unless the context otherwise requires, as referring to the persons who would take beneficially on an intestacy under the foregoing provisions of this Part of this Act."

Section 47 of the Act indicates the persons who would take beneficially on an intestacy, and provides :

> " (1) Where under this Part of this Act the residuary estate of an intestate, or any part thereof, is directed to be held on the statutory trusts for the issue of the intestate, the same shall be held upon the following trusts, namely :—(i) In trust, in equal shares if more than one, for all or any the children or child of the intestate, living at the death of the intestate, who attain the age of 21 years or marry under that age, and for all or any of the issue living at the death of the intestate who attain the age of 21 years or marry under that age of any child of the intestate who predeceases the intestate, such issue to take through all degrees, according to their stocks, in equal shares if more than one, the share which their parent would have taken if living at the death of the intestate, and so that no issue shall take whose parent is living at the death of the intestate and so capable of taking."

Sub-section (3) of the same section provides :

> " Where under this Part of this Act the residuary estate of an intestate or any part thereof is directed to be held on the statutory trusts for any class of relatives of the intestate, other than issue of the intestate, the same shall be held on trusts corresponding to the statutory trusts for the issue of the intestate (other than the provision for bringing any money or property into account) as if such trusts (other than as aforesaid) were repeated with the substitution of references to the members or member of that class for references to the children or child of the intestate."

The effect of that seems to be that, instead of the persons who are ascertained finally under these provisions taking vested interests as they would under the old statutory distribution, they take interests which are contingent in either case on attaining the age of 21 years or marrying under that age.

The question, first of all, is, what is the event on which cl. 16 is to take effect ? Does it mean a total failure of the trusts, i.e., the trusts of both the two-sixths Reith portion and the trusts of the four-sixths which were directed to be held on trust for the testator's issue, or do they simply take effect, possibly more than once, on the failure which has occurred as regards the four-sixths and, not yet, possibly, as regards the two-sixths, for, of course, the Reith portion may become vested under the provisions applicable to that part. In my view, it is plain that "failure or determination of all the prior trusts hereinbefore declared," means total failure of the trusts declared regarding the trust fund, i.e., the ultimate residuary estate. Although it is true that the clause refers to "the persons or person who would at the time of the failure or determination of all the prior trusts" take under the statutes of distribution, and so on and refers to the "failure of trusts . . . hereinbefore declared," yet the trustees are to hold the trust fund on the trusts declared by this clause. In my view, therefore, it is plain that it is the trusts of the trust fund which are referred to, and the clause refers to a fund to be ascertained once and for all on the total failure of all the trusts declared in respect of the trust fund, both those of the four-sixths and those of the two-sixths.

Having reached that conclusion, the question is what is the effect of the operation of this clause having regard to s. 50 and s. 47 of the Administration of Estates Act, 1925 ? It is contended by counsel for the stepchildren that the trust fails under the rule against perpetuities, and must fail under that rule because you might have a person ascertained who would still have a contingent interest at the longest time allowed by the rule against perpetuities, i.e., one who still had to fulfil the provisions of the statute by either attaining 21 years or marrying. It seems to me that that is so, and, therefore, as a person might be designated under the testator's will to succeed in this event who would not be ascertained and have a vested interest within the time allowed by the rule against perpetuities, the provisions of this clause are void and fail. It was argued on behalf of the infant defendants that I was entitled to apply s. 47 and s. 50 by ascertaining the class of persons without importing into it the conditions required by s. 47 of attaining 21 or marrying, but, in my opinion, those conditions are part of the qualifications of persons who are to take, and you cannot divorce those qualifications from the persons who are to be ascertained under conditions which form part of their description. That argument, therefore, in my view, fails.

[There followed argument on a further question raised by the summons.]

DANCKWERTS, J. : As I said in giving judgment on the previous question, this testator, though he provided for the event of his having children or issue, never had any child, and, consequently, all the provisions contained in cl. 14 and cl. 15 of his will providing for the event of his having children or issue never took effect as regards four-sixths of the trust fund formed by his residuary estate. The other two-sixths were to be held on trust for his two stepchildren, and in the case of the two stepchildren there were provisions for accruer in the event of failure and also for the fund falling into the trust fund and going to the children, if there should be any, on failure of the trust of the shares appropriated to the stepchildren, but the testator has failed to provide in his will for the event of failure of the trusts relating to children and their issue and possible accruer to the shares of the stepchildren. The question which I have now to decide is whether, in those circumstances, I can imply a limitation which will have the effect of adding the four-sixths to the part of the fund which is to be held on trust for the testator's stepchildren.

Counsel for the stepchildren has called my attention to the statement of the principle and the rules laid down by KAY, J., in Re Hudson (1). He says (20 Ch.D. 415), having referred to various authorities :

> "I deduce from these authorities the following rules :—1. Cross executory limitations in the case of personal estate like cross remainders of real estate, are only implied to fill up a hiatus in the limitations, which seems from the context to have been unintentional. 2. They cannot be implied—as of course > cross remainders could not—to divest an interest given by the will. 3. The existence of other cross-limitations between different persons does not prevent the implication. 4. But where such express cross-limitations are in favour of the very persons to whom the implied cross-limitations would convey the property, that circumstance is of weight in determining the intention."

KAY, J., gives instances in which a gap occurs, and says under 4 (c) : A

> "And generally where, there being such a gift over, the preceding limitations do not provide for every event except that contemplated by the gift over, but leave some gap which would occasion an intestacy as to part of the estate."

Counsel for those interested on intestacy called my attention to a passage in B which the learned judge says (ibid., 416) :

> "Where there is an ambiguity it is proper to look at the consequences of either construction. It is hardly possible to believe that it was intended that any part of the income should go to the legal personal representatives of deceased grandchildren or remoter issue."

In the present case there is a final gift over which, in the events which have C happened, I have held offends against the rule against perpetuities, but which, none the less, is to be found in the will. There is plainly a hiatus in the provisions of this will. If I imply a cross-limitation it clearly will not divest any interest given by the will because there are no express provisions in the will dealing with the particular events which have happened. The existence of other cross-limitations makes no difference, as there are no express cross-limitations which D would provide an inference that I should not imply cross-limitations in the present case, but, says counsel for those interested on intestacy, with some force, in the present case it is more likely that the testator would have preferred that the property should go to his sister and her descendants or persons claiming through her rather than to stepchildren who were no relations of his. Also, he says, if you look at the will you can see that the testator knew perfectly well E how to provide for a cross-limitation if he meant it to operate, and he refers me to the express provisions in that respect in cl. 13 and cl. 14. That is perfectly true, but it is rather difficult to speculate as to what the testator would have preferred in any particular circumstances. On the whole, it seems to me that this is a case which comes within the rule as laid down by KAY, J., and applied in a number of authorities, and I ought, therefore, to imply some clause in the will F which does not involve, as counsel for the stepchildren pointed out, any alteration of the will, but merely the writing into the will of something which one would expect to be there. Accordingly, I think I ought to imply a clause to carry over the four-sixths, in the events which have happened, as an addition to the two-sixths which are to be held on trust for the stepchildren of the testator.

Order accordingly. Costs of all parties as between solicitor and client out of the G trust fund.

Administration—Lunatic—Distribution of estate—Lunatic entitled, on father's death in 1906, to undivided share in freehold estates—Freeholds unsold and held by trustees on statutory trusts—Nature of lunatic's interest at date of her death—" Beneficial interest in real estate "—Administration of Estates Act, A 1925 (c. 23), s. 51 (2).

By the Administration of Estates Act, 1925, s. 51 (2) : " The foregoing provisions of this Part of this Act " (i.e., pt. IV, dealing with distribution of residuary estate) " do not apply to any beneficial interest in real estate (not including chattels real) to which a lunatic or defective living and of B full age at the commencement of this Act . . . was entitled at his death, and any such beneficial interest (not being an interest ceasing on his death) shall, without prejudice to any will of the deceased, devolve in accordance with the general law in force before the commencement of this Act applicable to freehold land, and that law shall, notwithstanding any repeal, apply to the case."

C By his will, dated Jan. 22, 1853, W.B., who died in 1855, devised certain freehold estates on trust for his son, T.B., for life, and, on the death of T.B. (in the events which happened) on trust for the children of T.B. equally. T.B. died in 1906 leaving five children, one of whom was C.B., who was born in 1877 and died a spinster and intestate on Sept. 2, 1948. In 1912 C.B. became of unsound mind and in 1935 a receiver was appointed of D her property and had not been discharged at the date of her death. The freeholds were still unsold and under the Law of Property Act, 1925, s. 39 and sched. I, pt. IV, para. 1, were vested in the trustees of W.B.'s will on the statutory trusts for sale set out in s. 35 of that Act. The question to be determined was whether, at the date of her death, C.B.'s interest in the property devised by the will of W.B. was a " beneficial interest in real E estate " within the meaning of s. 51 (2) of the Administration of Estates Act, 1925.

HELD : " beneficial interest in real estate " in s. 51 (2) of the Administration of Estates Act, 1925, was confined to such interest as would under the general law in force before the commencement of the Act have devolved in accordance with the law applicable to freehold land ; the interest to which C.B. was entitled at the date of her death in the property devised by the will F of her grandfather was an interest in the proceeds of a trust for sale, and was not an interest which, under the general law in force before Jan. 1, 1926, could have devolved in accordance with the law applicable to freehold land ; and, therefore, it was not a " beneficial interest in real estate " within the meaning of s. 51 (2).

ADJOURNED SUMMONS to determine the nature of the interest of the intestate, Constance Mary Bradshaw, who died a spinster on Sept. 2, 1948, in freehold properties to which she and her brothers became entitled in undivided shares on the death of their father in 1906 and which were now held by trustees on statutory trusts under the Law of Property Act, 1925, s. 39 and sched. I, pt. IV, para. 1. The intestate was of unsound mind from before Jan. 1, 1926, until her death, and the question was whether her interest in the properties at the date of her death was a "beneficial interest in real estate" within the meaning of the Administration of Estates Act, 1925, s. 51 (2). Danckwerts, J., held that it was not. The facts appear in the judgment. A

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 3. DANCKWERTS, J., read the following judgment. Constance B Mary Bradshaw died on Sept. 2, 1948, intestate and a spinster. She became of unsound mind in 1912. On July 22, 1935, a receiver was appointed in respect of her property and he had not been discharged at the date of her death. She was born on Dec. 26, 1877, and, therefore, on Jan. 1, 1926, she was 48, i.e., over the age of 21 years. On Mar. 19, 1949, letters of administration in respect of her estate were granted to the plaintiff, Arthur Ernest Bradshaw, and the first C defendant, Hengist Richard Edward Bradshaw. A question arises under the Administration of Estates Act, 1925, s. 51 (2), in the following circumstances. The intestate, Constance Mary Bradshaw, was the daughter of Thomas Bradshaw, who died on Nov. 30, 1906, and the grand-daughter of William Bradshaw, who died on July 12, 1855. By his will, dated Jan. 22, 1853, William Bradshaw devised certain freehold estates on trust for his son Thomas Bradshaw, for life, and after D his death, in default of appointment by Thomas Bradshaw (the situation which happened), in trust for Thomas Bradshaw's children at the age of 21 or on marriage (in the case of females) equally. There were five children of Thomas Bradshaw who attained the age of 21 years: (i) Thomas Claridge Bradshaw—the eldest, born on July 4, 1872—who died on June 6, 1946, leaving a son, the defendant Hengist Richard Edward Bradshaw; (ii) Percival Edward Bradshaw, E who died on Feb. 16, 1941, without issue; (iii) Alfred Ernest Bradshaw, who is still alive; (iv) the intestate; and (v) John Horsley Bradshaw, who died on July 15, 1927, leaving issue, the second defendant, John Stratlii Bradshaw. Accordingly, under the law of inheritance existing before 1926 the defendant, Hengist Richard Edward Bradshaw, would be the heir-at-law of the intestate. Freeholds devised by the will of William Bradshaw on the above-mentioned F trusts remain unsold, and are vested in the trustees of his will and are held by them on the statutory trusts for sale mentioned in s. 35 of the Law of Property Act, 1925, by virtue of the provisions of s. 39 and sched. I, pt. IV, para. 1, to the Law of Property Act, 1925.

The Administration of Estates Act, 1925, s. 51 (2), is in the following terms:

> "The foregoing provisions of this Part of this Act do not apply to any G beneficial interest in real estate (not including chattels real) to which a lunatic or defective living and of full age at the commencement of this Act, and unable, by reason of his incapacity, to make a will, who thereafter dies intestate in respect of such interest without having recovered his testamentary capacity, was entitled at his death, and any such beneficial interest (not being an interest ceasing on his death) shall, without prejudice to any will H of the deceased, devolve in accordance with the general law in force before the commencement of this Act applicable to freehold land, and that law shall, notwithstanding any repeal, apply to the case. For the purposes of this sub-section, a lunatic or defective who dies intestate as respects any beneficial interest in real estate shall not be deemed to have recovered his testamentary capacity unless his committee or receiver has been discharged."

It appears, therefore, that the conditions of this sub-section are satisfied in the present case, subject to the question of the nature of the interest of the intestate in regard to the freeholds devolving under the will of William Bradshaw. It is clear that on Dec. 31, 1925, the intestate was entitled, and, if the Administration of Estates Act, 1925, had not been passed and the former law were still in operation, would at the date of her death have been entitled, in equity and beneficially, to an undivided share in the freeholds, which share would have A been real estate and would have passed to her heir-at-law. Under the relevant sub-section, however, the question is whether, at the date of her death, the intestate was entitled to a " beneficial interest in real estate." The legislation of 1925 deprived the intestate of her former undivided share in the freeholds, and, instead, gave her a right to a share of the proceeds of sale and of the income pending sale (Law of Property Act, 1925, s. 35). None the less, there is, it B seems to me, undoubted authority that the interests of the intestate were properly to be described as an interest in real estate, at any rate for many purposes : see Re Mellish (1), referred to with approval in Re Kempthorne (2), and Re Fuller's Contract (3) ; and it seems not unreasonable to suppose that, as the undivided share in the land in equity would have devolved before 1926 on the heir-at-law, the intention of s. 51 (2) of the Administration of Estates Act, C 1925, was that the heir-at-law should not be deprived of his expectation that he would inherit the property. Section 51 (2), however, concentrates on the beneficial interest which the intestate had at the date of her death. Prima facie, the conditions of the sub-section would seem to be satisfied if it is then an interest in real estate, even if the beneficial interest itself be not then real estate.

There are a number of references in the Administration of Estates Act, 1925, D to " real estate," and, generally, they do not appear to clarify the matter. Section 33 imposes a trust for sale on the " real estate " of a person who dies intestate. Section 45, abolishing the old rules of descent, refers to the " real estate and personal inheritance " of persons dying after 1925, and s. 52 contains a definition of " real and personal estate." An argument against the heir-at-law was, however, founded on s. 55 (1) (xix) which is in these terms :

> " ' Real Estate ' save as provided in pt. IV of this Act means real estate, including chattels real, which by virtue of pt. I of this Act devolves on the personal representative of a deceased person."

Part IV of the Act includes s. 51. It is said that s. 55 (1) (xix) refers back to s. 1, which provides for the devolution on the personal representative of :

F

> " Real estate to which a deceased person was entitled for an interest not ceasing on his death . . . " and so invokes the interpretation provision (for the purposes of pt. I of the Act) in s. 3 (1) that :

G

> " . . . ' real estate ' includes . . . (ii) real estate held on trust (including settled land) or by way of mortgage or security, but not money to arise under a trust for sale of land, nor money secured or charged on land."

It is said that the effect of these provisions is to exclude from " real estate " for the purposes of s. 51 (2) money to arise under a trust for sale of land. This argument, however, does not seem to me to give proper effect to the exception H of the provisions of pt. IV in s. 55 (1) (xix), and I do not find it convincing.

There is, however, a decision of ROXBURGH, J. on the actual sub-section which I have to construe. Re Donkin (4) was concerned with the estate of a person of unsound mind, who died a spinster and intestate in 1934. In 1928 her brother had died intestate leaving her as his sole next of kin. No letters of administration had been obtained in respect of his estate, which included freehold houses, but, after the death of the sister, the Public Trustee obtained letters of administration in respect of each estate. The facts differ in some respects from the present case, but by reason of the imposition of a trust for sale on the brother's property by the Administration of Estates Act, 1925, s. 33, the question which arose in that case is similar to that which I have to decide. Roxburgh, J., after reading the provisions of s. 51 (2), said ([1947] 2 All E.R. 692) :

> "It seems to me that, to make sense of that provision, it is necessary to confine the beneficial interests indicated to such interests as would under the general law in force before the commencement of the Act have devolved in accordance with the law applicable to freehold land. If that be the true meaning of the section—and it is not an easy point—the rest seems to follow as a matter of course, because nobody would contend that before 1926 the interest of a beneficiary in the proceeds of a trust for sale of land would have devolved in accordance with the law applicable to the devolution of freehold land. At any rate, nobody has contended that before me. Accordingly, unless I can find some difference between a trust for sale such as could exist before the commencement of the Administration of Estates Act, 1925, and the trust for sale imposed by the Administration of Estates Act, 1925, in the case of an intestacy, it must follow that the beneficial interest which Miss Donkin had in her brother's estate on his intestacy was not one which under the general law in force before Jan. 1, 1926, could have devolved in accordance with the law applicable to freehold land. In my judgment, that is a good ground for holding that the interest which Miss Donkin had was not a 'beneficial interest in real estate' within the meaning of that phrase in s. 51 (2) of the Administration of Estates Act, 1925."

That seems to me to be a decision on the point which I have to decide in this case, and, accordingly, I must follow it and hold that in the present case the interest in the property devised by the will of William Bradshaw, deceased, to which the intestate was entitled at her death was not a "beneficial interest in real estate" within the meaning of s. 51 (2) of the Administration of Estates Act, 1925 ; but, if that be the true interpretation of the sub-section, it seems to me that by some mischance the drafting of the sub-section has probably failed to carry out in this case the intention that persons with expectations of succeeding to real estate should not be defeated by the alterations in the law of descent made by the legislation of 1925.

Declaration accordingly. Costs of all parties to be taxed as between solicitor and client, and paid out of the estate in due course of administration.

Court—Jurisdiction—Magistrate—Proceedings partly heard by one metropolitan magistrate—Continuation by another magistrate—Conflict of evidence between the parties.

The wife brought a summons against her husband on the ground of persistent cruelty. After one metropolitan magistrate had heard the whole of the wife's evidence in chief the hearing was adjourned. On the date of the resumed hearing another magistrate was sitting and both parties assented to his dealing with the case. Thereupon the notes of the wife's evidence were read and she swore : "That evidence is true," and was cross-examined. Evidence in support of the wife's case was heard, and the husband gave evidence denying the wife's evidence in toto, there thus being a serious conflict of evidence, and he was cross-examined.

HELD : (i) where proceedings have been started and evidence given before a judge or magistrate who is judge both of fact and law it is not proper, even with the consent of the parties, to continue the proceedings before another judge or magistrate, especially where there is the slightest risk of any conflict of evidence.

(ii) in the present case there was a grave conflict of evidence and the second magistrate (who made an order in favour of the wife) was not in a position to compare the evidence of the husband with that of the wife which he had not heard, and the whole proceeding was irregular, but the case was so clear that it would be wrong to send it back and the husband's appeal must be dismissed.

APPEAL from a decision of a metropolitan magistrate given at Lambeth Magistrates' Court on July 13, 1949, whereby he made an order against the husband on the ground of persistent cruelty to the wife. The husband now appealed and the Divisional Court, in dismissing the appeal with costs, gave directions as to the practice to be followed when there is a change in the composition of a tribunal during a hearing. On May 25, 1949, MR. WIGHTWICK heard the wife's evidence in chief and on July 13, 1949, MR. ROSE continued the hearing with the consent of the parties and made the order. The facts appear in the judgment of LORD MERRIMAN, P.

The husband (appellant) appeared in person.
Borders for the wife (respondent).

LORD MERRIMAN, P. : This is a husband's appeal from a decision of the metropolitan magistrate sitting at Lambeth whereby, on July 13, 1949, he found the husband guilty of persistent cruelty and made a maintenance order in favour of the wife which, in so far as the amount is concerned, is not challenged. The whole contest has turned on the propriety of the decision. I am not going to examine the evidence in detail. Suffice it to say that there is a detailed and circumstantial account by the wife of a series of assaults of a grave nature ending on at least three occasions with a black eye, and on other occasions consisting of beating with a belt in an unmerciful manner, extending from the end of 1947, and ending with a comparatively minor assault at Easter, 1949, after which the wife left the husband and took out this summons which first came on for hearing in May. The husband's case was that from first to last the whole thing was sheer imagination or invention and that he had never lifted a finger to his wife. Without discussing the evidence, it seems to be a case in which the positive evidence of the assaults was very strong and circumstantial and I have no hesitation in saying that the wife's case was abundantly proved.

Unfortunately there is a difficulty. The case was begun before one metropolitan magistrate and finished before another. MR. WIGHTWICK heard, in substance, the whole of the wife's evidence in chief on May 25, evidence setting out in detail and more or less in chronological order the story of the assaults of which she complained. To put the matter at the very lowest, it is a very grave disadvantage to anybody who has to give a decision in such a case not to have been able to judge the demeanour of the complainant wife while she was giving her own story. Everything that has been said about the advantages of seeing and hearing the witnesses, as against an appellate tribunal which only reads evidence on paper, A applies a fortiori to a court which only reads the principal evidence on paper and hears the rest of the evidence viva voce. I think it is necessary to speak plainly. I know that both parties consented to the evidence, which represented the best part of a day's hearing, being read over to Mr. Rose, the magistrate who took up the case, and to the wife saying in the witness-box : "That evidence is true." It still remains the fact that Mr. Rose never heard her give her B evidence in chief. He heard a very slight addendum to her evidence in chief and one not of great importance, and he heard her cross-examination and the rest of the evidence, including the evidence of a neighbour called on her behalf and the evidence of the husband. He found that the acts complained of by the wife amounted to persistent cruelty. About that there cannot be any dispute because, if the facts were proved, it is a perfectly clear case of persistent cruelty, C but it remains that the magistrate was contrasting the evidence of the husband with that of the wife which had only been partly heard by him.

It must be said plainly that this was a wholly irregular proceeding and ought not to be repeated. Everyone can understand the temptation to make a short cut like this, but, particularly in a case which is going to depend on the conflict between the two principal witnesses, it is essential to remember the commonplace D that it is important not merely that justice should be done but that it should manifestly be seen to be done. There is authority on this point, and it is contained in Coleshill v. Manchester Corporation (1), during which Fraser, J., who was trying the action with a jury died. In the Court of Appeal Scrutton, L.J., commented on the fact that after three witnesses had been called before Fraser, J., the case was resumed four days later before the same jury, but another E judge. He said ([1928] 1 K.B. 785) :

> "Acton, J., was sent down from London on the Sunday and, having read Thursday's shorthand notes, at the urgent request of the parties continued the case with the same jury on Monday the 11th, the Thursday's witnesses not being recalled. I can understand that in the unprecedented and painful circumstances it is unnecessary to take any objection to what F happened, but I think it is a precedent which should not be followed in the future. I doubt whether a judge has any jurisdiction to continue the hearing of a case in which witnesses have been called in court in the course of the trial before the jury and another judge, it not being a case of evidence being taken on commission or before an examiner."

However, it is only right to say that the court did not think it necessary to G interfere or—I use Scrutton, L.J.s., own words—"to take any objection to what happened."

I will contrast that with Re British Reinforced Concrete Engineering Co., Ltd.'s Application (2), a case before the Railway and Canal Commission in which MacKinnon, J., was acting as president of the Commission. The headnote, which closely follows the ruling given by MacKinnon, J., reads (45 T.L.R. 186) : H

> "Where during proceedings without a jury, after some of the witnesses have been called, the presiding judge dies, another judge, if there is no conflict of evidence, may at the request of the parties preside at the continuation of the hearing, after reading the shorthand notes of the evidence, and need not have the witnesses recalled."

The whole emphasis is on the absence of any conflict of evidence. In the present case the evidence which was read was that of the principal witness herself who was, in every single detail, in direct conflict with the witness who was going to be called, her husband. That is almost more directly in point than a case where there is a jury, as in Coleshill v. Manchester Corporation (1), because the jury remained the same throughout, and the change was only on the bench. It is manifestly an immaterial circumstance whether the change in the tribunal is brought about by death or illness. When the magistrate or judge, as the case may be, is the judge of both fact and law, it is, to quote the words of SCRUTTON, L.J., " a precedent which should not be followed," at any rate, where there is the slightest risk of any conflict of evidence.

Having said that, I am bound to say that I think this case is so clear that we should be in danger of doing a grave wrong if we were to send it back, as the husband asked us to do, for a re-hearing, and I, therefore—but with the general protest that I have uttered—propose that we should follow the course taken by the Court of Appeal in Coleshill v. Manchester Corporation (1) and decide that it is unnecessary to take objection to what happened on this occasion. In my opinion, this appeal fails and must be dismissed.

Negligence—Invitee—Customer in shop—Duty of shopkeeper—Slippery substance on floor.

The plaintiff was shopping in the defendants' shop at a time when there were only a few other customers there and she slipped on a piece of vegetable matter, fell, and was injured.

HELD: it was the duty of the defendants to see that the floors of the shops were kept reasonably safe for the use of customers; in the present case the piece of vegetable matter was an unusual danger and the burden was on the defendants either to explain how it came to be on the floor or to adduce evidence to show that reasonable steps had been taken to avoid the accident; that burden had not been discharged; and, therefore, the defendants were liable in negligence to the plaintiff.

ACTION for damages for negligence.

Berryman, K.C., and F. G. Paterson for the plaintiff.
Ryder Richardson for the defendants.

LORD GODDARD, C.J. : The plaintiff, Mrs. Turner, sues the defendants, Arding & Hobbs, Ltd., for damages in respect of the personal injuries which she received when she was shopping at their premises. The facts are not in dispute. The accident took place somewhere between 2 p.m. and 2.30 p.m. on a mid-week afternoon. The plaintiff had been shopping in the store and was passing between two counters when she slipped on a piece of vegetable matter, and fell heavily.

The duty of the shopkeeper in this class of case is well established. It may be said to be a duty to use reasonable care to see that the shop floor, on which people are invited, is kept reasonably safe, and if an unusual danger is present of which the injured person is unaware, and the danger is one which would not be expected and ought not to be present, the onus of proof is on the defendants to explain how it was that the accident happened. That was the view of LYNSKEY, J., in Stowell v. Railway Executive (1). The injured person need only say : " This was the trap which caused me to fall. It was something which ought not to have been there." It is true that the defendants may be able to prove that they have taken all reasonable steps to see that the floor remains safe, but what impresses me in the present case is that this accident took place, not at a crowded shopping time, when anybody might drop something from his or her bag and the assistants would have no reasonable chance of discovering it, but at a slack time when there were not many people about.

Assistants cannot be expected to walk behind each customer to sweep up anything that he or she may drop, and if this accident had happened at a very busy time when the shop was crowded with people I can well understand that it would be difficult to say that the defendants were negligent because something had got on the floor which they may not have had the opportunity of sweeping up. Here, however, I think that there is a burden thrown on the defendants either of explaining how this thing got on the floor or giving me far more evidence than they have as to the state of the floor and the watch that was kept on it immediately before the accident. I do not mean that it was their duty to have somebody going round watching it, but, in a store of this sort, into which people are invited to come, there is a duty on the shopkeeper to see that his floors are kept reasonably safe. No one was called to say that he passed over the floor just before the accident, and there is an utter lack of explanation on the part of the defendants as to how the accident happened. Apparently, a moment of two after it happened somebody seems to have kicked aside whatever it was that caused the plaintiff to fall, and it seems to me that the defendants have not discharged the burden which I think is placed on them. I find that the plaintiff was injured by a slippery substance on the floor, and that no explanation has been given of how that substance got on the floor or how it was that such a thing as this could happen at the time when it did happen. Therefore, I hold that the plaintiff is entitled to damages. [HIS LORDSHIP assessed the damages at £450 and gave judgment for the plaintiff with costs.]

WHITESIDE v. WHITESIDE AND OTHERS.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., Cohen and Asquith, L.JJ.), November 8, 1949.]

Deed—Rectification—No relief required as between the parties—Rectification to secure reduction of tax payable by party to deed.

In October, 1940, the parties were divorced, and, after discussion in regard to the maintenance of the wife, a deed was drafted by her solicitors in which the husband was expressed to covenant to pay " such a sum after deduction of income tax at the rate of not more than 7*s.* 6*d.* in the £ as shall represent £1,000 per annum." The husband by his solicitors altered the draft so that the covenant provided that the husband should pay " £1,000 per annum free of British income tax up to but not exceeding 7*s.* 6*d.* in the £," and on Apr. 16, 1942, the deed was executed in that form. The husband made the payments to the wife on the basis of freedom from tax at 7*s.* 6*d.* in the £ until the inland revenue authorities refused to allow deductions against his sur-tax on account of these payments, on the ground that under r. 23 (2) of the All Schedules Rules in the Income Tax Act, 1918, he had no right to make the payments under the deed without deducting the tax. On Mar. 30, 1948, the parties executed a supplemental deed whereby it was agreed that the deed of Apr. 16, 1942, should be treated as rectified by the substitution in the husband's covenant of the words, " such an annual sum as after deduction of British income tax at a rate up to but not exceeding 7*s.* 6*d.* in the £ will leave the sum of £1,000 per annum," for the words " £1,000 per annum free of British income tax up to but not exceeding 7*s.* 6*d.* in the £." The husband now sought rectification of the deed of Apr. 16, 1942, by the insertion therein of the words substituted by the supplemental deed, his object being to place himself in a position in which he would be entitled to claim deductions from sur-tax as against the revenue authorities.

HELD : in view of the supplemental deed of Mar. 30, 1948, there was no issue between the parties as to their rights inter se, and the court would not grant the discretionary remedy of rectification.

APPEAL by the plaintiff from a judgment of HARMAN, J., dated Mar. 11, 1949, and reported [1949] 1 All E.R. 755, dismissing his action for rectification of a deed, dated Apr. 16, 1942, whereby the plaintiff covenanted to pay an annuity to his former wife, from whom he was divorced in October, 1940.

The covenant in the deed was to pay a certain sum free of income tax, and the husband, who had been making the payments without deducting income tax, found that he was not allowed to make deductions against his sur-tax in respect of the full amounts paid under the deed. By a supplemental deed, dated Mar. 30, 1948, the husband covenanted to pay the wife such a sum as after deduction of income tax would amount to the sum he had actually been paying her, and he sought to have the deed of Apr. 16, 1942, rectified accordingly. HARMAN, J., dismissed the action on the ground (inter alia) that there was no issue inter partes, A and, therefore, rectification could not be ordered, and the Court of Appeal now upheld his decision on this ground. The facts appear in the judgment of SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R.

J. A. Wolfe and Honeyman for the husband, the covenantor.
Colinvaux for the trustees of the deed.

B

SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R.: This is an appeal from a judgment of HARMAN, J., in which he expressed his reasons for refusing to make an order, at the suit of the plaintiff, for rectification of a deed of covenant entered into, on Apr. 16, 1942, by the plaintiff and his former wife, who was the first defendant in the action. I will say at once that, in my judgment, HARMAN, J., was right in refusing the order. The deed in question arose out of the fact that the marriage C of the plaintiff and the first defendant had been dissolved and the deed was executed in order to make provision for the claim which the wife had for maintenance from her former husband. The trouble has been caused by a misapprehension—a misapprehension which has figured in more than one case which has come before the courts—as to the effect in a deed of a promise to pay a sum of money " free of income tax," for it is beyond doubt that in a deed or contract D between the parties such a form of obligation contravenes the provisions of r. 23 (2) of the All Schedules Rules in the Income Tax Act, 1918, disentitles the covenantee from receiving the named sum free of obligation in respect of tax, and imposes on the covenantor the duty of deducting from the sum promised the appropriate tax.

This case is curious in that, when the deed was first drafted, the form of the E obligation assumed the language legally appropriate to achieve what, no doubt, the parties intended. It was :

> " . . . during the life of the wife pay to the wife such a sum after deduction of income tax at the rate of not more than 7*s*. 6*d*. in the £ as shall represent £1,000 per annum . . . "

According to the evidence, shortly before the deed was executed the husband, F by his solicitor—I use that phrase because it has been suggested that the husband can deny the solicitor's authority—altered the draft. For present purposes it seems to me that the case is exactly the same as though the husband had, by his own hand, altered the draft. However, altered it was, and it took the form ineffective for the purposes which are now the subject of the debate, viz. :

G

> " . . . to pay to the wife . . . the sum of £1,000 per annum free of British income tax up to but not exceeding 7*s*. 6*d*. in the £."

The deed having been executed in that form, the result in law was that the right of the wife was limited to receiving £1,000 less income tax on that figure and not a gross sum free of tax, and it was the right, and, indeed, in strictness, the duty, of the husband to deduct the tax. For some time, however, the error passed H unnoticed, and the husband, who, it is right to say, behaved towards the wife with perfect propriety and in the most honourable way, paid her the full sum which it was intended by him that she should receive, namely—I leave out the complication caused by the limitation of the amount of the tax—the net figure of £1,000 per year. I gather that for a time he was allowed by the revenue authorities to deduct from his own taxable income for sur-tax purposes a sum on the basis that the obligation was to pay, not £1,000 less tax, but the gross figure which, after deduction of tax, would leave £1,000. In due course the error came to light, and the writ in the present action was issued on Jan. 21, 1948. The husband claimed against the wife and the trustees of the deed to have it rectified by restoring in the deed the language of the draft. As I have said, from the start the husband paid to the wife the sum of income he intended her to receive, and which she had intended, and, indeed, bargained and stipulated,

A to get. After the date of the writ, but before the matter came on for hearing, the parties, being not at issue on this point, proceeded to execute a supplemental deed rectifying the error, so that as between themselves the deed then took the form, and was thereafter to be treated as having always taken the form, that the obligation was to pay such a sum as, after deduction of tax, would leave £1,000 per annum.

B The fact of there having been that rectification inter partes is, to my mind, the vital element in this case. HARMAN, J., based his refusal to exercise the discretionary remedy of rectification (which, as has been said, must be cautiously watched and jealously exercised) on more than one ground. One of them was based on observations of my own in Van der Linde v. Van der Linde (1). The particular passage ([1947] Ch. 311) which the learned judge cited and relied
C on is where I am reported as saying, in reference to the argument then put forward on behalf of the Crown :

> " . . . where on the facts it is shown that there never was any obstacle as between the two parties to the deed to put right any mistake, it would not be a case in which on any view the court should exercise its discretion, more particularly where the object is on the plaintiff's part to obtain, so to speak,
> D by a side wind an advantage which he could have obtained and which he only lost through the error which was made."

I do not find it necessary, after hearing the argument, to qualify that formulation of the point in any way, but it was, of course, merely a statement of the argument and was unnecessary for my decision. I do not think that in the present case it is necessary to pursue that aspect of the matter further, or to express a decided E view one way or the other whether that proposition be well-founded. I would, however, say that I agree with HARMAN, J., in thinking that the headnote to Van der Linde v. Van der Linde (1) ([1947] Ch. 306), does not very accurately state what the point was. In that case the plaintiff, who had covenanted voluntarily to make a payment to his sister, sought rectification by inserting provisions which would enable him to better his position vis-a-vis the revenue, and the
F ground of the decision was failure on the part of the plaintiff to prove as a fact that he ever intended that the document which he executed should take any particular form with regard to the resulting tax position.

Two other decisions to which HARMAN, J., referred were Burroughes v. Abbott (2), a decision of P. O. LAWRENCE, J., and Jervis v. Howle and Talke Colliery Co., Ltd. (3). In Burroughes v. Abbott (2) an order had been made by the Divorce
G Court which, though expressed to be that the husband should pay £x per annum free of tax, was held to mean and intend that, by whatever form the order was implemented, the obligation should be to pay such a sum as, after deduction, would leave £x. In that case, the deed having followed the strict terms of the order of the Divorce Court, the result was that the wife was only entitled to the smaller sum, and the action arose because in the circumstances the husband,
H or those who represented him, stood on the strict legal obligation, and the wife, therefore, sued for rectification so that the true position, as the Divorce Court had ordered it inter se, should be reflected accurately by the instrument prepared by conveyancing counsel, which, it was held, failed adequately to reflect it. There was, therefore—and this was, I think, the essence of the matter and distinguishes the present case from that case—a substantial issue between the parties. The question was : Would the court in the exercise of its equitable powers call on or order the defendant husband to give effect to what the Divorce

Court had said he should do ? P. O. Lawrence, J., held that, although the trouble had arisen from a misapprehension common to both parties of the effect of conveyancing counsel's document, nevertheless there was a ground for exercising the equitable remedy vested in the court. I do not, therefore, see that there is any ground for suggesting that the decision in Burroughes v. Abbott (2) cannot stand with the view (which, as I have already indicated, is the right view in this case), taken by Harman, J., that no order for rectification ought to be made.

In Jervis v. Howle and Talke Colliery Co., Ltd. (3), which came before Clauson, J., the question was not dissimilar save that it arose, not between a husband and wife, or a former husband and wife, but between the parties to a mining lease. The learned judge described the parties as not being men of wide business experience or culture. It was proved that the contract into which they entered was a bargain that one should pay to the other a royalty expressed in this form : " 3*d.* per ton on all coal . . . to be paid free of tax." Clauson, J., found as a fact that the intention of the parties when they so bargained was that the 3*d.* per ton should be the net sum. The error was made of drafting the mining lease in a form which adhered strictly to the language above stated, so that the obligation of the mining lessee entitled and bound him, in paying his 3*d.*, to deduct income tax from it. The matter came before the court because the defendant company, who assumed the rights and obligation of the original lessee, claimed that it was entitled to make that deduction, whereas the lessor said that, if the agreement as executed had that effect, it failed to implement the bargain. There was, therefore, a substantial issue between the parties, and, following the principle of Burroughes v. Abbott (2), Clauson, J., held that there was again room and occasion for the exercise by the court of its equitable jurisdiction to reform. In the course of his judgment the learned judge referred ([1937] Ch. 71) to the well-known words of Lord Thurlow, L.C. (1 Bro. C.C. 341), in Shelburne v. Inchiquin (4), and indicated that the fact that the mistake arose from the legal result of the language used was not a bar to the relief claimed. I think that Harman, J., in the present case thought that the decision of Clauson, J., was inconsistent with the conclusion at which he felt constrained to arrive. With all respect to Harman, J., I do not think it is, and I, therefore, do not associate myself with the criticism that he directed to Jervis v. Howle and Talke Colliery Co., Ltd. (3), nor do I find it necessary to express any doubt of the correctness of the decision of Clauson, J.

In the course of his judgment ([1949] 1 All E.R. 760) Harman, J., referred to the statement in Kerr on Fraud and Mistake, 6th ed., p. 620, which he cited as a correct statement of the law. The statement is :

> " Though the court will rectify an instrument which fails through some mistake of the draughtsman in point of law to carry out the real agreement between the parties, it is not sufficient in order to create an equity for rectification that there has been a mistake as to the legal construction or the legal consequences of an instrument."

I do not read that passage as meaning that, if the mistake made is in using language to perfect an agreement which in law has some result different from the common intention, that is not a case in which there can be rectification, and I think, as at present advised, that, if that were the meaning of the passage, it would be too wide. In my opinion, it may well be that, if the mistake has arisen from the legal effect of the language used, that may provide a ground for the exercise of the court's reforming power. Subject, however, to that qualification, I think that the passage cited is correct.

I have dealt with the legal aspects of the matter. There were other grounds on which the learned judge came to his conclusion. It is on those grounds that I, for my part, think that he rightly decided the case. I have already referred to the fact that here—and it is a curious feature of the case—the husband, through his solicitor, deliberately altered the draft from the form which it originally took and which, as the result of the rectification of the parties, it now takes—to the form to which he objects. The learned judge, in the course of his judgment, said that here the agreement, as evidenced by the draft, was precisely the agreement which the document took, and that it was a deliberate agreement in so far as it involved a change from the form of words which the husband now prefers to the form to which he now objects. I do not say that that of itself would be fatal to the husband's case, but, in considering whether the court should exercise its equitable jurisdiction, I think that it is a material consideration that the court is asked to do so at the suit of a plaintiff who has to come forward and say: "This error was due to my own alteration of the draft. It is true that my wife accepted it, but, as appears from the evidence, I cannot show that this question of tax was ever a matter with which she was concerned or that it was ever present in the least in her mind." If the unfortunate result is due to the mistake made by the husband's legal adviser, that does not seem to me to be a good ground for saying that there should now be rectification, and rectification at a time when inter partes there is no issue or substantial question.

The only real point of substance is, indeed, that, as a consequence, the position of the husband as regards a third party, viz., the taxing authorities, has been adversely affected. The ground, therefore, on which I prefer to base my conclusion is that which I have already indicated—that, having regard to the rectification deed which followed the absence, and was a consequence of the absence, of any issue at any time between the parties as to their real rights inter se under the arrangement which took the form of this deed, it seems to me that the necessary condition for the reforming powers of the court are absent.

Counsel for the husband, at the request of this court, formulated the equitable right which, he said, the husband was entitled to assert. He formulated it thus:

> "When a document has been executed which does not carry out the intention of the parties, each party has the right against the other to have the document reformed in such a way that the document will place each in the same position as that which they had intended."

If that be a correct formulation of the right to reform—and I am not saying that it is not—the difficulty in his way in the present case is, as it seems to me, that he has not brought the husband's case within it. In the first place, I venture to doubt whether it could be here alleged that this agreement does not carry out the intention of the parties. I have already referred to the way in which alteration of the draft took place, and it is a fact that there is no evidence whatever that, so far as the bargain was concerned between the two contracting parties, the relationship of the husband to the revenue authorities, which would result from the form of words in fact selected, was ever in the wife's mind, or formed any part of the contractual relationship. Secondly, adopting the language of counsel for the husband, each party "has the right against the other." That seems to me to postulate that, in a case in which this equitable relief is sought, it must be a case in which one party is asserting a right against another and calling on the court of equity to say that it is inequitable and unconscionable for the other party to stand on the terms of the instrument as executed. As I have said, that condition is wholly absent. There never has been an issue between the parties. It has never been necessary for the husband to call on the wife to have the document reformed. When the matter arose, both agreed that it should be reformed, and reformed it has been. Therefore, as I say, as between the parties there seems to be no issue—no substantial matter which can form the basis of the claim in this court. It is to be noted that the wife took virtually no part in the proceedings in the court below, and on this appeal she has not, for obvious reasons, thought it necessary even to attend, and no order which the court makes in this action can affect her legal position under the document in the smallest degree. She is not, therefore, in any way interested in the point, nor, indeed, are the trustees. There is, in truth, before the court no person interested on whose conscience it is suggested that a court of equity should operate in ordering rectification.

I proceed to the conclusion of the formulation, where counsel for the husband said :

> ". . . have the document reformed in such a way that the document will place each in the same position as that which they intended." A

I think that that proposition must be qualified by saying, "in the same position vis-a-vis each other as they intended," and, as I have already said, that has already been done. I agree that on the facts the case has worked somewhat of a hardship on the husband, and, had he, having got the document in this form, B stood on the strict rights which it conferred, there is no doubt, I assume, that the other party, namely, the wife, could successfully have sued him for rectification, and, if the document had then been rectified, in its rectified form the husband would have had an advantage which, as things have turned out, and on the view of the learned judge and of this court, he does not now get, but that is assuming that the husband was withstanding the claim and that he was asserting C that his only obligation was the net figure. On that basis an order for rectification would not have put him in a better, but in a worse, position. However, that may be, and if there may be a hardship, it is not, in my judgment, sufficient, as counsel for the husband puts it, to state that, as things have turned out, the parties cannot now do that which will put the husband in the position he would have been in as regards third parties. It is true that, had the document taken D the other form, that would have been the position, but, in my judgment, that is not a sufficient ground for saying that in an action of this kind the court can, or, at any rate, ought to, rectify the instrument. I have not found it necessary to deal fully with all the points which were covered by the learned judge, and I have ventured to take a rather different view from that which he took in regard to the decision of Clauson, J., in Jervis v. Howle & Talke Colliery Co., Ltd. (3), E but I come to the conclusion that the judgment of Harman, J., was correct and that the appeal, accordingly, fails.

COHEN, L.J. : I, too, am of the opinion that this appeal fails. I very much doubt whether at any time the husband had a cause of action against the wife in respect of the matters alleged in the pleadings. The mistake, if mistake it be, had given him no cause of complaint against the wife, whatever may have F been the effect of the mistake on his position vis-a-vis the revenue authorities, but, even if he ever had any cause of action against the wife in respect of the matters in question, all possible dispute between the parties to this action was removed by the supplemental deed of Mar. 30, 1948. In the result, when the matter came before the learned judge on Mar. 11, 1949, there was no issue between the parties that the judge could determine. I cannot think that in those circum- G stances it would have been right for the judge to grant the discretionary remedy of rectification. Counsel for the husband submitted that the effect of refusing it would be to deprive their client of the benefit which, from the point of view of sur-tax, it was intended that he should have, but there is no evidence that it was the common intention of the parties to secure him that benefit. The wife's solicitor, who conducted the negotiations on her behalf, made it plain that his H mind was never directed to the sur-tax position. If, therefore, this element can ever be material in influencing the judge in deciding whether to exercise his discretion and grant rectification, this is not a case where it should be granted.

What I have said is sufficient to dispose of the matter, but the learned judge gave a secondary reason for his decision, namely, that he was not satisfied that the parties ever had made the agreement which the husband sought to introduce into the deed. He based this conclusion on the ground that the language used had been deliberately introduced into the deed by the husband's solicitors, despite the fact that the alternative language, which it is now sought to substitute, had been proposed by the wife's solicitors. It is not necessary to reach a definite conclusion on this point, but I must observe that I think that, if the husband had refused to execute the supplemental deed and the wife had commenced proceedings for rectification against him and had supported her claim by the evidence of the solicitors given in this action and by the documents, that claim would have succeeded. Such a decision would have accorded with that of CLAUSON, J., in Jervis v. Howle and Talke Colliery Co., Ltd. (3), to which my Lord has already referred, a decision with which I respectfully agree. For these reasons I would dismiss the appeal.

ASQUITH, L.J. : For the reasons given by my Lords, to which I cannot usefully add, I think that the appeal should be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

By the Housing (Rural Workers) Act, 1926, s. 3 (1), as amended by the Housing (Rural Workers) Amendment Act, 1938, s. 4 : " In the case of a dwelling in respect of which assistance has been given under this Act by way of grant the following conditions shall, subject as hereinafter provided, apply in relation to the dwelling for a period of twenty years from the date on which it first becomes fit for occupation after the completion of the works and shall so long as they continue to have effect be deemed to be part of the terms of any lease, agreement for a lease, or tenancy of the dwelling, and shall be enforceable accordingly . . . (b) The rent payable by the occupier in respect of the dwelling shall not exceed the amount of the normal agricultural rent, increased by a sum equal to four per cent. of the amount by which the estimated cost of the works in respect of which assistance has been given exceeds the amount of the assistance given by way of grant, and no fine, premium or other like sum shall be taken in addition to the rent ; For the purposes of this provision the expression ' normal agricultural rent ' means (i) in the case of a dwelling which had not previously to the execution of the works been, or which was not within the period of five years immediately preceding the execution of the works separately let as such, the rent which the local authority determine to be the rent normally paid by agricultural workers in the district, or, if it appears to the local authority that the number of agricultural workers in the district is insufficient for the determination of any sum as being such rent as aforesaid, the rent normally paid by persons of substantially the same economic condition in the district; and (ii) in the case of a dwelling which was separately let as such at any time within the said period of five years, the average amount determined by the local authority to have been payable by way of rent per week during the period of the letting: Provided that, if in the case of a dwelling to which para. (ii) applies the amount of the normal agricultural rent payable in respect thereof is by reason of a general increase of rents in the district less than the rent normally paid by agricultural workers in the district, or, if it appears to the local authority that the number of agricultural workers in the district is insufficient for the determination of any sum as being such rent as aforesaid, than the rent normally paid by persons of substantially the same economic condition in the district, the rent so normally paid shall be taken to be the normal agricultural rent."

The landlords of a cottage, which had been occupied by the tenant since before 1914, received a grant from the county council, under the Housing (Rural Workers) Act, 1926, s. 2 (1), in respect of certain works done to the premises in and before 1938. The rent which the tenant was paying was the maximum rent fixed under the provisions of s. 3 (1) (b) of the Act of 1926 at the date of the completion of the works in 1938, and was also the standard rent of the premises under the Rent Restrictions Acts. The works done to the premises did not have the effect of converting the premises into new premises, and the house was not one in respect of which the local authority for the purposes of pt. V of the Housing Act, 1936, were required by s. 128 of that Act to keep a housing revenue account, and, therefore, the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1939, s. 3 (2) (c), did not apply expressly to exclude the application of the Rent Restrictions Acts to the premises. The landlords sought to impose an increase in the rent by reason of a general increase of rents in the district, but the tenant challenged the validity of the proposed increase.

HELD: (i) "the general increase of rents in the district," contemplated in the proviso to s. 3 (1) (b) of the Housing (Rural Workers) Act, 1926, as amended by the Act of 1938, was a "general increase" up to, but not beyond, the date when the rent had to be first determined, i.e., the date of the execution of the works, and, the normal agricultural rent appropriate to the case having been arrived at, pursuant to the definition in para. (ii) of s. 3 (1) (b), on the facts as they stood in 1938, the rent of the cottage could not now be increased by reference to a general increase in the level of the relevant rents since that date.

Per curiam: as the legislature, by the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1939, s. 3 (2) (c), had deliberately excluded from the ambit of the Rent Restrictions Acts certain of the houses falling within the housing (Rural Workers) Act, 1926, the necessary implication was that those houses which were not so excluded were not intended to be excluded, and, therefore, there being no conflict between the two sets of Acts as to the rent payable, the provisions in the Rent Restrictions Acts in regard to the rent payable in respect of the cottage continued to apply.

APPEAL by the tenant from an order of His Honour JUDGE KINGSLEY GRIFFITH, at Kingston-upon-Hull County Court, dated June 10, 1949, whereby he held that the landlords were entitled to arrears of rent at 7*s.* 11*d.* a week in respect of a cottage occupied by the tenant. The rate of 7*s.* 11*d.* a week was the adjusted maximum rent determined by the local authority, the East Riding County Council, as from Apr. 1, 1948, under the Housing (Rural Workers) Act, 1926, s. 3 (1), and it represented an increase on the rent previously paid by the tenant, which was the maximum rent fixed under s. 3 (1) in 1938, on the completion of works done to the premises pursuant to the Act of 1926, and was also the standard rent of the premises under the Rent Restrictions Acts. The tenant challenged the validity of the increase, and her appeal from the order of the county court judge was now allowed by the Court of Appeal. The facts appear in the judgment of the court read by SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R.

A. W. Stephenson for the tenant.
R. W. Payne for the landlords.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 9. SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R., read the following judgment of the court. The defendant, Mrs. Straker, is the tenant of a cottage, No. 7 High Street, Patrington, which she has occupied since a date prior to 1914. It is conceded on behalf of the plaintiffs, her present landlords, that, apart from the effect which the Housing (Rural Workers) Act, 1926 (as varied by the Housing (Rural Workers) Amendment Act, 1938), may have on it, the premises are and have ever since 1914 been within the scope of the relevant Rent Restrictions Acts. In the present action the substantial question raised is that of the validity of an increase in her rent which the landlords have sought to impose. The actual figures do not for present purposes matter, and are complicated, for example, by an addition in respect of rates. It is, however, clear that the rent which the tenant was paying immediately before the increase which she challenges represents (a) the maximum rent fixed under the relevant provisions of s. 3 (1) of the Act of 1926 at the date of the completion of the works done pursuant to that Act in 1938, and (b) the standard rent of the premises under the Rent Restrictions Acts.

The tenant is entitled to succeed in this appeal, therefore, and to challenge successfully the validity of the attempted increase in her rent if she can establish either of the two following propositions, namely, (a) that, on the true construction of the Act of 1926, s. 3 (1), as amended by the Act of 1938, the maximum or " normal agricultural " rent ascertained thereunder is not liable to variation, and, particularly, to increase by reference to circumstances occurring after the date of the execution of the relevant works ; or (b) that the application of the Rent Restrictions Acts in regard to standard rent is not displaced or excluded by the Housing (Rural Workers) Act, 1926, during the period when the provisions of the latter Act are applicable to the premises. The learned county court judge rejected the tenant's contentions under both heads, and we have heard argument on both in this court. We are much indebted to the learned counsel for the assistance they have given to us on what have appeared to us to be matters of considerable difficulty on the construction of and conflict between Acts of Parliament.

Before proceeding to state our conclusions on the two points it is convenient to re-state two other agreed matters of fact recorded by the learned county court judge, viz., (i) that the works done on the premises in and prior to 1938, in respect of which the landlords received a grant pursuant to s. 2 of the Act of 1926 from the East Riding of Yorkshire County Council, did not have the effect of converting the premises into new premises, i.e., of destroying their previous identity, as was held by this court to have been the result of the works done in Roberts v. Jones (1), to which we shall later refer ; and (ii) the house is not one in respect of which the relevant local authority (since it is a county council) for the purposes of pt. V of the Housing Act, 1936, are required by s. 128 of that Act to keep a housing revenue account with the result that s. 3 (2) (c) of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1939, does not apply expressly A to exclude the application of the Rent Restrictions Acts to the premises.

We turn now to the first of the two contentions of the tenant. The relevant language of the Housing (Rural Workers) Act, 1926, s. 3 (1), as it stood before amendment, is as follows :

> " In the case of a dwelling in respect of which assistance has been given under this Act by way of grant the following conditions shall, subject as B hereinafter provided, apply in relation to the dwelling for a period of twenty years from the date on which it first becomes fit for occupation after the completion of the works and shall so long as they continue to have effect be deemed to be part of the terms of any lease, agreement for a lease, or tenancy of the dwelling, and shall be enforceable accordingly . . . (b) The rent payable by the occupier in respect of the dwelling shall not exceed the C amount of the normal agricultural rent, increased by a sum equal to three per cent. of the amount by which the estimated cost of the works in respect of which assistance has been given exceeds the amount of the assistance given by way of grant, and no fine, premium or other like sum shall be taken in addition to the rent."

Then comes the definition, on which the matter largely turns :

> " For the purposes of this provision the expression ' normal agricultural rent ' means (i) in the case of a dwelling which had not previously to the execution of the works been, or which was not within the period of five years immediately preceding the execution of the works separately let as E such, the rent which the local authority determine to be the average rent for the time being paid by agricultural workers in the district ; and (ii) in the case of a dwelling which was separately let as such at any time within the said period of five years, the average amount determined by the local authority to have been payable by way of rent per week during the period of the letting : Provided that, if in the case of a dwelling to which para. (ii) F applies the amount of the normal agricultural rent payable in respect thereof is by reason of a general increase of rents in the district less than the rent normally paid by agricultural workers in the district, the rent so normally paid shall be taken to be the normal agricultural rent."

It is unfortunate that it was on this, the unamended, language of s. 3 (1) of the Act that the county court judge reached his decision, for it is clear that he G placed considerable reliance on the point, conceded before him on the tenant's behalf, that, had her rent fallen to be determined by reference to para. (i) of the definition of " normal agricultural rent " instead of (as the fact is) by reference to para. (ii), it would have been liable to increase or variation in accordance with the average " for the time being " paid by agricultural workers in the district, and there is, to say the least, a strong argument for the view that, if H a rent determined in reference to para. (i) of the definition is variable, so in logic should be a rent determined in reference to para. (ii). But the terms of the definition have been materially altered by the Housing (Rural Workers) Amendment Act, 1938, s. 4, which does not appear to have been brought to the attention of the county court judge. In particular, the phrase " for the time being " in para. (i) of the definition has now been removed. As amended the two paragraphs of the definition and the proviso to para. (ii) now read as follows :

> "For the purposes of this provision the expression 'normal agricultural rent' means—(i) in the case of a dwelling which had not previously to the execution of the works been, or which was not within the period of five years immediately preceding the execution of the works separately let as such, the rent which the local authority determine to be the rent normally paid by agricultural workers in the district, or, if it appears to the local authority that the number of agricultural workers in the district is insufficient for the determination of any sum as being such rent as aforesaid, the rent normally paid by persons of substantially the same economic condition in the district; and (ii) in the case of a dwelling which was separately let as such at any time within the said period of five years, the average amount determined by the local authority to have been payable by way of rent per week during the period of the letting: Provided that, if in the case of a dwelling to which para. (ii) applies the amount of the normal agricultural rent payable in respect thereof is by reason of a general increase of rents in the district less than the rent normally paid by agricultural workers in the district, or, if it appears to the local authority that the number of agricultural workers in the district is insufficient for the determination of any sum as being such rent as aforesaid, than the rent normally paid by persons of substantially the same economic condition in the district, the rent so normally paid shall be taken to be the normal agricultural rent."

As we have already stated, the premises here in question have been continuously let to the tenant since at least 1914. It is clear that, applying para. (ii) of the definition of "normal agricultural rent," apart from the proviso, the figure arrived at would be fixed and finally fixed for the whole twenty years' period contemplated by the section (subject only to the owner's rights on repayment of the grant) by reference to the average weekly payments made by the tenant prior to the execution of the works. It is equally clear that the effect of the proviso is that some increase in the sum so calculated may be made, if justified by reason of "a general increase of rents in the district." The question is whether the "general increase" contemplated is one experienced up to, but not beyond, the date when the rent has to be first determined (in this case the date of the execution of the works), or whether it is one experienced at any time and from time to time during the period when the statutory restrictions apply.

It is, we think, true to say that phrases such as "normal agricultural rent," and "rent normally paid by agricultural workers in the district, or . . . normally paid by persons of substantially the same economic condition," when applied to a substantial period of time such as twenty years, are, at any rate, apt to import the notion of variability in accordance with changes in the relevant economic circumstances during that period, and, if the figure arrived at under the corresponding definition in para. (i) were shown to be variable during the period, we should find it difficult to resist the conclusion that the figures under para. (ii) were similarly intended to be variable, but, as a matter of English, the words and phrases to which we have alluded in our judgment are also properly referable to a particular point of time, e.g., the date when the works were undertaken. And it is to be observed that there is nowhere found in the introductory sentences of s. 3 (1) or, now, in the definition paragraphs of s. 3 (1) (b), as there is in s. 3 (1) (c), the common phrase "from time to time" or other similar formulae, and if the words, "for the time being" in definition (i) could properly have been relied on to show an intention that the normal agricultural rent under that part of the paragraph was a variable figure, it is to be noted that those words, as part of the amendment, contained in s. 4 of the Act of 1938, have now been removed and their place has not been taken by any corresponding language. It is further to be observed, as it seems to us, that, if the normal agricultural rent is, under either branch of the definition, liable to variation, it would appear to follow that any increase justified at one point of time should thereafter cease to be justified if there followed a fall in the relevant level of rents, and, in the case of a rent determined under definition (i), the proper figure might fall below the figure appropriate at the date of the original determination. Such a result would plainly be inconvenient, particularly in the light of the landlord's obligation under s. 3 (1) (c) to certify from time to time that the conditions of the preceding paragraphs of s. 3 (1) are being complied with. No doubt, the landlord would prima facie be protected by the local authority's determination, but we are not satisfied that such a determination would necessarily be available in all cases on the strict wording of definition (ii). In any case, the section does not appear to contemplate any procedure whereby, if there is a general fall in rent levels, the tenant could apply to the local authority and require them to determine afresh the amount of the normal agricultural rent.

For these reasons we have reached a conclusion different from that arrived at by the county court judge who, as we have said, had not had brought to his attention the amendments made in the Act of 1926 by the Act of 1938. In our judgment, the normal agricultural rent appropriate to the present case, having been arrived at pursuant to definition (ii) on the facts as they stood in 1938, cannot now be increased by reference to a general increase in the level of the relevant rents since that date. Whether in any case under para. (ii) of the definition, if the house on which the works had been executed was not occupied by a tenant until, say, ten years after the execution of the works, the " normal agricultural rent " would have to be determined at the date when such tenancy began or at the date of the execution of the works, it is unnecessary to determine, for on the facts of the present case the tenant has been the tenant at all relevant times.

If this conclusion is right, the tenant is entitled to succeed, and it is not strictly necessary to consider the second point, viz., the applicability of the Rent Restrictions Acts, but, as the case is of some importance and the matter was very fully argued, we think it right to express our opinion also on this point. As we have said, the circumstances of the present case taking it outside the terms of s. 3 (2) (c) of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1939, it cannot, in our judgment, be regarded as directly covered by the authority of Roberts v. Jones (1), for in that case, as we understand the facts, the house in question was one in respect of which the relevant local authority was required to keep a housing revenue account. It is true, however, that certain passages in the judgment of Scott, L.J., and his invocation of the maxim generalia specialibus non derogant seem to go beyond the strict requirements of the decision, and were naturally and properly considered as of weight by the county court judge. Scott, L.J., said ([1946] 2 All E.R. 680) :

> " That raises a question of first principle on which there is no direct authority, though there is authority which is relevant. The Rent Restrictions Acts impose a status on a house. In my view, in exactly the same sense, the Housing (Rural Workers) Acts impose a status on a house. That, I think, leads to the necessary conclusion of law that the Rent Restrictions Acts are not intended to apply to houses the rent of which is fixed within the Housing (Rural Workers) Acts."

He then referred to Bishop of Gloucester v. Cunnington (2), and proceeded :

> " This court decided that the Rent Restrictions Acts, being general Acts, did not apply to a house governed by special legislation of that kind, on the principle of the maxim generalia specialibus non derogant. That same principle applies, though in a different way, I think, to the Rent Restrictions Acts generally. They constitute general legislation. The Housing (Rural Workers) Acts are special legislation. Prima facie, the general was not intended to override or to conflict with the special legislation, and that, in > my opinion, is the proper interpretation to be put on the Rent Restrictions Acts."

It is to be noted that SCOTT, L.J., qualifies his observation in the last sentence by the words "prima facie," and, given that one of two apparently conflicting Acts can be defined as "special" and the other as "general," the lord justice's statement so qualified could not, we think, be open to question. Our main
A difficulty in the present case in applying the maxim so as wholly to exclude from the Rent Restrictions Acts all houses comprehended by the Housing (Rural Workers) Act, 1926, arises from the terms of s. 3 (2) (c) of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1939, itself. For by the express reference to s. 128 of the Housing Act, 1936, Parliament must have had in mind the reference in that section to the Act of 1926. If, therefore, as we think, Parliament expressly and
B deliberately excluded wholly from the ambit of the Rent Restrictions Acts certain, but certain only, of the houses falling within the Act of 1926, we feel compelled to hold that by necessary implication those houses within the Act of 1926 which were not so excluded by s. 3 (2) (c) of the Act of 1939 were intended not to be excluded, and, therefore, unless we are compelled by some irreconcilable conflict to hold otherwise, we are of opinion that the provisions as to standard
C rent in the Rent Restrictions Acts continue to apply to the present house.

In cases arising under the Pluralities Act, 1838, e.g., Bishop of Gloucester v. Cunnington (2), there is such an irreconcilable conflict in regard to the right to obtain possession. In that case LORD GREENE, M.R., said ([1943] 1 All E.R. 63):

> "This review of the relevant statutory provisions which were in force
> D when the Rent Restrictions Acts were passed shows that parsonage houses are placed by the legislature in a category by themselves. Save where a licence is obtained, residence by the incumbent in a parsonage house is compulsory. An incumbent who fails to reside in the house can be ordered to do so and an occupier can be expelled to make room for him. The reasons for this special treatment are of a spiritual nature and are based on the
> E necessity for ensuring that the cure of souls shall be conducted by an incumbent residing not only in the benefice, but in the parsonage house itself which is provided in order to enable him to perform his spiritual duties and (what is important) the duties of hospitality connected therewith. These considerations make it, in our view, impossible to suppose that the legislature intended that where a parsonage house has been let the tenant should have
> F the protection of the Rent Restrictions Acts. Particular confirmation of this view is to be found by a consideration of s. 59 [of the Pluralities Act, 1838.] Under that section, as has been already pointed out, every lease of a parsonage house can be avoided and the tenant evicted whenever the bishop orders the incumbent to reside in the house. If the Rent Restrictions Acts apply to such a house they must impliedly have repealed the provisions
> G of that section under which possession can be obtained in order to enable the incumbent to reside. It is, in our view, impossible to think that any such implied repeal could have been intended."

Similarly in Rose v. Hurst (3) an irreconcilable conflict arose between the right of the tribunal under the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927, s. 5 (2), to determine
H a fair rent between a willing lessor and a willing lessee and the standard rent imposed by the Rent Restrictions Acts which negatives the conception of free bargain: see, for example, the language of DENNING, L.J. ([1949] 2 All E.R. 26):

> "Those two sections cannot possibly apply at one and the same time to the self-same premises. Under the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927, a tribunal has got to 'determine' what the rent is to be. If it had already been fixed by the Rent Acts, there will be nothing for the tribunal to determine. Again, under the Landlord and Tenant Act the rent is to be that which a 'willing' > lessee would agree to give and a ' willing ' lessor would agree to accept, but, if the Rent Acts apply, the rent is fixed without regard to what either is ' willing ' to do. So the two provisions are inconsistent one with the other, and the task of this court is to say which provision is to prevail. The Act of 1927 is later and more specific than the Act of 1920 and must be taken to prevail."

We add that it does not seem to us to follow from the decision of this court in Rose v. Hurst (3) that the premises there in question were necessarily taken out of the scope of the Rent Restrictions Acts for all purposes and for all time, e.g., on the falling in of a new lease then granted.

If and in so far, therefore, as there is any direct conflict between the two Acts here in question, the courts may, no doubt, have to resolve the conflict by choosing one or the other, as it did in Rose v. Hurst (3), but there is, at the least, a large field where there is no conflict and in which each Act must be given its full effect. When a landowner repairs his farm cottages with his own money entirely and their identity is not thereby destroyed, the tenants clearly remain protected by all the provisions of the Rent Restrictions Acts. They cannot be turned out and their rents cannot be raised. It would be a remarkable thing if they should entirely lose the protection of the Rent Restrictions Acts simply because the landowner receives a grant from the county council to help him to do the repairs. We are satisfied that that is not the result of the Acts. There is no conflict between the Acts as to the rent payable. The Rent Restrictions Acts provide one maximum rent. The Housing (Rural Workers) Acts provide another maximum rent. The rent payable must not exceed either of the maxima. Whether there is such a conflict as regards security of tenure may be another matter. The question does not arise in this case, we have heard no argument on it, and we prefer, therefore, to express no opinion.

In the result, therefore, we think that the provisions of the Rent Restrictions Acts in regard to the rent payable in respect of this house continue to apply. As we have already stated, the precise point which has arisen in the present case did not arise in Roberts v. Jones (1), and, although we do not, of course, in any way question the correctness of the decision in that case, we think that the principle stated by SCOTT, L.J., in the first of the two passages from his judgment which we have quoted above does not lead to so broad a conclusion as he formulated. We are unable to agree, for the reasons we have stated, that the Rent Restrictions Acts are not intended to have any application to any houses falling within the Housing (Rural Workers) Acts. The tenant, therefore, in our judgment, is also entitled to succeed on this part of her case.

Death—Presumption—Petition—Jurisdiction—Parties domiciled abroad—Petitioner resident in England—Matrimonial Causes Act, 1937 (c. 57), s. 8 (1).

By the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1937, s. 8 (1): "Any married person who alleges that reasonable grounds exist for supposing that the other party to the marriage is dead may present a petition to the court to have it presumed that the other party is dead and to have the marriage dissolved, and the court, if satisfied that such reasonable grounds exist, may make a decree of presumption of death and of dissolution of the marriage."

In 1917 the wife married in England a private soldier of the Australian forces. Three months later he left England in a troopship. She remained in England, and, apart from a letter written on board ship, she had not seen or heard from him since that date. In 1949, while resident in England, she presented a petition under s. 8 (1) to have her husband's death presumed, alleging that her domicil was in New South Wales where he resided. The petition was rejected by the registry on the ground that, as the petitioner was not domiciled in England, there was no jurisdiction to entertain it. On appeal to the judge in chambers,

HELD: English courts had accepted the principle that, where the parties were domiciled abroad, the court of domicil had sole jurisdiction in suits for dissolution of marriage, but the relief afforded under the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1937, s. 8 (1), was not primarily or in essence dissolution of marriage, and the residence in England of the petitioner gave the court jurisdiction to entertain the petition.

DIVORCE SUMMONS adjourned into court.

The Divorce Registry rejected in limine, on the ground of lack of jurisdiction, a proposed petition by the wife to presume the death of her husband. The wife, an Englishwoman, married an Australian soldier in England in 1917, and within three months he left England in a troopship. Apart from a letter written on board ship she had not heard from him since that date and was unaware whether he was alive or dead. In her petition she alleged that the domicil of her husband and herself was in New South Wales. PEARCE, J., ordered that the petition should be filed. A

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 9. PEARCE, J., read the following judgment. In 1917 the wife, who was a shop assistant, married in England a private soldier in the Australian forces. Three months later he left England by troopship. She stayed in England. C Apart from a letter written on board ship she has neither seen nor heard of him since he left. She now wishes to petition under s. 8 (1) the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1937, to have it presumed that her husband is dead and to have the marriage dissolved. In her proposed petition she states her belief that the domicil of her husband and herself is in New South Wales. This belief rests, I understand, on the somewhat insecure foundation that her husband told her that his father D (who was a cattle drover) was living at an address in New South Wales. The petition was rejected in limine by the registry on the ground that it did not allege an English domicil, and that, therefore, the court had no jurisdiction to entertain it. Application is now made to me by the wife to allow it to be filed on the ground that an English domicil is not necessary to found jurisdiction. As the case is one of difficulty I invited the King's Proctor to assist the court by E arguing the matter.

Section 8 (1) of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1937, provides :

> " Any married person who alleges that reasonable grounds exist for supposing that the other party to the marriage is dead may present a petition to the court to have it presumed that the other party is dead and to have the marriage dissolved, and the court, if satisfied that such reasonable F grounds exist, may make a decree of presumption of death and of dissolution of the marriage."

In the ecclesiastical courts before 1857 jurisdiction depended on residence, not on domicil. By the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, all jurisdiction then exercisable by the ecclesiastical courts in respect of divorces a mensa et thoro, suits of G nullity of marriage, and other matrimonial matters was vested in the Divorce Court. Decrees of judicial separation having the same effect as divorces a mensa et thoro were substituted for them. The court was given a new power of decreeing dissolution of marriage. It was provided that in all proceedings other than those for dissolution of marriage the court should proceed on principles and rules as nearly as might be conformable to those of the former ecclesiastical courts. H The Act of 1857 contained no express provision with regard to jurisdiction. The legal principles determining the jurisdiction of the newly constituted court were at first in doubt.

In Forster v. Forster (1) it is to be noted that CRESSWELL, J.O., said (3 Sw. and Tr. 155) :

> " I should have been very glad indeed if the legislature had said that the court had no jurisdiction except over persons domiciled in England. When > LORD CAMPBELL was Lord Chancellor, I asked him to bring in a bill to settle the question and to define my jurisdiction ; but he said, 'I cannot do it. Whenever that question is raised, it must be decided upon legal principles. It cannot be defined'."

In 1895 the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in Le Mesurier v. Le Mesurier (2), on appeal from Ceylon, reviewed the English and Scottish cases, A and came to the conclusion that according to international law the domicil for the time being of the married pair afforded the only true test of jurisdiction to dissolve their marriage. The reasons for adopting domicil as the true test are clearly set out in a dissenting judgment of BRETT, M.R., in Niboyet v. Niboyet (3), a case which in the light of the later decisions must be considered to have been wrongly decided. From 1895 onwards the courts have followed Le B Mesurier v. Le Mesurier (2) and held that domicil is the true test in suits for dissolution of marriage. In 1927 the House of Lords regarded it as established that for a decree of dissolution of a marriage the court of the domicil is the true court of jurisdiction and that in principle that jurisdiction ought to be regarded as exclusive, since it affected the status of the parties and was equivalent to a judgment in rem : Salvesen (or von Lorang) v. Administrator of Austrian Pro- C perty (4), per VISCOUNT HALDANE ([1927] A.C. 654). Concurrently with the refusal of the court to entertain suits for dissolution of marriage where a foreign domicil is involved, there has been an acceptance by it of suits that do involve an alteration in status and are equivalent to judgments in rem. For instance, the court makes decrees of judicial separation where the parties are domiciled abroad. These involve alteration of status : Eustace v. Eustace (5), per ATKIN, L.J. D ([1924] P. 54). The court in certain cases makes decrees of nullity where the parties are domiciled abroad. These also involve alteration in status : Salvesen (or von Lorang) v. Administrator of Austrian Property (4), per VISCOUNT HALDANE ([1927] A.C. 654, 656), and per VISCOUNT DUNEDIN ([1927] A.C. 662). Counsel for the wife relies on these instances as showing that the court has not in the past been, and should not be, rigidly prevented by the existence of a foreign E domicil from making decrees in any cases involving alteration of status where it is necessary to do so to avoid hardship. Counsel for the King's Proctor says that these instances are justifiable on historical grounds and do not lessen the rigidity with which the court refuses to deal with cases of dissolution where there is a foreign domicil.

Counsel for the wife also referred to Stathatos v. Stathatos (6), and De Montaigu F v. De Montaigu (7), both of which adopted a dictum of SIR GORELL BARNES, P., in the Court of Appeal in Ogden v. Ogden (8) as showing that in a proper case the court will assume jurisdiction even in suits for dissolution. Those cases dealt with a situation that had arisen because the court of the husband's domicil had declared a marriage void on grounds not recognised in England. They assumed in the wife her original English domicil to support her petition for dissolution of the G marriages that had been avoided in the courts of domicil, but since those cases were decided before Salvesen (or von Lorang) v. Administrator of Austrian Property (4), I do not think they are of much assistance.

In Hutter v. Hutter (otherwise Perry) (9), where the marriage was in England but the domicil was foreign, the court assumed jurisdiction and gave a decree of nullity on the ground of wilful refusal to consummate the marriage, a ground H that was first created by the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1937. The ground of the decision was the historical jurisdiction of the ecclesiastical courts in cases of nullity. This case was referred to in the Court of Appeal in De Reneville v. De Reneville (10) and in Casey v. Casey (11), and there was no unfavourable comment on it. In the latter case SOMERVELL, L.J., said of it ([1949] 2 All E.R. 118) :

> "No doubt there is force in the argument that nullity suits where the marriage is voidable are similar to suits for dissolution. On the other hand there seems to me considerable reasons of convenience for giving the courts > where the respondent or both parties reside jurisdiction in this class of case, and I would desire, so far as this court is concerned, to keep that point open until it arises."

Casey v. Casey (11) was a case of nullity where there was a foreign domicil and BUCKNILL, L.J., there said (ibid., 117) :

> "My opinion in favour of dismissing this appeal is based partly on the balance of hardship to the parties, but mainly on the analogy of the rule that the court of the domicil is the sole court in dissolving a valid marriage."

The effect of the cases (both now and in 1937 when the Matrimonial Causes Act of that year was passed) appears to me to be this. (i) Both in theory and practice our courts have accepted the principle that the court of domicil has sole jurisdiction in suits to dissolve an existing marriage where there is a foreign domicil and that our courts should not take jurisdiction in such suits. In such cases questions of hardship or convenience are irrelevant. (ii) In suits for relief not involving dissolution of an existing marriage but involving alteration of status our courts have in theory accepted the principle that the court of domicil is the appropriate court to pronounce decrees that alter status and are equivalent to judgments in rem. How far they have accepted the principle that it is the only appropriate court does not appear certain : see Salvesen (or von Lorang) v. Administrator of Austrian Property (4), per VISCOUNT HALDANE ([1927] A.C. 654) and per LORD PHILLIMORE ([1927] A.C. 671), Inverclyde v. Inverclyde (12), De Reneville v. De Reneville (10) and Casey v. Casey (11). In practice, however, the courts have taken jurisdiction, which theory might find it difficult to justify, in certain cases where the domicil is foreign and alteration of status is involved. They have done so where they have found historical, or (as in Hutter v. Hutter (9)), quasi-historical, grounds for so doing. In such cases questions of convenience and hardship are not irrelevant. (iii) In suits where no alteration of status is involved there is no objection to our courts accepting jurisdiction where there is a foreign domicil if the parties are resident in England.

If, therefore, the suit now under discussion is a suit for dissolution of marriage, this court should not take jurisdiction and the question of hardship is irrelevant. It becomes necessary to see what is the essential nature of the relief claimed under s. 8 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1937. Section 2 sets out the grounds on which divorce may be obtained (by substituting a fresh s. 176 in the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925). The list of grounds there set out does not include the relief under s. 8. Section 8 (3) provides that ss. 181 to 184 inclusive of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925

> ". . . shall apply to a petition and a decree under this section as they apply to a petition for divorce and decree of divorce respectively."

It would seem, therefore, that the legislature is not regarding relief under s. 8 as being a decree of divorce. The sections of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, that are applied to such relief are those providing for interventions by the King's Proctor or other persons and the right of re-marriage. Many sections dealing with maintenance, variation of settlements, custody, the duty of the court to inquire into questions of connivance or condonation, and the effect of misconduct by the petitioner (which would, of course, be unsuitable where there is a presumption of death) are clearly intended to be excluded (by the inclusion of the four specified sections) from applying to proceedings under s. 8. As the sections thus excluded by implication each contain such words of application as " on a petition for divorce " or " on a decree of divorce," it becomes clear that the legislature considered that proceedings under s. 8 would not attract the operation of sections that apply to divorce.

The reason for this is, I think, apparent in the section. Its primary and essential purpose is to enable a petitioner to have it declared that the other party to the marriage is presumed to be dead. It was intended, no doubt, that, where it was reasonable to presume death but impossible to prove it, widows or widowers should no longer have to sterilise their whole lives, but could marry again without being haunted by the probably unfounded fear that their spouses might reappear with disastrous results to their new families. It was not, in my view, intended that this should really be a fresh ground for divorce (masquerading as a presumption of death) where the vanished spouse is in fact alive. Since facts sometimes

A belie presumptions, provision was made for the fact that occasionally spouses who were presumed dead would, in fact, be still living. To provide no safeguard for a petitioner in such a case would stultify the whole object of the relief given. PROFESSOR WOLFF in PRIVATE INTERNATIONAL LAW, p. 281, discusses the methods of various legislatures for dealing with the problem of the return of a spouse presumed to be dead, and it is interesting to note in passing
B that he assumes inferentially that under the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1937, s. 8, the English courts can deal with cases involving a foreign domicil.

As a safeguard, therefore, this Act has joined to the decree of presumption of death a decree of dissolution of the marriage and has thereby produced a new, and, in my view, anomalous, form of relief. It is this safeguard that has led to the difficulty in this case. It is argued, I think rightly, that the relief under s. 8
C is not severable, and, therefore, it is argued that a petition to have it presumed that the other party is dead and have the marriage dissolved, in fact, constitutes a petition for dissolution of marriage. It is fair to assume that in most cases where it is reasonable to presume death the decree of dissolution will not dissolve an existing marriage, since death will have already dissolved it, but in the occasional cases where the person presumed dead is alive the safeguard will take
D effect and an existing marriage will, in fact, have been dissolved by decree of the court. Does this occasional effect make a petition under s. 8 a petition for dissolution of marriage or prevent the court having jurisdiction where the domicil is foreign ? There is, to my mind, a fundamental difference between deliberately dissolving a marriage which the court knows to exist and dissolving ex abundanti cautela a marriage which the court presumes not to exist. Although
E there must always be some risk that the decree may alter status, owing to the party presumed dead being in fact alive, yet the risk in each case should not be a large one. In practice the alteration in status, if it occurred, would not be severe, since, where a husband's contact with his wife is so tenuous that his wife and the court presume him to be dead, it is unlikely that he or the community of his domicil are strongly conscious of his marriage status. Must that risk deter
F the court from accepting jurisdiction ? I do not think that the legislature so intended. The preamble to the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1937, sets out that it is expedient for inter alia the removal of hardship that the Acts relating to marriage and divorce be amended. If it had been intended that the removal of this particular hardship should not be available to Englishwomen who have married husbands domiciled elsewhere it would have been easy to say so by G enacting that the remedy shall be available not to "any married person" but to "any married person domiciled in England." An almost identical provision in a South Australian statute [the Matrimonial Causes Act Amendment Act, 1941, s. 4] gives the relief to "any married person domiciled in the State." Many wives are not very certain where their husband's domicil is and are not in a position to conduct experimental litigation abroad, and I think it was the inten-
H tion of the legislature that they should be able to participate in the benefits of the Act. It certainly seems just to such wives and also in the public interest that they should have their status as married women or widows established by this court if it properly can be done. To allow them to do so seems more in accord with the tenor of this Act of Parliament. Section 13 of the Act of 1937, in order to alleviate the hardship in certain cases where the husband of a deserted wife has changed his domicil from England to some other country, gives jurisdiction for dissolution although this is a clear infringement of the principle that dissolution belongs only to the court of domicil. It seems unlikely that, owing to the mere risk of such infringement, the Act intended to withhold relief under s. 8 from a class whose hardship was obvious. I think it more likely that the legislature assumed and intended that, owing to the anomalous nature of the relief under s. 8, our courts should not be deterred from taking jurisdiction under it when the husband had a foreign domicil.

There have been two cases cited to me in respect of similar statutory provisions —one decided in Scotland, the other in Queensland. The Scottish case was decided at first instance against the petitioner on the ground that she had failed to prove a Scottish domicil. On appeal she succeeded because it was held that she had proved a Scottish domicil : Antania Anskaitis (or Labcianskas) v. Antania Anskaitis (or Labcianskas) (13). In both courts it was assumed that a Scottish domicil had to be proved, and that point was never argued. The Divorce (Scotland) Act, 1938, s. 5, is in different terms from s. 8 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1937. It does not give a right to apply to have it presumed that the other party is dead, with dissolution as a secondary safeguard. It only gives a right to apply for a " dissolution of the marriage on the ground of the presumed death of the other party." This difference in terms and the absence of argument or comment on the point before me make it dangerous to give weight to that case in respect of the matter that I now have to decide. The other case, Cocks v. Cocks (14), dealt with s. 39A of the Queensland Matrimonial Causes Jurisdiction Act, 1864, introduced into the legislation (without preamble, and in company only with an amending section relating to dispensation with the service of writs) by the Matrimonial Causes Acts Amendment Act, 1943, s. 3. That section is in terms identical for all practical purposes with the section that I am now considering. In that case it was held that the petitioner must at the date of the institution of proceedings be domiciled in Queensland. I have studied the judgments carefully and the reasoning in them is bound to carry great weight with me. MACROSSAN, C.J., was of opinion that the terms of the section with which he was dealing clearly indicated ([1946] State Reports of Queensland, 149) :

> " that the exercise of the powers conferred on the court by the section is subject to the same requirements as to jurisdiction as the ordinary action for dissolution of marriage " and found himself unable to accept the view that the jurisdiction conferred by the section was an anomalous jurisdiction, and that, therefore, the court should exercise jurisdiction in favour of any person resident in Queensland.

The section that I am now considering was introduced into the legislation in a different way from that in Queensland, and, though many of the considerations before me are the same as those before the learned Chief Justice, some are different. I have had some doubt in the matter and I regard the question as far from easy, but for the reasons which I have indicated I find myself unable to take the same view of the section before me as he did of the section before him. In my view, relief under s. 8 is not primarily or in essence dissolution of marriage and was not intended to be so. The dissolution was added as a safeguard. The risk that in certain cases the presumption may be incorrect so that the safeguard will then come into operation and effect an alteration of status in respect of a person domiciled abroad was not, in my opinion, intended by the legislature to deter this court from accepting jurisdiction and should not prevent its doing so. I think, therefore, that residence is the test, not domicil. Since the husband is, ex hypothesi, presumed dead and as such has no residence, it cannot have been his residence that was intended to be the test. It is the residence of the petitioner that was intended to give jurisdiction. I, accordingly, direct that the petition should be filed.

Order that the petition be filed.

By her will, made on Apr. 25, 1916, the testatrix, who died on Aug. 3, 1948, directed her trustees to "devote the net proceeds" of her residuary estate "in whatever manner they may consider desirable to promote the defence of the United Kingdom from the attack of hostile aircraft."

HELD: the gift was intended to secure the protection of the United Kingdom by means of the armed forces of the Crown, and, therefore, as it entailed the advancement of the armed forces of the Crown, it was a good charitable bequest.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS to determine whether a gift by the testatrix of her residuary estate to trustees on trust to "devote the net proceeds in whatever manner they may consider desirable to promote the defence of the United Kingdom from the attack of hostile aircraft" was a valid charitable gift. DANCKWERTS, J., held that it was. The facts appear in the judgment.

J. L. Arnold for the executors.
John Monckton for the next of kin.
Denys B. Buckley for the Attorney-General.

DANCKWERTS, J.: The testatrix died on Aug. 3, 1948, having made her will on Apr. 25, 1916. By her will, after making certain bequests with which I need not deal, she gave, devised and bequeathed the whole of her residuary estate, whether real or personal, unto her trustees on the usual trusts for conversion, and, after providing for the payment of her debts, funeral and testamentary expenses, she directed that the trustees should > "... devote the net proceeds in whatever manner they may consider desirable to promote the defence of the United Kingdom from the attack of hostile aircraft."

The question is whether that bequest is a valid charitable bequest or is void on the ground of uncertainty.

It is argued by counsel for the next of kin that the bequest is void because it is really for patriotic purposes and, therefore, exceeds the ambit of charitable purposes in the legal sense of the term. He contended that it would include the promotion of a newspaper or the support of a political candidate, if those methods might be considered by the trustees to advance the defence of the United Kingdom from the attack of hostile aircraft. He also contended that the reference to the United Kingdom was a reference to a political entity rather than a territorial conception, and that, therefore, the trustees might find themselves, in the event of there being a war—which is an unthinkable situation to me—between Eire and the rest of the former United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, in such a situation that they had to support both sides. That seems to me to be a very far-fetched interpretation of the gift in the present case. It seems to me that it is obviously limited to the defence of the United Kingdom of which the deceased was a citizen, and would, I think, be confined to the defence of the United Kingdom as constituted from time to time. Further, it seems to me that it is obviously intended to promote the protection of the United Kingdom from the attack of hostile aircraft by means of the armed forces of the Crown.

Counsel for the next of kin contended that Re Smith (1), where a gift made " unto my country England " was held to be a valid charitable bequest, was distinguishable on the ground suggested by Lord Simonds ([1947] 1 All E.R. 521) in Williams' Trustees v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (2). It seems to me, however, that this is a clear case which falls within the well-known authorities in which gifts for the promotion of the armed forces of the Crown were held to be valid charitable bequests. I was referred by counsel for the Attorney-General to Re Stephens (3) and Re Good (4). Re Stephens (3) was a case where the bequest was of a sum in consols

> " . . . to the National Rifle Association, of which the Duke of Cambridge is president, and whose office is 12, Pall-mall East, and which association is also to be my residuary legatee, to form a fund to be called the Stephens' Prize Fund, to be expended by the council for the teaching of shooting at moving objects in any manner they may think fit, so as to prevent as far as possible a catastrophe similar to that at Majuba Hill."

Kekewich, J., held in that case that the reference to Majuba Hill in the latter part of the bequest showed that a gift for the promotion of shooting at moving objects was a charitable bequest because it obviously entailed the advancement of the armed forces of the Crown. In the same way, in Re Good (4), which otherwise is rather different on its facts from the present case, Farwell, J., said ([1905] 2 Ch. 66) :

> " I have come to the conclusion that this is a good charitable gift on the first ground—namely, that it is a direct public benefit to increase the efficiency of the army, in which the public is interested, not only financially, but also for the safety and protection of the country."

It seems to me that those two authorities exactly cover the gift in the present case and, therefore, I hold that this is a good charitable bequest.

Will—Gift of residue—"I give and bequeath unto" eleven named persons followed by specific gift to one of them.

A testator, by his will, made on a printed form, appointed C.C. and E.S. to be his "executor" (sic) and directed the payment of his debts and funeral expenses as soon as conveniently might be after his decease. The will proceeded: "I give and bequeath unto," and under those words was written the names of eleven persons, one name on each line, including C.C. Immediately under the last of the names were written the words: "My gold wrist watch to go to C.C."

HELD: the gift of the gold watch to C.C. was an afterthought, and, as the testator must be taken not to have intended to die intestate, it was reasonably clear that he intended to give all his property to the eleven persons named, who were, therefore, jointly entitled to the whole residuary estate apart from the gold watch.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS for the determination, inter alia, of the question whether, on the true construction of the will of William Henry Turner, the words "I give and bequeath unto" followed by the names of eleven persons operated as an effective gift or bequest to those eleven named persons of the testator's residuary estate, or whether (except as regards the specific gift of a gold watch) the testator died without having effectively disposed thereof. DANCKWERTS, J., held that the testator had effectively disposed of his residuary estate by his will.

Bassett for Henry Albert Turner, one of the next of kin.

DANCKWERTS, J.: The testator, William Henry Turner, who died on Sept. 13, 1948, made his will dated Sept. 2, 1948, on a printed form. After appointing Charles Carpenter and Edward Staveley executors and directing that all the testator's debts and funeral expenses should be paid as soon as convenient after his decease, the will proceeds: "I give and bequeath unto" and then follows a list of eleven named nephews and nieces, including Charles Carpenter. After a blank space the will continues: "My gold wrist watch to go to Charles Carpenter."

The question is whether the testator made an effective bequest of the gold watch to Charles Carpenter and an effective gift of his residuary estate to the eleven named persons, or whether he has failed to dispose of his residuary estate, only the specific gift being a valid disposition. In my judgment, on the true construction of this will, the bequest of the gold watch was an afterthought, and is clearly a specific and separate bequest. The next consideration is whether there is an effective residuary bequest in favour of the eleven named persons. Unless I can find the subject-matter to be ascertained the gift would, of course, be void for uncertainty, but it appears reasonably clear that the testator intended to give all the eleven named persons the whole of his estate, and, in the absence of words of severance, they take as joint tenants.

In reaching this conclusion I have been assisted by these cases. In Re Bassett's Estate (1) SIR JAMES BACON, V.-C., had no real difficulty in inferring a gift of residue in similar circumstances. In Re Harrison (2) a testatrix, in making her will, used a law stationer's form, which was partly in print, blanks being left in it which were to be filled up by the person who made use of it. After directing that her debts and funeral and testamentary expenses should be paid by her executrix thereinafter named, the testatrix gave all her property both real and personal "unto—to and for her own use and benefit absolutely," adding "and I nominate, constitute, and appoint my niece Catherine Hellard to be executrix of this my last will and testament." It was held by KAY, J., and by the Court of Appeal that there was an effectual gift of the residue to Catherine Hellard. In the present case, there is no description of the subject-matter of the intended gift, while in Re Harrison (2) there was such a description, but in the latter case a gift of residue was inferred by applying the rule stated therein by LORD ESHER, M.R., who said (30 Ch.D. 393):

> "There is one rule of construction, which to my mind is a golden rule, viz., that when a testator has executed a will in solemn form you must assume that he did not intend to make it a solemn farce,—that he did not intend to die intestate when he has gone through the form of making a will. You ought, if possible, to read the will so as to lead to a testacy, not an intestacy."

In Re Messenger's Estate (3), a testator, by his will, which was on a printed form, appointed E.A.C. to be his executor. After providing for the payment of the testator's debts, funeral and testamentary expenses, the will proceeded: "I give and bequeath to E.A.C." It was held that E.A.C. was entitled to the whole of testator's estate. That case is distinguishable from the present case only by the fact that in the present case a specific gift follows the alleged gift of residue, and CLAUSON, J., applying the rule in Re Harrison (2), having considered the judgment in Re Bassett's Estate (1), and deriving assistance from an Australian case, Fell v. Fell (4), had no difficulty in concluding that the testator intended the whole of his property to pass to the person named. Though there was there no reference to the subject-matter of the disposition, CLAUSON, J., held that it was reasonable to hold that the testator meant to dispose of the whole of his estate. In the present case there is a specific gift, but, as I have concluded that it was an afterthought and therefore stands apart, I have no difficulty in deciding that the testator was referring to the whole of his estate, and I so hold.

Declaration accordingly. Costs of all parties to be taxed as between solicitor and client out of the estate.

Trust—Trust to hold shares—Duty of trustee to sell securities received "in respect of" shares—Government stock substituted for shares by statute—"Securities"—Effect of Electricity Act, 1947 (c. 54), sched. III, pt. I, para. 5—Power to sell shares if "fundamental change" made in rights attaching thereto—Ordinary stock awaiting conversion into Government stock—Gas Act, 1948 (c. 67), sched. II, pt. II, para. 2—Jurisdiction of court to confer power of sale—Trustee Act, 1925 (c. 19), s. 57 (1).

The Second British Fixed Trust was constituted by a trust deed dated Dec. 6, 1932, which provided inter alia, by cl. 1 : ". . . 'Ordinary share' means any share or stock of any company which entitles the holder to participate without limit in the earnings and assets of the company and is not redeemable or repayable at the will of the company. 'Security' means any bond debenture debenture stock obligation or certificate of indebtedness and any share or stock or other interest in the profits or assets of a company other than an ordinary share . . . 'Share unit' means the ordinary shares specified in sched. I to this deed with only such changes therein as are provided for in this deed . . ." Clause 27 provided : "The trustee shall as soon as practicable sell and convert into cash all ordinary shares and securities received by it in respect of any unit (other than ordinary shares forming the share unit and fully paid bonus ordinary shares which the trustee is expressly required to retain by the provisions of these presents) and if there shall be deposited with the trustee by the managers as part of any unit any property which the trustee would have been required to sell if the same had been received in respect of any existing unit the same shall also be forthwith sold and converted into cash." By virtue of the Transport Act, 1947, the Electricity Act, 1947, and the Gas Act, 1948, each share unit constituted under the trust came to include £295 6*s.* 3*d.* British Transport 3 per cent guaranteed stock 1978/83, and £178 18*s.* 4*d.* British Electricity 3 per cent. guaranteed stock 1968/73, and in due course would include a holding of British Gas stock, and the question arose whether each such holding ought to be sold by the trustee in accordance with cl. 27 of the trust deed. The relevant provisions of the three Acts in question were considered by the court and taken to be the same. The Electricity Act, 1947, sched. III, pt. I, para. 5 (which applied to shares included in a share unit) provides : "Where the holder of any securities becomes, under this Part of this schedule, instead the holder of British Electricity stock, he shall hold that stock in the same right and on the same trusts and subject to the same powers, privileges, charges, restraints and liabilities as those in, on or subject to which he held those securities, and any provision of any deed, will, disposition or other instrument, and any statutory provision as to what is to be done by the holder of the securities or the redemption moneys thereof, shall, with any necessary modifications, have effect in relation to the said stock as it would have had effect in relation to the securities if they had not been extinguished."

HELD : the government stocks in question fulfilled the definition of "security" in cl. 1 of the trust deed, and if, therefore, they were to be regarded for all purposes of the trust deed, not as ordinary shares, but as securities, cl. 27 would operate and they would have to be sold, but the intention and effect of para. 5 of pt. I of sched. III to the Act of 1947 was to place the holder of the securities taken over under the Act in the same position as regards the substituted electricity stock as he was in before the expropriation, and, if there existed in the trust deed provisions which would be inconsistent with the retention of the substituted stock as part of the unit, those provisions were to be treated as modified so that they had not that operation, and, therefore, the trustee was not bound to sell the substituted stock.

Clause 23 of the trust deed provided : "If the managers shall certify in writing to the trustee that in the opinion of the managers . . . (E) Any fundamental change has been made in the rights attaching to any ordinary shares of any company . . . and shall at the same time require the trustee to sell the ordinary shares of such company then held by the trustee under this deed the trustee shall sell those shares." The question arose whether the managers were in a position to give a certificate under cl. 23 in relation to the substituted stocks, or in relation to the Gas Light & Coke Co. £1 units of ordinary stock (of which each unit included a holding, and in substitution for which British Gas stock had not yet been issued), and to require any of those holdings to be sold. The Gas Act, 1948, sched. II, pt. II, para. 2, provides : "During the period beginning with the vesting date and ending immediately before the conversion date, the securities to which this Part of this schedule applies shall, notwithstanding the dissolution of the bodies by whom the securities were issued, continue to exist and may be transferred, and the Gas Council shall keep the registers or other records of the holders of those securities, but the only rights which shall attach to those securities shall be—(a) the right to have instead British Gas stock which attaches to the securities by virtue of the next following paragraph ; and (b) the right to the payment of interest which attaches to the securities under para. 5 of this Part of this schedule ; and all other rights attaching to the securities shall, by virtue of this Act, be extinguished on the vesting date."

Held : having regard to para. 2, the managers were in a position to give a certificate under cl. 23 in relation to the Gas Light and Coke Co. ordinary stock because the rights attaching thereto had undergone a fundamental change, but in relation to the substituted stocks (including the gas stock when issued) the time had passed when such a point could be taken and no certificate under cl. 23 could be issued with regard to them.

Held, further, that the holding by the trustee of the substituted stocks did not raise any difficulty or inconvenience in relation to the management or administration of the property subject to the trust, and, moreover, there was a power of sale exercisable in certain circumstances under the trust deed, and there was, therefore, no jurisdiction under the Trustee Act, 1925, s. 57 (1), to confer a power on the trustee to sell the substituted stock and re-invest the proceeds.

Adjourned Summons to determine (i) whether, on the true construction of the trust deed constituting the Second British Fixed Trust and supplemental deeds and of the Transport Act, 1947, the Electricity Act, 1947, and the Gas Act, 1948, all or any of the stocks substituted by those Acts for stocks held by the trust (including those under the Gas Act, 1948, when they were issued) ought to be sold by the trustee ; (ii) if the answer to question (i) were negative, whether, in relation to the British Transport stock, the British Electricity stock, or the Gas Light and Coke Co. £1 ordinary stock units, or the British Gas stock, the managers were in a position to issue a certificate under cl. 23 of the trust deed that there had been a fundamental change in the rights attaching thereto and that, consequently, the stocks should be sold ; and (iii) that power might be conferred on the trustee to sell the stocks substituted or to be substituted by the said Acts and all or any other stocks or securities (if any) which might from time A to time be received by the trustee pursuant to any statutory provisions for compensation.

The Second British Fixed Trust was one of a series of trusts, all bearing the name "Fixed British Trust," each of which was constituted by a separate trust deed. Each trust was, in effect, a method of investment whereby small sums of money could be spread over a wide and defined list of companies. Each trust B was called "fixed" because the companies whose shares were included in its holding of securities were determined at the formation of the trust, and those shares could only be sold if certain conditions were no longer satisfied. Each investor purchased a number of "sub-units" and his investment was spread in the unit holding over all the shares comprised therein. Certain of the holdings in the units of the Second British Fixed Trust were replaced by government C stocks under the Acts mentioned, and the question of their sale, therefore, arose.

WYNN-PARRY, J., answered question (i) in the negative, question (ii) in the affirmative as regards the Gas Light and Coke Co. £1 ordinary stock units, but otherwise in the negative, and (iii) he held that the court had no jurisdiction (under the Trustee Act, 1925, s. 57 (1)) to make the order asked for.

K. J. T. Elphinstone for the plaintiffs, the managers of the Second British D Fixed Trust.

R. H. Walton for the first, second and fourth defendants, the trustee, and persons interested in the trust.

Peter Foster for the third defendant, a person interested in the trust.

WYNN-PARRY, J. : The first question which I have to decide on this E summons involves the construction of the original trust deed constituting the Second Fixed British Trust and the relevant provisions of the Transport Act, 1947, the Electricity Act, 1947, and the Gas Act, 1948. The question, which in the end comes down to a short, but not easy, question of construction, is whether, in the events which have happened, the British Transport stock and the British Electricity stock which has been received in substitution for ordinary shares, F and the British Gas stock, which will be received in respect of ordinary shares, in companies which existed before the coming into effect of those Acts, and which stocks, under their provisions, have been or will be issued in substitution for these ordinary shares, ought to be sold by the first defendant as the trustee under the trust deed as soon as practicable in accordance with certain clauses of the trust deed, the chief one being cl. 27.

G The trust deed provides, in cl. 1, certain definitions of which the relevant ones are these. "Ordinary share" is defined as meaning

> "any share or stock of any company which entitles the holder to participate without limit in the earnings and assets of the company and is not redeemable or repayable at the will of the company."

"Security" means

H

> "any bond debenture debenture stock obligation or certificate of indebtedness and any share or stock or other interest in the profits or assets of a company other than an ordinary share and includes rights as hereinafter defined."

There is also a definition of the word "Rights" which makes it clear that it is used in respect of, and limited to, ordinary shares. "Company" is defined as meaning

> " any corporation (whether incorporated under the Companies Act or not) incorporated in the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland " and " share unit " is defined as meaning

> " the ordinary shares specified in sched. I to this deed with only such changes therein as are provided for in this deed."

My attention has been drawn to a number of clauses in the trust deed, A particularly those following on the heading " Changes in and sales of deposited property." I do not propose to go through them in detail, but I accept for this purpose the submission of counsel for the second and fourth defendants that the object of the trust, as indicated by these clauses, was that the portfolio to be held by the trustee should consist exclusively of ordinary shares. The important clause for the purpose of this question is cl. 27 which provides : B

> " The trustee shall as soon as practicable sell and convert into cash all ordinary shares and securities received by it in respect of any unit (other than ordinary shares forming the share unit and fully paid bonus ordinary shares which the trustee is expressly required to retain by the provisions of these presents) and if there shall be deposited with the trustee by the managers as part of any unit any property which the trustee would have been required C to sell if the same had been received in respect of any existing unit the same shall also be forthwith sold and converted into cash."

There follow the provisions as to the methods of sale to which I need not refer.

Put shortly, what has happened is that, as a result of the coming into force of the Transport Act, 1947, the Electricity Act, 1947, and the Gas Act, 1948, D each of the units constituted under the trust includes a holding of £770 British Transport 3 per cent. guaranteed stock 1968/73, a holding of £295 6*s.* 3*d.* British Transport 3 per cent. guaranteed stock 1978/83, and a holding of £178 18*s.* 4*d.* British Electricity 3 per cent. guaranteed stock 1968/73. In addition, each of the units includes a holding of 100 Gas Light and Coke Co. £1 units of ordinary stock. That undertaking has become subject to the vesting provisions of the E Gas Act, 1948, and under that Act there will eventually be issued, in substitution for that holding of Gas Light and Coke Co. units of ordinary stock, British Gas stock, but there has as yet been no determination of the amount of British Gas stock which, pursuant to the Act, should be issued by way of compensation in respect of the particular holding, and, therefore, there has as yet not been received by the trustee any British Gas stock. As regards the holding of £770 British F Transport 3 per cent. guaranteed stock 1968/73, that was part of the stock issued to Messrs. Thomas Tilling, Ltd., as consideration for the transfer to the British Transport Commission of such of that company's interests in passenger road transport and road haulage undertakings as were effected by the Transport Act, 1947, and were, subsequently to such issue, distributed by Messrs. Thomas Tilling, Ltd., by way of a special capital profits dividend, so that that stock, as G will be seen, and as is, indeed, admitted by counsel for the third defendant, stands in a different position from the other government stocks issued and to be issued.

My attention has been directed in detail to the relevant provisions of each of the three Acts in question, but the argument has been illustrated conveniently by reference only to the Electricity Act, 1947, on the basis, with which I am dealing, that the relevant provisions of the three Acts for the purposes of this H question may be taken to be the same. The Electricity Act, 1947, s. 1 (1), provides :

> " There shall be established an Authority, to be known as the British Electricity Authority, and it shall be the duty of that Authority as from the vesting date to develop and maintain an efficient, co-ordinated and economical system of electricity supply for all parts of Great Britain except the North of Scotland District, and for that purpose . . . " to fulfil certain activities which are then specified. Section 1 (2) provides :

> " There shall be established Boards, to be known by the names mentioned in the first column of sched. I to this Act, for the areas which are described in general terms in the second column of that schedule and are to be defined by Orders made under this Part of this Act, and it shall be the duty of every such Board as from the vesting date to acquire from the British Electricity A Authority bulk supplies of electricity . . ."

Section 3 provides :

> " (1) The Central Authority and every Area Board shall be a body corporate with perpetual succession and a common seal and power to hold land without licence in mortmain."

B Section 13 provides for the vesting of assets of authorised undertakers and covers the undertaker whose shares are in question, the Lancashire Electric Light and Power Co., Ltd. The matter is carried further by s. 14, and I need not refer in any detail to either of those two sections. Section 20 (1) provides :

> " Every holder of securities of any body to whom this Part of this Act applies, not being securities of a local authority or a composite company, C shall be entitled to be compensated by the issue to him by the Central Authority, in accordance with the provisions of sched. III to this Act, of British Electricity stock of such amount . . . " as is to be calculated under the Act. Under sched. III provision is made for the issue of stock in satisfaction of compensation. The schedule is divided into two parts. Part I deals with " Provisions applicable to securities with values D determined before the vesting date," and pt. II, with " Provisions applicable to other securities," but I need not pursue the provisions of those two Parts of the schedule except as regards para. 5 of pt. I, which also is made applicable to securities falling within pt. II. Paragraph 5 reads as follows :

> " Where the holder of any securities becomes, under this Part of this E schedule, instead the holder of British Electricity stock, he shall hold that stock in the same right and on the same trusts and subject to the same powers, privileges, charges, restraints and liabilities as those in, on or subject to which he held those securities, and any provision of any deed, will, disposition or other instrument, and any statutory provision as to what is to be done by the holder of the securities or the redemption moneys thereof, F shall, with any necessary modifications, have effect in relation to the said stock as it would have had effect in relation to the securities if they had not been extinguished."

The electricity stock in question was issued under s. 40. Under the relevant corresponding provisions of the Transport Act, 1947, the British Transport stock in question was issued and under the corresponding provisions of the G Gas Act, 1948, gas stock will in due course be issued. Those three stocks (apart from the £770 British Transport 3 per cent. guaranteed stock 1968/73 which, as I have said, stands in a different position) have been, or will be, received by the trustee in satisfaction of the ordinary stocks of the railway company, the electricity company and the gas company which previously were held as part of the unit subject to the trust.

H As will be seen, the question which now emerges is whether those government stocks (for this purpose treating the gas stock as being issued) are to be regarded as being in all respects substituted for the ordinary stock in respect of which they have been issued, or whether they are to be regarded strictly as government stock, and in the latter event what is the impact on that position of cl. 27 of the trust deed ?

I do not entertain any doubt that the government stocks in question do not fulfil the definition of " ordinary share " in cl. 1 of the trust deed. They do, in my view, fulfil the definition of "security" in cl. 1 thereof. Further, I think that the statutory corporations set up by the respective Acts fulfil the definition of "company" in cl. 1 of the trust deed. Further, in my view, if the government stock received and to be received under the provisions of those three Acts is to be regarded for all purposes of the trust deed, not as ordinary shares, but as securities, then the argument on behalf of the second and fourth defendants that cl. 27 operates and the government stocks should be sold is well-founded. In my view, however, the crux of the whole matter is: What is the effect and true meaning of para. 5 of pt. I of sched. III which I have already read? It will be observed that so far as the first part of that paragraph is concerned it is couched in very wide language, for it provides that the holder of British Electricity stock which is issued to him in place of securities previously held by him is to A

> "... hold that stock in the same right and on the same trusts and subject to the same powers, privileges, charges, restraints and liabilities as those in, on or subject to which he held those securities ..." B

Pausing there, it appears to me that the intention and the effect of the paragraph is to place the holder of the substituted electricity stock in the same position, as regards that stock, as he was previously in as regards the securities in substitution for which the stock was issued. I, therefore, proceed to the second part of the paragraph to see whether that confirms my reading of the intention of the draftsman as expressed in that first part of the clause, or contains any matter to displace that interpretation. C

In my view, I find confirmation, and no matter to displace that interpretation. The paragraph goes on to say: D

> "... and any provision of any deed, will, disposition or other instrument, and any statutory provision as to what is to be done by the holder of the securities or the redemption moneys thereof, shall, with any necessary modifications, have effect in relation to the said stock as it would have had effect in relation to the securities if they had not been extinguished ..."

The effect of that latter part of the paragraph, as it appears to me, is that the draftsman has continued his paragraph in order expressly to deal with any doubt that might otherwise have been felt as to what was to be the position under some written provision, whatever be its nature, if that written provision were to some extent in conflict with the first part of the paragraph. He expressly provided, as I read the second part of the paragraph, that the written provision (in this case the trust deed) is to be read as modified so far as is necessary to enable the object of the paragraph as expressed in the first half thereof to be achieved. That, I think, appears clearly from the words E F

> "shall, with any necessary modifications, have effect in relation to the said stock as it would have had effect in relation to the securities if they had not been extinguished ..."

That is, you look at the position as it would have been if the securities had not been extinguished. G

These were ordinary shares and they formed part of the unit. In their place is issued, or is to be issued, government stock, and that is to be regarded, therefore, as part of the unit, but to the extent that there exists in the trust deed provisions which would be inconsistent with the retention of the substituted stock as part of the unit, those provisions are to be treated as being modified. H

In my view, therefore, for these reasons question (i) in the amended summons must be answered in the negative. [HIS LORDSHIP added, however, that the holding of £770 British Transport 3 per cent. guaranteed stock, 1968/73, which had formed part of the capital profits dividend distributed by Thomas Tilling, Ltd., was in a different category, and should be sold.]

HIS LORDSHIP heard argument on question (ii).

WYNN-PARRY, J.: The second question which I have to answer is, on the basis and to the extent to which question (i) was answered in the negative,

> "Whether in the events which have happened the managers are now in a position to give a certificate in writing under cl. 23 of the trust deed in A relation to the transport stock or the electricity stock, or in relation to the Gas Light & Coke Co. £1 units of ordinary stock, or in relation to the British Gas stock when issued in substitution for those units of ordinary stock, and to require any of those holdings to be sold."

The relevant provision of cl. 23 is:

> "If the managers shall certify in writing to the trustee that in the opinion of the managers . . . (E) Any fundamental change has been made in the rights attaching to any ordinary shares of any company . . . and shall at the same time require the trustee to sell the ordinary shares of such company then held by the trustee under this deed the trustee shall sell those shares."

C I propose to deal first with the position of the £1 units of ordinary stock of the Gas Light and Coke Co., Ltd. The present somewhat nebulous position as regards those securities is to be found on a perusal of the Gas Act, 1948, sched. II, pt. II, para. 2, which provides:

> "During the period beginning with the vesting date and ending D immediately before the conversion date, the securities to which this Part of this schedule applies shall, notwithstanding the dissolution of the bodies by whom the securities were issued, continue to exist and may be transferred, and the Gas Council shall keep the registers or other records of the holders of those securities, but the only rights which shall attach to those securities shall be—(a) the right to have instead British Gas stock which attaches E to the securities by virtue of the next following paragraph; and (b) the right to the payment of interest which attaches to the securities under para. 5 of this Part of this schedule; and all other rights attaching to the securities shall, by virtue of this Act, be extinguished on the vesting date."

To some extent a fiction is employed, but the language of the paragraph, in my judgment, is plain, and, taking one's stand at this date, i.e., after the Act had F come into force, but before the British Gas stock has been issued as compensation for the £1 units of ordinary stock of the Gas Light and Coke Co., Ltd., it is true that there has been a fundamental change made in the rights attaching to those units of ordinary stock of the Gas Light and Coke Co., Ltd. Therefore, as regards those units of ordinary stock, in my judgment, the managers are, if they so desire, in a position to give a certificate in writing under cl. 23 of the G trust deed.

As regards the transport stock and the electricity stock, and also the British Gas stock when issued—and I include the British Gas stock on the basis that the managers may not exercise the discretion under cl. 23 to which I have just referred—the position is different. As regards the transport stock and electricity stock, they have already been issued. No such point as has been successfully H taken in regard to the Gas Light and Coke Co. £1 units of ordinary stock was taken as regards the Great Western Railway ordinary shares (a holding of which is also included in each unit) or the electricity company's ordinary shares under the Transport Act or the Electricity Act. Although in one sense it is true to say that there has been a fundamental change in those ordinary shares, yet having regard to the circumstance that the British Transport stock and the British Electricity stock has been issued in respect of those shares, it is now, in my judgment, too late for any such point to be taken as regards those stocks. Such a point could only be taken if in the future it could be postulated that a fundamental change had been made in the rights attaching to the British Transport stock and the British Electricity stock or either of them. The same reasoning, in my view, will apply to the British Gas stock when issued.

HIS LORDSHIP heard argument on question (iii).

WYNN-PARRY, J.: By the summons it is asked that there may be conferred on the trustee, so as to be exercisable at the request of the managers for the time being of the trust, put shortly, a power to sell the stocks issued under the three Acts in question, as to which I have held that on the terms of the B trust deed as it stands there is no power to sell, and, further, that there be a general power to sell all or any other stocks or securities, if any, which may from time to time hereafter be received, so as to form part of a unit, by the trustee pursuant to any statutory provisions for compensation. That is a power looking to the future and anticipating further schemes for nationalisation. It is further asked that power shall be given to re-invest, not only the net proceeds of the C sale of any of the stocks coming within the purview of the power of sale to which I have referred, but also the whole or part of the net proceeds of any sale of investments or rights effected in accordance with the existing provisions of the trust deed and the supplemental trust deeds, in a manner set out in detail in the question, which, in effect, would involve investing the proceeds in buying further ordinary shares of the holding which, at the time of the proposed re- D investment, was the smallest in value of the holdings of ordinary shares comprised in each unit, and so on upwards with a view to achieving, so far as possible, a perfect balance in the spread among the investments constituting the securities.

The first point which I have to decide is whether there is jurisdiction in the court under the Trustee Act, 1925, s. 57, which is the section invoked, to make E any such order, either as regards authority to sell or as regards authority to re-invest. The section is couched in wide language, and there is little guidance in the reported cases, a circumstance which is explained by the fact that most applications under this section are dealt with in chambers. It appears to me that there must be some limit to the scope of this section. It cannot be construed as a section having such wide import as would allow a complete re-writing of a F trust deed or a substitution of a completely different object for that to achieve which the trust was brought into being. I find support in the view that there must be some limit to the scope of s. 57 (1) in the opening words, which are: "Where in the management or administration of any property vested in trustees . . ." If those words "management or administration" are to have no significance, it would have been the easiest thing in the world for the section to G have opened with the words: "Where any property is vested in trustees . . ." I do not intend to attempt to state what, in my view, is the exact scope of the section. I cannot see that I should be doing any service by embarking on any such attempt, for it is much better that each case as it comes up should be considered separately. I do feel, however, that I have to consider whether this application is one which I have jurisdiction to entertain, on the view, which H I take, that the words "management or administration" at the beginning of the section have a limiting effect on the jurisdiction conferred on the court. The resulting position, on the view which I have expressed in answer to question (i), is that there is now contained in each unit a certain holding in the compensation stocks, issued or to be issued under the three Acts in question, and that those compensation stocks are now to be regarded as, for all purposes, forming part of the unit. It is true, as I have already had occasion to point out, that, looking only at the trust deed, the presence of those stocks as part of the unit is foreign to the policy of the trust deed, but, according to the view which I have expressed, that is the effect of the policy and the language of the Acts in question.

Giving the matter the best consideration I can, I cannot see that the continued holding of these compensation stocks can raise any question of difficulty or real inconvenience in relation to the management or administration of the
A property subject to the trust, or in carrying out the trust. It, therefore, appears to me impossible in those circumstances to say that the mere fortuitous circumstance that, as the result of the coming into effect of the three Acts in question, there is now, in each unit, stock not of the nature originally contemplated, but which, by the effect of the Acts of Parliament, is to be deemed for all purposes to be ordinary stock and held as part of each unit,
B gives the court jurisdiction to make an order under s. 57 conferring an authority on the trustee or the managers, the object of which is to eliminate those stocks or any of them from the portfolio of the trust, particularly in view of the circumstance that I have already mentioned—that I am unable to see that any considerations of difficulty or inconvenience can arise.

There appears to me to be a second objection to the invocation of the jurisdic-
C tion under this section. Section 57 (1) contains these words :

> " . . . but the same cannot be effected by reason of the absence of any power for that purpose vested in the trustees by the trust instrument . . ."

There is a power of sale expressly conferred on the trustees under the trust deed in specified circumstances, though the particular power of sale asked for by this summons is absent.

D In Re Pratt's Will Trusts (1), MORTON, J., had to consider a somewhat similar question. In that case a testatrix bequeathed to her executors and trustees certain shares and the dividends and income accruing therefrom at her death on trust to pay the dividends or income thereof to her nephew for life and then, as to both income and capital, on trust for other persons. The will contained no express trust for sale. It was held that the shares were " trust funds . . . in a E state of investment " in the hands of the trustees, within the meaning of s. 1 (1) of the Trustee Act, 1925, and that the wording of that sub-section was wide enough to give to the trustees a power to sell the shares, and, therefore, the Trustee Act, 1925, s. 57, could not be invoked. MORTON, J., having dealt with the first question, namely, whether s. 1 (1) of the Trustee Act, 1925, applied, and having held that it did, said ([1943] 2 All E.R. 378) :

F

> " The result is that in the present case the trustees have a power of sale. I cannot, therefore, make the order which is asked under s. 57 of the Trustee Act, 1925, because the words ' by reason of the absence of any power for that purpose vested in the trustees by the trust instrument, if any, or by law ' are not applicable to the present case."

G It appears to me that that reasoning applies equally here, and, in my judgment, for those two reasons, the Trustee Act, 1925, s. 57, cannot be invoked in this case.

The matter may be taken further, and, therefore, in case I should be held by a higher court to have taken a wrong view on the question of jurisdiction, I will state what view I would have taken if, contrary to my own view, I had had jurisdiction to entertain this question. As regards the proposed power of sale,
H it was strongly urged on me that a perusal of the trust deed disclosed that the whole underlying policy of the trust and the main object with which it was brought into existence was that there should be held ordinary shares, and nothing other than ordinary shares, and that, therefore, it could be said to be expedient that these holdings of compensation stock should be sold. Here again I have to take into consideration the circumstances that, as a result of the deliberate policy of Parliament, achieved by the relevant provisions of the three Acts in question, the compensation stock has become part of the portfolio of the trust deed and is to be regarded, substantially speaking, as being for all purposes part of the unit, and that there is no difficulty or inconvenience likely to be encountered in giving effect to that policy. In these circumstances a case is not made out to my satisfaction that it is expedient that any of those stocks should be sold. Therefore, had I arrived at the conclusion that I had jurisdiction under s. 57, I should not have exercised that jurisdiction. It follows, therefore, a fortiori, that I should not in any event have been prepared to authorise any power of re-investment. In this connection I would add that in no circumstances can I see that any case has been made out for describing as expedient the introduction of a power to re-invest the whole or any part of the net proceeds of any sale of investments or rights effected in accordance with the existing provisions of the trust deed.

Landlord and Tenant—" Repair "—Reinstatement of business premises as private house—Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927 (c. 36), s. 18 (1).

By the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927, s. 18 (1) : " . . . no damages shall be recovered for a breach of any such covenant or agreement to leave or put premises in repair at the termination of a lease, if it is shown that the premises, in whatever state of repair they might be, would at or shortly after the termination of the tenancy have been or be pulled down, or such structural alterations made therein as would render valueless the repairs covered by the covenant or agreement."

Under the terms of a lease of " land, messuage and tenement " the tenant was entitled to use the premises " for the trade or business of a manufacturing chemist only and not . . . for any other trade or business whatsoever without the consent in writing of the landlord." He covenanted to keep the premises " in good and sufficient repair during the said term and in particular will reinstate the premises at the end of the term hereby granted as a private dwelling-house . . . " At the end of the term the premises were in a bad state of repair and had not been reinstated as a dwelling-house, but it was found as a fact that the landlord intended at that time to pull them down and erect other buildings in their place.

HELD : the reinstatement as a private dwelling-house required by the covenant was " repair " within the meaning of the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927, s. 18 (1), under which no damages were recoverable for breach of the covenant because the premises " would at or shortly after the termination of the tenancy . . . be pulled down."

ACTION for damages for breach of covenant to keep demised premises and to deliver them up in good and tenantable repair and to reinstate as a dwelling-house. A

The landlord owned a cottage tenement which she let to the defendant tenant for the duration of the war. On Sept. 7, 1945, notice to quit was served on the tenant who went out of possession on Nov. 30, 1949. The premises were then, admittedly, in a bad state of repair and they had not been reinstated as a dwelling-house. The tenant contended that the landlord's right to damages for B breach of the covenant was barred by the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927, s. 18 (1), because it was her intention at or shortly after the termination of the tenancy to have the premises pulled down. The landlord contended that s. 18 (1) applied only to a breach of a covenant to keep and deliver up in repair and not to a breach of a covenant to reinstate premises as a private dwelling-house. LORD GODDARD, C.J., held that the reinstatement of premises fell within the C word " repair " and gave judgment for the tenant with costs.

Lewis F. Sturge for the landlord (plaintiff).

Berryman, K.C., and Myles for the tenant (defendant).

LORD GODDARD, C.J., stated the facts, found that it was the landlord's intention at the end of the term to pull down the demised premises and erect D another building in their place, and held that the landlord could not recover damages for the breach of covenant to repair even if she changed her mind subsequently : Salisbury (Marquess) v. Gilmour (1), and continued : One other point has been raised by counsel for the tenant who argued : " True it may be that the landlord is debarred by the statute from recovering damages under the breach of covenant to repair, but she is not debarred from recovering damages for breach of the covenant to reinstate."

E The first clause of the lease simply provides that :

> " The landlord shall let and the tenant shall take all that land, messuage and tenement . . . "

It does not describe it as a dwelling-house. The tenant, Henry Goodman

> F " may use the said premises for the trade or business of a manufacturing chemist only and is not to use the said premises for any other trade or business whatsoever without the consent in writing of the landlord."

Then comes the covenant by the tenant :

> " To keep the said premises in good and sufficient repair during the said term and in particular will reinstate the premises at the end of the term G hereby granted as a private dwelling-house and re-place all the fixtures removed during the tenancy except the bath and washbasin which were handed over to the landlord at the commencement of the tenancy."

Section 18 of the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927, deals with breaches of covenant to keep or put premises in repair during the currency of a lease or at the termination of a lease and counsel for the landlord argued that anything H that can be said to be a work of reinstatement to restore the premises as a private dwelling-house is not caught by the section because, he said, the covenant to reinstate the premises is a separate and distinct covenant. He relied on the judgment of ATKINSON, J., in Eyre v. Rea (2). That case does not assist counsel for the landlord in his argument because there the tenant, having covenanted that he would use the premises as a private dwelling-house only, proceeded to alter them entirely and convert them into a set of flats, and it was held that the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927, did not prevent the landlord from recovering damages for breach of that covenant. Construing the covenant in the present case, I should say that the reinstatement to which it refers was regarded by both parties as a matter of repair and that they both meant it to be a matter of repair. When one is construing an Act of this sort it is right to bear in mind the judgment of Sir Nathaniel Lindley, M.R., in Thomson v. Lord Clanmorris (3), in which he pointed out ([1900] 1 Ch. 725) that when construing an Act of Parliament one must have A

> " . . . regard must be had not only to the words used, but to the history of the Act, and the reasons which led to its being passed. You must look at the mischief which had to be cured as well as at the cure provided."

If I look to see why this Act was passed and the mischief that it was passed to cure, it seems to me that it would be giving an unduly narrow construction to it, if I were to hold that, because part of this work consists of taking away B something which is inconsistent with a private dwelling-house and not inconsistent with a factory, the work is not caught by the words of s. 18 (1). I think I ought to hold that the reinstatement of these premises as a private house is a work of repair, and, consequently, there must be judgment for the defendant with costs.

Judgment for the defendant with costs. C

Company—Winding-up—Execution—Levying of execution delayed until after order for winding-up—Rights of creditor—Discretion of court—Companies Act, 1948 (c. 38), s. 325 (1) (c). E

The Companies Act, 1948, s. 325, provides: " (1) Where a creditor has issued execution against the goods or lands of a company . . . and the company is subsequently wound up, he shall not be entitled to retain the benefit of the execution . . . against the liquidator in the winding-up of the company F unless he has completed the execution . . . before the commencement of the winding-up: Provided that . . . (c) the rights conferred by this subsection on the liquidator may be set aside by the court in favour of the creditor to such extent and subject to such terms as the court may think fit."

On Nov. 23, 1948, B.I. Ltd., obtained judgment against the G.M. Co., G Ltd., and on Nov. 25 a writ of fieri facias was issued. Owing to representations made by the G.M. Co., Ltd., B.I. Ltd. were induced to delay execution, and on Jan. 17, 1949, when an order for the compulsory winding-up of the G.M. Co., Ltd., was made, the execution had not been completed. B.I. Ltd. now applied under para. (c) to have the rights of the liquidator set aside in their favour. It was found as a fact that the representations H of the G.M. Co., Ltd., which induced B.I. Ltd. to delay execution had not been in any way dishonest or improper.

Held: under para. (c) the court had jurisdiction to make the order asked for, the jurisdiction not being limited, as it probably was before the Act of 1948, to cases in which there had been dishonesty or trickery on the part of the debtor company.

Between Aug. 13, 1948, and Sept. 22, 1948, they paid to the Grosvenor Metal Co., Ltd., considerable sums in respect of goods to be delivered to them. The latter com-B pany failed to deliver goods to the value of £1,268 13*s*. 9*d*., and on Nov. 23, 1948, Bebb Industries, Ltd., in an action in the King's Bench Division, obtained judgment against the Grosvenor Metal Co., Ltd., for that amount, and damages to be assessed, and costs. On Nov. 25 a writ of fieri facias was issued. Between Dec. 3 and Dec. 17 certain representations were made in good faith by the Grosvenor Metal Co., Ltd., to Bebb Industries, Ltd., as a result of which the C execution of the judgment was delayed, and on Jan. 17, 1949, when an order for the compulsory winding-up of the Grosvenor Metal Co., Ltd., was made (on the petition of another creditor), execution had not been completed.

VAISEY, J., who acquitted the Grosvenor Metal Co., Ltd., of anything in the nature of dishonesty, granted the application.

D Weitzman for the applicants, Bebb Industries, Ltd.

Hewins for the respondents, Grosvenor Metal Co., Ltd.

VAISEY, J. : This is a summons which arises under the Companies Act, 1948, s. 325 (1), which enacts :

> " Where a creditor has issued execution against the goods or lands of a E company . . . and the company is subsequently wound up, he shall not be entitled to retain the benefit of the execution . . . against the liquidator in the winding-up of the company unless he has completed the execution . . . before the commencement of the winding-up."

There follows a proviso which is divided into three heads of which the last, para. (c), is in these words :

> " the rights conferred by this sub-section on the liquidator may be set aside by the court in favour of the creditor to such extent and subject to such terms as the court may think fit."

The case which I am deciding today raises no general question of principle, and the only question about which I think I ought to say a word is whether para. (c) G of the proviso has made any alteration in the existing law. Counsel for the applicants has referred me to four cases of which I need only mention Armorduct Manufacturing Co., Ltd. v. General Incandescent Co., Ltd. (1), in which it was held by the Court of Appeal that where the postponement of execution had been caused by a trick on the part of the defendant company the plaintiff ought not to be prevented from proceeding with his execution. That was a decision under H the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, of which s. 211 was substantially identical with the present section, save that it did not contain the exception stated under para. (c) of the present proviso. The effect of the decision made it clear that in the case of a trick, or something equivalent to dishonesty, the court had power to act, although there was no express statutory provision enabling it to do so. Armorduct Manufacturing Co., Ltd. v. General Incandescent Co., Ltd. (1) has always been regarded hitherto as the high-water mark of this jurisdiction, and I think that prior to the passing of the Companies Act, 1948, nothing short of a trick or some actual dishonesty would justify interference by the court. It is suggested that this new para. (c) of the proviso does no more than declare the law as it existed before the passing of the Act of 1948 and that I ought to proceed on the footing, as I should have proceeded before the Act of 1948 came into operation, that, in view of the decision in Armorduct Manufacturing Co., Ltd. v. General Incandescent Co., Ltd. (1), nothing short of trickery would justify my interference, but when I look at the words of para. (c) it appears to me that I am given a wider jurisdiction. In my view, it enables me to defeat the rights conferred on the liquidator either wholly or partially because of the words "to such extent." It enables me also to impose terms. For instance, I think I could say that the execution creditor should have the benefit of fifty per cent. of the judgment or that he should have the benefit of the judgment subject to any terms I might think fit to impose. Therefore, I hold that under this proviso I have a wider discretion than I should have had before that proviso became part of the statute law.

I am not going through the facts of this case. I do not think anybody could say there was any trickery here, but I hold as a fact that the applicants, Bebb Industries, Ltd., were persuaded, or induced, or requested, to stay their hands in the matter of this execution. While I acquit the officers of Grosvenor Metal Co., Ltd., of any kind of dishonesty or impropriety, I think that, but for their requests and the pressure they put on the applicants, this execution would have been completed before the commencement of the winding-up. I think that the rights of the liquidator must be set aside in favour of the applicants, and I so decide.

The only question which has given me any real anxiety is what I should do about costs. The liquidator could not possibly accede to this claim without a decision of the court, but, on the other hand, I do not see why the applicants should not have their costs. I think the proper course is for me to make the declaration asked for and to direct the liquidator to pay the costs of the applicants.

Order accordingly.

[Court of Appeal (Bucknill, Somervell and Denning, L.JJ.), November 14, 15, 1949.]

Landlord and Tenant—New lease—Compensation—Application by tenant—Reference to referee—Report by referee—Private conversation between county court judge and referee—Validity of judge's subsequent decision—Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927 (c. 36), s. 4 (1), s. 5 (1), s. 20 (2)—County Court Rules, 1936, Ord. 19, r. 2 (f) (g) (h); Ord. 40, r. 5.

A tenant of business premises applied for a new lease under the provisions of the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927, s. 5 (1). The landlord put in an answer and the matter was referred to a referee who made a written report to the county court judge. The judge asked for a supplemental report which was duly made with the consent of both parties. After reading the report and supplemental report the judge had a conversation with the referee concerning a point arising out of the reports, and, subsequently, heard the matter in court and gave judgment against the tenant.

HELD : without finding as a fact that the mind of the judge was influenced by his conversation with the referee or suggesting that he was doing anything but seeking to arrive at a proper and fair decision between the parties, oral communications should not take place between a judge and a referee, and the incident was an irregularity for which the tenant was entitled to have the judgment set aside.

APPEAL by tenant from the decision of His Honour JUDGE ARCHER, K.C., sitting at Brighton County Court, dated Sept. 16, 1949.

The tenant's application under the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927, for a new lease of a garage which had been held under the present lease by him or his predecessors in title for twenty years was referred to a referee. On receiving the referee's report the county court judge asked for a supplemental report, which was supplied, and the matter came on for hearing in court. The judge then announced that before the hearing he had discussed the reports in private with the referee on the question whether there was adherent goodwill attached to the premises. Objection was at once taken to this conversation by counsel for the tenant, but after discussion as to the proper course to be followed the hearing was continued with the consent of the parties and judgment was given against the tenant on a finding that there was no adherent goodwill. The Court of Appeal now set aside that decision on the ground that the judge had adopted an irregular procedure, and it was ordered that the matter be transferred to the High Courts to be heard de novo, the costs in the county court and in the Court of Appeal being left to the discretion of the trial judge.

Paull, K.C., and R. Gwyn Rees for the tenant.
Salmon, K.C., and W. J. Carter for the landlord.

BUCKNILL, L.J. : I will ask SOMERVELL, L.J., to deliver the first judgment.

SOMERVELL, L.J. : This is an appeal from a decision of JUDGE ARCHER, K.C., in proceedings under the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927. The tenant was the lessee of a garage, and the lease was coming to an end. Section 4 of the Act provides for a tenant being able to claim compensation for goodwill at the end of his lease. Section 5 (1) provides :

> " Where the tenant alleges that, though he would be entitled to compensation under the last foregoing section, the sum which could be awarded to him under that section would not compensate him for the loss of goodwill he will suffer if he removes to and carries on his trade or business in other premises, he may in lieu of claiming such compensation, at any time within the period allowed for making a claim under the said section, serve on the landlord notice requiring a new lease of the premises at which the trade or business is carried on to be granted to him."

By s. 5 (2) the tribunal have to consider whether the grant of a new tenancy is in all the circumstances reasonable, and they are given power to order the granting of a new tenancy to the lessee. Section 21 deals with procedure thus :

> " (1) The tribunal for the purposes of pt. I of this Act shall be the county court within the district of which the premises or any part thereof are situated acting under and in accordance with this section . . . (2) Where proceedings are commenced in the county court in respect of any claim or application under pt. I of this Act and are not transferred to the High Court, the matter shall, unless the parties otherwise agree, or it is otherwise prescribed, stand referred for inquiry and report to such one of the panel of referees appointed by the Reference Committee hereinafter mentioned as may be selected by the county court, as if with the consent of the parties the matter had been so referred to him in pursuance of s. 6 of the County Courts Act, 1919."

The equivalent of s. 6 of the County Courts Act, 1919, is now s. 90 of the County Courts Act, 1934.

The tenant put in his application for a new lease on Apr. 30, 1947, and no question arises as to that. It was in proper form. Then, in a document dated Feb. 12, 1949, again in accordance with the procedure, the particulars about this garage were given. The tenant had been lessee for some twenty years. There was an answer, and then the matter was referred to a referee in accordance with s. 21 (2). The referee made a report, which is dated June 8, 1949. It is unnecessary, in the view which I take of this case, to go into any detail on the facts, but I think it is necessary to say that this garage was in the rear of the Grand Hotel, Brighton, and near the Hotel Metropole and a large part of the business which it did was owing to its proximity to those two hotels.

The nature of the goodwill which is referred to in the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927, was considered by a Divisional Court in Whiteman Smith Motor Co., Ltd. v. Chaplain (1), the judgments of SCRUTTON, L.J., and MAUGHAM, L.J., in which have often been referred to in connection with the application of the Act. One thing which is clear from that decision is that goodwill which results from the position or from the site of the premises in question is not goodwill which the lessee can rely on, either for compensation or for a new lease. The present was a case in which, admittedly, a large part of the business and the goodwill which attached to it was due to its proximity to the hotels, and, therefore, was something on which the tenant could not rely. The position with regard to the other business which came to this garage fell to be ascertained in the light of the Act and decisions upon the Act. The referee made a report, and in para. 6 he said :

> " Having carefully considered the evidence, including that of the experts on either side, I have reached the conclusion that the trade derived from the visitors to the Grand and Metropole Hotels constitutes much the largest element in any goodwill belonging to the business, and, as this is due to the situation of the premises, it must be ignored in considering the question whether there is any adherent goodwill. On this point I have come to the conclusion, though not without considerable hesitation, that I ought to accept the view (though not the figures) of the tenant's first expert witness who had had a wide experience of the motor trade and to report that, having regard to the length of time during which the tenant and his predecessors have carried on business on the premises, to the evidence of custom apart from that derived from the hotels, and to all the circumstances, but disregarding any value attributable to situation, the value of the premises has been enhanced to some extent as the direct result of the carrying on on the premises of the trade of a garage proprietor and motor engineer by the tenant, and that the tenant would, therefore, be entitled to some compensation under s. 4 of the Act. If I am right in this it is clear that the amount he would receive (which, in my opinion, would be quite small) would not compensate him for the loss he would sustain by removal."

The referee goes on to say that, in his view, the tenant is entitled to a new lease. The matter came before the county court judge, who wanted that report supplemented. To this both parties agreed, so the matter was sent back to the referee for a further report, and a further report was obtained, called "Particulars of Goodwill," which set out figures of the annual takings, the proportion of cash takings not derived from hotel visitors, the annual profit, the proportion of annual profit not derived from hotel visitors, the proportion of adherent profit, and the rental value of adherent profit, say, £50. Then there is a note: "The estimate of adherent profit must, as pointed out by MAUGHAM, L.J., in the judgment to which I have been referred, be largely a matter of guesswork."

It is now necessary to refer to the rules of procedure which govern proceedings of this kind. Order 19 of the County Court Rules, 1936, contains rules made under s. 90 of the County Courts Act, 1934. Rule 2 begins with the words: "Subject to any order of the judge as to the conduct of the reference"—this, of course, deals generally with cases under s. 90—and sets out various things that the registrar or the referee can do. It provides that the attendance of witnesses can be enforced by summons, and matters of that sort, and continues:

> "(f) the registrar or referee may submit any question arising in the inquiry for the decision of the judge."

Then follow these important words:

> "(g) The report shall be in writing and shall be filed in the court office, and the registrar shall:—(i) give notice to all parties of the filing of the report . . . (h) when the report has been filed, (i) if the further consideration of the proceedings has been adjourned to a day named, any party may apply on that day to the judge to adopt the report, or may give not less than three clear days' notice of his intention to make an application on that day to vary the report, or to remit the report or any part thereof for further inquiry or report; or (ii) if the further consideration has not been adjourned to a day named, any party may, on not less than three clear days' notice, apply to the judge to adopt or vary the report, or to remit the report or any part thereof for further inquiry and report."

That shows, I think clearly, that the report is a document which has to be filed, and will be the basis of further proceedings, though, plainly, it does not bind the county court judge. I must also refer to the rules which relate to the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927. Ord. 40, r. 5, provides:

> "(1) The referee shall complete his inquiry and file his report within a period of four weeks from the receipt by him of the notice of his appointment, unless that period is enlarged by the court, and at the same time shall file a statement of his claim for remuneration and expenses."

There is a provision about giving notice, and then there is a form for the final order of the county court judge (County Court Practice, 1949, form 339, p. 1302) granting or refusing a new lease.

When the present matter came before the county court judge, the report and the supplemental report having been received, the judge, according to his note, said:

> "I said that, to my mind, very considerable difficulty remained, and that the referee had kindly seen me, and, in answer to the question: 'Would any proposing lessee be likely to be affected as regards the rent that he would pay by the alleged existence of adherent goodwill vested in the tenant?', it seemed he thought not, and that he had felt great doubt and difficulty in making his report. I said that both the referee and I must follow the process set out by SCRUTTON, L.J., and that I saw great difficulty in doing so on the materials available, so as to arrive at an answer to the question what (if any) > adherent goodwill was created by the tenant during the term of his lease—what has accrued to the landlord as additional value of his reversion ? "

That incident is the basis of this appeal. Counsel for the tenant submits that that constitutes—I am using neutral words—an irregularity in the proceedings as a result of which this court must set aside the order which the judge made. The matter was argued and the judge gave a decision. We have, without objection by counsel for the tenant, been supplied with a note made by the junior counsel for the landlord, a rather more detailed note of what happened which, I think, is important because it satisfies me that objection was taken in the court below to that conversation with the referee. According to this note, the judge discussed various courses—whether the matter should again be sent to a referee, and, if so, whether it should be sent back to this referee or sent to a different referee. Both parties agreed that the case should proceed. Counsel for the landlord suggests that, even if the point was taken, the fact that the tenant elected to go on before the judge precludes him from taking the point here. I do not think it does. I think that he was entitled to take the line : "I object to this, but go on. If I go to the Court of Appeal and it turns out that the point is a bad one, there is your judgment. If the point is a good one, not much time will have been wasted, because we are here with all the documents available." The judge decided that there was no adherent goodwill. He makes a reference, which I think should be read, to this interview with the referee. He says :

> "He kindly gave me an opportunity of seeing him and I asked him whether he thought the suggested goodwill could affect the bargain which a new lessee would make, but I got no answer which assists me. The guess that he has made is, proportionately, a very little guess. Are there any units in the calculations which permit it ? It is to be an 'intelligent guess'."

On the report and the evidence before him, he being the final court to decide this matter, the judge decided that there was no adherent goodwill. Counsel for the tenant, admitted that, apart from the point about the conversation between the judge and the referee, he would have been in great difficulty in asking this court to interfere with the decision which the judge had reached.

That brings me to the point which we have to decide. Is this such an irregularity as to entitle the tenant to have the decision set aside ? We were referred to Richardson v. Redpath, Brown & Co., Ltd. (2). That case deals with the position of a medical assessor in a workman's compensation case, and I do not think it assists us in the present problem. Let me make it perfectly plain that the judge in the present case was actuated by the best possible motives. He was troubled about the case and felt there was a difficulty about it. He thought he might save costs and assist the course of justice by seeing the referee. No one is attacking or impugning his motive in any way, but, notwithstanding his motive, he may have done something which is not sanctioned by the procedure, and vitiates the proceedings. At one time in his argument counsel for the landlord submitted that the only effect this conversation could have had was on the referee's mind. I do not so read the notes which we have with regard to it. I think the judge took a view of this case, which, no doubt, is a possible view, and put it to the referee, and I think it is possible that the attitude which the referee adopted when that view was put to him might have influenced the judge's mind in coming to his final conclusion. In those circumstances, without finding as a fact—it is not necessary to do so—that his mind was influenced, still less suggesting that he was doing anything but seeking to arrive at a proper and fair decision between the parties, I think the occurrence of that incident does entitle the tenant to have the judgment set aside. It is unnecessary to decide any case other than the present, but I would like to say that, to my mind, the rules plainly contemplate that the report should be in writing. They set out in detail the circumstances in which further reports can be obtained and matters can be further elucidated or not further elucidated by the referee. Therefore, it is most undesirable that methods of communication between the court and referee should be resorted to other than those which are clearly laid down by the rules. For these reasons I think this appeal must succeed. No doubt what should then be done is a matter which can be discussed later.

BUCKNILL, L.J.: I agree. It seems to me that the action taken by the A judge, no doubt with good intentions, was contrary to the procedure laid down by the Act and the rules made thereunder, and that his action was in excess of his jurisdiction. The result of the interview between him and the referee was, in effect, to cancel the operative part of the report.

DENNING, L.J.: It is settled practice that an appellate court is entitled to consult the judge who tried the case. At one time it was not unusual for the B trial judge to form one of the court in banc which heard the appeal. That was dropped more than a hundred years ago, but the practice of an appellate court consulting the trial judge has continued right up to the present time, though it is now infrequent except in criminal cases. The Criminal Appeal Act, 1907, not only contemplates, but requires, that the Court of Criminal Appeal shall have before them a report from the judge who tried the case, giving his opinion of it, C and that is a report which the prisoner and his counsel have no right to see. I do not, however, think this practice applies as between a referee who makes a report and the judge who tries the case. The judge is, after all, the trial judge, and he has to decide the case on information which is properly before him, whether it be in the shape of a report or in the shape of evidence. Each side must have an opportunity of dealing with any information adverse to his case. If, and in D so far as, that information comes from the referee and is embodied in the written report or a supplemental report to which the parties have access, justice is not only done but is manifestly seen to be done. If the information comes by word of mouth in a private conversation when the parties are not present, justice may, perhaps, be done, but it is not seen to be done, and one of the parties will go away with the feeling that the case has been decided against him behind his E back. It is elementary in our jurisprudence that justice must not only be done, but also must manifestly be seen to be done. It must be remembered that the parties have the right to apply to vary the report or to ask the judge to hear further evidence, and, as SCRUTTON, L.J., said in Simpson v. Charrington & Co., Ltd. (3) ([1934] 1 K.B. 76):

F "A motion to vary a report is necessary if it is to be challenged."

How can parties do this if they do not know the terms of the report? And how can they know the terms of the report unless it is in writing? Order 19 of the County Court Rules specifically requires that the report shall be in writing, and I see no justification for an oral report such as was given in this case. I agree that the appeal shall be allowed.

G BUCKNILL, L.J.: The appeal will be allowed, and, both parties applying to us under the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927, s. 21 (1) (b), to transfer this matter to the High Court, we make the appropriate order. As regards costs, we think that in all the circumstances the just order to make is that the costs below and the costs of the appeal should be in the discretion of the new trial judge. We think the matter should start de novo in the High Court.

H Appeal allowed. Order transferring action to the High Court. Costs reserved to trial.

Income Tax—Repayment of tax—Management expenses—Investment company—Expenses of changing investments—Brokerage and stamp duty—Income Tax Act, 1918 (c. 40), s. 33 (1).

The Income Tax Act, 1918, s. 33 (1) provides : " Where . . . any company whose business consists mainly in the making of investments, and the principal part of whose income is derived therefrom . . . claims and proves to the satisfaction of the Special Commissioners that, for any year of assessment, it has been charged to tax by deduction or otherwise . . . the company . . . shall be entitled to repayment of so much of the tax paid by it as is equal to the amount of the tax on any sums disbursed as expenses of management (including commissions) for that year . . . " A B

An investment company within s. 33 (1) sought to include in its claim for management expenses sums disbursed for brokerage and stamp duty in changing its investments.

Held : such disbursements were not " expenses of management " within s. 33 (1). C

Decision of Croom-Johnson, J. (ante p. 132), affirmed.

[As to Allowance for Management Expenses, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 17, pp. 135-137, paras. 267-273 ; and for Cases, see DIGEST, Vol. 28, pp. 55, 56, No. 283, and Supplement.]

Appeal by the Capital and National Trust, Ltd., from an order of Croom-Johnson, J., dated May 19, 1949, and reported ante p. 132, on a Case stated by the Special Commissioners of Income Tax. D

The Special Commissioners had found that the expenses incurred by the company, an investment trust company, in changing investments were not " expenses of management " within the Income Tax Act, 1918, s. 33 (1), and were, therefore, not to be included in claims under that sub-section. Croom-Johnson, J., upheld the decision of the Special Commissioners, and his decision was now affirmed by the Court of Appeal. The facts appear in the judgment of Tucker, L.J. E

Grant, K.C., Talbot, K.C., and Borneman for the company.
Donovan, K.C., and R. P. Hills for the Crown.

TUCKER, L.J. : This is an appeal from a judgment of Croom-Johnson, J., in a case which raised the question whether sums paid by way of stamp duty and brokerage commission on the purchase or sale of investments were or were not expenses of management of the company in question. That point arises under the Income Tax Act, 1918, s. 33 (1), which provides : F

> " Where . . . any company whose business consists mainly in the making of investments, and the principal part of whose income is derived therefrom . . . claims and proves to the satisfaction of the Special Commissioners that, for any year of assessment, it has been charged to tax by deduction or otherwise . . . the company . . . shall be entitled to repayment of so much of the tax paid by it as is equal to the amount of the tax on any sums disbursed as expenses of management (including commissions) for that year . . . " G H

It is not in dispute that the Capital and National Trust, Ltd., is a company whose business consists mainly in making investments and that the principal part of its income is derived therefrom. For a number of years the Inland Revenue Commissioners have been accustomed to offer no objection to the inclusion of sums disbursed by way of brokerage and stamp duty in connection with changes of investments made by this company and other similar companies, as distinguished from investments representing capital expansion, but when the company came to make its claim on the customary basis for the year ending Apr. 5, 1948, they were informed that the Inland Revenue Commissioners were no longer prepared to regard any part of the expenditure it had incurred in brokerage and stamp duties in connection with changes of investments as sums disbursed as " expenses of management (including commissions) " within the meaning of s. 33 (1). Hence this litigation.

The question is whether, when the company took the matter before the Special Commissioners, it succeeded in establishing its claim that these payments were " expenses of management (including commissions) " within the meaning of that section. The Case having found, as I have said, what the nature of the business of this company was, there are the following findings with regard to the functions of the management. This was stated in the evidence of a witness whose testimony is summarised in the Case and was accepted by the commissioners :

> " The chief duty concerned with the management of an investment trust company was to maintain the income, and to do that it was necessary to keep a day to day watch on its investments. Investments had frequently to be changed whether the market was rising or dull, solely with the view of maintaining the income yield. Market fluctuations were not matters of primary concern, but if the market value of an investment rose an investment trust company might realise its holding with the object of re-investing the proceeds to secure an improved yield of income. The sums paid or suffered in respect of brokerage and stamp duty were part of the cost of acquiring an investment and a charge that had to be incurred on the sale of an investment."

The commissioners decided that the sums paid by the company

> " in respect of brokerage and stamp duty, when purchasing investments, constitute an integral part of the purchase price, thus increasing the price to be paid. In the same manner the sums deducted for brokerage and stamp duty, in effecting a sale, constitute an integral part of the selling price, thus diminishing the amount received by the appellant company. We are unable to divorce these sums from the price paid or the amount received when changes take place in the investments. In our view, in the case of the appellant company, expenses of management are mainly concerned with matters up to the time when the actual purchase or sale of an investment is effected. These matters include the payment for the services of those whose duty it is to maintain, as far as possible, the income yield from the investments, to keep a constant watch on those investments, and to decide when and what changes are advisable. Once a decision about a change in the investments has been arrived at, we are unable to say that charges for brokerage and stamp duty necessarily incurred in a purchase or sale constitute expenses of management within the meaning of the said section. We do not consider that the words ' including commissions ' in the said section or the use of the word ' commission ' in the said contract notes to be conclusive of the matter."

Some criticism may be directed towards the reasoning which appears in those findings and in the statement that the sums paid in respect of brokerage and stamp duty constitute an integral part of the purchase price. That may, perhaps, not be quite accurate, but they are certainly sums necessarily paid in the course of the transaction of purchase. The gist of the decision lies in the view expressed that the expenses of management in this case are mainly concerned with matters up to the time of the actual purchase or sale of an investment. I think that is the foundation of the commissioners' finding.

When the matter came before the learned judge, he dealt with it in this way. I read the language he used because I find myself in complete agreement with it and quite unable to express myself in any better language. He said (ante p. 133) :

> " . . . it seems to me that it is impossible for the company here to say, on the facts as proved, not only that as a matter of law these payments are expenses of management, but that the commissioners ought to have been satisfied that they were. I do not think they are expenses of management, although, no doubt, it was judicious for the company to do what was done. If they are not expenses of management, then the sub-section is not satisfied and the company is not entitled to relief under it. I cannot see how, giving the expression ' management ' its ordinary everyday meaning, it can possibly be said, with regard to an investment company, that the cost of stamps on transfers and contract notes and brokers' remuneration can be said to be expenses of the management of the company. It is, no doubt, incidental to the business of an investment company, but I do not think it is within the expression which is used, giving it, as I must give it, its ordinary meaning. The only other point left in the case is that the section refers to ' commissions.' I think that that reference is not apt to cover a stockbroker's remuneration, which is calculated as a commission, in making bargains on behalf of the company. The section is aimed at something quite different—managing a concern where somebody gets, as part of his remuneration, perhaps, a commission on income, or something of that sort."

Those last words are merely indicating the kind of case which the learned judge was envisaging. They are not purporting to be an exhaustive definition. As I have said, I find myself in complete agreement with that statement of the case.

I would only add that the argument of counsel for the company, as it seems to me, is really that these expenses were " expenses of management," because they were expenses incurred by the management in carrying out the business of the company. That seems to me a totally different thing. What we are concerned with here is the expenses of management, not expenses incurred by the management in carrying out the proper business of the company. The word " commissions," in my view, in no way extends the meaning of " expenses of management." Before these deductions can be made by the company, they must, first of all, be expenses of management, but it is made clear that those expenses can properly include expenses which have been paid by way of commission. For these reasons, I agree with the decision of the learned judge, and I think this appeal fails.

SINGLETON, L.J. : I agree.

JENKINS, L.J. : I also agree.

WAY v. WAY: ROWLEY v. ROWLEY: KENWARD v. KENWARD: WHITEHEAD v. WHITEHEAD.

[PROBATE, DIVORCE AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (Hodson, J.), October 13, 14, November 9, 1949.]

A Nullity—Conflict of Laws—Marriage in Russia—Validity—Parties domiciled in England—Requirements of Soviet law not observed—Mutual consent—"Mistake"—Wife forbidden to leave Russia.

Four husbands, domiciled in England, petitioned for decrees of nullity of their marriages in Soviet Russia to Russian wives, contending that the marriages were invalid for want of form, or, alternatively, were void for want of consent. In each case the marriage had taken place at the local B bureau (corresponding to an English register office) and a certificate of marriage had been signed by a government official and handed to the husband. Under s. 2 of the Russian marriage Law of 1926 registration was indisputable evidence of the existence of the marriage, and by s. 4 of the Law and the Code issued by order of the Presidium of the Supreme Council of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics in 1945 the requirements for C registration of a marriage were (a) mutual consent, (b) attainment of the marriageable age, and (c) the production of documents certifying identity, freedom to marry, and state of health. The provisions of (c) were not complied with in any of the cases.

HELD: (i) the question of form must be determined by the lex loci contractus and the effect of s. 2 of the Law of 1926 was that the marriages D were not invalidated by the omission to comply with the requirements of para. (c).

(ii) the question of consent must be dealt with by reference to the personal law of the parties rather than by reference to the law of the place where the contract to marry was made, and, as the husbands were domiciled in England, English law applied, and under it the marriages were not void for want of consent, there being no mistake in the identity of the party E whom each husband married nor any erroneous belief by any of the parties as to the nature of the ceremony in which he was taking part, nor did the fact that by Russian law the husbands and wives were prevented from living together invalidate the marriage although at the time of the ceremonies the husbands believed that they would be able to do so.

F [EDITORIAL NOTE: The problem of which system of law governs the validity of a marriage alleged to be void on account of the absence of the real consent of the parties to the celebration of the marriage ceremony is discussed in DICEY'S CONFLICT OF LAWS, 6th ed., p. 264.

PETITIONS by four husbands, domiciled in England, for nullity of marriages on the ground that the marriages, which were celebrated in Russia in each case, did not comply with the requirements of Russian law, and, therefore, the ceremonies, which took place before a registrar, did not constitute valid marriages under English law. It was also pleaded that the marriages were void for want of consent. Hodson, J., in a considered judgment, rejected these contentions. The facts appear in the judgment.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 9. HODSON, J., read the following judgment. In each of these four cases the husband is seeking for a decree of nullity of marriage where a form of marriage has been entered into in the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics. Three of the marriages took place in Russia proper in 1945 and the fourth took place in Georgia in 1942, but the differences of date and place are not material. By their pleadings the husbands claimed that marriage as understood in the U.S.S.R. does not comply with the essentials of marriage according to English law, and that the ceremonies did not in English law constitute valid marriages. In the alternative, they claimed that these marriages were void for want of consent. In the further alternative, they claimed that the marriages had been frustrated.

The first plea was not persisted in, no doubt because of the decision of the Court of Appeal in Nachimson v. Nachimson (1), which disposes of this contention and is not outdated by any material changes in the Russian law of marriage since that case came before the court. No argument was addressed to me on the doctrine of frustration, which has never been applied to the status of marriage as opposed to a contract to marry. The distinction between the contract and the status created by the contract is clearly drawn in the judgment of Brett, L.J., in Niboyet v. Niboyet (2) (4 P.D. 11):

> "Marriage is the fulfilment of a contract satisfied by the solemnisation of the marriage, but marriage directly it exists creates by law a relation between the parties and what is called a status of each."

To such a status the doctrine of frustration has no application. The husbands relied on absence of consent and in addition sought to maintain that the marriages were invalid for want of form. This last ground, although not pleaded, has been taken into consideration in this judgment as it is that mainly relied on by the husbands. No useful purpose could have been served by amendment of the pleadings since the wives cannot be served, certainly in three cases. The main petition has been served in one case, that of Rowley, but service has been dispensed with in the other three cases. In addition to the claim for nullity already outlined, the husband, Rowley, seeks a divorce on the ground of adultery, but he has not yet been able to procure evidence to put before the court on this ground, and the husband, Way, alleges wilful refusal to consummate the marriage and claims a decree of nullity on this account.

The material facts in the four cases are as follows. Brigadier Way, who was serving in 1941 with the British Military Mission in the Caucasus, was taken by his duties to Tiflis, where he met his wife, then a ballerina and a Russian subject, in December of that year. He was 42 and she was 27 years of age. The husband spoke Russian fluently and the parties eventually agreed to marry although the actual marriage was postponed for some time at the suggestion of the wife. On Sept. 11, 1942, both parties attended at the local bureau, which corresponds to what in England is known as a register office, produced their passports, from which the necessary particulars were taken, and signed the register, and a certificate, which is now on the file of the court, was handed to the husband. No entries were made on his passport and no questions were asked about the health of the parties or their previous marriages, if any, nor was their attention drawn to any portion of the marriage code. After the registration the wife continued to follow her occupation as a ballerina, and went immediately to the Opera House for a rehearsal. The parties slept together that night in the room normally occupied by the wife. The husband got into her bed and manifested his desire to have sexual relations with her. This she refused without giving any reasonable excuse, merely saying it was very hot and that she must get some rest. There was no subsequent change in the wife's demeanour. She continued with her work at the opera house and on the following night she again refused intercourse notwithstanding the husband's urgent representations that he was going away the next day so that consummation would be rendered impossible until after the war. On this night, as on the first night, after a time the husband left the wife's bed. The parties never met after Sept. 13 when the husband left Tiflis on duty.

Mr. Rowley was in Moscow on duty with the British Army in April, 1945, and met a Russian girl, his present wife, in April, 1945. Each spoke a little of the language of the other, and the parties agreed to marry after an acquaintance lasting for several months. They attended at a register office where they both signed the register on Nov. 25, 1945. No entries were made in the husband's passport. No questions as to health or previous marriages were put, nor were references to the civil code made. After the marriage the parties lived together until Jan. 17, 1946, when the husband left Moscow. He subsequently obtained a notarial copy of the marriage certificate.

Mr. Whitehead met his wife, a Russian girl, in May, 1944, when serving with the British Military Mission in Moscow. She spoke fluent English and he spoke virtually no Russian. Early in 1945 marriage was mentioned between them, and in February, 1945, the husband obtained a divorce and told the wife that he was free. She pressed him to marry her, and he agreed about May 12 to do so. On May 19, 1945, the parties attended before the registrar and the procedure was similar to that in the preceding two cases. The register was signed, no entries were made in the husband's passport and no questions put as to health or previous marriage, nor was reference made to the civil code. The parties never lived together because the husband was posted away from Moscow immediately after the registration.

Mr. Kenward was serving with the Royal Navy in Archangel in 1945 and in September of that year met his wife, a Russian girl, who subsequently suggested marriage, to which he agreed. Each spoke very little of the other's language. The parties attended the register office where assistance in interpretation was given by a friend who spoke English, and on Oct. 16, 1945, the registration took place. The husband was asked if this was his first marriage. He did not remember signing the register, but there can be little doubt that both parties did so. The certificate with the petition was a duplicate obtained by the husband. No entry was made in his passport and nothing was said about health or the civil code. Two days later the husband was recalled to his ship and has never seen his wife since.

I propose to deal first with the question of form. This has to be determined in accordance with the law of the place where the marriage was celebrated, namely, the U.S.S.R. According to the evidence, the conception of marriage according to Russian law is that it is brought about by the consent of the parties and at one time might or might not be registered, the registration not being of the essence of the marriage but an incident useful to prove the fact. That is to say, the fact of marriage existed independently of registration just as much as birth and death. This was the position under the marriage Law of 1926. In 1944 the position was altered by an amending Law which established registration of marriage in the interests of the State and society and also to protect the persons and property, rights and interests, of the spouses and children. This Code was brought into force by order of the Presidium of the Supreme Council of the Russian Socialist Federal Soviet Republic of Apr. 16, 1945, and provides that only a registered marriage creates rights and duties in the spouses. Since all these marriages were registered it is not necessary to consider provisions governing the legality of pre-existing unregistered marriages.

The requirements for registration are dealt with by s. 4 of the Law of 1926, which reads as follows :

> "(a) Mutual consent to register the marriage. (b) The reaching of marriageable age. (c) The production of documents indicated in s. 132 of the Code."

No question arises under (a) or (b), but it is said that (c) was not complied with. Section 132 reads as follows :

> "Those registering a marriage are obliged to produce at the time of the declaration documents certifying their identity, and subscribe that no obstacles indicated in ch. 2, div. 1, of the present Code exist, and also that they are mutually aware of the state of their health and particularly with regard to venereal and mental diseases and tuberculosis, and must also indicate into what consecutive marriage, registered or unregistered, each of them enters and how many children he had."

No question arises as to documents of identity, in my opinion, but it is true that, according to the evidence of all the husbands, there was no subscription by them of any document relating to obstacles to the marriage or the health of the spouses or as to the existence of children, nor were there any of these questions raised. By s. 133 of the Code of 1926 it was provided as follows :

> "The responsible official registering the marriage is obliged to read to those contracting marriages sections 4, 5 and 6 of the present Code, and to warn them about their penal responsibility in case of false statements. After this the inscription made in the register is read, signed by them and countersigned by the official."

By s. 133 (1) of the Code, added by the order of the Presidium of the Supreme Council of R.S.F.S.R. on Apr. 16, 1945, it was further provided as follows :

> "In the passports of the spouses an inscription about the registered marriage is made indicating the surname, christian name, patronymic and the year of birth of the spouse and the place and time of the registration of the marriage."

These provisions were not complied with in the case of any of the husbands. In these circumstances it is submitted that the marriages are void for want of formality.

The main difficulty in the way of this argument is that by s. 2 of the Law of 1926, as was proved in the evidence, registration of marriage when acts of civil status are concerned is indisputable evidence of the existence of the marriage. Some reliance was placed on the reported opinion of the Commissar of Justice to the effect that the avoidance of both registered and unregistered marriages can be applied for in courts of law by all government organs, public organisations and third parties interested in such cases when the decision of the main problem depends on the question whether matrimonial relations exist. This opinion, assuming its authoritativeness, does not, to my mind, assist the parties to the marriage or either of them to dispute the existence of a registered marriage since such dispute is forbidden to them by the terms of s. 2 of the Law of 1926. I think this section is conclusive against the argument directed against the validity of the act of registration and it is irrevelant that the registrars omitted to perform some of the duties imposed on them by the Code as a preliminary to the registration itself. The essential feature existed that prior to the registration there was, subject to the argument with which I will deal hereafter regarding "mutual consent to marry." The registration even if no more than a ministerial act, is conclusive as between the parties, at any rate as to matters of form.

The second ground argued, namely, that the marriage is void for want of consent, is, I think, open to the husbands on the footing that questions of consent are to be dealt with by reference to the personal law of the parties rather than by reference to the law of the place where the contract was made. This view is not covered by direct authority, but is, I think, supported by the judgment of LORD MERRIMAN, P., in Apt v. Apt (3) ([1947] 1 All E.R. 629) :

> " The case might be put as follows. The wife was a domiciled British subject when she gave the power of attorney. This is not expressed to be irrevocable. Although her intention at the time she gave it was to contract a Christian marriage and to acquire the husband's domicil when the marriage was celebrated, she changed her mind and revoked the power of attorney before the celebration, while she was still a British subject. The marriage ceremony, therefore, did not effect a ' voluntary ' union but only a union which is deemed to be voluntary by the law of a country to which she was not subject at the time of the revocation of the power of attorney. That being so, the effect of the revocation should be decided according to English law."

In the same case in the Court of Appeal COHEN, L.J., said ([1947] 2 All E.R. 679) :

> " In our opinion, the method of giving consent as distinct from the fact of consent is essentially a matter for the lex loci celebrationis and does not raise a question of capacity . . . "

Marriage is essentially a voluntary union, and, as counsel for the husbands put it, and I cannot improve on the phrase, " consent is an emanation of personality." It is, therefore, I think, justifiable and consistent with authority to apply the matrimonial law of each of the parties.

In the case of these husbands, all of whom are domiciled in England, the law of England, therefore, applies to the question whether or not they consented to their marriages, and the section of the Russian Code as to the conclusiveness of registration does not shut the door against argument directed to want of consent. It is clear that, if there is a mistake as to the identity of the person with whom the contract is made or an erroneous belief as to the ceremony—for example, a belief that the ceremony was one of betrothal not of marriage—the marriage is void for want of consent. No such mistake can be put forward here, but it is said that in these four cases the marriages were entered into in the mistaken belief : (a) That the administrative Soviet practice of granting permission to wives of foreigners to leave the Soviet Union with their husbands would continue as it had done before the marriages took place ; (b) that they would be permitted to go and see their wives after they had parted from them ; and (c) that the marriages entered into imposed a duty on the spouses to live together, whereas in each case, in fact, by s. 9 of the Code no such duty was imposed on them. Section 9 of the Code reads as follows :

> " Both spouses have complete freedom in the choice of occupation and professions. The order of keeping the common household is fixed by mutual agreement between the spouses. A change of place of residence of one of the spouses does not impose on the other a duty to follow the one."

There is no authority for introducing into the law of England mistakes of this kind invalidating marriage. As to (a) and (b), it is true that the husbands hoped that what might be described as the normal relationship of man and wife would be recognised and observed. It is also true that it shocks the conscience that human relations should be ignored by a government which has, in fact, prevented these wives from joining their husbands. It does not, however, follow that the failure of the Soviet government to act in accordance with international usage will avoid the marriages on the ground of mistake, and I am, in my opinion, bound to hold that it does not. As to (c), the rights and duties of spouses to one another will vary according to the law of the domicil of the married pair, and there is no ground for avoiding the marriage on the ground of mistake because the rights and duties imposed on persons domiciled in Russia, who marry, vary from those imposed by other countries. As I indicated earlier in this judgment, no attempt has been made to argue that a Russian marriage ought not to be recognised in this country as not fulfilling the requisites of what has been called a Christian marriage—that is to say, " the voluntary union for life of one man with one woman, to the exclusion of all others," which is the definition given by Sir J. P. Wilde, J.O., in Hyde v. Hyde and Woodmansee (4), and is the accepted definition of a marriage which is recognised by the law of this country. In my judgment, therefore, the prayer for nullity on the ground that the marriages were in each case void fails.

In the case of Way, however, on the facts stated, accepting as I do his evidence, the wife has wilfully refused to consummate the marriage, and the marriage is, accordingly, voidable by English law, which is the law of the matrimonial domicil and the husband is entitled to a decree. In the case of Rowley there is an alternative prayer for divorce on the ground of adultery, and the petition will, therefore, on the petitioner's application, be adjourned. In the cases of Kenward and Whitehead I have been asked to adjourn one petition instead of dismissing both so that, in the event of a successful appeal in one case, it will not be necessary to take steps to appeal in the other. I, accordingly, dismiss the petition in Kenward's case and adjourn Whitehead's petition with liberty to restore, but this petition will also be dismissed (i) in the event of no appeal being lodged in Kenward's case within the time as limited or extended by the Court of Appeal, or (ii) if an appeal is presented, in the event of such appeal being dismissed.

Orders accordingly.

Solicitor—Negligence—Damages—Conveyance of building—Vendor's solicitor retained by purchaser—Discovery that plans of building not approved by local authority—Purchaser not informed.

A purchase of property, including a bungalow which had been erected during requisition by the Air Ministry and which he proposed to convert into a dwelling-house, wrote to the vendor's solicitors : " I have negotiated the purchase of a property at . . . belonging to your client, B., [the vendor] through S., estate agent . . . and it would be greatly appreciated if you would act on my behalf in connection with the conveyance and registration of the property and the arranging of the mortgage loan with the present owner, B." The solicitors in reply wrote : " We are obliged for your instructions to act for you in the purchase of this property, and shall be glad to prepare the conveyance and mortgage herein." At the time of this correspondence the solicitors knew of the proposed conversion of the bungalow into a dwelling-house. Without the knowledge of the solicitors the sale had been induced by the fraudulent misrepresentations of the vendor, and the purchaser was awarded damages against the vendor on the basis of the difference between the purchase price and the value of the property as it stood without amenities the existence of which the vendor had represented. In reply to a requisition for the official search in respect of the property the solicitors received a letter from the clerk to the local council stating that " no plans have been approved by the council for the bungalow referred to in your requisition." The solicitors informed the vendor who stated that he personally would obtain the necessary approval and " make it right for " the purchaser, but they did not inform the purchaser and he completed the purchase without knowledge that no plans had been approved for the original erection of the bungalow and that, therefore, the local council might require it to be pulled down. In an action for damages for negligence against the solicitors :

HELD : (i) it was the solicitors' duty to communicate the information to the prospective purchaser and not merely to see that he obtained a good title, and, having failed to do so, they were liable for damages.

(ii) the measure of damages was the difference between the value of the property as it stood with a " secure " building, and its value as diminished by the possibility that the local council might require the building to be pulled down.

ACTION for damages against the first defendant for fraudulent misrepresentation, against the second defendants for negligence, and against both defendants for breach of contract.

The plaintiff bought from the first defendant for the sum of £880 two plots of land near Pollington in the West Riding of Yorkshire. One plot was part of a field on which there were six buildings—a brick building, which it was intended to convert into a bungalow, an air raid shelter, and four Nissen huts. The second defendants were a firm of solicitors practising in Harrogate who acted for both the first defendant and the plaintiff in the conveyance of the property. The land had been requisitioned by the Air Ministry during the war and the buildings had been erected to house Royal Air Force personnel. When the land was released from requisition the first defendant accepted the buildings in lieu of compensation, and in March, 1946, he signed a document which stated : " It is also understood that the Air Ministry can give no guarantee that the said huts or structures disposed of out of the services comply with the bye-laws, planning or requirements of the local government authorities or statutory undertaking concerned." The water and electricity supply to the site had been cut off on de-requisition and the first defendant knew that his chances of having those services provided in the future were extremely small. The drains emptied on another field owned by the first defendant. An estate agent acting on behalf of the first defendant, replying to an inquiry from the plaintiff about the property stated that the " bungalow stands on one acre of land and has water, electricity and main drainage laid on." When inspecting the property the plaintiff told the first defendant that he required a place for his wife to live in, and that, having no money with which to buy the bungalow, he would have to sell his own house at Bexhill to put down the necessary purchase price. The first defendant told the plaintiff that " hot and cold water will be on, on putting the internal fittings in, such as boilers and baths," that he had an undertaking that a water supply would be continued by the local authority, that the supply of electricity would be continued by the local electricity undertaking, and that drainage was laid on. The first defendant made these statements knowing them to be untrue and intending the plaintiff to be influenced by them when contemplating buying the property. PRITCHARD, J., held that these were fraudulent misrepresentations, and that the estate agent was acting as the first defendant's agent when making his representations which were untrue to the knowledge of the first defendant.

On Aug. 15, 1946, the plaintiff paid a deposit of £88 to the estate agent and on Sept. 18, a conveyance was executed and a further £352 was paid, the balance of £440 remaining on mortgage with the first defendant. On Nov. 6 the plaintiff accepted an offer for the sale of his house in Bexhill. On Nov. 15 he was informed by the Goole Rural District Council that the plans submitted by him for the conversion of the bungalow into a dwelling-house did not comply with the council's byelaws and that the council were unable to approve the plans, but, in view of the shortage of housing accommodation, they were prepared to allow the conversion for a period of one year, after which, unless the period was extended, the building would have to be pulled down. On Jan. 9, 1947, the plaintiff received a letter informing him that his application for electricity to be supplied to the property had been deferred. On Mar. 2, 1947, the plaintiff was informed by the Goole Rural District Council that the plans for the proposed conversion of the bungalow into a dwelling-house were rejected, primarily because no water supply or means of disposal of sewage were available.

PRITCHARD, J., gave judgment for the plaintiff against the first defendant and awarded him £210 damages as representing the difference between the purchase price of £880 and the value of the property as it stood. He disallowed a claim against the first defendant for damages in respect of £41 4*s*. 9*d*. costs paid by the plaintiff to the second defendants in connection with the conveyance, but he awarded damages amounting to £170 2*s*. and £35 6*s*. 6*d*. expended by the plaintiff for accommodation for his wife and family after leaving Bexhill and for the storage of furniture. The facts with respect to the second defendants, against whom judgment was also given, appear in the judgment.

Jellinek and J. A. Peck for the first defendant.

Heathcote-Williams, K.C., and S. N. Bernstein for the second defendants.

PRITCHARD, J. : In 1946 the plaintiff, Horace Travers Lake, bought from the first defendant, George Heads Bushby, for the sum of £880, two plots of land near the village of Pollington in the West Riding of Yorkshire. One of those two plots was part of a field, on which there were six buildings described in the conveyance to the plaintiff as a brick bungalow, an air raid shelter, and four Nissen huts. The plaintiff alleges against the first defendant that he was induced to enter into the contract to buy this property by certain fraudulent misrepresentations made by the first defendant, and by an estate agent called Stacey who, the plaintiff alleges, was acting as the agent of the first defendant, and he claims damages against the first defendant for fraudulent misrepresentation. He does not claim rescission of the contract or conveyance. The second defendants, Atkinson, McCall & Co., are a firm of solicitors practising in Harrogate.

They acted for the first defendant and for the plaintiff in connection with the conveyance of the property. The plaintiff alleges that these solicitors were negligent in their conduct of his affairs and from them he claims damages for negligence.

[His Lordship stated the facts relating to the sale by the first defendant of the property to the plaintiff, held that the sale had been induced by a fraudulent misrepresentation, assessed damages against the first defendant at £415 8*s*. 6*d*., and continued :] I now come to that part of the case which concerns the second defendants, the solicitors, Atkinson, McCall & Co. On Aug. 15, 1946, when the plaintiff confirmed his bargain in the letter which he sent to the estate agent with the deposit of £88, he made the request that the first defendant's solicitors should act for him " in this matter," and on the same day, by letter, he retained the second defendants in the following terms :

> " Dear Sirs, I have negotiated the purchase of a property at Long Lane, Pollington, Yorks., belonging to your client, Mr. Bushby, through Captain N. T. Stacey, estate agent, 1 Cambridge Road, Harrogate, and it would be greatly appreciated if you would act on my behalf in connection with the conveyance and registration of the property and the arranging of the mortgage loan with the present owner, Mr. Bushby."

The plaintiff goes on to say that he understands Mr. Stacey has forwarded to the second defendants a copy of his letter dated Aug. 15, 1946. By a letter dated Aug. 17, the second defendants make it clear that they had received a letter from Mr. Stacey, and by a letter on the same day they accept the plaintiff's retainer in these terms :

> " We are obliged for your instructions to act for you in the purchase of this property, and shall be glad to prepare the conveyance and mortgage herein."

I am satisfied that at that time Mr. McCall (the partner in the defendant firm who was acting in this matter for the plaintiff and for the first defendant) knew the contents of the letter which the plaintiff had written on Aug. 15 to Mr. Stacey, and from Mr. McCall's own evidence I am satisfied that he also learned from Mr. Stacey that the plaintiff proposed to convert into a dwelling-house the building described as a bungalow on the land which the plaintiff was buying. On Aug. 26, 1946, the second defendants sent to the plaintiff a contract for signature. On Aug. 27 the plaintiff signed it, and then there followed, on Sept. 4 and 8, the two letters on which the plaintiff's case is founded. On Sept. 4 the solicitors wrote to the clerk to the Goole Rural District Council enclosing a requisition for the official search in respect of the property and the fee. In reply to that letter, on Sept. 8, 1946, the solicitors received from the clerk to the council the following letter :

> " I enclose herewith receipt and certificate of search under the Land Charges Act, 1925. With reference to field No. 60, no plans have been approved by the council for the bungalow referred to in your requisition."

It is the plaintiff's case that that information was never communicated to him by Mr. McCall, that Mr. McCall's failure to communicate that information amounts to negligence, and that in consequence of that negligence he (the plaintiff) has suffered damage. That, therefore, involves consideration of these three questions.

The first question which I have to decide is whether Mr. McCall communicated that information to the plaintiff ? [His Lordship referred to the evidence and found that Mr. McCall did not communicate the information to the plaintiff.] The next question is : Was it Mr. McCall's duty to communicate that information to the plaintiff ? Counsel for the second defendants contended it was not and that the position was that the bargain was struck by the plaintiff with the first defendant before he retained the second defendants, as appeared from the terms of the retainer itself, which was a retainer merely to convey property which had already been bought. The second defendants' duty, therefore, went no further than to see that their client got a good title, which, it is admitted, he did get. In support of these contentions counsel cited Pitman v. Francis (1), Scholes v. Brook (2), Lewis v. Collard (3), Brindsen v. Williams (4) and Barker v. Gambrill (5). I have considered all these cases, the terms of the retainer, the terms in which it was accepted, and the terms in which the second defendants rendered their account for their services. I have also considered what Mr. McCall says he did on receiving information from the rural district council as recorded in a letter of June 9, 1947, from Mr. McCall to the plaintiff's present solicitors. Mr. McCall says that on receiving the information from the clerk to the Goole Rural District Council : A B

> " We immediately got in touch with the vendor and he replied that this might be so but that he personally would obtain the necessary approval and 'make it right for Major Lake,' adding that 'if everything is not exactly as he wants, I will make it right for him '."

Mr. McCall says he did that on Sept. 10 or 11, 1946, immediately after getting the information. In my judgment, after consideration of all those matters and in spite of the decisions and the arguments which counsel for the second defendants put before me, there was a duty on Mr. McCall to communicate this information, not only to the vendor, who was one of his clients, but to the purchaser, the plaintiff, who was the other of his clients, and I think that, by not doing so, he failed in the duty which he owed to the plaintiff. C D

That gives rise to the third question : Has the plaintiff shown that he suffered damage in consequence of this negligence ? That is the part of the case I have found extremely difficult. Counsel for the second defendants cited to me Davies v. Lock (6), Bean v. Wade (7) and Groom v. Crocker (8). These authorities show beyond doubt that the duty which a solicitor owes to his client arises ex contractu, and apart from the contract between him and his client the duty does not exist at all. The damages the client is entitled to recover must, therefore, be considered on that basis. In Victoria Laundry (Windsor), Ltd. v. Newman Industries, Ltd. (9), ASQUITH, L.J., said ([1949] 1 All E.R. 1002) : E

> " . . . the aggrieved party is only entitled to recover such part of the loss actually resulting as was at the time of the contract reasonably foreseeable as liable to result from the breach." F

Applying that principle to this case, it seems to me that the loss which resulted from the breach was that the plaintiff completed his contract and thereby suffered the damage which I have held he is entitled to recover against the first defendant, namely, £415 8*s*. 6*d*. If, however, I were to hold that that damage was reasonably foreseeable by Mr. McCall as liable to result from the breach of duty I should, in effect, be holding that Mr. McCall knew, or ought to have known, of the first defendant's fraudulent misrepresentations and that Mr. McCall knew that before the completion date the plaintiff was selling his house at Bexhill, and I am satisfied that Mr. McCall did not know either of those things. Therefore, the damages which may be recoverable against the second defendants must be considered on a wholly different basis from the damages which I have held are recoverable against the first defendant, because the latter are entirely related to the first defendant's fraudulent misrepresentations and to the knowledge which the first defendant had about the plaintiff's project in selling his Bexhill house. Neither of these matters was known to Mr. McCall. G H

The proper way to approach the question of damages for Mr. McCall's breach of contract is this. When Mr. McCall had received the letter of Sept. 8, 1946, from the Goole Rural District Council he ought to have realised that the bungalow was in danger of being pulled down because no plans had been submitted for its erection. He thus had knowledge which I am satisfied the plaintiff did not possess, the plaintiff having been deceived by the first defendant into believing that there was no danger of the bungalow being pulled down on the ground that its original erection had never been authorised. If the plaintiff had been told of the contents of the letter of Sept. 8 he would have appreciated the danger and would not have bought the land. The result is that the plaintiff bought for £880 land plus what I may call a secure building and what he got was land plus a threatened building, and, if it is possible to arrive at a figure which represents his loss calculated in that way, that is the figure which the second defendants ought to pay in respect of the damage occasioned by their breach of duty. In arriving at a figure, I have had regard to these considerations. This building has been said to be worth £200 as it stands. I have tried to assess the chances of its being pulled down. I have in mind the answer which the clerk to the Goole Rural District Council gave to a question which I put to him : " The truth of this matter is that the council did not want any of these buildings occupied at all, did they ? " and the clerk candidly admitted that that was the attitude of the council. They wanted to be rid of these mushroom growths which had sprung up at the instance of the various service authorities during the war years, and, therefore, I think there is considerable chance of this building being pulled down. On the other hand, if it is pulled down, the plaintiff, although he has lost the prospect of a dwelling-house, has also been saved the expense of converting it into a dwelling-house. No one has told me what that would cost. [HIS LORDSHIP then assessed damages against the second defendants at £100.]

Judgment for the plaintiff against both defendants with costs.

BELCHER AND OTHERS v. READING CORPORATION.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Romer, J.), October 25, 26, 27, 28, November 15, 1949.]

Housing—House of local authority—Rent—Increase—" Reasonable charges "—Maintenance of balance between ratepayers as a whole and tenants—Duty to consider " rents ordinarily payable by persons of the working classes in the locality "—Housing Act, 1936 (c. 51), s. 83 (1), s. 85 (5).

By the Housing Act, 1936, s. 83 (1) : " The general management, regulation, and control of houses provided by a local authority under this Part of this Act shall be vested in and exercised by the authority, and the authority may make such reasonable charges for the tenancy or occupation of the houses as they may determine." By s. 85 (5) : " In fixing rents the authority shall take into consideration the rents ordinarily payable by persons of the working classes in the locality . . . "

Between 1919 and 1939 the local authority built a large number of houses, which were let at varying rentals according to the accommodation and amenities provided. From the tenants' point of view, these rents compared very favourably with the rents paid by tenants of similar houses which were privately owned. On Nov. 14, 1947, the borough treasurer submitted to the authority's housing sub-committee reports showing (a) on the basis of the rents then paid by the council tenants, a steadily rising deficiency on the housing repair account from 1948/1949 onwards culminating in a deficit of over £70,000 by Mar. 31, 1953, but, on the basis of a proposed revision of rents, a surplus from 1949/1950 onwards ; (b) a future deficit of formidable proportions on the housing revenue account if the rents remained unaltered, but a constantly increasing accumulated surplus from 1948/1949 if a proposed revision of rents was adopted. At a meeting on Nov. 17, 1947, the housing sub-committee agreed with the borough treasurer's recommendations and reported accordingly to the housing A committee, and on Nov. 24, 1947, the housing committee approved and adopted the report of the sub-committee recommending the increases of rent. At each of these meetings the committee, before arriving at their decision, considered the question of the rents paid for similar accommodation in Reading by tenants of privately-owned houses, and discussed the interests of the ratepayers as a whole as well as those of the council tenants. After B meeting deputations, of the tenants, who objected to the increases, the housing committee, at a meeting on Dec. 30, 1947, decided to reduce by one third the increases originally proposed, but the reduced increases were also resisted by the tenants, who contended that the decisions of the local authority, through their housing committee on Nov. 24 and Dec. 30, 1947, were ultra vires and void, on the grounds (i) that the increased rents were C not " reasonable," within the meaning of s. 83 (1) of the Act of 1936, in that (inter alia) (a) certain outgoings had been discharged from the housing revenue account which ought to have been borne by the ratepayers as a whole, with the result that the account was wrongly reduced, and, (b) the creation of a surplus in the account ought to be done at the expense of the ratepayers as a whole, and not at the expense of the council tenants ; (ii) D in making the decisions the authority did not apply their minds to the requirements of s. 85 (5) of the Act of 1936.

Held : (i) the question whether the local authority's decision to raise the rents could be impeached, as being in conflict with s. 83 (1) of the Act of 1936, depended not on whether it might have been preferable to charge this or that item against the ratepayers as a whole, or to have apportioned E it in some manner between them and the tenants, but on whether the increased rents were " reasonable," as s. 83 (1) required them to be. In dealing with these matters, it was the authority's duty, so far as possible, to maintain a balance between the interests of the ratepayers as a whole and those of the council tenants, having due regard to any specific requirements of the Housing Acts, and the policy of the local authority did not per se support F any suggestion of unreasonableness on their part or any failure to take into account any consideration which they ought to have taken into account for the purpose of maintaining this balance.

(ii) the description " working classes " having a far wider, and less certain, signification than it used to possess, it was immaterial that some of the occupants of privately-owned houses of a similar kind might be G " black-coated workers," and, on the facts, it was clear that the question of the rents payable by members of the " working classes " in the district was considered at the meetings held on Nov. 17 and 24, 1947.

(iii) therefore, (a) the obligation imposed by s. 85 (5) of the Act of 1936 was fully observed, and (b) the increased rents were " reasonable," as required by s. 83 (1), and, accordingly, the local authority's decisions of H Nov. 24, 1947, and Dec. 30, 1947, to raise the rents were not ultra vires, either under s. 83 (1) or under s. 85 (5) of the Act of 1936, or for any other reason.

Per curiam : there was no legal sanction whatsoever, in the Housing Acts or elsewhere, for the view that tenants who had occupied council houses over a period of years were, or should be, immune from any rent increase.

[EDITORIAL NOTE : By s. 1 of and sched. I to the Housing Act, 1949, which was enacted on July 30, 1949, references to the "working classes" have been removed from certain provisions of the Housing Act, 1936, "so as to enable account to be taken of the housing conditions and housing needs of all members of the community." As a result of these amendments, a local authority, in fixing rents of council houses, no longer has a duty, under s. 85 (5) of the Act of 1936, to "take into consideration the rents ordinarily payable by persons of the working classes in the locality."

ACTION by five council house tenants of the Reading Corporation, suing on behalf of themselves and some 3,140 other tenants, claiming (a) a declaration that two decisions of the corporation, through their housing committee, comprised in resolutions passed on Nov. 24 and Dec. 30, 1947, under which the rents of the council houses were increased, were ultra vires and void under the Housing Act, 1936, s. 83 (1) and s. 85 (5), and (b) an injunction to restrain the corporation from claiming and collecting the increased rents. ROMER, J., held that the decisions were not ultra vires, and gave judgment for the corporation. The facts appear in the judgment.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 15. ROMER, J., read the following judgment. This action is brought by five council house tenants of the defendant corporation, and they are suing on behalf of themselves and a number of other tenants, some 3,140 in all. They claim that two decisions of the corporation, through their housing committee, under which the rents of the council houses were increased, are ultra vires and void.

The houses with which I am concerned were all built between the two great wars. They afford varying degrees of accommodation and amenities, and, accordingly, command varying rentals. On Nov. 14, 1947, the defendants' borough treasurer, Mr. Clifford Jones, submitted to the housing management and rent sub-committee three finance reports dealing respectively with the housing repairs account, the housing revenue account and a review of rents. Mr. Clifford Jones also enclosed with his reports a copy of the borough architect's report on housing repairs. This latter report submitted a reasoned estimate of annual expenditure amounting to £32,050 in relation to the council houses under the headings of internal re-decoration, external re-painting, fencing, paths, renewals of various kinds and odd repairs. The housing sub-committee were meeting on Nov. 17 and it was in anticipation of this meeting that the borough treasurer submitted the reports which I have mentioned. In his report on the housing repairs account, the treasurer, after referring to the statutory provisions relevant thereto and to certain matters of past history, proceeded as follows :

> "3. Expenditure from the account. The expenditure chargeable to the account is the actual cost of repairs executed. The fund must, however, be sufficient to meet long term repairs and replacements, and should have an increasing balance, especially in view of the progressively increasing liability for repairs on older properties. 4. Reading housing repairs account. (i) In 1931, the council decided not to insure their corporation houses in respect of fire risks and a special contribution based on ½ per cent. of gross > rents has been made to the repairs account since 1931/32 and earmarked for fire insurance purposes. The council has no legal authority to set up a fire insurance fund, and the fire insurance fund is, therefore, an unofficial allocation of the repairs account. This must be the case until local Act powers are obtained. (ii) It will be seen from table I (attached) that the expenditure on the repairs account rose sharply from £14,405 in 1945/46 to £21,848 in 1946/7. This is an increase of £7,443, approximately 52 per cent. of the 1945/6 expenditure, and equivalent to a rise of £144 in A weekly expenditure on repairs. The reasons for the increase in expenditure are explained in the borough architect's report, but may briefly be stated as follows : (a) Repairs deferred during war years, which it is estimated will take ten years to complete. (b) Increased labour costs. (c) Increased cost of materials. 5. Proposed increase in repairs contribution. To cover the B deficiency on the account and to help to re-build the balance, it will be necessary to double the pre-war contributions from housing revenue account. The contributions will then be : non-parlour two bedroom houses, flats and maisonettes, £7 per house, etc., per annum ; non-parlour three bedroom houses, £8 per house per annum ; all other types of houses, £9 per house per annum. Table II shows the effect of the increased contributions over the C next five years. If the repairs contribution is increased from Apr. 1, 1948, the balance of the repairs account at Mar. 31, 1948, would be £7,036 in hand. Of this figure, £5,890 relates to the fire insurance fund."

Table I (attached to the said report) showed, inter alia, an excess of expenditure over income on the housing repairs account for the year 1946/7 of £7,967. Table II, which was described as "Estimated position of housing repairs account D 1947/8 to 1952/3," showed, on the basis of the then current contributions, a steadily rising deficiency from 1948/9 onwards, culminating in a deficit of £70,181 by Mar. 31, 1953. On the basis of the proposed revised contributions, however, the table showed a surplus on the account from 1949/50 onwards, and a surplus balance of £13,617 in March, 1953.

The borough treasurer's report on the housing revenue account began by E drawing the housing sub-committee's attention to certain matters affecting the account in the Housing Act, 1936. It then set out a table of expenditure and income for the years 1939/40 to 1946/7 inclusive and of surpluses and deficits. It appeared from this table that the surplus on the account as at Mar. 31, 1947, was £1,294. There then followed an estimate of income and expenditure on the account for 1947/8 to 1950/51 inclusive. This showed a future deficit of formidable F proportions on the account if the rents remained unaltered, but a constantly increasing accumulated surplus from 1948/9 if the proposed revision of rents was adopted. The report then dealt with one of the matters of which complaint is made in this action, viz., the salaries of the technical staff of the borough surveyor's and borough architect's departments. The report said :

> G "Such staff is engaged on architectural, technical and supervisory work, surveys, preparation of plans, etc., in connection with the lay-out and preliminary work on the new housing estates. Unfortunately, the Ministry of Health has ruled, in granting loan sanctions, that 'no part of the salary or wages of the council's permanent staff (including employees) ordinarily charged to revenue account should be defrayed out of loan moneys . . .' The H borough surveyor and borough architect have advised me of the percentages of salaries of their departments which they consider should be charged to housing, and, in view of the Ministry's ruling above, the present position is that no part of the salaries can be financed by loan and the whole amount must, therefore, be financed out of revenue moneys, although it is in respect of capital expenditure."

The amount so charged was £5,200 for the year 1946/7 and was estimated at £5,300 for each of the three following years. The report then proceeded as follows :

> " 7. Unproductive loan charges. The loan charges on unproductive sites during the next three years are estimated to be as follows : 1947-48, £2,280 ; 1948-49, £1,360 ; 1949-50, £630. This includes loan charges on the basis of the completion of all schemes at present under way with the exception of Emmer Green which is estimated up to the end of October. If work on this site is continued, the amended figures will be as follows : 1947-48 £2,750 ; 1948-49, £3,550 ; 1949-50, £3,220. 8. Methods of covering deficit. The deficit remaining in the revenue account can be met from two sources, viz., general rate fund, or increased rents. If the whole deficit was to be met from rents, the effect is set out in the attached rents schedule (table I). If the increase in repairs account contributions is deferred until 1948-49, the deficit to be borne by general rate fund in 1947-48 will be reduced from £5,607 to £1,000. 9. Alternatives to flat rent increases. If the committee decide that additional contributions should be made from general rate fund in order to ease rent increases, the effects of reducing the rent increases by 1/6th and 1/3rd are shown below. Reduction of proposed rent increases by 1/6th : 1947-48, deficiency for year, £7,833 ; 1948-49, surplus for year, £2,541 ; 1949-50, surplus for year, £7,072 ; 1950-51, surplus for year, £9,198 ; 1951-52, surplus for year, £9,217. Reduction of proposed rent increases by 1/3rd : 1947-48, deficiency for year, £9,907 ; 1948-49, deficiency for year, £4,375 ; 1949-50, deficiency for year, £331 ; 1950-51, surplus for year, £1,642 ; 1951-52, surplus for year, £1,661. 10. Tenants of pre-war houses. The balance on the housing revenue account at Mar. 31, 1945, was £16,759 and this surplus was contributed partially by government grants, statutory rate contributions and by the tenants of the 3,140 dwellings built under pre-war schemes. This surplus has since that date been used on technical staff and unproductive loan charges on post-war housing schemes and, to the extent of £3,800 only, on increased cost of managements, i.e., approximately £12,900 was spent on new schemes."

A table was attached to this report showing in detail the numbers and types of the council houses, the increases in their rents if the whole, alternatively five sixths, alternatively two thirds, of the suggested rent increases of approximately 50 per cent. were brought into operation, and the resulting net rents and inclusive rents. The report also annexed a statement indicating the net rents fixed by neighbouring authorities in comparision with those applying in Reading. Finally, in the report on " Review of Rents," the borough treasurer dealt with the problem of the " pooling " of rents, but it is not necessary for me to notice this in any detail.

At their meeting on Nov 17, 1947, the housing sub-committee, after a discussion which was the subject of oral evidence before me, agreed with the borough treasurer's recommendations and submitted a report to the housing committee, who were meeting on Nov. 24, 1947. This report, after referring to the borough treasurer's report on the housing repairs account and to the borough architect's estimate as aforesaid of £32,050 per annum on the maintenance of council houses, said :

> " We are in agreement with the borough architect's suggestion and recommend that, in future, the expenditure from the housing repairs account be based on the figures mentioned above. In order to cover the estimated deficiency on the account and to re-build a reasonable balance, we are of opinion that it will be necessary to double the pre-war scale of contributions from the housing revenue account and we accordingly recommend that, as from Apr. 1 next, these contributions should be . . . " as had been suggested in the borough surveyor's report. The housing sub-committee's report then adverted to the housing revenue account and to the borough treasurer's report thereon, and pointed out that the latter :

> " . . . showed that from 1939/40 to 1943/44 there was a continued increase in the accumulated surplus (from £6,250 to £17,054), but that in the past three years this surplus had been reduced to £1,294 and that, if the necessary contribution to the housing repairs account were made to cover the programme outlined in the borough architect's report, there would be a net deficit of £18,203 at the end of the current year which could be met in two ways, namely, (a) from the general rate fund or (b) by an increase in rents. We have carefully considered the two alternatives and are of the opinion that the deficit should be made up by raising the rents. With a view, however, to mitigating the effect which a substantial increase in rent may have on many of the tenants, we have considered the following suggestions, namely :—(a) that a portion of these increases should be met from the rates ; (b) that rent rebates might be made in appropriate cases. In regard to (a), the borough treasurer has shown that if, for instance, the flat rent increases were reduced by 1/6th or 1/3rd the effect would be as follows . . . "

The report then set out the figures.

> " In regard to (b), we are opposed in principle to the granting of any rebates which would have the effect of charging differing rents for houses of the same type. The borough treasurer's report also included a table showing the various rents charged by certain other authorities in the South of England and we noted that the present level of rents in Reading was below the average of the authorities quoted. After carefully considering all the above factors, we have come to the conclusion that a general increase in rents is the method which should be adopted to produce the necessary additional income for the housing revenue account and we accordingly recommend that the rents of the council houses be increased in accordance with the following scale and that the necessary notice be given to the tenants so that such increases can take effect forthwith."

The scale set out was in conformity with the borough treasurer's full suggestion for rent increases and with the resulting figures set forth in his report. The sub-committee's report then continued :

> " The effect of raising the rents in the current year and delaying the commencement of the increased contribution to the housing repairs account until Apr. 1 next will be to produce (a) a net deficit in the housing revenue account at the end of the current year amounting to £1,150 which must be met from the rates ; (b) a surplus of £8,208 at the end of 1948/49 ; and (c) an accumulated surplus increasing thereafter at the rate of approximately £15,000 per annum. This surplus may, however, be required (a) to meet a further increased contribution to the housing repairs fund and (b) to cover additional charges to the housing revenue account in respect of new schemes and higher costs."

The report then referred to the question of pooling the rents of all the council houses, but recommended that that matter should be deferred for the time being. At their meeting on Nov. 24, 1947, the housing committee resolved (i) that the sub-committee's proceedings and recommendations be approved and adopted, and (ii) that a general review of rents of council houses be undertaken in due course and that the borough treasurer be requested to report thereon to the housing sub-committee as soon as possible.

The decision to increase the rents created considerable resentment and indignation in the minds of the corporation's tenants. Two deputations were received by the corporation on their behalf and the views both of landlords and tenants were exchanged on the subject of the rent increases. These deputations appeared before the housing committee on Dec. 22, 1947, the first of them being led by the plaintiff, Mr. Belcher. Mr. Belcher told the committee that the tenants were convinced that any increase would create a real hardship to the majority of tenants and result in a lowering of their standard of living and that certain charges which had been in part responsible for the council's decision ought properly to be thrown on the ratepayers as a whole and not on the shoulders of the tenants alone. Mr. Belcher also produced what was described as an "average weekly budget for man, wife and two children based on actual rations, points values, and utility prices" and which showed that such a man, receiving £4 18*s.* 8*d.* a week and paying 15*s.* weekly for rent, would have nothing left over for luxuries, or even for such amenities as newspapers, stationery and stamps, holidays, cigarettes, etc., after paying for his own and his family's food and other necessities.

As a result of these dissident views, the housing committee re-considered the position and ultimately met again on Dec. 30, 1947. The following are the minutes of that meeting:

> "Council houses: rents. The committee resumed consideration of the rents of the various council houses and, having had regard to the possible hardships which might be caused by the imposition at the present time of the full increases of rent previously decided upon and to the impending review of rents called for by the committee at their meeting on Nov. 24, 1947, Resolved: (1) That the rents of the council houses be so adjusted: (a) that the surplus at present anticipated in the housing revenue account for the year ending Mar. 31, 1949, be not provided, and (b) that no provision be made in the housing revenue account to meet the cost of unremunerative loan charges on the purchase of land, the construction of roads and sewers and the erection of buildings during such period as such estates remain unproductive. (2) That the increases of rent authorised by the committee at their meeting on Nov. 24, 1947, be varied as follows: Previous increase authorised, 5*s.* 3*d.* per week; amended increase, 3*s.* 6*d.* Previous increase, 4*s.* 6*d.* per week; amended increase, 3*s.* Previous increase, 4*s.* per week; amended increase, 2*s.* 8*d.* M.A.P. bungalows, 4*s.* per week; amended increase, 1*s.* 4*d.* (3) That the amended increases of rent now authorised take effect from Jan. 19, 1948, and that the town clerk be instructed to inform all corporation tenants accordingly."

The committee, accordingly, departed from the full increases of rent contemplated by the borough treasurer's report, and qualified their previous decision of Nov. 24 by freeing the tenants from the incumbrance of idle loan charges on lands, roads, sewers and buildings and by abandoning the anticipated surplus at Mar. 31, 1949. As a result of these alleviations, the committee was able to reduce by one third the increases of rent originally proposed. These reduced increases, however, did not prove acceptable to the council tenants and they continued with a rent strike which they had already organised in protest against the original decision of Nov. 24. This strike continued until February, 1948, when it was called off. On July 6, 1948, the writ in this action was issued, challenging the validity of both of the decisions to which I have referred.

It would at this point be convenient to refer to the provisions of the Housing Acts which are relevant to the matters in issue. I do not propose to read these provisions in detail, but will give the references to the sections—the Housing Act, 1936, s. 83 (1), s. 85 (1), (5) and (6), s. 114, s. 128, s. 129, s. 131, s. 133, and sched. VIII; the Housing (Financial and Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1946, s. 21 (3) and (4); the Housing Act, 1949, s. 1 and sched. I. The case of the tenants, as pleaded and as presented to me in argument, was that the decisions of the corporation, acting through their housing committee, which were comprised in the resolutions passed on Nov. 24 and Dec. 30, 1947, were ultra vires and void. It is said that the rent increases effected by these resolutions are not "reasonable," as they are required by s. 83 (1) of the Act of 1936 to be, and it is said also that the corporation, when arriving at their decisions, ignored the requirements of s. 85 (5) of the same statute. I will consider in detail these arguments, and the manner in which they were elaborated, after I have referred to the oral evidence which was called before me.

The only witness called by the tenants was Mr. Percy Belcher himself. He has occupied for many years one of the defendant corporation's council houses, and the result of the resolution of Dec. 30, 1947, was to increase his rent by 3*s.* a A week. He said in evidence that he had done decorative work on his house during the war and many of the other tenants had done the same. He referred also to bad workmanship in the building of his and other council houses and gave particulars of what he had in mind. He also confirmed the accuracy of the budget which he produced at the deputation to the housing committee and to B which I have earlier referred. In cross-examination, he said that his present salary as general secretary of the Tobacco Workers Union is £700 per annum, but that that is far in excess of the wages of the average council house tenant on the corporation's estates, which he estimated at about £4 18*s.* a week. When asked whether the general minimum standard of wages in this country to-day is more than double what it was in 1939, he did not agree and thought that the increase was roughly 78 per cent. C In Mr. Belcher's speech to the housing committee as a member of the deputation which they received he had said :

> "Having carefully considered all the circumstances surrounding your decision to increase our rents, we are here to state that we feel that not only are these increases totally unjustified, but that any increase falls within the same category." D

With regard to this statement, Mr. Belcher was asked in cross-examination :

> "Q.—So your attitude is this : I am not interested in whether these figures are reasonable or not ; I say I have an absolute right to have a fixed rent. That was your attitude, was it not ? A.—On the basis that the houses were 24 years old and that most of the tenants have been there for 24 years, yes. E
> Q.—That is your attitude : We are entitled to stay on at the same rent and under no circumstances ought our rent to be increased. That is your attitude ? A.—Yes, at that time.
> Q.—And it is still your attitude ? A.—Yes."

At the close of the tenants' case, counsel for the corporation intimated that, F but for one consideration, he would have been content to call no evidence and to argue merely that, in view of the relevant statutory provisions and of such facts as my attention had been drawn to by the tenants, he had no case to answer. The dispute between the corporation and their council house tenants which culminated in these proceedings had, however, attracted much publicity, and the corporation were desirous of making manifest that the decisions at G which they had arrived, and which the tenants were attacking, were entirely in order and reflected their desire, and were in fulfilment of their duty, to preserve a proper balance between their tenants, on the one hand, and the general body of ratepayers, on the other, and they were anxious, therefore, by the production of oral and other evidence, to justify their decisions to the full. Evidence was, accordingly, called. H

The corporation's first witness was their borough treasurer, Mr. Clifford Jones. He said that he was present at the meeting of the housing sub-committee which was held on Nov. 17, 1947, and that he went through the three reports which he had submitted, and which I have previously mentioned, with the sub-committee. He was then asked :

> "Q.—Do you remember whether you read to them s. 85 (5) [of the Housing Act, 1936] which, you see, is set out there ? A.—I cannot remember > whether I actually read the extract from the section, but I definitely told them the point.

> Q.—Would you tell my Lord what you told them ? A.—I told them that they must take into consideration rent ordinarily payable by persons of the working classes in the locality.
>
> Q.—Had they, to your knowledge, got any information which would enable them to take that into consideration ? A.—Yes.
> Q.—Just tell my Lord, generally speaking, what that was. A.—Some of the members know it through their membership of the sub-committee. In dealing with applicants for houses, they often go into the rents they pay. Some of the members are, of course, themselves landlords of their own properties. Others are members of other committees, such as the valuation committee and the assessment committee, which deal with rents, and at that time of the public assistance committee . . . and generally I took the view that they knew rents in various other ways. They know it through membership of the council, because various committees of the council do own properties, which are let, and from time to time the rents come before them."

Mr. Clifford Jones was then asked about the sum of £6,500 which was earmarked in the housing repairs account to fire risk. He said :

> " We pay into that account the fixed contribution per house for the normal repairs and we pay in addition an amount which has been calculated as roughly equivalent to what we would have to pay if we insured outside by way of premium. That amount is also put into this account annually from housing revenue account, and it has been the custom in Reading to keep the accumulated balance of what is called the fire insurance side of the repairs account separately from the other balance of the account. In other words, the balance of the account is shown, but inset we show the sub-division.
> Q.—How would that money ever be expended ? Could it ever be expended on anything other than repairs to houses ? A.—No."

Mr. Clifford Jones then explained that the amount they transferred each year was calculated to be roughly what the premium would be if they effected a fire insurance policy with an outside insurance company, and, if they had done that, it would have made no difference to the deficit of the housing repairs account. He then explained the charges for salaries of staff and also the charge of extra salaries of employees absent on war service and, with regard to the latter, said that they were always charged to the account to which their salary when they were not on war service was charged. The total of these extra salaries amounted to something over £900 in all.

With regard to the meeting of the housing committee on Nov. 24, Mr. Clifford Jones said that he was present at it and that the committee considered and discussed the question of rent increases for about an hour before arriving at their decision. He said that at the meeting on Nov. 17 the sub-committee discussed two rents which were introduced by members of the corporation, and they also frequently discussed at the meeting the points of view of ratepayers who were already paying higher rents than the council house tenants for less satisfactory accommodation. At the meeting on Nov. 24 the committee again discussed these ratepayers' points of view and the waiting list and post-war rents. As to the meeting of the housing committee on Dec. 30, which Mr. Clifford Jones also attended, he said that the committee discussed principally the points put by the delegations and the various angles on the extent to which they could reduce the rent and what reducing the proposed increased rents would mean to the ratepayers.

He was then asked whether, in his capacity of rating and valuation officer for the borough of Reading, he knew anything about the rents of privately-owned working class houses in Reading. He said that he did and that, in the main, the increased council house rents, decided on at the meeting on Dec. 30, 1947, were still below the rents of privately-let estates which were built between the wars. In support of this view, Mr. Clifford Jones produced a statement D.1. (which was supplemented by another statement, D.1A) which he had prepared and which showed that the rents of 2,320 houses built between the wars on the defendant corporation's estates were, with the exception of two groups, below the rents of houses also built between the wars, and having similar accommodation, belonging to private owners. The two exceptions related to non-subsidy houses built on the corporation's Whitley Estate. In cross-examination, Mr. Clifford Jones stated that the corporation are considerate of the position of their tenants and would not raise the rents of their houses merely because the tenants received higher wages than formerly. With regard to his statements D.1. and D.1A, he agreed that many of the council houses shown on it were somewhat older than the privately-owned houses with which they were compared, that the subsidies received by the corporation had to be taken into account as well as the actual rents paid by the tenants, and that some of the privately-owned houses enjoyed amenities which were not enjoyed by the council tenants. In re-examination, Mr. Clifford Jones said that the defendant corporation, in addition to being concerned with the welfare of their tenants, were also very concerned with the ratepayers, the majority of whom are people of comparable means with the tenants of the council houses. With regard to the government subsidies, he said that these are granted to enable the authority to pay off the loans from which the houses are originally built.

The next witness was the borough architect, Mr. Willett, who is responsible (among other things) for the maintenance of existing building estates of the defendant corporation. He told me in evidence that the increase in building costs and wages and materials in 1947 over those prevailing in 1939 has been "rather remarkable." He produced a statement which he had prepared (D.4) to prove it. I need not go into this statement in detail, but it is interesting to note that the cost of external painting in November, 1947, represented an increase of 263.7 per cent. over the cost in August, 1939, whilst with regard to internal re-decoration the comparative percentage increase was nearly 130 for a non-parlour two bedroom house, over 120 for a non-parlour three bedroom house and over 138 for a parlour three bedroom house. Mr. Willett said that he was present at the meeting of the housing sub-committee on Nov. 17, 1947. He was asked :

> "Q.—According to your recollection, during the discussions was any mention made of the question of rents paid by members of the working classes in the neighbourhood or in Reading ? A.—Yes, it was, and I remember quite clearly that, when the borough treasurer read his report, he drew attention to the necessity for that to be taken into consideration."

He said that he was also present at the meeting of the housing committee on Nov. 24, and that there was, again, a very considerable discussion on the report of the housing management sub-committee, which he thought they had in full, and there was certainly discussion about houses in the neighbourhood of the estates. Mr. Willett was cross-examined with a view to showing that not much had been done for some years past by way of re-decorating some of the council houses, and he said that, principally due to the war, there were some houses which had not been re-decorated (except by the tenants) since 1935 or 1936, but that many hundreds had had something done to them internally. He estimated that over 340 houses had been re-decorated since 1947 and that since the end of the war over 2,000 houses had been re-painted externally, 900 of which had been re-painted since November, 1947. In re-examination Mr. Willett said that, as compared with his budget of estimated annual expenditure (£32,050) in his report, nearly £40,000 was in fact spent last year.

Mr. Porter, the deputy town clerk of Reading, said that he was present at the meeting of the housing sub-committee on Nov. 17, 1947. He said:

> "There was quite a lot of discussion about rents of other houses. In the first instance, when the borough treasurer was submitting his reports, he drew the committee's attention to the provisions of the section dealing with rents and then, while the members were discussing the reports, quite a number of them referred to rents that were paid by people for all types of accommodation—I mean houses, rooms or flats. The impression that I got was that these members had information of the rents and that very often those rents were higher than the rents paid for council houses. These were people who were normally on the corporation's housing list too.
> Q.—What about the meeting on Nov. 24 of the housing committee? Did you hear any of the discussion? A.—I did.
>
> Q.—Would you just tell my Lord what you heard there? Was it the same sort of thing? A.—It followed exactly the same lines.
>
> Q.—Then were you present again at the meeting on Dec. 30? A.—Yes.
> Q.—Did you hear any discussion about this topic there? A.—I am not so clear on that."

He adhered to this evidence in cross-examination, though he was unable to enter into any further detail.

The next witness was Mr. Philip Mann, a Fellow of the Royal Institution of Chartered Surveyors and the sole principal of Messrs. Haslam & Son, chartered surveyors, who carry on business in Reading. The firm is a very old-established one and Mr. Mann has been with it for eighteen years. He told me that at the moment he is managing some 530 of what they call artisan dwellings, which are dwellings occupied by the working classes, and since the firm was established they have always had a large weekly rent collection. He said that these dwellings are occupied by exactly the same class of person as those who occupy the corporation's council houses. The houses his firm manages include both pre-1914 houses and houses built between the wars. After describing the pre-1914 houses, he said that most of the between-the-wars houses which he manages were built in 1937 and 1938 and the net rents of the houses are from 11*s.* 6*d.* to 17*s.* 3*d.* Their accommodation comprises in each case a parlour, kitchen, small scullery and three bedrooms, bathroom and w.c. He had prepared a statement (D.7.) setting out particulars of houses from which he collected the rents, and which he knew, and described them according to their blocks. Mr. Mann then said that at the request of the defendant corporation he had inspected some of their council houses and had prepared a statement (D.8.) showing the accommodation and rents of the houses he had seen. He was asked:

> "Q.—Would you tell my Lord what you thought of those houses generally as compared with the houses you manage? A.—I would say that they struck me as being very much better in every way.
> Q.—You have told my Lord that your between-the-wars houses were very much better than your pre-1914. How would these houses compare with your between-the-wars houses? A.—They are very similar, but the corporation houses have a very great advantage over the private enterprise ones that I look after in that they are properly laid out on an estate. There is a great deal more space on the corporation estates. There is more garden and better outlook and surroundings generally. In some cases the corporation houses are bigger than the private enterprise ones."

Mr. Mann was then asked how the rents of the corporation houses compared with the rents of the houses that he managed, and he said that the pre-1914 houses in some cases let for higher rents than the corporation houses and that, with regard to the between-the-wars houses, the rent of the private enterprise house was the same as, or rising to (he thought) 3*s*. 3*d*. more than, the corporation houses. He then illustrated his meaning by reference to the statements D.7. and D.8., and dealt with the matter in some detail. He was then asked :

> " Q.—Generally speaking how would you say the council houses compare with yours on the basis of value for money ? Do you think the council tenants or your tenants are getting the better value for their money ? A.—I would say most certainly the council tenants.
> Q.—Speaking as an estate agent purely, what do you say about these rents that the council are charging ? Do you say that they are fair rents for the type of accommodation offered or would you say they are high or low or how would you describe them ? A.—I should describe them as extremely reasonable rents for the accommodation offered."

In cross-examination, after drawing attention to the fact that the owners of the houses which he was managing were able to make little, if any, profit out of them by reason of rent restriction, Mr. Mann turned to the question of repairs and said :

> " In the old pre-war days, pre-1939, we as agents were rather particular about repairs. We endeavoured to paint the outsides of all our properties at regular intervals of not less than five years, and we invariably re-decorated one room per annum in every house. Since the war that is quite impossible with any of these rents I have got here."

Finally Mr. Norman Martin, senior partner in the firm of Martin & Pole, estate agents, of Reading, was called. His evidence followed on the same lines as, and was confirmatory of, the evidence which had been given by Mr. Mann. He had prepared a statement (D.9) giving particulars of the corporation's council houses which he had inspected, and a further statement (D.10) of certain houses which are under the management of his firm and which he thought would be comparable with those corporation houses. He was asked :

> " Q.—Speaking as an estate agent, and in quite general terms, how would you describe the rents paid in respect of the council houses shown on (D.9)—do you regard them as high, low or average ? A.—I consider them to be very reasonable rents.
> Q.—Why do you express that opinion ? A.—On account of the accommodation that is offered, in comparison with other houses managed by my firm—the amenities and everything that is offered in respect of them.
>
> Q.—Are you acquainted with the accommodation offered for working class people in Reading generally, from your experience as an estate agent ? A.—Yes.
> Q.—How would you say that the rents of these council houses compare with the rents paid by artisans generally in Reading in non-council houses ? A.—They are lower than the general prices paid by other people."

In cross-examination Mr. Martin agreed, as also Mr. Mann had agreed, that he was unaware of the occupations of the tenants of the privately-owned houses. He was clear, however, that they belonged to the working class. It is right that I should say that I was impressed both by Mr. Mann and by Mr. Martin, and I am satisfied that the evidence of these witnesses was entirely reliable.

I must now consider the arguments which were addressed to me on the facts and evidence which I have summarised above. Before, however, doing so, I think it is desirable that I should express my opinion on the view which Mr.

Belcher intimated to the housing committee when he accompanied the deputation which they received and which he repeated in his evidence before me. This view was in no way urged on me by counsel for the tenants in his able argument, but, as it is, apparently, held by some, at least, of the defendant corporation's council house tenants, and may be shared by corporation tenants in other parts of the country, it is right that I should say a word about it. The view is, in brief, that tenants who have occupied council houses over a period of years are, or should be, immune from any rent increase at all. For this view I am quite unable to find any legal warrant or sanction whatsoever, whether in the Housing Acts or otherwise. Parliament has provided the tenants of council houses with the protection of certain safeguards, and some of these fall to be considered in the present proceedings, but to say, e.g., as Mr. Belcher has said, that tenants of council houses built 24 years ago, who have occupied those houses since the beginning, ought not to have their rents increased in any circumstances is to present a point of view which, in my opinion, has no justification at all.

Turning now to the arguments of counsel for the tenants on the question whether the rent increases were "reasonable," the general background of his case can be summarised as follows. He said that s. 83 (1) of the Act of 1936 casts on a local authority, when fixing charges for the tenancy or occupation of council houses, the duty of seeing that those charges are "reasonable", and this means, not only reasonable in the view of the authority, but reasonable in fact. He said that it was the intention of the Housing Acts that local authorities ought not to make a profit out of the letting of their council houses and that it is principally for this reason that such houses are not subject to the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Acts. The argument is that it is the essence of the whole conception of council houses that local authorities are to provide accommodation for the working classes at reasonable rents and that the legislature did not intend a normal business relationship to exist between the local authorities and their working class tenants. The scheme of the Housing Acts, it is said, is that there is a class of persons whose means are such that, without the assistance of the legislature, they would be under great difficulties in the payment of the rent of their houses. Accordingly, the phrase "reasonable charges" in s. 83 (1) of the Act of 1936 requires a different interpretation from that which would be justified in relation to privately-owned dwellings. It is argued that council house tenants have, in their domestic budgets, to relate their outgoings to their income and that this is an essential factor which local authorities ought to bear in mind, and which, it is said, the defendant corporation in the present case did not bear in mind, when fixing the rents which are to be paid by their council house tenants. On this background the tenants formed their general complaint against the corporation who, they say, disregarded the considerations to which I have referred and approached the question of council house rents as an ordinary problem of private estate management, and from the purely economic point of view.

The tenants rely on specific instances of what they contend was the corporation's wrong approach to the economic condition of their housing estates. One of the matters which the housing committee had in mind when increasing the rents at their meeting on Nov. 24, 1947, was the desirability of providing a surplus in the housing revenue account for the year ending Mar. 31, 1949, and succeeding years and the resolution of Dec. 30, 1947, only qualified this intention to the extent of abandoning the proposed surplus as at Mar. 31, 1949. This purpose of building up a surplus in the housing revenue account was attacked in two ways. First, it was said that, even assuming that a sound policy of private estate management would require or justify the creation of such a surplus, this ought only to be done, having regard to the considerations already mentioned, at the expense of the ratepayers as a whole and not at the expense of the council tenants. Secondly, it was said that the housing revenue account would not have needed fortifying or replenishing in this manner but for the fact that it had been wrongly reduced, over a period of years, by bearing charges which ought not to have been imposed on it. This latter objection introduces the tenants' other specific grounds of complaint. Certain outgoings had been discharged from the housing revenue account which, the tenants contend, ought to have been borne by the body of ratepayers as a whole. The first of these was the sums debited against the account under the heading of supervision A and management. The tenants say that these were incurred, in the main, in relation to unproductive land and not in relation to the completed estates which were in the occupation of the tenants. It is argued that, although, as a matter of account, these charges might properly be debited to the housing revenue account, as arising out of supervision and management of "land" (s. 129 (1) (iii) and s. 128 (b) of the Act of 1936), the actual burden of such B charges, to the extent that they related to unproductive land and were incurred in connection with new schemes, ought to be borne by the ratepayers on the ground that it was the borough as a whole that was getting the benefit of them.

Similar criticisms were made of the debit to the housing revenue account of loan charges on the unproductive sites. The resolution of Dec. 30, 1947, abandoned the earlier intention of continuing to debit these charges in the C future, but it had been the past practice of the corporation to debit them, and the tenants say that it was wrong and that the housing revenue account would have been in a more prosperous condition had they been charged against the rates. Then, with regard to the war service charges, a non-recurring item of nearly £1,000, they ask why these should be met out of their rents instead of by the ratepayers. Finally, the tenants object to the fire insurance fund, which D was explained by Mr. Clifford Jones in his evidence. They regard this fund as being a wrongful diversion of part of the housing repairs account which is, under s. 131 (2) of the Act of 1936, properly applicable only to repairs, and they claim that, had the amount not been so diverted, the necessity for a rent increase would pro tanto have been diminished.

I have referred specifically to all of the particular matters on which the tenants E feel they have cause to complain. I do not, however, for a reason which I will shortly state, propose to analyse them further or consider in detail the grounds on which the corporation justify the debits which are impeached. I need only say that, after carefully considering all the documents and the evidence in the case, I am far from satisfied that any of the relevant charges against the housing revenue account can legitimately be criticised, nor do I see anything wrong in F earmarking to fire risk (in the manner which Mr. Clifford Jones explained) a part of the moneys standing to the credit of the housing repairs account. As to budgeting for a surplus in the rents, whilst it is true that the legislature contemplated a possible deficiency on a local authority's housing revenue account and provides (by sched. VIII to the Act of 1936) that any such deficiency shall be met out of the rates, surpluses on such account were also in contempla- G
tion, and their destination is provided for by s. 130 of the Act of 1936 and s. 21 (3) of the the Act of 1946, whilst a surplus on the housing repairs account is contemplated and provided for by s. 131 (3) of the Act of 1936. And it is to be observed that there is no statutory provision under which a surplus on the housing revenue account can be applied in reduction of the council house tenants' rents. H

The question, however, whether the corporation's decision can be impeached as being in conflict with s. 83 of the Act of 1936 depends, in my judgment, not on whether it might have been preferable to charge this or that item against the ratepayers as a whole or to have apportioned it in some manner between them and the tenants, but on whether the increased rents are "reasonable," as the section requires them to be. What the tenants are seeking to do in these proceedings is to analyse in very considerable detail various items of the corporation's past and contemplated expenditure and say : " This item ought to be borne by the ratepayers," or " That item should have been apportioned between them and us," and " If you do this or had done that, you would not need extra rent, or so much extra rent, from us." If a local authority has indulged, or was proposing to indulge, in some expenditure which had no relation to their housing estates and to raise their tenants' rents in order to pay for it, this kind of approach to the matter might well be both intelligible and permissible. But no such action or intention by the corporation has been proved in the present case and I cannot but think that the tenants' attitude, if accepted, would result in the management and control of corporation estates being largely diverted from the councils, to whom the legislature has entrusted it, to the courts. Much of what I have ventured to describe as the background of the argument of counsel for the tenants on this question I accept. I would, however, point out that the tenants are not the only people whose interests the corporation have to consider, for they have to bear in mind the general body of ratepayers as well. It seems to me that, in solving the economic problems with which councils are confronted to-day, and which arise mainly from the greatly increased cost of materials and labour, they are placed in a position of not inconsiderable difficulty. It is, of course, clear that they have to consider the welfare of their tenants and to remember that those tenants are people of small—sometimes of very small—means. On the other hand, they have also to be mindful of the interests of the ratepayers as a whole—the majority of whom, in Reading, as Mr. Clifford Jones informed me, are people of comparable means with the tenants of the council houses. It is their duty, so far as possible, to maintain a balance between these two sections of the local community, having due regard, of course, to any specific requirements of the Housing Acts. If the council house rents are much below those prevailing in comparable private estates in the locality, then, prima facie, a council might be suspected of unduly favouring the tenants, whilst, if they are much in excess of such other rents, the presumption would be the other way round. I have already indicated that, in my opinion, the past policy of the corporation, as established by the evidence, is not deserving of the criticism that has been levelled against it and it does not per se support any suggestion of unreasonableness on their part or any failure to take into account any consideration which they ought to have taken into account for the purpose of maintaining the balance to which I have referred.

Bound up with this view and, indeed, an essential element in its formation, is the test suggested by s. 85 (5) of the Act of 1936 to which I will now refer in connection with the alternative way in which the tenants' case of ultra vires is presented. For, as I have indicated, the increased rents would prima facie require some justification in point of " reasonableness " if they were shown to exceed those that prevailed in comparable privately-owned houses in Reading at the end of 1947. The tenants contend in the first place that the defendant corporation never applied their minds to the requirements of s. 85 (5) of the Act and that their failure to do so in itself vitiates the decisions at which they arrived. It is true that the minutes of the meetings of Nov. 17 and 24, 1947, contain no reference to the subject-matter of the sub-section and that, in the documents before me, it is only mentioned once, namely, in the borough treasurer's report of Nov. 14, 1947, where he intimated that it is one of the considerations which had to be borne in mind in connection with the pooling of rent. It is, however, clear from the evidence of Mr. Clifford Jones and of Mr. Willett and of the deputy town clerk of Reading that the question of the rents payable by members of the working classes in Reading was considered at the meetings which were held on Nov. 17 and 24, 1947. I am satisfied that the obligation imposed by s. 85 (5) of the Act was fully observed. Then, as to the comparison between the increased rents, on the one hand, and the rents for working class dwelling-houses prevailing in the locality, on the other, the principal criticism by counsel for the tenants of the evidence of Mr. Mann and Mr. Martin was that they did not know the nature of the occupations of the tenants who inhabited the houses which these witnesses, or their firms, respectively managed. They might be black-coated workers, counsel suggested, or, at all events, persons of greater affluence than is commonly the case amongst members of the working classes. As to this I may say that, in the light of modern conditions, I share the difficulty which Denning, J., felt and expressed in Green & Sons v. Ministry of Health (1), with regard to the question who does, and who does not, belong to the working classes. It does not appear to me that this description is the prerogative nowadays of any particular section of the British people. The phrase has a far wider and far less certain signification than it used to possess, and it is to be observed that, possibly for this reason, it has now been jettisoned from s. 85 (5) by the Housing Act, 1949, s. 1 and sched. I.

In so far as the phrase, the working class, is still capable of definition, there is no doubt but that it can properly and fairly be applied to the tenants of the privately-owned houses in and near Reading of which Mr. Mann and Mr. Martin gave me particulars in their evidence. Counsel for the tenants further submitted that these houses do not afford a reliable comparison with the council houses in the matter of rentals, in that the latter carry—or usually carry—the additional advantage of government subsidies, and also because of the profit margin which is presumably present in the rents of private estates. Notwithstanding these considerations, the evidence of Mr. Mann and of Mr. Martin, and the material on which that evidence was based, leave me in no doubt that the view, which they both expressed, that the increased council house rents compare very favourably, from the point of view of the tenants, with those payable in respect of similar but privately-owned dwellings in the district was justified. It is further to be observed that the tenants adduced no evidence to establish the contrary view. I would add, though this is perhaps immaterial, that such rents do not compare unfavourably with rents for similar accommodation belonging to the other local authorities in southern England whom the defendant corporation approached for information.

The conclusions at which I have arrived are, accordingly, that the decisions of the corporation which the tenants seek to impeach in these proceedings were not ultra vires, whether from the point of view of s. 83 of the Act of 1936, or of s. 85 (5), or for any other reason. The defendant corporation has, in my judgment, carefully and conscientiously observed its duties to its tenants to the best of its ability without losing sight of the duties which it also owes to the ratepayers of the borough as a whole. The increases which it has felt itself compelled to make in the rents of its council houses are, doubtless, and understandably, unwelcome to the tenants. The latter must, however, realise that these increases are due, not to any unreasonable disregard by the council of their interests, but to the economic pressure of existing conditions, a pressure from which no one to-day is free.

Having regard to the views which I have expressed, I need do no more than mention a point which arose out of s. 129 of the Act of 1936, and which emerged from the "further defence" of the corporation which was delivered shortly before the trial. By their statement of claim the tenants attacked, as hereinbefore appears, the propriety or validity of certain debits which the corporation had made in their housing revenue account. The corporation, accordingly, applied to the Minister of Health for a direction with regard to these debits under s. 129 (5) of the Act of 1936. The Minister intimated that, in his view, some of such debits ought not in strictness to have been made, but he gave the direction required in order to regularise the position. The corporation, as an alternative defence, accordingly relied on this direction, but counsel for the tenants in opening the case before me, said that he was proposing to contend that the direction was not authorised by s. 129, or otherwise, and was, accordingly, invalid. It did not appear to me to be right that this point, which was one of wide importance, should be debated or decided without giving the Minister an opportunity, if he so desired, of being represented before me. He was, accordingly, communicated with and, as a result, Mr. Buckley appeared as amicus curiae on their behalf. The point was argued both by Sir Andrew Clark, for the corporation, and by Mr. Buckley, on the one side, and by Mr. Raeburn, for the tenants, on the other. In view of my conclusions on the main issue, however, the question does not fall to be decided and in these circumstances it is better that I should say no more about it. It, accordingly, only remains for me to say that the action fails and must be dismissed.

GIBSON AND ANOTHER v. SOUTH AMERICAN STORES (GATH & CHAVES), LTD., AND OTHERS.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., Asquith, L.J., and Wynn-Parry, J.), November 14, 15, 16, 1949.]

Charitable Purpose—Relief of poverty—Requirement of public element—Employees' health and relief fund—Funds provided by company for assistance of necessitous employees and their dependants—Right of company to revoke trust deed and hold fund freed from trust—Application of cy-près doctrine.

The articles of association of a public limited company, incorporated in 1912 and conducting chain stores in the Argentine Republic and elsewhere, provided that the board of directors should set aside every year two per cent. of its profits for the Employees' Savings and Insurance Fund, later called "the Employees' Health and Relief Fund." On Apr. 14, 1918, a trust deed was executed in order to define and declare the trusts on which the fund was and should be held and the terms on which it was and should be administered, and it provided : "(3) The fund shall both as to capital and income and accumulations of income be used and applied at such times and in such manner in all respects for the benefit of such members of the class of beneficiaries hereinafter designated as the [board] shall from time to time direct and (without prejudice to the generality of the discretion intended to be hereby reposed in the [board]) may be used and applied in or towards the granting of gratuities pensions or allowances of such respective amounts to be paid to such persons (being members of the said class of beneficiaries) upon such terms and subject to such conditions as the [board] shall from time to time think proper to prescribe. (4) The class of beneficiaries for whose benefit the fund may be used or applied as aforesaid shall include all persons who in the opinion of the [board] are or shall be necessitous and deserving and who for the time being are or have been in the company's employ or the employ of any agents of the company or in the employ of [a subsidiary company] and the wives widows husbands widowers children parents and other dependants of any person who for the time being is or would if living have been himself or herself a member of the class of beneficiaries." The trust deed further provided, by cl. 12, that, in the event of the liquidation of the company otherwise than by reconstruction, the fund should be distributed among the "members of the said class of beneficiaries including members then in receipt of any gratuities pensions allowances or other benefits"; and by cl. 15: "The company may at any time or times with the sanction of a special resolution of the company in general meeting rescind alter or modify the provisions of these presents or any of them." Until 1948, when the articles were amended by deleting the direction to the board, the appropriate amount was set aside each year and the sum in the hands of the trustees of the fund rose to £105,000. The fund was employed in accordance with cl. 3 and cl. 4 of the deed and from time to time gratuities, pensions or allowances were granted to employees and their dependants, including employees in the Argentine, France and Chile. The calls on the fund were much less than its income, and they appeared to be decreasing, and the company desired to wind-up the fund, using part of it to contribute to a new pensions scheme and returning the rest to the ordinary funds of the company free from the trusts.

Held: (i) on the true construction of the trust deed all members of the class of beneficiaries defined in cl. 4 thereof must satisfy the requirement of being necessitous and deserving; cl. 15 did not empower the company in general meeting to specify other persons as members of the class; and the trust was, therefore, apart from the consideration of its public character, charitable until the company thought fit to revoke it.

Re Peel's (Sir Robert) School, Tamworth (1868) (3 Ch. App. 543), applied.

(ii) the question whether the trust in this case was of sufficiently public character to be charitable was concluded in the affirmative by the decision of the Court of Appeal in Re Laidlaw's (Sir Robert) Will Trusts (1935) (unreported), in which case, although no note of the judgment was available, it was clear that the identical question must have been involved, and that, although the grounds of the decision were not apparent, the question must have been answered in the affirmative.

(iii) the trust deed disclosed an intention to make provision only for the company's own employees and families for a period limited by cl. 12 and cl. 15, and no general charitable intention, and the surplus trust funds should not, therefore, be applied cy-près, but, subject to the execution of the trusts contained in cl. 3 and cl. 4, the trust funds would revert to the company.

Appeal by South American Stores, Ltd., from an order of Harman, J., dated May 12, 1949, and reported ante, p. 18. An application was made by originating summons to determine inter alia whether a fund provided by the company for the benefit of necessitous employees and their dependants was the subject of a charitable trust, and, if so, whether there was power in the company to revoke that trust. Harman, J., found that the trust deed set up a valid charitable trust, and that there was a general charitable intent, and he directed the application of surplus funds cy-près. The Court of Appeal found that the trust was for the relief of poverty, and that the question whether the trust satisfied the requirement of public character in a charitable trust was concluded affirmatively so far as the Court of Appeal was concerned by an unreported decision of the Court of Appeal in 1935, Re Laidlaw's (Sir Robert) Will Trusts. The court held, however, that there was no general charitable intent, and, therefore, that the surplus funds, whether arising by operation of a deed of revocation (provided for by the trust deed) or by operation of law, would revert to the company. The facts are set out in the judgment of Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., and are summarised in the headnote.

Milner Holland, K.C., and E. B. Stamp for the company.

Pascoe Hayward, K.C., and R. H. Walton for one of the beneficiaries under the trust deed.

SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R. : This case comes to this court on appeal from Harman, J., and it raises two distinct points at least : (i) a question of construction of the deed which is the subject-matter of the action, and (ii) a question of general law, the rule in regard to public character in its application to charities for the relief of poverty.

The deed was made on Nov. 14, 1918, between the South American Stores

(Gath and Chaves), Ltd., of the one part, and two persons described as, and thereinafter called, the trustees, of the other part. Before turning to the language of the deed, it is right that I should make a brief reference to certain earlier facts, part of the history of the case. The company is one which, ever since its incorporation in 1912, had thought it proper to make provision for the company's servants. For the first six years of the company's existence under the articles of association of the company the form the provision took was the setting A aside of a percentage of the company's profits to a fund called at first "Employees Savings and Insurance Fund," and later "Employees Help and Relief Fund." When the document of 1918 came to be executed, the sums so set aside amounted to £21,000, or thereabouts. It is conceded that up to the date of this document in 1918, notwithstanding the labels attached from time to time to the fund, it remained part of the company's assets, the company's own B property, and would have been available, if the worst had come to the worst, for the company's creditors. Counsel for the company has invited us to form the view that on its proper construction the deed of 1918 did not alter that substantial result, but I cannot accept that argument. The first question, indeed, which counsel has posed is: Was the document of 1918 a document which effectively created any trusts at all? On that point, I confess I feel little difficulty. The C third recital to the document, the parties to which I have already described, was in this form:

> "And whereas it is considered expedient to define and declare the trusts upon which the fund [the accumulated £21,000] is and shall be held and the terms upon which the same is being and shall be administered . . ."

It is true that many of the discretions which would normally be found vested D in the trustees appointed under such a document are, under the terms of this deed, exercisable by the board of directors of the London company, but that still leaves in my mind no doubt that this document did create and establish trusts as it certainly stated that it did. I do not propose on this point, with all respect to counsel, to travel through the document. Suffice it to say that by cl. 3 it was provided that the fund "shall both as to capital and income and E accumulations of income be used and applied" as therein set forth, and that in other clauses, such as cl. 11 and cl. 13, provisions were made which in terms make it, to my mind, almost beyond argument that this document did create a trust.

That leaves for solution the question, which has been more difficult: What was the nature of the trust which it created? Was it a charitable trust? I F want at this stage to guard myself in two respects. I have already indicated that there remains still for our consideration a substantial problem of law, namely, whether the requirement of public interest is applicable to the same extent in cases of charities for the relief of poverty as it is in other cases, and, in posing the question: "Did this document, according to its construction, constitute a charitable trust?", I am assuming that the charitable nature is not defeated G by the fact that the class to be benefited is one defined by reference to service in a company or series of companies. There is a second reservation I must also make. It is possible that the charitable trusts were, on their proper interpretation, confined to the specific purposes described in the deed, without there being any general charitable intention. I have to make that reservation, because on the evidence, as we are informed, it now appears that the objects stated, assuming H them to be charitable within the phrase I have hitherto used, are not sufficiently numerous to exhaust the uses to which the fund can be put, and it was on that ground that the learned judge, having decided adversely to the company, directed application cy-près. I want at this stage to keep that matter open. More accurately, I think it would be proper to express the question to which I am about to apply myself: What was the precise nature of the trust which was declared by the document? I should finally interpolate that the question has arisen because the company desires, in exercise of a power expressly reserved to it by cl. 15 of the deed, to revoke these trusts, not, it must be said in all fairness to the company, to appropriate to itself and the shareholders the £21,000 or greater figure which is, or was at the date of revocation, in the names of the trustees, but because it is thought that a more appropriate provision can be made in other ways for the servants of the company. The only question is the technical one : In the circumstances can they do it in this way ?

A The most material clauses of the deed, for present purposes, are cl. 3 and cl. 4. It is, I think, proper that I should read them. Clause 3, of which I have already referred to the opening words, is as follows :

> "The fund shall both as to capital and income and accumulations of income be used and applied at such times and in such manner in all respects
> B for the benefit of such members of the class of beneficiaries hereinafter designated as the London board shall from time to time direct and (without prejudice to the generality of the discretion intended to be hereby reposed in the London board) may be used and applied in or towards the granting of gratuities pensions or allowances of such respective amounts to be paid to such persons (being members of the said class of beneficiaries) upon such
> C terms and subject to such conditions as the London board shall from time to time think proper to prescribe."

That clause indicates that the definition of the class of beneficiaries will follow, but it is, I think, plain that the beneficiaries under the trust are to be persons selected—true, it is selected by the London board, but nevertheless selected —from the class of beneficiaries to be later defined. I wish to draw attention to
D the fact that, although that is expressed to be without prejudice to the generality of the earlier discretion, the fund is to be used in the granting of gratuities, pensions or allowances, and that phrase, I observe, is also to be found in cl. 12. Clause 12 directs that, in the event of the liquidation of the company otherwise than by re-construction, the fund shall then be distributed among the "members of the said class of beneficiaries including members then in E receipt of any gratuities pensions allowances or other benefits."

I now return to cl. 4 round which the argument before us has ranged. That clause begins :

> "The class of beneficiaries for whose benefit the fund may be used or applied as aforesaid shall include . . ."

F I pause there to dispose of one point. It was suggested that the use of the word "include" imported necessarily that the class of beneficiaries should extend to some much wider and unspecified class than that which is then next defined. I do not so read it. I think "include" means there "cover." Clause 4 proceeds :

> ". . . shall include all persons who in the opinion of the London board are or shall be necessitous and deserving and who for the time being are or > G have been in the company's employ or the employ of any agents of the company or in the employ of Gath & Chave Sociedad Anonima and the wives widows husbands widowers children parents and other dependants of any person who for the time being is or would if living have been himself or herself a member of the class of beneficiaries."

It is not very difficult as a matter of English to criticise that clause. Most of H the difficulty in practice has arisen from the last part of it. It is a matter of note that it uses the plural "and the wives, widows, husbands" etc., then goes back to the singular "of any person," which might be suggested to mean that the person had several wives. I only mention that to show that one has, I think, to approach this clause without any assumption that it is as a matter of English and syntax precisely, carefully, or accurately drawn.

The first point that arises—and again I think I can dispose of this quite briefly—is in regard to the effect of the words "in the opinion of the London board," for it is said that that is a discretion without limit and the result is that the class is not people who are, in truth, necessitous and deserving, but people who the London board may—and, it is suggested, may by the most extravagant process of thought—regard as covered by those two words. I do not think that such an extended meaning can be given to that phrase. I think that to begin with the discretion is a fiduciary one. A member of the class must be both necessitous and deserving. One can well imagine difficulties might arise, whether A it could be said that a particular individual qualified under both heads. I take this provision to mean that in the event of doubt the opinion, which must be bona fide given in the exercise, as I say, of a fiduciary discretion of the London board, is to be taken as conclusive. I do not think, therefore, that extends the class so as to make it cease to be a gift for the relief of poverty.

That qualification, however, is not the sole one. The persons must be, not B only necessitous and deserving in the opinion of the board, but also persons who are or have been in the company's employ. To simplify the matter, I will leave out the reference to the agents of the company or to the South American company mentioned. So far, as it seems, there is no great difficulty. Then come the added words " and the wives," etc. As a matter of strict English, and if you can, as I have said, apply with any conscientiousness very strict C rules of syntax to this sentence, the words " and the wives " seem to relate back to " include all persons," so that the class would be, first, all persons who in the opinion of the London board are necessitous and deserving and are employees or ex-employees, and the wives, widows, husbands, widowers, etc., of any person in the primary class, but without imposing on the wives, etc., the necessity of themselves being necessitous and deserving. That result is, I think, surprising if it be D right, when one considers the general scope and obvious purpose of this document. The difficulties do not end there. It postulates that the wife, to take the case of a living employee, may herself be affluent, but the employee must be within the class, i.e., he must, in the opinion of the board, be necessitous. That, as a matter of fact, is on the face of it absurd. Further difficulties are presented, and I am not suggesting that I shall be able, or find it necessary, to try to solve them all, E but in the case of a deceased employee, if he is to be within the class strictly, it has to be postulated of him that he, if living, would have been necessitous. Again, it is very difficult to see how, with any pretence of accuracy, such a hypothesis can be dealt with, but the only test, one would suppose, which could have been intended was by reference to the condition of the widow or other dependant whose circumstances were under consideration. I think myself that F the emphasis in the words " himself or herself " adds to or tends towards what I think to be the right solution. The phrase is " of any person who for the time being is or would if living have been himself or herself a member of the class," which means himself or herself prima facie necessitous and deserving. The whole tenor of this clause makes it clear to my mind that the intention was that the fund, in so far as it is not used for " employees or ex-employees," should be G used for the relief of the necessitous condition of wives, etc., of employees and ex-employees.

Finally, I add to that by way of corroboration the reference I have already made to gratuities, pensions, or allowances as an indication in the deed of the kind of benefit contemplated, the sort of language that one would use to describe a benefit for the relief of necessitous circumstances. What, then, is the solution ? H To my mind, it involves substituting for " and " the word " or." I think if that is done, it will solve the difficulty. Written out more in full, I think it should read " or who are the wives, etc." The words " who are," which have been used earlier, I think might be imported even though the word " and " remains, but it does, I agree, do the least violence to the language that one should read for the word " and " the slightly longer phrase " or who are." I agree with counsel for the company that one should not start to construe this document with any prejudice or bias in favour of giving it a charitable effect, but I believe I have not done so. I think that to give it sensible effect one must read those words in the way that I have suggested. In other words, I agree with and adopt what Harman, J., says (ante, p. 21) :

> " In my judgment, the class of beneficiaries defined in cl. 4 must all satisfy the requirement of being necessitous and deserving, that is to say, that poverty is a necessary element to qualify a person for benefit. It was suggested to me that, though employees or ex-employees must necessarily be poor, yet that qualification did not extend to their dependants. I cannot so construe the deed. In my judgment, dependants must be necessitous and deserving just as a member of the primary class of employees or ex-employees must himself or herself be."

Out of respect for the argument, I have dealt at greater length than did the learned judge with this point, but I think that that statement of his is correct and I adopt it for the purposes of this judgment.

There, however, remains outstanding one further point. I have already said that there is in cl. 15 of this deed a power of revocation :

> " The company may at any time or times with the sanction of a special resolution of the company in general meeting rescind, alter or modify the provisions of these presents or any of them."

It is said by counsel for the company that that must be read as being a qualification of each clause, and that when the class of beneficiaries is defined in cl. 4, the effect is as though it read : " The class of beneficiaries shall include all persons therein named, or such other persons as might from time to time be specified by the company in general meeting." I do not myself think that that is the fair way to construe these clauses together. I think that cl. 15 is what it purports to be, a revocation clause, and, of course, power to alter or rescind is power partially to revoke. I think it likely, and it is not necessary to express a concluded opinion about it, that the clause is invalid as offending against the rule against perpetuity, but I am content to assume for the purpose of dealing with this point that it is at the moment an operative clause, i.e., in considering this as a matter of construction, I will leave out of account the question of the invalidity of cl. 15 by reference to the rule against perpetuity. As I have already indicated, however, I do not think you can read cl. 4 and cl. 15 together so as to secure the result that a benefit was intended for a charitable class or some other class of persons to be specified thereafter.

I think that that conclusion really follows from the judgments of this court in Re Peel's School, Tamworth (1). It is true that that case was primarily concerned with the powers of the Charity Commissioners and whether Sir Robert Peel, who at the material date was the sole trustee under the trust established in the circumstances I will mention in a moment, was entitled to refuse to supply them with certain accounts in respect of the management of the school and whether by so refusing he was guilty of contempt of court. For present purposes, however, the point emerges in this way, that the father of the Sir Robert Peel in question had established a fund for the support of a school at Tamworth for the education of poor boys in that town. Apparently, the management was vested in the Sir Robert Peel concerned in the case as sole trustee at the material date. By a codicil the father had provided that, if the person responsible for the management (as it turned out, Sir Robert Peel) should be dissatisfied with the management or discipline of the school or of opinion that the school was not of public utility, or should for any reason be desirous to alter, vary and change the management, regulations, objects and purposes of the school, then Sir Robert Peel or other managers should be at liberty to alter, vary or change the management, regulations, objects and purposes of the school, or to revoke or abolish and absolutely discontinue and dissolve the same entirely, and thereupon to appropriate, dispose of and apply the sum of money as he thought fit. Sir Robert Peel had not purported to exercise his powers, but it was argued on his behalf that the Charity Commissioners had no power to make the demands they had made on him because there was here no charity in truth, and that point depended on the effect of this power of revocation which it was sought to use in the same way that counsel for the company has used cl. 15 here. I cannot put the answer to the point better than by reading one passage from the judgment of SIR WILLIAM PAGE-WOOD, V.-C. (3 Ch. App. 549) : A

> " SIR Roundell Palmer further argued that this, according to Morice v. Bishop of Durham (2), was not a charity. The decision in that case turned upon the fact that the trusts declared were either for charitable objects or for other purposes, so that the court could not tell how much was intended for charitable objects, and therefore could not fix the property with B charitable purposes at all. That cannot be applied to a case where the testator has definitely marked out the charitable purposes, and has not left it optional with the trustees to apply the fund for the charitable purposes or for other purposes, but has directed them to apply it for the charitable purpose until the managing body of the charity think fit to revoke the trusts." C

It seems to me that that language, assuming as I do that cl. 15 is not wholly invalid, applies here. As I construe cl. 3 and cl. 4, the company has directed the trustees to apply the fund for charitable purposes, and, making always the assumption that the purposes which I have defined are charitable, until the company by special resolution thinks fit to revoke those trusts. The fund has been dedicated to it, and, in my judgment, therefore, in view of that decision, it is D not open to argue that the case must be treated as though there were here a direction to apply the fund for these charitable purposes or for other purposes and so bring the case within the disqualification to which SIR WILLIAM PAGE-WOOD refers.

I think I have now covered the points which were raised on construction, and, deciding as I do that HARMAN, J., was quite right in the conclusion to which E he came, we now have, after my brethren have delivered their judgment, to proceed to the problem of law which I have already indicated.

ASQUITH, L.J. : At one stage I was greatly impressed by the argument for the company founded on the presence in the deed of cl. 15, but, in my view, a complete answer to that argument is afforded by the principle on which the F court proceeded in Re Peel's School, Tamworth (1) (L.R. 3 Ch. App. 549). I entirely agree with the conclusions that the Master of the Rolls has reached on the construction of this document, and with the reasoning on which these conclusions are formed.

WYNN-PARRY, J. : I agree. The question is one of construction which has been most fully dealt with already, and I should only be guilty of unwelcome G repetition if I were to add any conclusions of my own.

[There followed argument on the question of law with regard to the requirement of public character in relation to gifts for the relief of poverty having otherwise charitable nature.]

H

SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R. : At the end of the argument on the first point raised in this case, namely, the problem on the construction of the terms of the relevant deed of the class of persons intended to benefit, the court expressed its conclusion, agreeing with the learned judge in the court below, that the trusts established in cl. 3 and cl. 4 were limited to necessitous beneficiaries. That left as the next point for discussion what, it appeared, might well be a question of law of great difficulty and no little importance. The question may, I think, be put thus: Under the law as it has now been established, and in the light of several recent decisions, both in this court and in the House of Lords, is a trust for a class of poor persons defined by reference to the fact that they are employed by some person, firm, or company, a good charitable gift, a good charitable trust, or does it fail of that qualification through the absence of the necessary public element?

A There is, I think, no doubt that the emphasis which has been placed in recent years on the need for that public characteristic had to some degree been lost sight of in earlier cases, and its emphatic affirmation (the last case I have in mind is Gilmour v. Coats (3)) undoubtedly raises the question whether certain decisions of courts of first instance on trusts in favour of poor persons of various categories are now consistent with the principles which have been stated. In B Re Drummond (4), EVE, J., had to consider whether a trust established for the purpose of providing holidays for employees of a particular company was a good charitable trust, and he answered that question negatively, saying that it was a trust, not for the public or a section of the public, but for private individuals, albeit a fluctuating body of such individuals. It is to be observed that there was no poverty qualification in that case. In the absence, therefore, of poverty, the C case appeared to decide that employees of a particular company were not a section of the community so as to give to the trust in their favour the necessary public quality. In the later case in this court of Re Compton (5) when LORD GREENE, M.R., in what may be, perhaps, regarded now as a classic judgment, dealt fully with this problem of public character, Re Drummond (4) was expressly affirmed. It must, therefore, now be taken to be concluded, so far as this court D is concerned, that where there is no poverty element, where there is no trust for the relief of poverty, the employees of a particular undertaking are not a section of the community so that a trust in their favour will qualify as a charity.

The question, however, arises that counsel for the company invited us to answer negatively: Is the same true when the trust is one for the relief of poverty? In this court it was apprehended, when the matter came before E HARMAN, J., that there was no decision one way or the other on that problem, but there have been three cases in which at first instance that problem, or a problem sufficiently closely related to be regarded as the same problem, did arise. Those three cases are (i) Spiller v. Maude (6), reported in a note to Pease v. Pattinson (7). That was a decision of SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., sitting at first instance, in which the class intended to be benefited were the members of a F theatrical society established in the city of York; (ii) in Re Gosling (8), where the class was old and worn out clerks of a banking firm, which was a decision of BYRNE, J.; and (iii) Re Buck (9), where the class concerned were members of a certain friendly society and their dependants, a case which was determined by KEKEWICH, J. Beyond doubt in each of those cases (and more particularly the second) the decisions appear to have involved the conclusion that the class G of persons whom I have stated in each case did form a section of the public. It is, however, true that the emphasis may have been laid more on the poverty element, and LORD GREENE, M.R., said of the first of them in his judgment in Re Hobourn Aero Components, Ltd.'s Air Raid Distress Fund (10), presently mentioned ([1946] 1 All E.R. 508):

> "I must confess . . . that seems to me to be a very extreme decision, > H because the whole arrangement was of a personal nature. However, it was saved by the fact of poverty . . ."

Had the point which counsel for the company has raised in this case been argued in the three cases I have mentioned as fully as here and had the judges had the advantage of the guidance given by the later cases, their decisions must have involved the question which is here involved, namely, whether the servants of this company form a section of the community, or whether, because this is a trust for the relief of poverty, it is not necessary that they should.

I think that counsel for the company was perfectly entitled to say that, if those three cases are considered in the light of the observations of this court in Re Compton (5), and in the later case, in some ways more significant for present purposes, of Re Hobourn Aero Components, Ltd.'s Fund (10), there would at the very least be grounds for saying that they are inconsistent with those observations. I think also that one may fairly add that, in considering whether a trust is (within the somewhat technical meaning of the term) a charity and as such A entitled to enjoy the privileges in regard to income tax and the rule against perpetuities which charities enjoy, one may put to oneself the question, as a commonsense matter, and say : Looking at this trust and applying the ordinary usages of our language, is it a charity as ordinary men and women would understand it ? Putting that question in relation to this case, it might have been answered : No, this is a domestic affair of a particular company designed for B the advantage and promotion of the interests of its own servants. On the authorities, as I have so far stated them, there was, obviously, a serious and substantial case for the consideration of this court and of HARMAN, J., whether this trust was charitable. The matter was dealt with in this way by HARMAN, J. Faced as he was, on the one hand, with the decisions in regard to poor relations, properly so called, and also with the three cases to which I have alluded, Spiller C v. Maude (6), Re Gosling (8) and Re Buck (9), and, on the other hand, with the emphatic insistence on the need for the public element and the decision of Re Drummond (4), the learned judge concluded that consistency could only be achieved by treating the relief of poverty as in itself supplying the necessary public element. HARMAN, J., said (ante, p. 23) :

> " It seems to me that a public object is always necessary to make a trust D legally charitable, and that the explanation of the poverty cases is that a much narrower object may in them be considered to work a public benefit than in the other categories."

Proceeding from that statement of principle, and after referring to the three cases at first instance which I have already mentioned, the learned judge came to the conclusion that there was here a charitable object—in other words, that this E trust was a charitable trust. Counsel for the company in this court said that we were free, as HARMAN, J., was not, or, at any rate, that we were less restricted than was he, in regard to the three instances directly in point, and that it was open to us to say that, in the light of later decisions, they should be treated now as wrongly decided. On the other hand, they have all of them stood for some time. In Re Compton (5), when LORD GREENE, M.R., had referred to the poor F relations cases, he said ([1945] 1 All E.R. 206) :

> " If the question of the validity of gifts of this character had come up for the first time in modern days I think that it would very likely have been decided differently since I should have thought that their purpose was a private family purpose lacking the necessary public character. But it is G in my view quite impossible for this court to overrule these cases. Many trusts of this description have been carried on for generations upon the faith that they were charitable and many testators have no doubt been guided by these decisions. The cases must at this date be regarded as good law although they are, perhaps, anomalous."

Without going further into the matter, because, as will presently appear, I H think it is unnecessary, it would, I think, be impossible for the court, in the light of that observation, to treat now as wrongly decided the poor relations cases, properly so called, and it is true that the learned Master of the Rolls earlier in the judgment had said that the explanation of them might be—not was, but might be—that relief of poverty in itself supplied the necessary public characteristic. Spiller v. Maude (6), Re Gosling (8) and Re Buck (9), have also stood for some time, so that, again, it might be said that the anomaly ought now to be treated as extending in any case to them also, because many persons would have regulated their affairs in accordance with the guidance which those decisions give and that a parity of reasoning should apply to them as to the poor relations cases founded on Isaac v. Defriez (11).

I have mentioned these matters because they are of great importance and because, as it seems to me, they present a somewhat nicely balanced problem for consideration. If in this case, or in some other case, the question of the charitable qualification of trusts in favour of employees of companies or businesses (which under modern conditions might include such classes as the whole of the coalminers of England, or the whole of the railway servants of England) the House of Lords may well consider some new formulation of the proper principle applicable, but, so far as this court is concerned, it seems to me that the matter has already been concluded. It has before been observed to be a peculiar and unfortunate characteristic of our system that, though in the great majority of cases which come before it this court is the final court of appeal for England, there is no provision whatever made for taking a note or making a record of the judgments of the court. It appears that on Jan. 11, 1935, there came before this court, which we are told consisted of LORD HANWORTH, M.R., ROMER, L.J., and SLESSER, L.J., Re Sir Robert Laidlaw's Will Trusts (12). Counsel for the Attorney-General has been good enough to supply the court with such material as the vagaries of our reporting system have left for posterity.* It includes, fortunately, an extract from the relevant part of the will of Sir Robert Laidlaw, and the terms of the will were :

> "The sum of £2,000 to the trustees for the time being of the provident fund which has been established in connection with the business of Whiteaway, Laidlaw & Co., Ltd., which company was constituted to take over and took over the business of my former firm [which he names] upon trust to invest the same in any investments in which they can invest money forming part of such provident fund and to apply the income of the said sum and the investments for the time being representing the same in their uncontrolled discretion for the relief of poor members or former members of the staff of the said company or their families."

I think for practical purposes it is clear, and counsel for the company has conceded, that the point raised in the present case was inevitably and directly involved also in Laidlaw's case (12), for there was a trust on the face of it established in perpetuity to provide for poor employees of a particular business concern. In the court of first instance the decision had, apparently, been given, in favour of the testator's next of kin or residuary legatees, that the terms I have read did not constitute a valid charitable trust, and an appeal was brought to this court after the Attorney-General had been added as a party. Again, we are indebted to counsel for the Attorney-General, who has seen the instructions which were laid before Mr. Andrewes Uthwatt then counsel for the Attorney-General. Those instructions make it clear that the attention of the Attorney-General was specifically drawn to the cases, on the one hand, of Re Gosling (8), and, on the other, of Re Drummond (4), so that, at least, the point was clearly in the mind of the Attorney-General. In this court, however, the Attorney-General does not appear to have been called on to argue. As I have already stated, no note exists of the terms of the judgment, but the appeal was allowed and the order was, so far as relevant, that the legacy was "a valid charitable legacy for the benefit of the persons who shall from time to time and for the time being be poor members or poor former members of the staff" of this company.

Faced with that decision, counsel for the company was obviously in very considerable difficulty. Reference was made to the recent decision of the full

* The All England Law Reports first appeared in Feb., 1936.

Court of Appeal in Young v. Bristol Aeroplane Co., Ltd. (13), which has laid down that this court is bound by the decisions of the Court of Appeal save in certain precise and fairly well defined exceptions. Only one exception could be invoked by counsel for the company, and that was that in Re Laidlaw's Will Trusts (12), the decision must be taken to have been given per incuriam. In the first place, I think myself that it would be for counsel for the company to show that (if it was so) the decision was given per incuriam. In other words, A the onus would be on him, for prima facie one must, I think, assume that in a case in which the point is directly raised the judges of this court will have considered it, more particularly where they reverse the decision of the court below which had decided against the validity of the charity. Following, therefore, Young v. Bristol Aeroplane Co., Ltd. (13), I conclude that we are here bound to treat this particular trust as a valid charitable trust. B

The result on this part of the case is, therefore, again that I think the decision of HARMAN, J., was correct. I have thought it right to deal somewhat fully with the matter, because the particular ground on which I must rely for my conclusion was not put to the learned judge. Re Laidlaw's Will Trusts (12) had not then emerged from the fifteen years' obscurity in which it appears to have remained until today. It does not appear on what precise ground the case was determined, C and, therefore, I feel it right, if the matter shall hereafter be considered in a higher court, to say that I must not be taken to accept the view that the ground for justifying such decisions as the poor relations cases is, as HARMAN, J., expressed it (ante, p. 23) :

> " . . . the explanation of the poverty cases is that a much narrower object may in them be considered to work a public benefit than in the other D categories."

I think, as LORD GREENE, M.R., stated in Re Compton (5), that may be an explanation. On the other hand, it may be that they simply must be regarded now as a well established anomaly. I find it unnecessary in the circumstances to say any more or to express a view one way or another whether the principle HARMAN, J., found should be treated as well established, or whether the three E cases, Spiller v. Maude (6), Re Gosling (8), and Re Buck (9), ought now to be regarded as rightly decided. I think, so far as I am concerned, this question has been determined by Re Laidlaw's Will Trusts (12) on grounds which are not apparent, and I follow them without affirming or disaffirming any of the grounds relied on by HARMAN, J.

That, prima facie, would be the end of the case, but earlier in the argument, F when counsel for the company addressed the court on the matter of construction, he indicated another argument which those he represents desire to put before the court, namely, that, assuming there was here a valid charitable trust, nevertheless there was no general charitable intention. That point was not argued before HARMAN, J., at all, so far as I understand it. The learned judge having decided the two main points, one, that of the construction of the deed, and, two, G the point of law with which I have dealt, then proceeded without any discouragement from any of the counsel present to direct that on the evidence it would be necessary for a scheme to be prepared for the cy-près administration of the fund. That was, on the hypothesis that there is here a general charitable intention, undoubtedly necessary. The prosperity of the company since 1918, and I suppose of its employees, having been such that the fund now subject of the deed amounts H to over £100,000, it is proved clearly that there are not at the moment available necessitous servants or ex-servants or members of their families in sufficient numbers to absorb anything like the whole income of the fund. It must also be assumed that in the foreseeable future there is no prospect or likelihood of there being so. On that basis, therefore, what should now be done ? The answer to that question depends on whether there is or is not here a general charitable intention. The question whether in any case there is to be found a general charitable intention is, as has been said more than once, a question for which it is not easy to formulate precisely the principles of the answer. In Tudor on Charities, 5th ed., p. 145, I find that, after stating that the notion of the general intention of charity is hardly susceptible of accurate definition, two quotations are then given by way of illustration. The first is from Kay, J., in Re Taylor (14) :

> " If upon the whole scope and intent of the will you discern the paramount intention of the testator was not to benefit a particular institution, but to effect a particular form of charity independently of any special intention or mode, then . . . if the particular mode for any reason fails, the court, if it sees a sufficient expression of a general intention of charity, will, to use the phrase familiar to us, execute that cy-près."

The second quotation is from a Scottish case in the Court of Session, Burgess's Trustees v. Crawford (15), and is by Lord Johnston :

> " If this bequest is to be carried out cy-près . . . it is necessary that we should be able to find that the testator has evinced expressly or by implication an intention to dedicate his money to charity independently of the particular modus in which he has directed it to be applied. But . . . with this qualification that by charity I mean . . . not charitable purposes generally, but some charitable purpose in the concrete, definitely, however generally, defined."

Those two passages, taken alone, seem to indicate that there is, so to speak, an onus, and not a slight onus, to show it on those who allege a general charitable intention, but I think that the statements I have cited should, perhaps, be further qualified.

Counsel for the Attorney-General referred to the same edition of Tudor, at p. 141, where he cited this passage :

> " There is an exception to this rule [that the cy-près principle is confined to property given with a general intention] concerning property given absolutely and perpetually to charity, and which has vested in the charity : in such circumstances, a rule of convenience has grown up that on the subsequent failure of the trusts, the fund can be applied cy-près irrespective of the donor's intention."

Counsel himself formulated his proposition in these terms. If, he said, property has been effectively devoted to a charitable purpose with the contemplation that it will continue indefinitely and without any contemplation of reverter, then, once that effective devotion has occurred, there is sufficient element of general charitable intention. In other words, as he also put it, where you can see on the face of the document that the donor has divested himself in favour of the particular charitable object without reserving or contemplating any executory right of reverter, then, whether as a rule of convenience or otherwise, you should infer a general charitable intention. I will assume in counsel's favour that he has, as he commonly does, formulated correctly the proposition to be applied. Nevertheless, when I examine again this deed in the light of properly admissible surrounding circumstances, I conclude that there is here no general charitable intention. In the first place, I observe that the source of the fund is a percentage of the profits of the trade of the company accumulated over a number of years, and, in the second, that the objects of the trust are the servants and ex-servants of that company (or of associated companies) and their families, so that you start with what I have already described as something which is, on the face of it, of a domestic character. Certainly, as Wynn-Parry, J., pointed out, the last beneficiaries that one would expect the company ever to have contemplated would be employees of similar companies, namely, of this company's competitors in trade. It may well be, however, that it would be wrong to over-emphasise that, because, as counsel for the Attorney-General points out, when the cy-près doctrine has to be applied the result might well surprise and even disappoint the original donor. However, the matter does not end there. As I have said, the objects of the fund are confined to servants of this company and associated companies and families of those servants. By cl. 12 provision is made for what is to happen if the company ceases as a trading concern to exist altogether, i.e., is wound-up. That, of course, it might be said, would raise very clearly the question : Was there a general charitable intention ?, and, in so far as cl. 12 answers the question, it answers it by saying that in that event the whole fund is to be distributed among the members of the class then in existence or such of them as a committee therein specified select. It is, therefore, clearly contemplated at the least that, if the trading concern ceases to exist, there is to be a final winding-up of this charitable trust, or, put another way, it emphasises the domestic character of the trust by saying that it is at least limited not only to the servants of the company, etc., but also to the business life of the company.

Finally, cl. 15 provides that :

> " the company may at any time or times with the sanction of a special resolution of the company in general meeting rescind alter or modify the provisions of these presents or any of them."

On an authority to which I will refer in a moment it is clear, I think, that the court is entitled, in construing this deed and in arriving at a conclusion whether there is a general intention in favour of charity, to take account of that clause, even though it is (if it be) invalid as being an infringement of the rule against perpetuities. If the proper construction of cl. 15 (which, as I have indicated, relates to " provisions of these presents or any of them ") is to read into each clause a proviso to the effect that the company may at any time rescind or alter it, I venture to think that the case becomes very near to the type of case where there is a particular trust established (limited as I have indicated) with an express provision that, if the donor or some other person comes to the conclusion that the trust is no longer workable or desirable, he may revoke it. Counsel for the Attorney-General, I agree, distinguishes the two. He says that a power to revoke without any indication of the grounds on which the company would act differs from the other type of case where there is a power to put an end to the trusts if the originally expressed intention ceases to be capable of being exactly carried out. In any case, what we are here concerned with is a matter not expressly mentioned at all. We are concerned with what is to happen, not when the trusts fail to be effective through bad management or undesirability, but when they have failed through lack of sufficient objects of benefaction. Nevertheless, taking this clause together with the earlier cl. 12 and in the light of the other circumstances, and finding, as I find, no express indication of intended perpetuity, I feel myself compelled to conclude that there was never here a general charitable intention, but only an intention to make this particular provision for this company's (and its associated companies') own employees and their families.

I cannot leave the matter without one brief reference to the authorities. Counsel for the company, in the earlier argument to which I alluded, drew our attention to Clark v. Taylor (16). There a testator had made a benefaction in favour of a school for orphan girls associated with the name of a Mrs. Enderby, and it appeared that Mrs. Enderby discontinued the school within a month after the testator's death. On the construction of that will Sir Robert Kindersley, V.-C., came to the conclusion that there was no general charitable intention. That is an illustration of the kind of case. There have been other and later cases, which may not be altogether easy to relate together, cases for the most part in which use was sought to be made of rights of reverter, express rights, which were found to be invalid as infringing the rule against perpetuity. One of them, and it is a case on which counsel for the Attorney-General relied, was Re Peel's Release (17), a case which, I think, related to the same charity as that which was the subject of the earlier case of Re Peel's School, Tamworth (1). That was a case in which there is found, on the one hand, an express provision that the property granted in 1837 should be " for-ever thereafter " applied to the charitable use indicated, but there is found also a right, which in 1921 Sir Robert Peel sought to exercise, of putting an end to the trust if, in his view, the management was unsatisfactory, and so on. That case, together with three others, one somewhat parallel and two different in certain vital respects, was considered by MAUGHAM, J., in Re Talbot (18). In Re Talbot (18) the main problem arose by reason of the effect of the Methodist Church Union Act, 1929, s. 18, on certain trusts which an earlier testator had established. In Re Talbot (18) the form of the trust had not contained any express indication of perpetuity, such as the words " for-ever thereafter," which are found in Re Peel's Release (17). There was a provision that if the chapel connected therewith should, in the opinion of the trustees, cease to be used for preaching the particular doctrines which the testator was obviously concerned to advance, there was to be a right to put an end to the trust. That clause was held to be void because of the perpetuity rule, but the learned judge considered the various cases, and, as I follow his judgment, he came to the conclusion that they were reconcilable on this principle. He said, first ([1933] Ch. 902)—and this is a point which I had anticipated earlier :

> " In considering whether there is or is not a general charitable intent, a thing which is not capable of exact definition, the court, I think, has to consider the whole scope and effect of the will and may rely on a proviso of the nature of a defeasance clause, whether or not such a clause is open to objection on the ground of perpetuity."

Applying that principle the learned judge, as I have said, reconciled the cases somewhat on this fashion. In Re Peel's Release (17) and in Re Bowen (19), there was express language indicating perpetuity. I have already mentioned the words in Re Peel's Release (17), " for-ever thereafter." In each of the other cases which appeared to produce a different result, Re Blunt's Trust (20), and Re Randell (21), there was on the face of the document concerned apparently an intention that it should only exist for a limited period, namely, so long as certain conditions subsisted. In the particular case of Re Talbot (18), MAUGHAM, J., would have come to the conclusion that it fell in the latter class, but in fact he held that the original trusts must be taken to have been altered by s. 18 of the Act of 1929, and, therefore, given an element of perpetuity or at least a new lease of life which produced the result that they could not be treated as having come to an end.

Applying the reasoning of Re Talbot (18) to the present case, it seems to me, for the reasons which I have tried to indicate, that here you have a trust which seems on the face of it to be intended for a domestic purpose and for a limited period, namely, the period during which these conditions essential for its being carried into effect should persist. One condition would obviously be the continuance of the company, but another is the continuance of a sufficient number of persons belonging to the class of beneficiaries defined. I, therefore, think that there is here no sufficient ground for saying that a general charitable intention has been shown. The result is that in so far as the funds are not now required, or may not be required, for carrying out the trusts imposed by the deed, they would not be applied cy-près to other charitable objects, but would revert to the company. That result is, of course, unaffected by the circumstance that the express power of revocation, which I gather has, in fact, been exercised, is, or may be invalid according to the rule against perpetuity. In the circumstances, it is not necessary to decide whether it is valid or invalid, because I understand the company do not seek to withdraw from the deed, and have not by their deed of revocation sought to withdraw from the trust funds which are required for carrying out the original express trust, so that the result is the same whether the deed of revocation operates or whether it comes back to the company by the operation of law and not the execution of the deed. For the reasons which I have indicated, I conclude that there is here no general charitable intention, so that, subject to the due execution of the specific trusts of cl. 3 and cl. 4, the property would revert to the company.

In pursuance of this power, the commissioners made the Income Tax (Employments) Regulations, 1944, which, by reg. 27 (1), provide that : "Within G fourteen days of the end of every income tax month the employer shall pay to the collector all amounts of tax which he was liable under these regulations to deduct from emoluments . . ."

Information laid by the Attorney-General.

The Attorney-General claimed from the defendant, an employer, money which she had deducted from wages or emoluments payable to her employees in respect of income tax under the Income Tax (Employments) Act, 1943, s. 1 (1). The employer, having deducted certain sums, placed the money in a safe which was broken into by thieves the money being stolen. Croom-Johnson, J., held that the money was at the risk of the employer and that she was liable to account for it to the revenue authorities.

Winn for the employer.

CROOM-JOHNSON, J. : The employer employed persons who were liable prima facie to pay income tax under the provisions of the Income Tax (Employments) Act, 1943. Pursuant to that statute and to the Income Tax (Employments) Regulations, 1944, made by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue under s. 2 (1) of it, she deducted from the wages of her servants, who were weekly servants, the appropriate sums of money week by week for the amount of tax which, having regard to their code numbers, had to be deducted in accordance with the tables prepared by the commissioners and circulated by them to persons in the position of the employer. She put the money which she so deducted, totalling £32 13*s*., in a bag to be kept until the time when she had to send in a return to the collector of taxes of what she had deducted, and she put the bag in the safe at her business premises with other bags containing sums of money connected with her business. The £32 13*s*. in question consisted of Treasury notes and coins, and the bag containing that amount was specially marked. On the night of January 25/26, 1946, thieves broke in and stole the money in the safe including the money in this specially marked bag.

The question for determination is, first, at whose risk was the money in the bag ? If it were at the risk of the revenue authorities, the employer would not be liable for the loss which has occurred, because none of the money has been recovered. If the money were at her risk, then comes the question whether she is liable to account to the revenue authorities for that sum and to pay it out of her own money. Difficulty has arisen owing to a confusion between two things :—(i) whether the bag of money was the money of the Treasury or at the risk of the revenue authorities, which it was not, and (ii) whether the bag of money was her own money, which it was. There was nothing to prevent her, at any moment she chose to do so, going to that bag, and using the money in it. In so doing, she would have committed no offence. She was entitled to take money from the bag for any purpose.

It is not suggested that the regulations of 1944 are ultra vires the statute. Under the Income Tax (Employments) Act, 1943, this P.A.Y.E. system is set up. Section 2 (1) which gives the Commissioners of Inland Revenue power to make regulations is in these terms :

> " The Commissioners of Inland Revenue shall make regulations with respect to the assessment, charge, collection and recovery of income tax in respect of emoluments to which this Act applies . . . and those regulations may, in particular, include provision—(a) for requiring any person making any payment of, or on account of, any such emoluments, when he makes the payment, to make a deduction or repayment of tax calculated by reference to tax tables prepared by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue and for rendering persons who are required to make any such deduction or repayment accountable to, or, as the case may be, entitled to repayment > from, those commissioners . . . and any such regulations shall have effect notwithstanding anything in the Income Tax Acts."

Then there is a proviso concerning the right of appeal to the General or other Commissioners "which a person would have apart from the regulations." That refers to the wage earner whose tax is being collected from him by this system. Regulation 27 of the Income Tax (Employments) Regulations, 1944, provides : A

> "(1) Within fourteen days of the end of every income tax month the employer shall pay to the collector all amounts of tax which he was liable under these regulations to deduct from emoluments paid by him during that income tax month . . ."

By reg. 27 (2) the collector shall give the employer a receipt on the prescribed B form for the total amount so paid. There are also other references in the regulations which relate to the liability to pay.

It is said that to make the employer liable for the money which has been lost is to impose on her an obligation to pay a tax which is not authorised by Parliament, for, as she has deducted the money and put it in the bag ready for the collector, to hold that she is liable to pay out of her own money the C amount of the tax which has been lost from the bag would, in effect, be to tax her in respect of the wages of her employees. In support of that ingenious contention reference was made, not as a binding authority, but as indicative of the sort of principle which I ought to apply, to the observations (37 T.L.R. 886) of SCRUTTON, L.J., and ATKIN, L.J., in A.-G. v. Wilts. United Dairies, Ltd. (1). In those judgments is enshrined the well known constitutional proposition D that there can be no tax without the authority of Parliament. The trouble I have in seeking to apply that proposition is to be certain that I am not falling into the error of confusing two things : (i) a tax which is demanded of the employer, which this is not, and (ii) a liability to account for moneys which, pursuant to her duty under the Act of Parliament, she has deducted from the wages of her employees, which this is. Once it is made clear that there is a E duty to account laid down in terms by Parliament so that the constitutional point is so far satisfied, and once it is shown that the employer has not accounted, she becomes liable under the regulations to pay over the sums which she has deducted and which, by reason of what occurred, she has not paid.

In the answer to the Attorney-General's information, which is referred to as part of the agreed statement of facts, it is suggested that the employer F had fully and truly accounted for the said sum of money in a letter of Feb. 1, 1946, in which she stated what sums of money she had deducted from her employees' wages and put in the bag in the safe along with other money, that the premises had been burgled, and that the amount she had deducted had been lost. That is not to account for the money within the meaning of s. 2 (1). The letter merely states how much has been deducted with an intimation, in G effect, that she is not going to pay it. The employer's only authority for not paying her employees in full is the statute and the regulations made under it. What she did with the money deducted and how she dealt with it is neither here nor there. She was not obliged to set aside actual money or to keep it in specie. She might have drawn from the bank such a sum as would have enabled her to pay her employees the net amount of their weekly wages, i.e., H the full wages less the appropriate deduction for tax, and to have paid them that sum. In these circumstances, I am at a loss to understand the argument that the total of the deductions in any one week could be said to be at the risk of the revenue authorities because the employer chose to put the relevant amount of money in a bag and put the bag in a safe. It is not suggested that the revenue authorities knew anything about this procedure, or that they were parties in any way to this method of dealing with the money. It was not money earmarked or held in such a way that it would be a breach of the employer's duty to them if she used the money for her own purposes. She was just as free to deal with it as an old lady, who had put her Church collection money in one purse and the money for the butcher or baker in another, would have been free to use the contents of either of those purses. It seems to me idle to suggest that this money was ever at the risk of the revenue authorities. This is no more a tax on the employer than any other deduction which is made under the Income Tax Acts. If a person who is liable to pay interest on an annuity and so is under a duty to deduct tax at the source chooses to put the money in a bureau or any other receptacle and the money is lost, it is absurd for him to say that the money is at the risk of the revenue authorities. There is no real foundation for the point which has been raised, and the result is that there will be judgment for the Attorney-General for £32 13*s.*, reduced by the deduction of sums which the employer was entitled to deduct by virtue of certain necessary adjustments to £28 17*s.*

Re REES' WILL TRUSTS. WILLIAMS v. HOPKINS AND OTHERS.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., Cohen and Asquith, L.JJ.), November 11, 22, 1949.]

Will—Gift to " my trustees absolutely they well knowing my wishes concerning the same "—Gift of estate on trust and not gift conditional on discharge of testator's wishes.

By his will, a testator appointed his friend H. and his solicitor W. to be executors and trustees thereof (thereinafter referred to as " my trustees"), and he devised and bequeathed all his property, subject to the payment of his funeral and testamentary expenses and debts, to " my trustees absolutely they well knowing my wishes concerning the same." The will proceeded : " [I] direct them to permit my brother L.J.R. to have and receive the rents and profits of my property at V. during his lifetime." L.J.R. pre-deceased the testator.

HELD : on its true construction the will gave to the trustees an estate on trust and not a gift conditional on their discharging the wishes communicated to them ; oral evidence to the contrary was inadmissible ; and, therefore, the trustees were not beneficially entitled to the residue.

APPEAL of the plaintiff, a surviving executor, against a decision of VAISEY, J., dated Feb. 25, 1949, and reported [1949] 1 All E.R. 609, on an adjourned summons to determine whether, on the true construction of the will of Thomas Richard Rees, an absolute gift to trustees (as such) imported a gift to them beneficially of a surplus fund remaining after certain wishes communicated to them by the testator during his lifetime had been complied with. VAISEY, J., held that there was no gift beneficially to the trustees. The Court of Appeal now affirmed this decision. The facts appear in the judgment of SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R.

Milner Holland, K.C., and Michael Bowles for the plaintiff, the surviving executor, and the first and second defendants, personal representatives of a deceased executor.

Ungoed-Thomas, K.C., and Rowe Harding for the third and remaining defendants, entitled on intestacy.

SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R. : By his will, dated July 29, 1936, the Rev. Thomas Richard Rees, by cl. 1 revoked former wills and testamentary instruments. By cl. 2 he appointed his friend, Thomas Hopkins, a farmer, and his solicitor, Roger Williams, executors and trustees of his will. Clause 3 was as follows :

> "I devise and bequeath all my estate and effects whatsoever and wheresoever of or to which I may be possessed or entitled at my death (subject to payment of my funeral and testamentary expenses and debts) unto my trustees absolutely they well knowing my wishes concerning the same and direct them to permit my brother Lewis John Rees to have and receive the rents and profits of my property at Vardre Clydach in the county of Glamorgan during his lifetime."

Clause 4 was what is known as a charging clause enabling a professional executor or trustee to charge for his professional services.

Mr. Rees died in September, 1944. His brother, Lewis John Rees, predeceased him by over four years, having died in 1940. Thomas Hopkins, the executor and trustee, survived the testator by about one year. In those circumstances the question has arisen whether, under the terms of the will and having regard to properly admissible evidence, Mr. Roger Williams, the plaintiff and surviving executor and trustee, can, either alone or with the representatives of Mr. Hopkins, claim beneficially the residue of the testator's property which has turned out to be considerable. His claim to do so rests, first, on the fact that the wishes concerning the estate mentioned in cl. 3 of the will have been proved to consist of communications made both to Mr. Williams and Mr. Hopkins regarding various payments to a number of persons and those payments alone do not anything like exhaust the residue. In addition, Mr. Williams says that the testator informed him—though it does not appear that the information was given also to Mr. Hopkins—that the residue left after discharging these various payments was to belong beneficially to Mr. Hopkins and Mr. Williams.

VAISEY, J., answered the question which I have posed negatively, and I agree with him. There are two distinct points. The first is one of the construction of the will. On its true interpretation does cl. 3 confer on the persons named as trustees an interest in the property on trust only or does it give the property to those two persons conditionally on their discharging the wishes communicated to them ? The second point which arises, if the first is decided adversely to the plaintiff trustee, is this. Although the form of the will on its proper reading creates only a trust estate in the trustees, can they, nevertheless, by oral evidence, prove that they held it on trust, having discharged the several payments to which I have already alluded, for the two trustees beneficially or the survivor of them ?

On the question of construction the learned judge cited three cases, Irvine v. Sullivan (1), Croome v. Croome (2), a case in this court, and the decision of SARGANT, J., in Re Foord (3). All those cases were, as VAISEY, J., observed, very different from the present on their facts, but they indicate the principle properly applicable in cases of this kind. I need not refer to all of them. It is sufficient to make two references to the judgment of SARGANT, J., in Re Foord (3). That was a case of a will of a very untechnical character, but it is of special significance in the present case because in that will the testator used the word "absolutely" in reference to the vital bequest. In approaching the problem SARGANT, J., cited a passage from the judgment of LORD ELDON, L.C. (1 Ves. & B. 272) in King v. Denison (4) (which was also cited in the Court of Appeal in Croome v. Croome (2)), and said ([1922] 2 Ch. 521) :

> " 'If I give to A. and his heirs all my real estate, charged with my debts, that is a devise to him for a particular purpose, but not for that purpose only. If the devise is upon trust to pay my debts, that is a devise for a particular purpose, and nothing more ; and the effect of those two modes admits just this difference. The former is a devise of an estate of inheritance for the purpose of giving the devisee the beneficial interest, subject to a particular purpose : the latter is a devise for a particular purpose ; with no intention to give him any beneficial interest.' "

The question in the present case, as it was in Foord's case (3), is : Which of the two alternatives here apply ? It is right to say that, as SARGANT, J., observed, the cases show that slight indications may well suffice to persuade the court that the intention of the testator was not to create a trust estate in the devisee, but to give him a conditional gift. With regard to "absolutely," I will cite one other passage from the judgment of SARGANT, J., where, referring to the argument, he said (ibid., 522) :

> "First, there is the use of the word 'absolutely.' No doubt it might, especially if used by some one acquainted with legal language, be construed as describing the extent of the interest in the property given—namely, the fee simple in freehold property and the absolute interest in personal property. But I think in this extremely untechnical will the testator must have used it to mean 'out and out,' and that it therefore carried not merely the full legal interest but the beneficial interest also."

I approach the construction of the present document in the light of that statement of principle by LORD ELDON which SARGANT, J., applied in Re Foord (3). First, this will, far from being an untechnical document, is manifestly a lawyer's document. Secondly, I think that in this will the word "absolutely" should be construed, not as conferring a beneficial interest, but as defining the extent of the interest in the property given, so as to confer on the trustees the property given to them—and I borrow the language used by COHEN, L.J., during the argument—free of any fetter which would prevent their carrying out his express wishes. If that be the right conclusion, it goes far to answering the question raised, for counsel for the plaintiff candidly admitted that the construction he sought to place on the word "absolutely" was the linchpin of his argument and that without it his case would wear a somewhat pale complexion.

The matter does not end there, however, because, after referring to his wishes, the next phrase is, "and direct them to permit my brother . . . to have and receive the rents." Counsel for the plaintiff said that the use of the word "permit" indicated something less than the obligation of a trust, but the phrase is not merely "to permit" but "I direct them to permit." I think that is pre-eminently language which is apt to impose the obligation of trusteeship. During the argument the point emerged that the brother, Lewis John Rees, to whom the benefit of the property was given, would, had he survived, have been the sole statutory next-of-kin of the testator. It was suggested that that was a relevant circumstance, because, if there was here a trust in favour of the next-of-kin so far as it was not exhausted by the express wishes, then the surprising conclusion would be reached that the person to benefit would be the same person as he to whom a limited interest had been given in part of the property. That seemed to me at first sight a not inconsiderable argument, and it was one which I gather was not put to the learned judge in the court below. I have come to the conclusion, however, that, on the whole, it is insufficient to tip the balance away from the trust in favour of the conditional gift. One should not assume that the testator appreciated that, if Lewis John Rees survived him, as in fact he did not, he would be the person who, under the statute, would take beneficially the whole of his estate. In any case, if so far the balance be a nice one between the two alternatives, we then have to consider the effect of cl. 4 which is the longest individual clause in the will. I do not want to over-emphasise the significance of it. I have already said that this is pre-eminently a lawyer's will and none but a lawyer would have put in a clause in this language. It goes somewhat further than that, however, for, on the construction of counsel for the plaintiff, the only possible effect that this substantial clause, occupying about a third of the whole document, could have would be to enable Mr. Williams, the solicitor, to throw on his co-trustee and co-beneficiary, Thomas Hopkins, one half of the costs which Mr. Williams' firm would charge for carrying out the duties imposed on them, a result which I conceive would be the last thing that either Mr. Williams as he drew the will or the testator could have intended. I, therefore, come to the conclusion, agreeing with the learned judge on the first point, that this will properly interpreted gives to the two trustees an estate on trust and not a conditional gift.

On the second question, as I have already indicated, I agree with the learned judge that to admit evidence to the effect that the testator informed one executor, or, I will assume in favour of counsel for the plaintiff, both the executors, that he intended them to take beneficial interests and that his wishes included that intention would be to conflict with the terms of the will as I have construed them, for the inevitable result of admitting that evidence and giving effect to it would be that the will would be regarded, not as conferring a trust estate only on Messrs. Hopkins and Williams, but as giving them a conditional gift which on construction is the thing which, if I am right, it does not do. Counsel for the plaintiff answers that once you admit the "wishes concerning the same" so far as they relate to third parties, then there is no inconsistency, for this, after all, is part of the wishes. According to the evidence, I think that is not entirely clear, but I assume it in counsel's favour. Still, that does not get over the difficulty. The admission of this evidence would involve that the trustees took, not a trust estate, but a conditional gift. The point was put by COHEN, L.J., during the argument that, supposing the express wishes were contained in some document and that the document stated that, subject to satisfaction of these various gifts, the residue should belong to the two named persons absolutely, what would then be the situation ? My first answer to that would be that that does not happen to be the fact in this case, but, if it were so and such a document were referred to in the will, it seems to me that prima facie that document would have to be included in the probate (THEOBALD ON WILLS, 10th ed., p. 66) and the question would be one of the construction of the two documents, the will and the memorandum, together.

I, therefore, agree with the learned judge also on this point, and I venture to cite from his judgment one short passage which seems to me to put the point concisely and forcibly. Having said what the nature of the evidence was, he continues :

> "Nor do I think that [Mr. Hopkins and Mr. Williams], having satisfied > the primary purposes indicated to them by the testator [i.e., the gifts to third parties], can turn round and say : 'We are no longer trustees ; we take beneficially,' any more than they can say : 'We are trustees for ourselves.' "

The learned judge in the next sentence expressed some regret at having come to a conclusion which probably defeated the wishes of the testator. I also am not insensible of that feeling. At the same time my own regrets are moderated to this extent. In the general public interest it is not to be forgotten that Parliament has laid it down that prima facie a will disposing of the property of a deceased person must follow certain strict forms. These courts, moreover, have been very insistent on the importance of the principle that those who assume the office of trustees should not, so far as they can prevent it, allow themselves to be in a position in which their interests and their duties conflict. This is a case in which the will was drawn by a solicitor, and the claim is that that solicitor is entitled, either absolutely or jointly with another, to the whole beneficial interest. In the general public interest it seems to me desirable that, if a testator wishes his property to go to his solicitor and the solicitor prepares the will, that intention on the part of the testator should appear plainly in the will and should not be arrived at by the more oblique method of what is sometimes called a secret trust. Having said that, however, it is only right that I should make it quite plain that in this case I am making no kind of reflection on the good faith and propriety of the solicitor, Mr. Williams. The learned judge expressed the view that there was here no sort of case for suggesting any impropriety on the part of the solicitor, and I do not want it to be thought, having said what I have said, to be casting any doubt on the justice of those observations. For the reasons I have given, I think that the claim here fails, and that the appeal should be dismissed.

COHEN, L.J. : I agree.

ASQUITH, L.J. : I also agree.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. LONDON STADIUMS, LTD.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Tucker, Singleton and Jenkins, L.JJ.), November 17, 1949.]

Company—Stamp duty—Exemption—Capital duty—Transfer duty—Amalgamation of companies—Transfer of undertaking in return for shares in transferee company—Sale by "existing" company of part of shareholding within two years of amalgamation—Finance Act, 1927 (c. 10), s. 55 (6) (b).

By the Finance Act, 1927, s. 55, where a company (called "the transferee company") has increased its capital with a view to the acquisition of the undertaking of an existing company, the transferee company is entitled to exemption from stamp duty on the increase and on the instrument of transfer of the undertaking in consideration of the issue of shares of the transferee company to the existing company, but it is provided by sub-s. (6) that if " (b) . . . the existing company within a period of two years from the date . . . of the authority for the increase of the capital of the transferee company ceases, otherwise than in consequence of reconstruction, amalgamation or liquidation, to be the beneficial owner of the shares so issued to it . . . the exemption shall be deemed not to have been allowed, and an amount equal to the duty remitted shall become payable forthwith, and shall be recoverable from the transferee company . . . "

A L.S. Ltd., increased its capital from £100 to £750,000 with a view to acquiring the undertaking of three existing companies, and it acquired the beneficial ownership of those undertakings under a declaration of trust in consideration of its own shares which it issued to the existing companies. It applied for and obtained exemption from capital duty on the increase and of transfer stamp duty on the conveyance of the beneficial ownership of the undertaking to it. B Within six months the existing companies sold a large portion of the shares so issued to them to a firm of stockbrokers with a view to their being offered for sale to the public, and the Revenue claimed from L.S. Ltd., payment of the capital duty and transfer duty remitted, together with interest.

HELD: by ceasing to be beneficial owners of a portion of the shares issued to them, the existing companies ceased to be beneficial owners of " the shares " within the meaning of s. 55 (6) (b), and, therefore, L.S. Ltd., lost C the exemption from duty which had been granted to it.

APPEAL by London Stadiums, Ltd., from an order of LORD GODDARD, C.J., made on July 11, 1949, reported ante, p. 362, in which he held that by reason E of the sale (within two years of the allotment) by " existing companies " of shares in London Stadiums, Ltd. (the " transferee company "), allotted to them on the acquisition of their undertakings by the " transferee company," the exemption from duty under the Finance Act, 1927, s. 55 (1), had, having regard to s. 55 (6) (b), been lost. The Court of Appeal affirmed that decision. The facts appear in the judgment of TUCKER, L.J. F

Tucker, K.C., and J. Clements for the company.

Pennycuick, K.C., and J. H. Stamp for the Attorney-General.

TUCKER, L.J.: This is an appeal from a judgment of LORD GODDARD, C.J., in an action which was brought by the Attorney-General against the G defendant company, London Stadiums, Ltd., to recover a sum of money which it was contended was due from the defendant company by virtue of the provisions of the Finance Act, 1927, s. 55 (1). The decision was given on a preliminary point on the pleadings, and we have been told that that decision, subject to questions of amount, in effect disposes of the point at issue between the parties.

The company was incorporated on Apr. 29, 1946, with a nominal capital of H £100 divided into 1,000 shares of 2*s*. each. It was established with the object, inter alia, of acquiring and taking over the undertakings of three other companies, known as the Wandsworth Stadium, Ltd., which is referred to as " the Wandsworth company," the Park Royal Stadium, Ltd., referred to as " the Park Royal company," and the Charlton Stadium (1936), Ltd., referred to as " the Charlton company." On June 5, 1946, an agreement for sale for effectuating the amalgamation was made between the three companies, which are hereafter referred to as " the existing companies," and the defendant company, which is what is referred to in s. 55 (1) as a "transferee company." By that agreement the defendant company agreed to purchase as at May 1, 1946, the goodwill and business of the existing companies, their freehold and leasehold hereditaments, their totalisators, plant, furniture, fixtures, etc., and the benefit of all pending contracts, engagements and orders, and all other property to which they were entitled in connection with their businesses, with certain specified exceptions. It was provided that the total consideration for the sale should be the sum of £749,000, payable in certain specified proportions, and that that sum should be satisfied by the allotment of 7,490,000 fully paid shares in the defendant company of 2*s.* each, 2,740,000 of those shares to be allotted to the Wandsworth company, 2,250,000 to the Park Royal company, and 2,500,000 to the Charlton company. On June 6, 1946, the capital of the defendant company was increased to £750,000 by the creation of new shares, and the consideration shares referred to under the agreement were duly allotted by the defendant company in due course. On June 17, 1946, a deed of declaration of trust was made between the three existing companies and the defendant company, whereby it was declared that those companies held their freehold and leasehold hereditaments in trust for the defendant company. That agreement and declaration of trust were duly presented for adjudication to the Inland Revenue Commissioners for stamp duty. The commissioners decided that there was 10*s.* deed duty payable on the agreement and that the declaration of trust was not chargeable with any duty, and the instruments were so adjudicated accordingly. On Nov. 4, 1946, resolutions were passed by the defendant company which resulted in 3,000,000 of the fully paid 2*s.* shares being sub-divided into 6,000,000 fully paid 1*s.* shares, and the remaining 4,500,000 fully paid shares being consolidated in such manner that every ten of such existing shares should constitute one fully paid £1 share and that the resulting 450,000 shares of £1 each be re-numbered accordingly. On or about Nov. 5, 1946, by an agreement entered into by the three existing companies and R. Edwards, Chandler & Co., the latter company agreed to purchase 2,000,000 ordinary shares of 1*s.* each in the capital of the defendant company for 9*s.* 2½*d.* a share, and on or about Nov. 8 an offer for sale to the public of 2,000,000 ordinary shares of 1*s.* each of the defendant company was made by Messrs. Edwards, Chandler & Co. All the shares included in the offer were taken up, and before the end of 1946 2,000,000 fully paid ordinary shares of 1*s.* each in the defendant company, part of the issue made in effecting the amalgamation of the three existing companies, were sold and transferred by them respectively as follows:—750,000 1*s.* shares by the Wandsworth company, 500,000 shares by the Park Royal company, and 750,000 shares by the Charlton company.

The matters at issue between the parties arise, as I have said, under the Finance Act, 1927, s. 55. That section provides :

> "(1) If in connection with a scheme for the reconstruction of any company or companies or the amalgamation of any companies it is shown to the satisfaction of the Commissioners of Inland Revenue that there exist the following conditions, that is to say . . . (b) that the company (in this section referred to as 'the transferee company') is to be registered . . . with a view to the acquisition either of the undertaking of, or of not less than ninety per cent. of the issued share capital of, any particular existing company ; (c) that the consideration for the acquisition (except such part thereof as consists in the transfer to or discharge by the transferee company of liabilities of the existing company) consists as to not less than ninety per cent. thereof—(i) where an undertaking is to be acquired, in the issue of shares in the transferee company to the existing company or to holders of shares in the existing company ; or (ii) where shares are to be acquired, in the issue of shares in the transferee company to the holders of shares in the existing company in exchange for the shares held by them in the existing > company ; then, subject to the provisions of this section . . . (B) stamp duty under the heading ‘ Conveyance or Transfer on Sale ’ in sched. I to the Stamp Act, 1891, shall not be chargeable on any instrument made for the purposes of or in connection with the transfer of the undertaking or shares . . . nor shall any such duty be chargeable under s. 12 of the Finance Act, 1895, on a copy of any Act of Parliament, or on any instrument vesting, or relating to the vesting of, the undertaking or shares in the transferee company : Provided that . . . (b) in the case of an instrument made for the purposes of or in connection with a transfer to a company within the meaning of the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, the provisions of paragraph (B) of this sub-section shall not apply unless the instrument is either—(i) executed within a period of twelve months from the date of the registration of the transferee company or the date of the resolution for the increase of the nominal share capital of the transferee company, as the case may be ; or (ii) made for the purpose of effecting a conveyance or transfer in pursuance of an agreement which has been filed, or particulars of which have been filed, with the registrar of companies within the said period of twelve months.”

It is not disputed that all the requirements of that section were fulfilled so as to enable the company to obtain the exemption from stamp duty which is therein provided, but the section goes on to provide that, notwithstanding that exemption, the company may be required to pay the duty in respect of which exemption was obtained in certain circumstances. Those circumstances are set out in sub-s. (6), and it is with regard to the language of that sub-section that this action is concerned. It provides :

> “ If . . . (b) where shares in the transferee company have been issued to the existing company in consideration of the acquisition, the existing company within a period of two years from the date, as the case may be, of the registration or incorporation, or of the authority for the increase of the capital, of the transferee company ceases, otherwise than in consequence of reconstruction, amalgamation or liquidation, to be the beneficial owner of the shares so issued to it, . . . the exemption shall be deemed not to have been allowed, and an amount equal to the duty remitted shall become payable forthwith, and shall be recoverable from the transferee company as a debt due to His Majesty, together with interest thereon . . . ”

By reason of the sale of the shares to which I have referred by the three existing companies which took place in November, 1946, and represented, so far as the Wandsworth company were concerned, a sale of some fourteen per cent. of its original one hundred per cent. consideration, in the case of the Park Royal company some eleven per cent., and in the case of the Charlton company some fifteen per cent., it was contended on behalf of the Crown that the existing companies within a period of two years have ceased to be the beneficial owners of the shares so issued to them, and, accordingly, the Crown is entitled to the payment of this duty.

The case turns on the proper construction to be put on the words “ beneficial owner of the shares so issued to it.” It is said on behalf of the Crown that, if the existing company ceases to be the beneficial owner of any single share forming part of the shares originally issued to it, the circumstances contemplated in the sub-section take effect and the duty is payable, and they contend that that is the natural and proper interpretation to be put on the words “ the shares so issued to it.” On the other hand, it is contended by the company that “ the shares so issued ” means the totality of the shares, and that, therefore, so long as the existing companies retain one share out of those issued to them, the conditions prescribed by the sub-section are not fulfilled. This is purely a question of the construction of the language of the sub-section, and, although we have been quite properly referred to certain authorities, I can derive no assistance from them, with one possible exception, subject only to this, that we have been reminded by counsel for the company that in general terms the proper approach to questions of this kind has been stated on many occasions, and, in particular, was set out by VISCOUNT HALDANE, L.C., in Lumsden v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (1). LORD HALDANE said ([1914] A.C. 887) :

> " My Lords, this appeal raises a question of much difficulty which has been the subject of elaborate argument at the Bar. But the real point lies within narrow limits, and turns on the proper construction of a few words in a statute, the Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910."

Having said that the subject was so novel and so complicated that it was inevitable that questions should arise on which the meaning of the legislature has not been made wholly free from ambiguity, he proceeded (ibid.) :

> " The duty of a court of construction in such cases is not to speculate on what was likely to have been said if those who framed the statute had thought of the point which has arisen ; but, recognising that the words leave the intention obscure, to construe them as they stand, with only such extraneous light as is reflected from within the four corners of the statute itself, read as a whole."

Then he said (ibid., 892) :

> " My Lords, it is no doubt true that there are cases of construction where the natural meaning of the words of a statute is rejected, and another meaning not expressed by the words taken in their ordinary sense is read in. That occurs where the context and scheme of the statute requires that this should be done in order that the language of the statute as a whole may be read as consistent. But a mere conjecture that Parliament entertained a purpose which, however natural, has not been embodied in the words it has used if they be literally interpreted is no sufficient reason for departing from the literal interpretation."

Finally, he said (ibid., 896) :

> " . . . I said at the beginning that the duty of judges in construing statutes is to adhere to the literal construction unless the context renders it plain that such a construction cannot be put on the words. This rule is especially important in cases of statutes which impose taxation."

I take it that this is the manner in which we should approach the construction of this sub-section. I think there can be no doubt about that, but I go further. I am prepared to assume, without deciding, that in interpreting this section we should apply the rule that where there is any real ambiguity in the meaning, this being a taxing statute, it should be resolved in favour of the taxpayer. I say that I am prepared to assume that without deciding it, because we have not thought it necessary to hear argument on behalf of the Attorney-General in this case, and s. 55 deals with the conditions which are required in order that a special exemption which has previously been given shall continue to avail the taxpayer who has received it. I am prepared to assume that those principles of construction should apply to a case of this kind, but that only arises if I should be of opinion that the language of the sub-section is ambiguous. I do not so think. I think the language of the section in its context is reasonably plain, and, without speculating as to the ultimate intentions of the legislature, whether they sought to achieve a certain permanence of amalgamation or not—it seems to me clear from the whole structure of the section that they intended to preserve the status quo in this matter as it existed at the time when exemption was given for the period of two years, and that, if there were any alteration in the status quo by means of the beneficial ownership of any part of the shares issued ceasing to remain in the existing companies, then payment under the provisions of the sub-section should become effective. To give the words any other meaning would render the whole of this part of the scheme—this sub-section, at any rate—purely nugatory. If, by retaining one share out of hundreds of thousands, possibly, of shares issued, the company could retain the benefit of the exemption, it is difficult to see what purpose could possibly have been achieved by the insertion of the sub-section.

A It is pressed on us by counsel for the company that there may have been a slip by the draftsman of s. 55, and that, therefore, the remedy of the Crown lies with Parliament and not with us. I do not so read these words. It is true that a pleader dealing with a matter of this kind, to make that which was clear, or tolerably clear, manifest beyond all dispute, might have used the words "or any of them," but it seems to me that the words "the shares so issued," having regard to the structure of the section as a whole, mean, and clearly mean, B "the shares or any of them."

That is the view at which LORD GODDARD, C.J., arrived in this case. He said (ante, p. 364):

> "I have simply to see what is the true construction of the words, 'the beneficial owner of the shares so issued to it.' It seems to me that, if one looks at the object of the section, which deals with what I may C call a genuine amalgamation of companies, it contemplates that, if the transferee company is to get the substantial benefit that is given in the shape of relief from stamp duty, the existing companies must keep those shares and not market them to the public or elsewhere for a period of at least two years. The section was not meant to facilitate the creation of a market in shares. It was meant to facilitate the genuine amalgamation of D businesses which were to remain amalgamated for at least two years . . . I think it is impossible to say that, where a person parts with some of the shares that have been issued to him, he remains the beneficial owner of the shares so issued."

That that is the proper interpretation to be given to the language of this sub-section is further reinforced by the words of SIR WILFRID GREENE, M.R., E although, it is true, they were only obiter, in Lever Brothers, Ltd. v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (2). He was there dealing, not with para. (b) but with para. (c) of sub-s. (6), where exactly the same words occur, and he said ([1938] 2 All E.R. 811):

> "There is one other provision in the section which appears to me to point F strongly in the same direction. Under s. 55 (6), provisions are put in for what I may, for the sake of brevity, call ensuring some degree of permanence in the amalgamation which is to be carried through. Obviously, the legislature would not be willing to grant exemption from stamp duties unless it were in connection with something which was not merely in form an amalgamation, but an amalgamation to which an end was not going to be G put within a few weeks, or something of that kind, by disposing of the shares which had been acquired. It would have been a curious result if the benefit of a provision which was obviously enacted to encourage, or, at any rate, to prevent discouragement of, amalgamation could be obtained without ensuring that there should be an effective amalgamation with, at any rate, some degree of permanence in it. With a view to that, sub-s. (6) H provides, among other matters, that, where the acquiring company has acquired shares in the other company (if it is that type of amalgamation), if the shares are sold, or if any of the shares are sold, or got rid of, within two years, then the benefit of the exemption which has been granted shall be taken back, and the duty must be paid."

He there uses the words "if the shares . . . or . . . any of the shares are sold."

In that passage SIR WILFRID GREENE, M.R., as, indeed, did LORD GODDARD in the present case, expressed the view that the object of the section was to achieve a certain permanence of amalgamation. It was argued by counsel for the company that a view of this legislation as a whole showed that that result did not necessarily follow. I express no view about that. There are those two very weighty expressions of opinion with regard to it. I think it is sufficient to say that the intention of the legislature was to preserve the status quo, whatever may have been the ultimate object aimed at.

There is only one other matter to which I should refer before passing from this question, in justice to the argument of counsel for the company. He emphasised the fact that in para. (b) of sub-s. (6) occur the words " otherwise than in consequence of reconstruction, amalgamation or liquidation," and he said that those three excepted operations, which might result in a cesser of the beneficial ownership, necessarily involved a one hundred per cent. cesser. Be that as it may, in my view it is not sufficient to put a different meaning on the words which follow. The fact that in certain events the cesser may be one hundred per cent., does not, in my view, prevent the section operating when in other circumstances the cesser is only partial. For these reasons, I think that this appeal fails.

SINGLETON, L.J. : I agree.

JENKINS, L.J. : I agree, and I will venture to add only a very few words of my own on the construction of s. 55 (6) (b). For my part, I think " the shares so issued to it " means " all the shares so issued to it." Further, I think " the beneficial owner of the shares so issued to it " means " the person who owns beneficially all the shares so issued to it." The company to which the shares in question were issued clearly ceases to be " the beneficial owner of all the shares so issued to it " when it parts with any of those shares. I think the argument of counsel for the company proceeds on a wrong construction, which consists of taking the words " ceases to be the beneficial owner of " together and treating them, as it were, as a compound verb equivalent to " parts with the beneficial ownership of." If one so construes those words, one does get an ambiguity, but, in my judgment, there is no ground for so construing them, and I think, on the true construction of this paragraph, the words " ceases to be " qualify the phrase " the beneficial owner of the shares so issued to it." The event referred to is the event of the existing company ceasing to occupy the position of being the beneficial owner of, or, in other words, the person who owns beneficially, all the shares issued to it. If there were any ambiguity in the language of sub-s. (6) (b), taken by itself, I entirely agree with my Lord that, when the section is looked at as a whole, it is abundantly plain that the result must be as he has stated. I, therefore, agree that the appeal fails.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

MONA OIL EQUIPMENT & SUPPLY CO., LTD. v. RHODESIA RAILWAYS, LTD.

[King's Bench Division (Devlin, J.), November 1, 2, 3, 18, 1949.]

Contract—Prevention of performance—Need for breach of term of contract—Implied condition to co-operate—Misunderstanding not removed—Obstruction by defendants' agent—Liability of defendants.

As the sellers required immediate payment in order to be able to carry out a contract for the sale of seventy-five oil tanks, a term in the contract provided : " As an alternative against bill of lading payment may be made against signed confirmation by T. & Co. [the buyers' shipping agents] that the tanks are now at the disposal of " the buyers. The sellers' representative called on T. & Co. who knew of the arrangement but refused to act until written instructions were received. On complaint by the sellers' representative that T. & Co. (whose attitude he had misunderstood) were refusing to act at all, the buyers did not ask T. & Co. about the complaint or tell them of the misconception that had arisen, nor did they inform the sellers' representative that they were that day (as they, in fact, were) sending instructions to T. & Co. In consequence, the sellers' representative did not again approach T. & Co. on the matter. The contract not having been performed, the sellers brought an action for damages for breach of contract, alleging breach of an implied duty on the buyers' part to do nothing to prevent or obstruct the performance of the condition of payment on which the contract depended.

Held : (i) except possibly in the rare case of a wrongful act independent of the contract, an act preventing or obstructing the performance of a condition by the other party to a contract to be actionable must be such as itself to constitute a breach of an express or implied term of the contract and should be so pleaded.

(ii) by instructing T. & Co., the buyers had done all that they were legally required to do to make the contract effective. The removal of the misunderstanding which had arisen between the sellers' representative and T. & Co. was not the subject of any implied contractual obligation ; and, therefore, the lack of co-operation which the buyers had evinced in not removing that misunderstanding was not a breach of an implied term of the contract.

Action for damages for breach of a contract of sale of seventy-five oil tanks.

The defendants instructed their buying agency in London to buy seventy-five oil tanks from the plaintiffs at £150 f.o.b. each for the earliest possible shipment to Rhodesia. The plaintiffs, who had not the tanks in their possession though they were in a position to buy them, made it clear to the agency that they could not themselves finance the deal and would require immediate cash, and on Feb. 17, 1949, the contract was signed. It contained inter alia the condition : " Immediately the goods have passed inspection and are ready for shipment, invoices are to be sent direct to the [defendant] company." At the foot of the contract the defendants' agent wrote " Payment against invoices." By mutual agreement the contract was varied later the same day, and instead of the cash payment a letter of credit in the usual form providing for payment against documents was substituted. At the same time the following further clause was inserted in the contract : " As an alternative against bill of lading payment may be made against signed confirmation by Messrs. Turnbull, Gibson and Co. [the defendants' shipping agents] that the tanks are now at the disposal of Rhodesia Railways, Ltd." The plaintiffs placed their order for the tanks with their suppliers on Feb. 17, and arranged for the necessary credit, and on Feb. 21 their representatives interviewed Messrs. Turnbull, Gibson & Co. Though aware of the general arrangements, that firm had not received written instructions and they refused to act until they received them. There was a misunderstanding about the effect of the interview, as the result of which the plaintiffs' representative was convinced that Turnbull, Gibson & Co. was refusing to act at all, and he at once complained of this attitude to the defendants' agents. On the same day the defendants' agents had sent the written instructions to Messrs. Turnbull, Gibson & Co., but the plaintiffs' representative was not so informed nor was anything said then or later to remove the misunderstanding. Accordingly, the plaintiffs did not call again on the buying agents or take up the matter with them. On Mar. 3 the plaintiffs wrote to the agents saying that as the arrangement for payment on the letter of credit depended on Messrs. Turnbull, Gibson & Co. and as they " are unwilling to give their services in this matter . . . we must ask for payment to be made in accordance with the contract of Feb. 17. The tanks have already been invoiced to you and we shall be glad to receive your cheque in due course." To that letter the defendants' agents replied that their consulting engineers would inspect the tanks, and, if they reported that they were available and in good condition, the contract would be dealt with forthwith (meaning, according to the evidence, that payment would be made). The tanks were to be delivered in parts, and parts for about 150 tanks were held for disposal by the plaintiffs' suppliers. After inspection the engineers reported that the material appeared to be generally in serviceable condition, but it would be advisable to consider certain individual items, some plates and bolts of the tanks being corroded. The plaintiffs gave an assurance that only really good parts would be dispatched, and by Mar. 14 they had arranged with their suppliers for a written assurance to be given that they held seventy-five tanks at the plaintiffs' disposal. In a letter dated Mar. 14 the plaintiffs offered to hand this document to the defendants against cash. On Mar. 16 the defendants wrote in effect refusing to pay until the parts to be appropriated to the contract had been segregated, inspected again, and held to their order. On Mar. 17 the plaintiffs' suppliers cancelled the contract for the tanks and the plaintiffs issued a writ against the defendants. The plaintiffs contended that the term of the contract that payment would be made against signed confirmation by Messrs. Turnbull, Gibson & Co., impliedly cast on the defendants the duty of procuring their agents to take all reasonable steps to ascertain whether the tanks were at the disposal of the defendants and also of doing nothing to prevent or obstruct the performance of the condition of payment, and they alleged a breach of this duty. The defendants denied a breach, and contended alternatively that any breach, if breach there was, gave rise to only nominal damages. DEVLIN, J., gave judgment for the defendants with costs.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 18. DEVLIN, J., read a judgment in which he reviewed the evidence; found the facts as stated; held that the clause in the letter of credit imposed on Messrs. Turnbull, Gibson & Co. no duty to take the initiative or to prepare a draft of any document, but only a duty to confirm the effect of material, documentary in character, such as a delivery order, to be put before them; and continued: I can now consider whether the terms alleged by the plaintiffs can properly be implied, and, if so, whether they have been broken. The first term alleged is that the defendants would procure their agents, Messrs. Turnbull, Gibson & Co., to take, and that the agents would take, all reasonable steps to ascertain whether the tanks were at the disposal of the defendants. It is conceded by the defendants, I think rightly, that there was a duty on them to instruct Messrs. Turnbull, Gibson & Co. to act. This they did by the letter of Feb. 21. It is not suggested that these instructions were not given with reasonable promptitude or that they were in any way deficient. On the construction which I have given to the clause the duty of Messrs. Turnbull, Gibson & Co. did not require them to take any steps until some material was placed before them. No material was ever placed before them. I find that Turnbull, Gibson & Co. were properly instructed and that they were not lacking in their duty. The word "procure" in the alleged term is wider than "instruct." In support of the contention that there was a wider duty I was referred to Frederick Leyland, Ltd. v. Compagna Panamena (1) and particularly to the dictum of GODDARD, L.J. (76 Ll. L.R. 127), which was subsequently approved by LORD THANKERTON in the House of Lords ([1947] A.C. 428). It was there held that where a surveyor, invested with the power to certify, misconceived his function and refused to act it was the duty of his employers to put him right or dismiss him and appoint another. I need not consider the application of this principle, for, on my view, Messrs. Turnbull, Gibson & Co. did not refuse to act, and there is nothing to show that they misconceived their function.

The second term alleged is that the defendants would do nothing to prevent or obstruct the performance of the condition of payment in the Messrs. Turnbull, Gibson & Co. clause. This is a common form of allegation, but I venture to think that in the light of the decision in Luxor (Eastbourne), Ltd. v. Cooper (2) its use could now with advantage be restricted to the exceptional case. It is generally regarded as originating from the dictum of WILLES, J., in Inchbald v. Neilgherry Coffee, Tea & Cinchona Plantation Co., Ltd. (3). It was applied in Trollope (George) & Sons v. Martyn Bros. (4) but with the qualification that the prevention must be "without just cause or excuse." In Luxor (Eastbourne), Ltd. v. Cooper (2) the right qualification was said by LORD WRIGHT to be that the prevention must be wrongful. LORD WRIGHT explains what this means in the following passage ([1941] 1 All E.R. 60):

> "When a defendant is charged by a plaintiff with having prevented the plaintiff from fulfilling a condition on which his right to payment depends, it must, in my opinion, be shown that the defendant's act which prevented was wrongful. The wrong would be generally a breach of the contract. Thus, in Mackay v. Dick (5), the maker of an excavating machine was required by the contract to send the machine for the purpose of being tested to the railway cutting which the buyer was engaged in constructing, and the buyer was only to be liable to pay for it if it there, in working, satisfied the test. This House held that the buyers had prevented fulfilment of the condition because they held that, it being the buyer's duty under the contract to provide the necessary facilities, they had failed to do so. Hence their default > prevented the seller from satisfying the condition. The seller could therefore say that he had done all that lay on him to fulfil the condition and was to be taken to have implemented it. The test was only not satisfied because of the buyer's default. Thus, when it is said in the present case that the appellants prevented the respondents from completing the contract, it must be shown that the appellants broke some term of the contract between them and the respondents. The appellants cannot be held liable on the ground of prevention where all that happened was that they did, or omitted to do, something which, as between themselves or the respondents, they were free to do or to omit to do. I question if there is any exception to this principle, but I am clear that there is no exception material to this case."

This shows that, except possibly in the rare cases where the wrongful act alleged is independent of the contract, the allegation of prevention is only circumlocution. Where the wrongful act is a breach of the contract, it can stand alone. There is no advantage in alleging an implied term not to break another term. Indeed, it is absurd, since it is implicit in this form of allegation that the breach of the second term is objectionable only if it prevents the performance of a condition. Plainly no pleader would allow himself to get involved in this form of allegation if the second term was express, so that the proposition of law on which this form of pleading rests may be stated thus: "It is an implied term of a contract that a party will not by breaking a second implied term prevent the other party from fulfilling a third term." Clearly, everything except the central allegation of breach is confusing verbiage. It is confusing because it distracts attention from the heart of the matter, which is to ascertain whether there is a proper basis for the implication of the second term. It suggests that the principal, if not the only, criterion by which this implication should be judged, is whether, in the absence of the proposed term, the performance of a condition by the other party, generally the one involving his right to payment, could be prevented with impunity. In truth, the proposed term, like all other implied terms, must be judged by the test whether or not it is necessary for the business efficacy of the contract. The fact that an act, if not prohibited by the contract, is one which would result in a party being robbed of the benefits which otherwise the contract would give him is certainly an important matter to be considered in relation to the business efficacy of the contract, but it is not necessarily the most important, and it is certainly not the only matter. There are many decided cases in which it has not prevailed.

Mackay v. Dick (5), cited by LORD WRIGHT in the passage I have quoted above, contains two separate and independent propositions, one enunciated by LORD BLACKBURN, and the other by LORD WATSON, and there is a danger of misunderstanding them if, as in the headnote to the case, they are combined into one. The first is set out in the words of LORD BLACKBURN (6 App. Cas. 263) :

> " . . . where in a written contract it appears that both parties have agreed that something shall be done, which cannot effectually be done unless both concur in doing it, the construction of the contract is that each agrees to do all that is necessary to be done on his part for the carrying out of that thing, though there may be no express words to that effect."

It will be observed that LORD BLACKBURN says nothing about prevention. The principle he enunciates may be put succinctly, as VISCOUNT SIMON, L.C., put it in Luxor (Eastbourne), Ltd. v. Cooper (2) ([1941] 1 All E.R. 39), saying that where co-operation is necessary, it is implied that it is forthcoming. If the matter rested there, the plaintiff's normal remedy for breach of the implied term would be damages. The second proposition, based on the opinion of LORD WATSON, advances a stage further and gives the plaintiff in appropriate cases an additional form of relief. If the breach of the implied term prevents the plaintiff from performing a condition binding on him, he is to be taken as having fulfilled that condition, and, if the condition is one on which his right to payment depends, he may sue for payment instead of damages. That these propositions are distinct is shown by the fact that Lord Blackburn's reasoning does not involve the second at all. His construction of the contract does not require it. He says (6 App. Cas. 264):

> " . . . . the defender, having had the machine delivered to him, was by his contract to keep it, unless on a fair test according to the contract it failed to do the stipulated quantity of work, in which case he would be entitled to call on the pursuers to remove it. And by his own default he can now never be in a position to call upon the pursuers to take back the machine, on the ground that the test had not been satisfied, he must, as far as regards that, keep, and consequently pay for it."

On this view there was no question of the defender preventing the pursuers from claiming payment. He prevented himself from escaping from the liability to pay. The point is developed in the judgment of McCardie, J., in Colley v. Overseas Exporters (6).

Lord Watson (6 App. Cas. 270) proceeded on a different construction of the contract and so invoked the principle I have stated. He rested it on well established doctrine (see also the authorities cited by McCardie, J., in Colley v. Overseas Exporters (6)) and not on any implication in the contract. The formulation of the implied term in cases of this class depends, in my judgment, on the necessity for co-operation. Without co-operation the contract would lack business efficacy, and this class of case is, therefore, simply an exemplification of the general principle. This analysis of the term pleaded (in which I intend no disrespect to the pleader in this case, for, as I have said, it is common form) is, I hope, not too elaborate, since it enables me, if it is right, to reach a speedy conclusion on the facts. I do not need to inquire whether the defendants' actions prevented or obstructed the plaintiffs from getting payment. I can ask myself whether there can be implied in this contract any term (none is specifically pleaded) prohibiting the acts complained of in the amended statement of claim in so far as I have found them proved. I can think of no term that can properly be implied other than one based on the necessity for co-operation. It is, no doubt, true that every business contract depends for its smooth working on co-operation, but in the ordinary business contract, and apart, of course, from express terms, the law can enforce co-operation only in a limited degree—to the extent that is necessary to make the contract workable. For any higher degree of co-operation the parties must rely on the desire that both of them usually have that the business should get done. Unfortunately for the plaintiffs, the desire of Mr. Chamberlain [the defendants' representative] to do business with them evaporated after Feb. 17. I think it can properly be implied in this contract that the defendants should instruct Messrs. Turnbull, Gibson & Co. to act as otherwise the relevant clause would be unworkable. This was done. The plaintiffs failed to take advantage of the clause through their own misunderstanding, which Mr. Chamberlain did nothing to remove and which his behaviour probably confirmed, but the removal of misunderstanding is quite beyond the reach of implied contractual obligation. Since Luxor (Eastbourne), Ltd. v. Cooper (2) it is clear that the court cannot by means of an implied term prohibit arbitrary behaviour or acts done "without just cause or excuse," for the reason that such matters are not capable of sufficiently precise definition. For the same reason the court cannot by such means exact a higher degree of co-operation than that which can be defined by reference to the necessities of the contract. There will be judgment for the defendants with costs.

GRAY AND OTHERS v. SOUTHOUSE AND ANOTHER.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Devlin, J.), November 16, 17, 18, 1949.]

Contract—Failure of consideration—Recovery of money paid—Premium paid for grant of sub-tenancy of premises subject to the Rent Acts—Payment of premiums prohibited—Tenant a statutory tenant and so unable to sublet—Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920 (c. 17), s. 8 (1) (2), as amended by the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1939 (c. 71), sched. I.

In the course of negotiations for a sub-tenancy of a flat subject to the Rent Restrictions Acts the prospective sub-tenants paid a premium to the tenant notwithstanding the prohibition of any such payment by the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, s. 8 (1), as amended by the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1939, sched. I. The sub-tenants were aware that they were doing that which was prohibited by law and they lent themselves to a scheme for the disguising of the payment by representing it as money paid for the cost of the re-decoration of the flat. The tenant, being a statutory tenant, was unable to grant the sub-tenancy. In an action by the sub-tenants for recovery of the sums paid on the ground that they had been paid for a consideration which had failed,

HELD : although, in general, as a matter of public policy, the court would not assist a party to recover money paid by him in the course of the commission of an illegal act, it was not contrary to public policy in this particular class of case for a person who had paid a premium to be allowed to recover it, and the sub-tenants were entitled to recover the premium as money paid for a consideration that had wholly failed.

[AS TO MONEY PAID IN PURSUANCE OF AN ILLEGAL CONTRACT, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 7, pp. 174-176, para. 249 ; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 12, pp. 281-289, Nos. 2307-2375.]

Case referred to :

(1) Browning v. Morris, (1778), 2 Cowp. 790 ; 12 Digest 288, 2363.

ACTION for the recovery of money paid under a contract, the consideration for which, it was alleged, had wholly failed.

The plaintiffs sought to recover sums amounting to £169 8*s.* 6*d.*, which they had paid to one Hunt, the second defendant, as the agent of the first defendant in negotiations for a sub-lease of a flat at 71, Perham Road, London, W.14, as a premium to the first defendant, the tenant. During the negotiations it appeared that the first defendant was a statutory tenant and, therefore, was unable to grant a sub-tenancy, and the present claim was made, but the question arose whether it was not contrary to public policy for the court to assist the plaintiffs to recover money the payment of which they had been aware was forbidden by the law. DEVLIN, J., held that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover the premium.

Alan Fletcher for the plaintiffs.
Harold Brown for the first defendant.
The second defendant did not appear.

DEVLIN, J., reviewed the evidence, found as a fact that the second defendant was the agent of the first defendant, and that the first defendant was liable to repay the premium subject to the question of public policy, and continued : With regard to this question, it was made plain that the plaintiffs knew that, in paying a premium of £150, they were doing something which the law forbade. The ordinary rule is that the court will not assist any party who comes before it to recover money if it is necessary for the party presenting the cause of action to rely on the commission by him of an illegal act. The Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, s. 8, as amended by the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1939, sched. I, provides :

> "(1) A person shall not, as a condition of the grant, renewal, or continuance of a tenancy or sub-tenancy of any dwelling-house to which this Act applies, require the payment of any fine, premium, or other like sum, A or the giving of any pecuniary consideration, in addition to the rent, and, where any such payment or consideration has been made or given in respect of any such dwelling-house under an agreement made after Sep. 1, 1939, the amount or value thereof shall be recoverable by the person by whom it was made or given . . . (2) A person requiring any payment or the giving of any consideration in contravention of this section, shall be liable B on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding £100 . . ."

The Act, therefore, prohibits the requiring of a payment to be made to the landlord, and it is possible that, if a tenant pays a premium, he is guilty of aiding and abetting the criminal offence for which the section provides, and since the plaintiffs appear to have lent themselves to a scheme for disguising the matter by representing their payment as one made for the cost of re-decorations C I shall assume for the purposes of this case that the plaintiffs are so guilty. The main point on which counsel for the plaintiffs has relied is the provision in the section under which the premium shall be recoverable by the person by whom it was made or given. If that is given its full effect, it would mean, if this were a case under the Act, which it is not, that the plaintiffs would be able to recover the premium which they had paid. D

At first sight it seems curious, when the rule is so clearly defined that a court will not assist a plaintiff to recover money which is paid as part of an illegal scheme connived at by him, that Parliament should provide that, although the tenant is particeps criminis, he be entitled to get his money back. I have, therefore, felt it necessary to consider whether that provision ought not to be restricted to tenants who were not participes criminis, and was merely intended E as a procedural means provided by the statute whereby they might get their money back. On the whole, however, I think that that is not the right meaning of the provision. It is necessary to remember that when matters of this sort come before the courts the criminal offence is over. There could be no question of anything that the court does furthering the commission of a crime. The question that the court has to consider in this type of case is what is to happen F to property which has been disposed of in one way or another in the course of the crime. The broad rule is that the court will assist neither side, and that the loss lies where it falls. Like all broad rules it produces hard cases. It often happens that the less guilty of the two parties is the loser, and, therefore, there is nothing inherently immoral in the idea of Parliament considering that in a particular class of case it is desirable that the money should go to one side rather G than to the other.

The Rent Acts are Acts for the protection of tenants, and Parliament might very well have had it in mind that, unless it altered the common law rule, the result would be that the landlord, who would generally be far the more guilty party of the two, would be left in possession of the fruits of his illegality. That is the proper view of the statute, and it is reinforced by Browning v. Morris (1), H where LORD MANSFIELD, C.J., in his judgment says (2 Cowp. 792) :

> "But, where contracts or transactions are prohibited by positive statutes, for the sake of protecting one set of men from another set of men ; the one, from their situation and condition, being liable to be oppressed or imposed upon by the other ; there, the parties are not in pari delicto ; and in furtherance of these statutes, the person injured, after the transaction is finished and completed, may bring his action and defeat the contract."

Accordingly, I hold that there is no need to restrict the full meaning of the provision on which counsel for the plaintiffs relies. On the contrary, if Parliament had intended the benefit of the provision to be limited to innocent persons, it would be surprising that it used such unqualified language. After all, by 1939, when the section I am considering was before Parliament, it was widely known to all classes of the community that the giving of " key money " or premiums for tenancies of controlled dwelling-houses was illegal. The cases of innocent tenants must be very rare, and I can hardly believe that Parliament intended the wide words of the statute to be restricted to those exceptional cases. This is not a claim made under the Act, and the Act is not pleaded in support of it. All I have to do, therefore, is to satisfy myself that it is not contrary to public policy in this particular class of case that the plaintiffs should recover the sums for which they sue. I am satisfied that public policy puts no impediment in the way of their obtaining judgment.

MARRIAGE v. EAST NORFOLK RIVERS CATCHMENT BOARD.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Tucker, Singleton and Jenkins, L.JJ.), November 1, 2, 3, 4, 24, 1949.]

Land Drainage—Catchment board—Cleansing watercourse—Damage to plaintiff's bridge—Dredgings deposited on bank—Diversion of flood waters—Action for nuisance, alternatively, negligence, by plaintiff—Competence—Land Drainage Act, 1930 (c. 44), s. 34 (1), (3), s. 38 (1).

By the Land Drainage Act, 1930, s. 34 (1), a catchment board were empowered to maintain and improve existing works and to construct new works, and by s. 38 (1) they were allowed to deposit on the banks of a watercourse any matter removed in the course of dredging that watercourse. By s. 34 (3) : " Where injury is sustained by any person by reason of the exercise by a drainage board of any of its powers under this section, the board shall be liable to make full compensation to the injured person, and in case of dispute the amount of the compensation shall be determined in the manner in which disputed compensation for land is required to be determined by the Lands Clauses Acts."

In pursuance of their statutory powers a catchment board deposited on the south bank of a river dredgings taken from the river, thereby raising the bank from one to two feet, this work being completed on Jan. 6, 1944. In December, 1946, the river flooded, and, as the flood waters were prevented by the deposited dredgings from escaping over the south bank as they had formerly done, they ran through a by-pass on the north of the river and swept away a bridge leading across it to a mill. The owner of the bridge brought an action against the board, claiming damages for nuisance in the loss of the bridge :

HELD : (i) where a statute empowering the execution of a variety of works gave to the statutory authority wide powers, which necessarily involved the possibility of interference with the rights of others, and expressly provided a remedy by way of compensation, a person who sustained injury through the carrying out of operations authorised by the statute had no right of action for nuisance ; and, therefore, as the injury sustained by the plaintiff was occasioned by a normal drainage operation, carried out in the usual way, under the powers given to the catchment board by s. 34 (1) of the Land Drainage Act, 1930, the plaintiff's only remedy for the injury of which he complained was to claim compensation under s. 34 (3) of the Act.

(ii) under s. 34 (3), it was for the arbitrator to decide not merely the quantum of the compensation, but also whether the plaintiff was entitled to compensation.

APPEAL by the plaintiff from an order of BYRNE, J., dated May 12, 1949, and reported ante, p. 50.

The plaintiff was a miller who owned Limbourne Mill on the River Waveney at Wortwell, near Harleston, in the county of Norfolk, and also a bridge leading to the mill across a by-pass channel on the north side of the river below a weir. The defendants were the East Norfolk Rivers Catchment Board, a public authority whose area included the River Waveney. In December, 1946, when the river was in flood, the plaintiff's bridge collapsed, and the plaintiff brought an action claiming damages for nuisance, the writ in the action being issued on Nov. 5, 1947. BYRNE, J., found as a fact that the collapse occurred because, from Oct. 1, 1943, until Jan. 6, 1944, the catchment board, while engaged in dredging the river, had deposited the dredgings on the south bank, thereby raising it from one to two feet, with the result that the flood waters were unable to escape over the south bank, as they had done in previous years, and ran instead through the by-pass channel, scouring the channel and undermining the buttresses of the bridge. The catchment board contended that the plaintiff's sole remedy was a claim for compensation under the Land Drainage Act, 1930, s. 34 (3), and that, in any event, the action was statute-barred under the Limitation Act, 1939, s. 21 (1), as it was an action against a public authority commenced more than one year after the cause of action arose. BYRNE, J., gave judgment for the catchment board on both issues. From this decision the plaintiff appealed, and during the appeal he was allowed to amend the statement of claim by adding an allegation of negligence on the terms that he was confined to the particulars already delivered. The Court of Appeal now held that the evidence did not establish negligence, and they upheld the decision of the learned judge that the plaintiff's action was not maintainable. In view of their decision they considered it unnecessary to decide the question arising under the Limitation Act, 1939, s. 21 (1).

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 24. The following judgments were read.

TUCKER, L.J. : This is an appeal from a decision of BYRNE, J., by which he gave judgment for the defendants, the catchment board, in an action for damages for nuisance, brought against them by the plaintiff, who at all material times was the owner and occupier of a mill known as Wortwell Mill, situate on the River Waveney, which is a main river within the defendant board's area under the Land Drainage Act, 1930. The material facts can be stated quite shortly. On Oct. 1, 1943, the board, under the powers conferred on them by the aforementioned Act, began dredging operations in the Waveney just above the plaintiff's mill. The dredging continued up stream for nearly a mile and was completed by Jan. 6, 1944. The spoil from the dredging operations was all placed on the south bank of the river, which the learned judge has found to have been slightly lower than the north bank before the dredging. The result of the deposit of spoil was to raise the south bank so that it was between one foot and two feet higher than the north bank. The judge has further found that there were certain defined natural channels on the south side of the river which in times of flood carried the flood water which would otherwise have flooded the fields to the south. The operations, which were completed by Jan. 6, 1944, did not affect the plaintiff until December, 1946, when a flood occurred. As a result of the level of the bank on the south side having been raised, the fields on the north side became flooded and the volume of water in a by-pass channel of the river which flowed under a bridge on the plaintiff's property to the north of the mill was greatly increased. The flood waters scoured the by-pass channel and undermined the buttresses of the bridge causing its collapse. It was for this damage, agreed at £205 19*s.*, that the action was brought.

There were issues at the trial as to whether the damage complained of was due to the defendants' dredging operations or was caused by a turbine erected by the plaintiff across the mouth of the by-pass channel and/or a crest board which the plaintiff was alleged to have installed on the overflow weir. Both these issues were decided favourably to the plaintiff, and the judge stated that he preferred the plaintiff's evidence to that of the board's engineer at all points where they were at variance. The learned judge found as a fact that by the operations described above the board diverted the ordinary flood course of A the river and thus did an act which, if done by a riparian owner, would have been actionable at the suit of another riparian owner. For the purposes of this judgment I am content to assume that the learned judge's findings in regard to the diversion of the river were justified on the evidence. Counsel for the board was prepared to argue that on examination of the evidence it would be found that the necessary elements to found an action by a riparian owner were not B present, but he submitted that in any event the plaintiff's only remedy was to claim compensation under the Land Drainage Act, 1930, s. 34 (3). As I accept the latter contention, I have not examined the evidence on this point as fully as would otherwise have been necessary, nor have we heard argument thereon.

In the circumstances the question for decision is whether on these findings the learned judge was right in holding that the plaintiff's only remedy was to C claim compensation. This is purely a question of construction of the Land Drainage Act, 1930. The following are the relevant sections of the Act. Section 1 (3) provides :

> " Subject to the provisions of this Act, a drainage board shall exercise a general supervision over all matters relating to the drainage of land within its district and shall have such other powers and perform such other duties D as are conferred or imposed on drainage boards by this Act."

Section 6 (1) provides :

> " The powers conferred by this Act on drainage boards shall, so far as concerns the main river, including the banks thereof, and drainage works in connection with the main river, be exercisable solely by the catchment board." E

Section 12 (1) gives the Minister of Agriculture power to give directions with respect to the performance of their duties by the catchment board. Then comes s. 34, which is the all-important section for present purposes, except for sub-s. (2), which is not material. The section provides :

> " (1) Every drainage board acting within its district shall have power : F (a) to maintain existing works, that is to say, to cleanse, repair or otherwise maintain in a due state of efficiency any existing watercourse or drainage work : (b) to improve any existing works, that is to say, to deepen, widen, straighten or otherwise improve any existing watercourse, or remove mill dams, weirs or other obstructions to watercourses, or raise, widen, or otherwise improve any existing drainage work : (c) to construct new works, G that is to say, to make any new watercourse or drainage work or erect any machinery or do any other act not hereinbefore referred to, required for the drainage of the area comprised within their district : Provided that a catchment board shall not, by virtue only of this sub-section, be taken to be authorised to do any work otherwise than in relation to the main river. (3) Where injury is sustained by any person by reason of the exercise by a H drainage board of any of its powers under this section, the board shall be liable to make full compensation to the injured person, and in case of dispute the amount of the compensation shall be determined in the manner in which disputed compensation for land is required to be determined by the Lands Clauses Acts. (4) It is hereby declared that nothing in this section authorises any person to enter on the land of any person except for the purpose of maintaining existing works."

Section 38 (1) provides :

> " A drainage board, without making payment therefor or giving compensation in respect thereof, may appropriate and dispose of any shingle, sand, clay, gravel, stone, rock or other matter removed in the course of the execution of any work for widening, deepening or dredging any watercourse, and may deposit any matter so removed on the banks of the watercourse or use it in any other manner for the maintenance or improvement of those banks or for the purposes of the execution of any other work which the drainage board have power to execute."

It is, I think, clear that the powers conferred by s. 34 (1) necessarily involve the possibility of violation of the legal rights of riparian owners and that the exercise of such powers and the manner in which they are to be exercised are matters within the discretion of the board. If a riparian owner becomes aware that a catchment board is intending to carry out an operation within the scope of the powers conferred on them by s. 34 (1), which operation will necessarily or probably involve a violation of his legal rights, can he come to the court and claim an injunction ? I think clearly not. To hold otherwise would be to substitute the decision of the court for that of the board in a matter which the legislature has placed in the discretion of the board and for which it has expressly provided compensation. It is well settled that under language such as is used in s. 34 (3), a claimant for compensation must prove that the act complained of is one which, but for the authorisation of the statute, would have been actionable. Indeed, it was not disputed by counsel for the plaintiff that that is the meaning of the word " injury " in s. 34 (3). It is sufficient to cite the language of LORD BLACKBURN (7 App. Cas. 293) in Caledonian Ry. Co. v. Walker's Trustees (1) :

> " Some things, I think, are now no longer open to discussion. No action can be maintained for anything which is done under the authority of the legislature, though the Act is one which if unauthorised by the legislature, would be injurious and actionable. The remedy of the party who suffers the loss is confined to recovering such compensation as the legislature has thought fit to give him (see Hammersmith Ry. Co. v. Brand (2). The Lands and Railways Clauses Acts of 1845 give some compensation. I do not think that there is in this respect any difference between the legislation for England and for Scotland. And it must now be considered settled that on the construction of these Acts, compensation is confined to damage arising from that which would, if done without authority from the legislature, have given rise to a cause of action."

The importance of the existence of a compensation clause in determining the intention of the legislature is emphasised by LORD BLACKBURN in Metropolitan Asylum District v. Hill (3), where he says (6 App. Cas. 203) :

> " The legislature has very often interfered with the rights of private persons, but in modern times it has generally given compensation to those injured ; and if no compensation is given it affords a reason, though not a conclusive one, for thinking that the intention of the legislature was, not that the thing should be done at all events, but only that it should be done, if it could be done, without injury to others. What was the intention of the legislature in any particular Act is a question of the construction of the Act."

It has been decided that, where there is such a compensation clause and the provisions of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, s. 68, apply, it is for the arbitrator to decide whether actionable damage has been proved : see East and West India Docks and Birmingham Junction Ry. Co. v. Gattke (4). It is not disputed that a diversion of the course of a river by one riparian owner is actionable at the suit of another.

It follows, in my view, on the construction of this Act that the plaintiff's remedy for the actionable wrong found by the learned judge consists only in his right to receive compensation under the provisions of s. 34 (3) of the Act of 1930. In arriving at this decision I have given careful consideration to the arguments of counsel for the plaintiff to the contrary, with which I will now deal. He submits that, although the remedy for the violation of a legal right is in general to be found in s. 34 (3), this sub-section has no application to a case where the damage suffered is caused by a nuisance unnecessarily created by the defendants in the exercise of their statutory powers or to negligence on their part and that, in order to invoke the protection of the Act, the onus is on the defendants to prove that they acted without negligence and that the nuisance created was necessary to the proper performance of the powers conferred on them by statute. In support of this contention he relies on the well known words of LORD BLACKBURN in Geddis v. Bann Reservoir Proprietors (5) and of VISCOUNT DUNEDIN in Manchester Corporation v. Farnworth (6). In Geddis' case (5) LORD BLACKBURN said (3 App. Cas. 455) :

> " For I take it, without citing cases, that it is now thoroughly well established that no action will lie for doing that which the legislature has authorised, if it be done without negligence, although it does occasion damage to anyone ; but an action does lie for doing that which the legislature has authorised, if it be done negligently. And I think that if by a reasonable exercise of the powers, either given by statute to the promoters, or which they have at common law, the damage could be prevented it is, within this rule, ' negligence ' not to make such reasonable exercise of their powers. I do not think that it will be found that any of the cases (I do not cite them) are in conflict with that view of the law."

In Manchester Corporation v. Farnworth (6) VISCOUNT DUNEDIN said ([1930] A.C. 183) :

> " The onus of proving that the result is inevitable is on those who wish to escape liability for nuisance, but the criterion of inevitability is not what is theoretically possible but what is possible according to the state of scientific knowledge at the time, having also in view a certain common sense appreciation, which cannot be rigidly defined, of practical feasibility in view of situation and of expense."

In neither of those cases, nor in others where similar language is used, was the court concerned with a compensation clause. Where there is no such clause and where the legislature has authorised the execution of specific works, the court will be vigilant to see that an injured party is not deprived of his remedy, unless the language of the statute and the nature of the works authorised necessitate such a conclusion. In my view, quite different considerations arise in cases like the present, where the statute to be construed is not dealing with specific works, but is conferring a wide discretion on a statutory authority, necessarily involving interference with the legal rights of riparian owners, and is expressly providing a remedy by way of compensation for such interference.

It is not necessary for present purposes to attach any limitation to the word " injury " in s. 34 (3). It is sufficient to say that, in my view, it includes damage to property suffered by a riparian owner. Nor is it necessary to consider whether the sub-section would, on the proper construction of this statute, preclude an action based on allegations of negligence in the carrying out of works lawfully undertaken by the board in the exercise of its discretion under its statutory powers. The statement of claim alleged that what the defendants did was done " wrongfully and without right or title." Negligence was not an issue at the trial. During the course of the appeal we allowed the plaintiff to amend his statement of claim by adding the word " negligently " on the terms that he was confined to the particulars already delivered. These particulars do not, in my view, disclose a case of negligence in the execution of the works such as was envisaged in East Suffolk Rivers Catchment Board v. Kent (7) as affording a cause of action to an injured party. In that case no point was taken that the claim, based as it was solely on negligence, could only be maintained under s. 34 (3), although DU PARCQ, L.J., in the Court of Appeal made a passing reference to the sub-section and dismissed it as irrelevant ([1939] 4 All E.R. 182). In my view, the addition of the word " negligently " in the statement of claim does not alter the nature of the plaintiff's case as originally pleaded and as dealt with by the trial judge. It would, I think, be wrong for us on the material available, and without any finding by the learned judge, to hold that the operation decided on by the board in its discretion had been negligently carried out. I am, accordingly, of opinion that the learned judge was right in holding that the plaintiff's action was not maintainable.

Having regard to the conclusion at which I have arrived as to the effect of s. 34 (3) on the plaintiff's claim, it is unnecessary to decide whether, if the plaintiff's claim was maintainable, the board could have successfully relied on the Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893, as amended by the Limitation Act, 1939, s. 21 (1). The submission of the board was to the effect that the cause of action found by the learned judge consisted in the diversion of the course of the river and it was said that such a cause of action accrues at the moment of diversion and that damage is not a necessary ingredient therein. Accordingly, it was argued that, as no complaint is made of any act or default since January, 1944, the plaintiff's claim is statute barred. As to that I would only observe that, if this is the result, it adds one more to the many instances of injustice often resulting from this Act. For the reasons stated, I would dismiss this appeal.

SINGLETON, L.J. : The defendants are the catchment board for an area which includes the River Waveney. Between October, 1943, and Jan. 1, 1944, they carried out certain dredging and cleansing work in the river and they deposited the gravel, clay, etc., removed from the bed of the river on to the south bank. The plaintiff was the owner of a mill on the river and of a bridge which gave access to the mill from the north. In December, 1946, there came a flood and the bridge was washed away. The plaintiff alleged that the damage to his bridge was caused by the wrongful deposit by the board of large quantities of soil on the south bank, which prevented overflow water from the river safely escaping in time of flood. His action was based on nuisance. The board admit the deposit of soil and plead that the acts were done by them in the exercise of the powers conferred on them by the Land Drainage Act, 1930. They plead in para. 4 of the defence that the statement of claim discloses no cause of action, and in para. 5 they rely on the Limitation Act, 1939, s. 21 (1). The claim for an injunction was abandoned at an early stage. The damages claimed amounted to £200, but the hearing of the action before BYRNE, J., took more than three days and the argument in this court occupied most of four days.

BYRNE, J., accepted the evidence of the plaintiff in preference to that of the board's engineer. He found that the south side was the side of the river which was always regarded as the safety valve in time of flood—that was the side which flooded first and took off most of the flood water—and he drew attention to the channels on the low ground on that side. He was satisfied that the bridge collapsed because the flood waters scoured the by-pass channel and undermined the buttresses and that the flood water did that because the south bank had been raised between one foot and two feet by the dredgings taken from the river by the catchment board. The learned judge added (ante, p. 53) :

> " On the facts I have come to the conclusion that the catchment board, by their act, diverted the ordinary flood course of the river, and thus did an act which, had it been done by a riparian owner, would have rendered that riparian owner liable to an action, but, having regard to the terms of the > statute, I am of opinion that no action based on nuisance will lie against the board, and that the plaintiff's only remedy is under s. 34 (3) of the Land Drainage Act, 1930."

On this ground and on the plea based on s. 21 (1) of the Limitation Act, 1939, he gave judgment for the board.

It is to be observed that there was no express plea that the plaintiff's remedy (if any) was under s. 34 (3) of the Act of 1930. It may be said that it is covered by paras. 3 and 4 of the defence. For myself, I should have preferred to see this pleaded as one answer of the board to the plaintiff's claim. Yet it is right to point out that the board do not admit that the plaintiff is entitled to compensation under s. 34 (3). Their contention is that he is not entitled either to damages or to compensation, unless he shows an actionable wrong or something which would have been actionable but for the statute, and they submit that that position never arose. The view of BYRNE, J., was that the board created a nuisance and that the damage to the plaintiff flowed from that. In this court the main submission of counsel for the plaintiff was based chiefly on the principle stated by LORD HATHERLEY (3 App. Cas. 450) and LORD BLACKBURN (ibid., 456) in Geddis v. Bann Reservoir Proprietors (5) and on the statement of the law by VISCOUNT DUNEDIN in Manchester Corporation v. Farnworth (6), where he said ([1930] A.C. 183) :

> " When Parliament has authorised a certain thing to be made or done in a certain place, there can be no action for nuisance caused by the making or doing of that thing if the nuisance is the inevitable result of the making or doing so authorised. The onus of proving that the result is inevitable is on those who wish to escape liability for nuisance . . . "

See also the observations of VISCOUNT SUMNER (ibid., 195) and LORD BLANESBURGH (ibid., 206, 207). Counsel for the plaintiff submitted that the board had not shown that the nuisance created was the inevitable result of their carrying out work which they were authorised to do, and that, consequently, the plaintiff had a right of action.

It is necessary to look carefully at the Land Drainage Act, 1930, which is an Act to amend and consolidate the enactments relating to the drainage of land, in order to see (a) what powers, rights and duties are given to catchment boards, (b) how the carrying out of those powers, rights or duties may affect various persons, and (c) whether any, and, if so, what, remedies are given to persons who may be affected by the operations. The River Waveney is a main river and thus, by s. 6 (1), the powers conferred by the Act on drainage boards can only be exercised by the catchment board. The most important sections of the Act are ss. 34 and 38. Wide powers are given to the board and it is clear that they have a discretion as to what work they shall undertake, and when, and, speaking generally, the way or manner in which they shall perform the work is left to them. It is equally clear from the nature of the work that the doing of it may cause nuisance and damage to a number of people. One cannot interfere with the course of a river, or even of a stream, without causing upset. The operation of dredging or cleansing a river or a ditch results in spoil which has to be put somewhere and that may create a nuisance. This was recognised by Parliament and s. 34 (3) provides that, where injury is sustained by any person by reason of the exercise by a drainage board of any of its powers under the section, the board shall be liable to make full compensation to the injured person in the manner provided. (I do not overlook the limitation imposed by s. 38 (1)).

In Clowes v. Staffordshire Potteries Waterworks Co. (8) MELLISH, L.J., said (8 Ch. App. 139) :

> " . . . if a public company or any individuals obtain an Act of Parliament which they say enables them to take away the common law rights of any person, they are bound to show that it does it with sufficient clearness."

I am satisfied that the remedy by way of compensation given by s. 34 (3) of the Act of 1930 was intended to cover the kind of case under consideration. I am not sure that it matters whether or not there was shown to be a violation of a legal right. My impression is that the intention of Parliament was to avoid lengthy and costly litigation on questions of this kind and to ensure that anyone who suffered damage in consequence of work done under the powers given by the section should have a right to compensation. After all, the work is undertaken for the benefit of persons in the area. They contribute to the cost of it directly or indirectly and, if one of them suffers damage from the operations, he should be entitled to compensation from the general fund. At least it would seem that, if damage was sustained through the operations, that would provide prima facie evidence of a right to compensation. I recognise, however, that there may be a distinction to be drawn between " damage," on the one hand, and " injury," as used in s. 34 (3), on the other hand. Moreover, it is not necessary to decide this point for the purposes of the appeal, for the judgment of BYRNE, J., was to the effect that there had been a violation of a legal right, and there was evidence which justified that conclusion. Examination of the Land Drainage Act, 1930, and of s. 34 in particular, leads one irresistibly to the view that Parliament recognised that there might be, and frequently must be, a nuisance created by the carrying out of works under the powers given by the section, and compensation for any damage sustained thereby is provided—quite a different case from the one with which LORD DUNEDIN was dealing in Manchester Corporation v. Farnworth (6). It is this which satisfies me that a person who sustains injury through the operations has no right of action for nuisance. On a fair reading of the section it is shown with sufficient clearness that the intention was that the remedy should be by way of compensation alone. I draw attention to the words of LORD DU PARCQ ([1949] 1 All E.R. 550) in Cutler v. Wandsworth Stadium, Ltd. (9).

This leaves untouched the question of negligence. No such issue was raised on the pleadings. At the close of the evidence application was made by counsel for the plaintiff for leave to amend the statement of claim by adding an allegation of negligence. This application was resisted and was refused. Before this court an application to amend was allowed, on the understanding that the plaintiff was limited to the particulars already delivered in the action. As I have said, a wide discretion is given to the board as to how and when they carry out works under the section. Raleigh Corporation v. Williams (10) is not wholly in point, but it is interesting to see the view of LORD MACNAGHTEN on a matter of this kind. He said ([1893] A.C. 550) :

> " It was argued on behalf of the respondents that if a drainage work constructed under a by-law duly passed turns out in the result not to answer its purpose by reason of the insufficiency of the outlet, or by reason of some other defect which a competent engineer ought to have foreseen and guarded against, or if the result of a drainage work is to damage a person's land by throwing water upon it which would not otherwise have come there—that is actionable negligence on the part of the municipality. This argument in their Lordships' opinion is wholly untenable. On the other hand, their Lordships do not agree with the argument of the appellants that municipalities are helpless instruments in the hands of the engineers they employ. They cannot indeed modify the engineers' plan themselves. That is no part of their business. But they may return the plan for amendment if they think that it is not desirable in the shape submitted to them. If, however, acting in good faith, they accept the engineers' plan and carry it out, persons whose property may be injuriously affected by the construction of the drainage work must seek their remedy in the manner prescribed by the statute."

I draw attention, too, to Colac (President, etc.) v. Summerfield (11)) and, in particular, to the words of Lord Watson ([1893] A.C. 191). It seems to me that in order to establish a right of action against the catchment board the plaintiff must prove affirmatively that there was negligence in the manner of carrying out the work which had been undertaken. That must be alleged, sufficient particulars must be given, and proof supplied. In such circumstances, the damage would be shown to arise from the negligence of those carrying out the work rather than from the operations authorised by the section. It may be questionable how far it is worth while going into such matters in any particular case if the person who has sustained damage can recover full compensation under s. 34 (3). In the initial stages of the action it is probable that counsel had not the material on which to base a plea of negligence. If there had been such an allegation, it is difficult to see what particulars would have been given. After the board's engineer, Mr. Mobbs, had been cross-examined there was material on which it can be argued that he ought to have taken more care—and yet it can be said that, if the spoil had been placed on the opposite bank, someone else might have suffered damage. To establish a case of negligence it must be shown that there was neglect of some care which the board were bound to exercise towards someone, and it is not enough for the plaintiff to say that, if the spoil had been placed somewhere else, he would not have suffered in the way he did. The general position must be borne in mind, and the standard of care required is that of a reasonably competent man carrying out work of this kind with due regard for the rights of all. Unless there is shown to be a breach of that, the plaintiff does not prove negligence. I am not prepared to hold, on the evidence, that it is necessary in every such case that levels be taken before material is deposited on the bank of a river. It may be desirable in some cases, but that is far from saying that failure to take levels in a particular case amounts to negligence. Those responsible for the operations are entrusted with a certain amount of discretion as to how they do the work. It is not without importance to notice that no damage occurred for nearly three years after the deposit was made. I do not think that this court, on the material before it, ought to find negligence against the board.

Counsel for the plaintiff pressed on us that s. 34 (3) only applied to the quantum of compensation—an attractive argument in view of the wording of the sub-section—but I see no reason why we should not follow the law as stated in Rhodes v. Airedale Drainage Comrs. (12) and in Hall v. Bristol Corporation (13), which was adopted by Byrne, J. Assuming, as the learned trial judge found, that the plaintiff proved a nuisance created by the board, it arose from operations authorised by the statute and a remedy by way of compensation is provided by the statute. That I regard as an answer to the claim. I do not think it necessary to deal with the further point raised under the Limitation Act, 1939, s. 21 (1). I agree that the appeal should be dismissed.

JENKINS, L.J. : In order to maintain his action at all, it was necessary for the plaintiff to show that the deposit by the catchment board on the south bank of the River Waveney of the spoil raised in dredging the river above his mill was in the nature of an actionable wrong, which, if done by a person without statutory powers, would have entitled him to sue that person for the resulting flood-damage to his bridge. This question the learned judge decided in favour of the plaintiff, holding on the facts (ante, p. 53) that the board

> " . . . by their act diverted the ordinary flood course of the river, and thus did an act which, had it been done by a riparian owner, would have rendered that riparian owner liable to an action . . . "

For authority in support of this proposition he referred to Menzies v. Breadalbane (14) and Bickett v. Morris (15) as showing that " interference with a regular flood channel which formed part of the bed of the river " would be actionable at common law, whereas an erection on the bank of the river which merely prevented flood water from flowing at large over a riparian owner's and, without obstructing any existing flood channel, would not be actionable at common law by the person to whose land the flood water was diverted in consequence of the erection: see Gerrard v. Crowe (16) and R. v. Pagham, Sussex, Sewers Comrs. (17).

In his review of the authorities in Gerrard v. Crowe (16), Viscount Cave [1921] 1 A.C. 399) treated Menzies v. Breadalbane (14) as a case where there was > " . . . a regular flood channel which, although dry when the river was low, became filled with water at times of flood ; and it is plain that such a channel forms part of the alveus of the river and cannot be obstructed."

He described (ibid., 400) Bickett v. Morris (15) as " a case of injury to the alveus." He also expressed disapproval (ibid., 399) of the view expressed by Lord Tenterden, C.J. (1 B. & Ad. 887) in R. v. Trafford (18) to the effect that no

> " . . . sound distinction can be made between the ordinary course of water flowing in a bounded channel at all usual seasons, and the extraordinary course which its superabundant quantity has been accustomed to take at particular seasons . . . "

In Gerrard v. Crowe (16) the flood water diverted by the respondent's protective works from his land to that of the appellant seems formerly to have flowed from the river over the respondent's land and thence into the river again, but not by any defined channel, and the respondent's works were held by the Privy Council to afford the appellant no cause of action. I think it must, therefore, be regarded as settled that, to be actionable, an erection on the bank of a river must be shown to obstruct a defined channel through which flood water is accustomed to flow, and not merely to prevent flood water from flowing at large over land adjoining the river and thence back into the main stream, although this may be the course the flood water is accustomed to take.

After stating the law, as it seems to me, quite correctly, the learned judge expressed his finding in ambiguous terms in speaking, as he did (ante, p. 53) of the diversion of " the ordinary flood course of the river," which might refer either to the existence of a defined channel through which flood water normally went and which was obstructed by the deposit of spoil, or merely to the flowing of flood water at large over the land in question and from it back into the river below the mill, which was prevented by the deposit of spoil. I cannot say I am satisfied that the evidence justifies a finding to the former effect. The plans are inconclusive. They show what appear to be drainage channels traversing the marsh land, which unite and enter the river below the mill, but none of these channels seems to communicate with the river above the mill. These channels may, therefore, have been made simply for the purpose of draining off from the land in question any flood water which might happen to come on it, and never have performed the function of supplementary alvei for the river in time of flood. However, for the purposes of this appeal I am content to assume that the learned judge intended to find on the facts that the deposit obstructed a defined flood channel, and further to assume that his finding is justified by the evidence. On these assumptions it follows from what I have said above that the learned judge rightly held that the deposit of the spoil by the board would have constituted an actionable wrong at common law.

On the assumption that what was done by the board would, if done by a private individual, have constituted an actionable wrong, the next question is whether, as the learned judge has held, the effect of the Land Drainage Act, 1930, from which the board derives its existence and powers, is to deprive the plaintiff of the right of action he would otherwise have had against the board and leave him to the remedy by way of compensation provided by s. 34 (3) of the Act. It was argued for the plaintiff that he was not so deprived : (i) because the deposit of the spoil on the south bank in a continuous line (i.e., without gaps, or without any adequate gaps, for the escape of flood water) constituted a nuisance to the plaintiff and the Act does not authorise the board to commit a nuisance (this being in substance the whole of the plaintiff's case as pleaded and as argued below, where leave to amend by alleging negligence was refused by the learned judge) ; and (ii) (an allegation of negligence on the same facts having been introduced by amendment with the leave of this court) because such deposit was a negligent act on the part of the board, and the statute does not authorise the board to commit negligent acts.

I do not think that the argument is really much advanced by describing what was done by the board as a nuisance. All that that means is that the deposit of the spoil on the south bank constituted a source of danger to the plaintiff's property in time of flood, to which the board was not entitled to subject him. Unless, however, the deposit had the effect of obstructing a defined flood channel, to the unobstructed benefit of which the plaintiff was entitled, any resulting flood damage to the plaintiff's property would be mere damnum sine injuria, so that the allegation of nuisance really comes to no more than an allegation of wrongful obstruction by the board of a defined flood channel. The allegation of negligence, if I may be allowed, so to speak, to write it out in full, amounts, as I understand it, to an allegation that the board, being under a duty to the plaintiff not to damage his property by their drainage operations, wrongfully and in breach of that duty deposited the spoil in a continuous line on the south bank, when it knew or ought to have known that the consequent heightening of the south bank would have the effect of diverting flood water to the opposite side of the river, and increasing the flow of water through the by-pass channel in time of flood, with possible damage to the plaintiff. But here, again, the board's duty to the plaintiff in this matter (on breach of which the claim in negligence depends) cannot, so far as I can see, be put higher than a duty to refrain from blocking any defined flood channel to the unobstructed benefit of which the plaintiff was entitled. If the deposit did obstruct any such channel, the board (apart from the Act) would be equally liable, whether or not the board knew or ought to have known of the existence of such a channel and the probable consequences of blocking it, and the allegation of negligence (or, in other words, the allegation that the board knew or ought to have known of the existence of the flood channel and the probable consequences of its obstruction), therefore, adds nothing to the cause of action, except in so far as it affords ground for the contention that the wrong here complained of, being in the nature of a negligent act, is, according to the authorities to which I am about to refer, an act in respect of which the board is not entitled to claim immunity from suit by virtue of the Land Drainage Act, 1930. If, on the other hand, all the deposit did was to prevent flood water from flowing at large over the marshland to the south of the river, then there was no duty to the plaintiff in the matter, and the question of negligence does not arise. In this latter alternative, any claim which the plaintiff might have could only be in respect of some new right conferred by the statute, for breach of which the remedy by way of compensation conferred by the statute would plainly be exhaustive.

Therefore, whichever way the case is put, I think that the question is substantially the same, namely, whether the Land Drainage Act, 1930, prevents the plaintiff from suing the board for the otherwise actionable wrong of depositing the spoil on the south bank so as to obstruct a defined flood channel (or, in other words, a channel forming part of the bed of the river in times of flood), to the unobstructed benefit of which the plaintiff was entitled for the protection of his property from flood damage, and substitutes for the ordinary right of action a claim to compensation under s. 34 (3). The grounding of the plaintiff's case on nuisance or negligence (as opposed to trespass to the plaintiff's rights in respect of the flood channel as a riparian owner) is, in effect, an invocation of the general principle that Acts of Parliament by which statutory powers are conferred should not be construed as absolving those invested with them from liability, enforceable by action in the courts, in respect of any avoidable injury to others occasioned by the exercise of the powers.

We were referred to a number of well-known authorities in which this principle has been enunciated and illustrated, and in particular to Geddis v. Bann Reservoir Proprietors (5), where LORD HATHERLEY said (3 App. Cas. 450):

> "... I apprehend, that the true construction of all such powers given to companies is this: You may carry out your work to its full extent, and in some cases you must carry it out to its fullest extent, in the manner provided by the Act, but in so doing you shall not create any needless injury —you shall use all those precautions against injury to others which you would use against injury to yourselves in carrying on a similar work, and if we find that in carrying out your powers damage has been done by you, the law will say that the powers which you can exercise shall be exercised for the prevention of mischief."

LORD BLACKBURN said (ibid., 455):

> "For I take it, without citing cases, that it is now thoroughly well established that no action will lie for doing that which the legislature has authorised, if it be done without negligence, although it does occasion damage to anyone; but an action does lie for doing that which the legislature has authorised, if it be done negligently. And I think that if by a reasonable exercise of the powers, either given by statute to the promoters, or which they have at common law, the damage could be prevented it is, within this rule, 'negligence' not to make such reasonable exercise of their powers. I do not think that it will be found that any of the cases (I do not cite them) are in conflict with that view of the law."

The cases cited on this aspect of the matter also included Manchester Corporation v. Farnworth (6) where VISCOUNT DUNEDIN said ([1930] A.C. 183):

> "When Parliament has authorised a certain thing to be made or done in a certain place, there can be no action for nuisance caused by the making or doing of that thing if the nuisance is the inevitable result of the making or doing so authorised. The onus of proving that the result is inevitable is on those who wish to escape liability for nuisance, but the criterion of inevitability is not what is theoretically possible but what is possible according to the state of scientific knowledge at the time, having also in view a certain common sense appreciation, which cannot be rigidly defined, of practical feasibility in view of situation and of expense."

We were also referred to East Suffolk Rivers Catchment Board v. Kent (7), where the earlier authorities are reviewed.

The general principle is thus well settled, but its application in any particular case must depend on the object and terms of the statute conferring the powers in question (including the presence or absence of a clause providing for compensation and the scope of any such clause), the nature of the act giving rise to the injury complained of, and the nature of the resulting injury. I venture to think that the questions which arise in any given case of this kind are substantially these. (i) Was the act which occasioned the injury complained of authorised by the statute? (ii) Did the statute contemplate that the exercise of the powers conferred would or might cause injury to others? (iii) If so, was the injury complained of an injury of a kind contemplated by the statute? (iv) Did the statute provide for compensation in respect of any injury of the kind complained of which was sustained through the exercise of the powers conferred? If the answers to all these questions are in the affirmative, then I think it must follow that the party injured is deprived of his right of action and is left to his remedy in the form of compensation under the statute.

To deal with the questions, in the above order, in relation to the present case,

(i) The board clearly had power to dredge the river and deposit the spoil on the south bank under s. 6 (1), s. 34 (1) and s. 38 (1) of the Act. (ii) I think it is manifest that the Act did contemplate that the exercise of the powers conferred on the board would or might cause injury to others. It is clear that operations of the kind contemplated by s. 34 (1) must inevitably interfere with the rights of riparian owners, by altering the flow of the river and its behaviour in times of flood or drought, quite apart from the direct interference with rights of property involved in some of the works specifically mentioned. The presence of the provision in s. 34 (3), to the effect that the board must make full compensation where injury is sustained by any person by reason of the exercise by the board of any of its powers under the section, in itself shows that the Act contemplates that legal rights may be infringed, and the provisions of s. 61 (1) which prohibit the board, except with the consent of the undertakers, from doing any work which, whether directly or indirectly, interferes with, or with the use of, the works or property of various specified types of undertaking in such manner as to affect injuriously the said works or property, necessarily implies that in other cases the board may execute works notwithstanding that they interfere, or will interfere, with property so as to affect it injuriously. (iii) I think that the injury complained of by the plaintiff was clearly of a kind contemplated by the Act. It was an injury in the shape of flooding (i.e., an injury in the matter of drainage in the statutory sense) occasioned by a drainage operation in the shape of the dredging and deposit of spoil. I do not think that it can be removed from the category of injuries contemplated by the Act merely on the ground that the spoil could have been deposited elsewhere or differently disposed on the south bank, or on the ground that the board knew or ought to have known that the spoil, deposited as it was, would have the effect of increasing the danger of damage to the plaintiff's property in times of flood.

There is, I think, an important distinction for this purpose between statutory powers to execute some particular work or carry on some particular undertaking (e.g., the construction and operation of the reservoir, in Geddis v. Bann Reservoir Proprietors (5), the provision of hospitals, in Metropolitan Asylum District v. Hill (3), and the construction and operation of the generating station, in Manchester Corporation v. Farnworth (6)), and statutory powers to execute a variety of works of specified descriptions in a given area (the works in question being of such a kind as necessarily to involve some degree of interference with the rights of others) as and when the body invested with the powers deems it necessary or expedient to do so in furtherance of a general duty imposed on it by the Act (e.g., the powers conferred on the board in the present case by s. 6 (1), s. 34 (1) and s. 38 (1) of the Land Drainage Act, 1930, to execute works of the various descriptions therein mentioned in furtherance of the general duty, imposed on it by the Act (as appears by necessary implication from s. 12), of maintaining the main river in a due state of efficiency). In cases of the former class, the powers are, in the absence of clear provision to the contrary in the Act, limited to the doing of the particular things authorised without infringement of the rights of others, except in so far as any such infringement may be a demonstrably necessary consequence of doing what is authorised to be done. Thus, power to construct and operate a reservoir, and pass water from it down a prescribed channel, does not authorise the passing of water down the channel without keeping it in a fit condition to receive the water so as to avoid the flooding of adjoining lands (Geddis' case (5)) ; power to provide hospitals does not authorise the provision of a fever hospital in a populous place in which it will be a nuisance to neighbouring inhabitants (Hill's case (3)) ; and power to construct and operate a generating station does not authorise the undertakers to carry it on so as to create a nuisance by smoke and fumes, except in so far as it may be demonstrably impossible to carry on the generating station without creating such a nuisance (Farnworth's case (6)). In cases of the latter class, such as the present case, it is obvious that, if the powers are subject to an implied limitation to the effect that they are to be exercised so as to not cause any avoidable infringement of the rights of others, the powers will in great measure be nullified and the manifest object of the Act will be largely frustrated. Thus, if the board in the present case could be sued in the courts, every time they dredged a reach of the river and deposited the spoil on one or other of the banks, by any riparian owner who could show that the effect of what had been done was to obstruct a flood channel and thereby increase the risk of damage to his premises by flood water, on the footing that this was an actionable wrong, notwithstanding the statute, the board could in every such case be restrained by injunction from carrying out the work. The injury, or apprehended injury, would, moreover, always be avoidable by abandonment of the particular project, however beneficial that project might be to riparian owners other than the complainant, and the board would, therefore, never be able to defeat the complainant on the ground that the injury or apprehended injury was an unavoidable consequence of the exercise of its statutory powers.

In the absence of any provision in the Act for compensating persons injured by the exercise of the board's powers, difficult questions might arise as to the extent (if any) to which the Act should be regarded as depriving a person thus injured of his ordinary remedy in the courts, inasmuch as he would, if so deprived, be wholly without remedy, but the Act including, as it does, a provision for compensation, in the shape of s. 34 (3), the considerations stated above seem to me to lead irresistibly to the conclusion that the intention of the Act was to make the board, acting in good faith and within their powers, the sole judge of what was necessary or proper to be done in the way of drainage operations for the benefit of their catchment area as a whole, and, within limits which I will endeavour to define, to deprive persons injured by any exercise of the board's powers of their ordinary remedy by way of action and substitute the remedy by way of compensation prescribed by s. 34 (3).

The limits outside which the ordinary rights of action remain are, I think, these. (a) The injury must be the product of an exercise of the board's powers as such, as opposed to the product of some negligent act occurring in the course of some exercise of the board's powers but not in itself an act which the board are authorised to do ; e.g., an injury caused by flooding on one side of the river due to the heightening by the board of the bank on the other side would be a proper subject of compensation, as opposed to action in the courts, but an injury caused by the negligent driving of one of the board's lorries bringing materials to the site would be actionable in the ordinary way. (b) The injury must be the product of the operation which the board intended to carry out, and not of some unintended occurrence brought about in the course of carrying out the work owing to negligence in carrying it out. Thus, if the board dig a drain which, when dug as planned, has the effect of depriving a riparian owner of the full supply of water from the river to which he is entitled, the remedy of the riparian owner will be compensation under the Act, not action in the courts, but, if, through negligence in digging the drain, the board undermined and breached a dyke, and thereby inundated the countryside, I apprehend that the board could not claim, by way of defence to an action by a person whose land was flooded, that the breaching of the dyke brought about by its negligence, and forming no part of the operation in hand, was done in exercise of its statutory powers, and was, therefore, a matter for compensation, not action. (c) The operation must not be one which, on the face of it, is so capricious or unreasonable, or so fraught with manifest danger to others, that no catchment board acting bona fide and rationally, not recklessly, would ever have undertaken it. The last of these three limitations or requirements inevitably introduces questions of degree, but, as will be seen from the terms in which I have stated it, I think that a very strong case of something amounting to reckless conduct on the part of the board must be made out to enable an action to be maintained on account of an injury which, in the other two respects I have mentioned, is a matter for compensation under the Act as opposed to action in the courts.

I do not think that this view involves any inconsistency with the authorities on the subject of negligence in the exercise of statutory powers. None of these decisions has gone to the length of holding—and I do not think any of the parties to them would have argued—that under the Land Drainage Act, 1930, or under any Act in comparable terms, conferring powers which involve infringement of the rights of others and providing for the compensating of persons injured by the exercise of those powers, any error of judgment or lack of foresight whatsoever on the part of the statutory authority, in the planning of an operation within its powers, sufficies to make an injury resulting from the operation, when completed as planned, a matter for action in the courts, notwithstanding the statutory provisions for compensation ; or, in other words, so far as the Land Drainage Act, 1930, is concerned, to prevent the injury in question from being an injury sustained " by reason of the exercise by a drainage board of any of its powers " within the meaning of s. 34 (3). In the present case the injury sustained by the plaintiff was sustained by reason of a normal drainage operation carried out in the usual way, i.e., the operation of dredging and depositing the spoil along the bank. The injury might have been avoided if the spoil had been differently disposed. The effect of depositing the spoil on the south bank was to make that bank a foot or two higher than the north bank, instead of a foot or two lower as formerly, with the obvious consequence of increasing the liability of the north bank to flooding. The prospect of serious damage to the plaintiff in times of flood, through the increased flow along the by-pass channel spanned by his bridge, was less apparent, and clearly did not amount to an imminent risk, since the work was completed in January, 1944, and the damage did not occur till December, 1946. I cannot regard the facts as bringing home to the board anything worse than an error of judgment in under-estimating the effect which the heightening of the south bank at this particular point on the river might have in times of severe flood, and, in my view, an error of judgment of that order falls very short of the degree of negligence or reckless conduct on the part of the board which is required to remove the injury sustained from the category of injuries covered by the compensation provision.

(iv) It follows from what I have said above in dealing with the other three questions that, in my view, the provision for compensation which the Land Drainage Act, 1930, contains in the shape of s. 34 (3) does provide for compensation in respect of an injury of the kind complained of by the plaintiff in this case.

Having thus arrived at affirmative answers to the four test questions stated above, I am of opinion that the learned judge was right in his conclusion to the effect that the action was not maintainable, and that the plaintiff's proper and only remedy for the injury of which he complained was to claim compensation under s. 34 (3) of the Act. The learned judge also dealt with and upheld the board's contention that the action, if otherwise maintainable, would in any event be barred by the Limitation Act, 1939, s. 21 (1), on the ground that the cause of action accrued once and for all on the date when the deposit of spoil on the south bank was completed, i.e., more than a year before action brought. This is a point of considerable technicality and difficulty, and I prefer to refrain from expressing on it an opinion which, either way, could not affect my conclusions as to the result of the present appeal, which, for the other reasons I have endeavoured to state, in my view fails and should be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

MANCHESTER ROYAL EXCHANGE, LTD. v. THE MANCHESTER, LTD. AND OTHERS.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., Cohen and Asquith, L.JJ.), November 22, 23, 1949.]

Landlord and Tenant—War-time lease—Termination twelve months after date of end of emergency—Termination also on happening of specified events—Validation of War-time Leases Act, 1944 (c. 34), s. 1 (1) (2) (3).

The tenants, a limited company, carried on a restaurant business on premises leased to them under three leases. On June 27, 1941, being at that time in serious financial difficulties, the tenants executed a scheme of arrangement under the Companies Act, 1929, s. 153, and after obtaining the sanction of the court entered into a deed to give effect to the scheme. As part of the scheme the landlords under the deed agreed to accept a substantial reduction in rent and to extend the terms of the leases, which were due to expire in December, 1942, until the expiration of the scheme period. The relevant clauses of the scheme were as follows : " (1) ' The scheme period ' means the period during which this scheme shall continue in force under the provisions hereinafter contained . . . (3) This scheme . . . shall henceforth have effect and continue in force until the expiration of twelve calendar months after the date on which the emergency that was the occasion of the passing of the Courts (Emergency Powers) Act, 1939, is declared by an Order in Council to have come to an end Provided nevertheless that this scheme shall determine and ipso facto cease to be binding on the earlier happening of any of the following events : (i) If an order is made or resolution passed for the winding-up of the company : (ii) If an execution or distress be levied and not . . . . satisfied within fourteen days : (iii) If a receiver of any part of the company's property or assets is appointed: (iv) If a resolution to the effect that owing to losses . . . the company . . . cannot any longer be usefully carried on is passed unanimously by the committee of creditors . . . " Since 1941 the financial position of the tenants had greatly improved and they had accumulated an undistributed surplus of £20,000 after allowing for unpaid creditors and other contingencies, and the landlords now contended that the term granted under the deed was void at law because of uncertainty and was not validated by the Validation of War-time Leases Act, 1944.

HELD : at law the leases provided for by the scheme of arrangement were void for uncertainty, but they were validated by the Validation of War-time Leases Act, 1944, s. 1 (1), and must have effect as if granted for a term of ten years, although they were determinable, not only on the happening of one or more of the events specified in s. 1 (2) of the Act, but also on the happening of the events specified in the proviso to cl. 3 of the scheme.

It was agreed that the date of the commencement of the period of ten years imported into the leases by s. 1 (1) of the Act should be that of the commencement of the term covered by the agreement (in the scheme) for the tenancies for the duration of the war emergency, i.e., June 27, 1941.

Appeal by the landlords from an order of Sir Leonard Stone, Vice-Chancellor of the County Palatine of Lancaster, dated July 11, 1949.

The tenants, a company known as "The Manchester," Ltd., carried on a restaurant business in Manchester on premises which they leased from the landlords, Manchester Royal Exchange, Ltd. Being unable to pay their debts out of their assets, the tenants entered into a scheme of arrangement under the Companies Act, 1929, s. 153. The scheme, which was dated June 27, 1941, A provided inter alia that unsecured creditors were not to be paid during the scheme period, nor were their debts to carry interest. "The scheme period" was defined as "the period during which the scheme shall continue in force under the provisions hereinafter contained." Clause 3 provided: "This scheme when sanctioned by the court under s. 153 of the Companies Act, 1929, shall henceforth have effect and continue in force until the expiration of twelve B calendar months after the date on which the emergency that was the occasion of the passing of the Courts (Emergency Powers) Act, 1939, is declared by an Order in Council to have come to an end, Provided nevertheless that this scheme shall determine and ipso facto cease to be binding on the earlier happening of any of the following events: (i) if an order is made or resolution passed for the winding-up of the company; (ii) if an execution or distress be levied and C not paid out or satisfied within fourteen days; (iii) if a receiver of any part of the company's property or assets is appointed, or (iv) if a resolution to the effect that, owing to losses incurred in carrying on the business of the company, the same cannot any longer be usefully carried on is passed unanimously by the committee of creditors to be appointed under the provisions hereinafter contained; (v) if the company acts in contravention of cl. 6 or cl. 7 hereof." D By cll. 6 and 7 the company was not to distribute any profits to its members by way of dividend or bonus, and the directors were not to receive any fees. By cl. 9 it was agreed that after the scheme had taken effect the tenants and the landlords would execute a deed whereby the rent payable in respect of the restaurant premises should be substantially reduced and the terms of the three leases, which would have expired at the end of 1942, "shall be modified as E follows: (A) the respective terms of years thereby granted shall be extended until the expiration of the scheme period . . ." The scheme was sanctioned by the court on Aug. 25, 1941, and the deed between the tenants and the landlords was executed on Oct. 31, 1941. The deed, after reciting that the scheme had been approved, stated, by cl. 2: "Leases Nos. 1, 2, and 3, shall be deemed to be extended and modified as provided by the scheme." F

Since June, 1941, the affairs of the tenant company had prospered, and, after sums had been set aside to provide for the unpaid creditors and to answer the issued capital of the company, there was an undistributed surplus of about £20,000. The directors of the tenant company had, however, forborne to pay themselves or to distribute any of the profits which had accumulated.

The landlords presented a petition seeking directions from the court on the G true construction of the deed, and they contended that the leases, contemplated by the scheme and duly executed, were void at law. Holding that the petition involved a repudiation by the landlords of the fact that they were bound by the deed, the Vice-Chancellor dismissed the petition in limine. The Court of Appeal now overruled his decision and considered the matters raised by the petition, the main questions being: (i) Having regard to the general law, as H laid down in Lace v. Chantler (1), was the term granted or purported to be granted by the deed of Oct. 31, 1941, void at law for uncertainty? (ii) If it was void, was the effect of the Validation of War-time Leases Act, 1944, to revive it and to give effect to it, subject to the terms and on the conditions fixed by the Act? The case is reported only on these points. Dealing with subsidiary questions, the Court of Appeal held: (a) that it was impossible to read into the scheme of arrangement a provision that the "scheme period" should end when the tenants' affairs were such that, not only could the creditors be paid, but also there would remain a balance at least equal to the paid-up capital of the company ; (b) the scheme contemplated an Order in Council under the provisions of the Courts (Emergency Powers) Act, 1939, s. 7 (3), which would have the effect of putting an end to that Act, and, as that had not occurred, the period, as defined in the scheme, had not come to an end ; (c) on the true construction of the agreement, the parties intended that the scheme should continue until the end of the war emergency, with the proviso that it should terminate on the earlier happening of any one of the five events specified in the proviso to cl. 3 of the scheme. On the main questions the Court of Appeal held that the leases granted by the deed of Oct. 31, 1941, were at law void for uncertainty, but were validated by the Act of 1944.

Milner Holland, K.C., and Forrester for the tenants.

SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R., stated the facts and, after dealing with the subsidiary questions, continued: It now remains to deal with the main issue which, I think, is somewhat difficult. The deed of October, 1941, was executed by both landlords and tenants and purported to be, and was treated by the two executing parties as being, the carrying out of what the scheme provided. It might be, if the argument of counsel for the landlords was to be accepted, that the result of that scheme was to create no estate in the tenants. In that event, counsel for the tenants said : "The landlords have failed to do what the scheme provided they should do, and I can claim against them that they are in breach of the terms of the scheme." That, I think, is a difficult argument to sustain, seeing that this deed was executed by the tenants themselves and on the face of it purported to be, and must be taken to be, the carrying out of the scheme. There is, however, this point. The definition of the scheme period in cl. 3 was to provide at what date the terms of the scheme as a whole should cease to operate, e.g., at what date the creditors would be able to claim payment. So far as the execution of the new lease was concerned, the introductory language of cl. 9 of the scheme in terms says that the two parties, the tenants and the landlords, should "execute such deed or deeds as may be requisite to give effect to the following provisions," including a provision for extending the term of the lease until the expiration of the scheme period. I think it is certainly an arguable point that what that clause was providing for was that the parties should execute a deed or deeds in whatever was the appropriate form to give legal effect to the extension contemplated. In Lace v. Chantler (1), LORD GREENE, M.R., cited ([1944] 1 All E.R. 306), and, I think, so as to make it part of his judgment and with his approval, a passage from FOA ON LANDLORD AND TENANT, 6th ed., p. 115, at the end of which occurs the following language :

> "Consequently, a lease to endure for 'as many years as A. shall live,' or 'as the coverture between B. and C. shall continue,' would not be good as a lease for years; although the same results may be achieved in another way by making the demise for a fixed number (ninety-nine for instance) of years determinable upon A.'s death, or the dissolution of the coverture between B. and C."

Counsel for the tenants says that, if the deed in its present form does not produce a valid and effective result, the obligation of the landlords was to execute a lease for some fixed term, but determinable on the happening of the several events mentioned, and that by that device effect could be given to the scheme, and, indeed, within the language of FOA ON LANDLORD AND TENANT, the same result would have been achieved, and he contends that we ought to construe the deed as though it had been in that form. As a matter of construction, it seems to me that he is faced with an insuperable difficulty, because he must provide an answer to the question : " What is the fixed term which the document, on its true construction, provides ? " That is a question which it is impossible to answer. I do not, therefore, think that, even if we were to adopt the hook and crook method of ROWLATT, J., in Great Northern Ry. Co. v. Arnold (2), we could arrive at a construction of the document which would insert some figure of a term certain and thereby get over all the difficulties. I think, however, that the tenants might, in some other proceedings, ask either for specific performance of the agreement or rectification of the deed, which is in a sense the same thing, so as to give effect to that for which the parties bargained. I am not sure in the circumstances that it is necessary to express a concluded opinion on this matter, and, in any case, counsel for the tenants has conceded that, whatever form is adopted, effect must be given to the proviso. Adopting the language of cl. 9, " such deed or deeds as may be requisite to give effect to the following provisions," any difficulty could be overcome by providing that the lease for the extended term should in any case be determinable at the option of the landlords on the happening of any of these events. In the circumstances I do not think that the view which I take, that the Validation of War-time Leases Act, 1944, does apply, involves the difficulty which counsel for the landlords suggested it did in regard to the proviso.

I, therefore, approach the question of the application of the Validation of War-time Leases Act, 1944, on the view that here is an agreement for the grant of a term for the duration of the war with a proviso for cesser of the term on the happening of any one of the events set out in the proviso to cl. 3 of the scheme. Nevertheless, it is argued for the landlords, that is not an agreement within the language totidem verbis of the Act. The Act is in its title described as :

> " An Act to validate agreements purporting to grant or provide for the grant of tenancies for periods depending on the duration of the war . . . "

Section 1 (1) provides :

> " Subject to the provisions of this section, any agreement, whether entered into before or after the passing of this Act, which purports to grant or provide for the grant of a tenancy for the duration of the war shall have effect as if it granted or provided for the grant of a tenancy for a term of ten years, subject to a right exercisable either by the landlord or the tenant to determine the tenancy, if the war ends before the expiration of that term . . . "

In s. 1 (2) we find the definition of " the duration of the war." It means :

> " . . . a period which, on the proper construction of the words used in the agreement whatever they may be, ends with, or within, a specified time after . . . "

One of the events specified in the sub-section is the end of hostilities as respects any State or all States with which His Majesty is at war. The validating effect, therefore, of the Act, reading sub-ss. 5 (1) and (2) together, is limited to cases where an agreement has been made purporting to grant a tenancy for a period which, on the proper construction of the words used, ends with one of the specified events. Counsel for the landlords says that is not true of this agreement, as it provides for the grant of a tenancy for a period which ends, not only with the end of hostilities, but also with the earlier happening of certain other events, and, therefore, it is not within the Act. He reinforces his argument by referring to s. 1 (3) (a), where special provision is made for the cases, for example, of

> " (i) a tenancy for a specified term or for the duration of the war, whichever is the shorter ; (ii) a tenancy for a specified term or for the duration of the war, whichever is the longer."

Those examples, he says, emphasise that, save in the cases specified, this Act is intended to apply only to cases where the term purported to be granted or agreed to be granted is exclusively referable to the duration of the war.

My first answer to that argument is that the Act does not, in terms, say "exclusively referable." In any event, I think that the present is a case in which the term granted was, on the proper construction of the words used, referable to the duration of the war. In other words, it was a grant for a period which ended or was intended to end on the happening of one or other of the war events, and that is not the less true because provision is also made for the earlier cesser or determination on the happening of certain other specified events. I think that a lease for twenty-one years, but expressed to be determinable on the earlier happening of certain specified events, is none the less truthfully to be described as a twenty-one years' lease. Therefore, I think that it is not true to say that this agreement, which contemplates an extension for the duration of the war, is outside the ambit of the Act because it might be earlier determined. After all, it has to be borne in mind that what is on the face of it a clear and intelligible bargain is rendered void only by reason of the fact that the term "for the duration of the war emergency" was so uncertain as to be incapable of granting an estate by demise. Notoriously, such provisions found their way into all kinds of bargains and documents during the war, and the object of the Act was to give effect to the intention where it was possible to do so. I do not find any difficulty in substituting, as the Act in s. 1 (1) says must be done, the fixed term, in these leases, subject to the right of earlier determination. If the result were to create inconsistency, there might be difficulty, but this agreement, it seems to me, can perfectly well be read as an agreement (as the Act provides) for a fixed term of ten years, subject, first, to the right of either party to determine it by one month's notice on the earlier ending of the war emergency, and, secondly, to being terminable or liable to cease on the earlier happening of one of the other events named in the agreement. Again it is important to bear in mind that, whereas the end of the war emergency is an event which must some day happen, these other events which form the subject of the proviso might never happen at all. I, therefore, think that essentially there are here leases or there is an agreement to grant leases for a period which, on the proper construction of the words used in the agreement, ending within a specified time after the end of the war emergency.

Having reached that conclusion, it follows that the tenants are entitled to continue in their secure, if austere, enjoyment of the restaurant until the period of ten years ends, or, as I construe it, the Courts (Emergency Powers) Act, 1939, comes to an end, or on the happening of one or other of these events. That still leaves the small point, from what date does the ten years' period begin? The matter is not capable of much elaboration, but, after hearing the argument for the landlords, counsel for the tenants was not disposed to quarrel with the scheme date, viz., June 27, 1941, as being the proper starting point. He was unable to contend that the ten years' period should begin at the end of the existing lease, which was December, 1942. The logic and good sense of the matter seem to me to point very strongly to the scheme date more particularly, because, by the terms of the scheme itself, the reduced rental which was part of the bargain was expressly provided to begin on the scheme date. So, without saying more, I pronounce in favour of June 27, 1941, and the result is, applying myself to the question asked on the petition, that, apart from the Validation of War-time Leases Act, 1944, the document of Oct. 31 was void at law, but that the Act was effective to validate it by making the term purported to be granted thereby a term of ten years from June 27, 1941, subject to the right of either party to determine it in the manner provided by s. 1 (1) of the Act, and subject to the appropriate provision for earlier determination on the happening of the events specified in the proviso to para. 3 of the scheme. The result is that this appeal must be allowed.

COHEN, L.J. : I am of the same opinion. The deed, which was executed pursuant to the scheme, merely provides that the leases shall be deemed to be extended and modified as provided by the scheme. What, therefore, we have to consider is the true meaning and effect of the scheme. I approach this document bearing in mind that it is in the nature of a commercial document and not a conveyancing deed. Clause 9, so far as material, is in these terms :

> " So soon as practicable after this scheme has taken effect the company and the landlord will do such acts and things and execute such deed or deeds as may be requisite to give effect to the following provisions . . . (iii) The said leases of Dec. 24, 1921, Mar. 20, 1928, and Oct. 25, 1934, shall be modified as follows :—(A) the respective terms of years thereby granted shall be extended until the expiration of the scheme period . . . (C) As from the scheme date until the determination of the said leases so modified as aforesaid, the total rent payable thereunder shall be at the rate of £2,000 per annum the same to include all other charges expressed to be payable thereunder in addition to the rents thereby reserved."

This refers back to the definition in cl. 1 of the expression, " the scheme period," and through that definition to cl. 3. Clause 1 defines the scheme period as meaning :

> " the period during which this scheme shall continue in force under the provisions hereinafter contained."

Clause 3 is in these terms :

> " This scheme when sanctioned by the court under s. 153 of the Companies Act, 1929, shall henceforth have effect and continue in force until the expiration of twelve calendar months after the date on which the emergency that was the occasion of the passing of the Courts (Emergency Powers) Act, 1939, is declared by an Order in Council to have come to an end, Provided nevertheless that this scheme shall determine and ipso facto cease to be binding on the earlier happening of any of the following events . . . "

The specified events are then set out.

As I read cl. 3, it provides for a period which is defined by the words " until the expiration of twelve calendar months after the date . . . ," and then goes on to provide that in certain specified events the term thus created shall determine and cease prior to the expiration of the period. Counsel for the landlords, however, says that it must be read as an agreement to grant a lease the term of which shall be one of six alternative periods. He bases this argument on the definition of the scheme period in cl. 1, and, particularly, on the words " during which this scheme shall continue in force." In other words, he is seeking to read " scheme period " as meaning one or other of the six periods which he finds in cl. 3. I am unable to accept this argument. As I read the scheme the lease is to be for a term as defined in cl. 3, determinable, however, on the occurrence of any of the five specified events therein set forth. So construed, the tenancy is clearly within the mischief of Lace v. Chantler (2). The question, therefore, is, whether on this construction the tenancy falls within the Validation of War-time Leases Act, 1944 ? In my view, it does. Counsel for the landlords admitted that, if the tenancy was for the period defined in cl. 3 of the scheme and was not determinable in the specified events, it would be within the protection of the Act. He says that, having regard especially (a) to the definition of the term, " the duration of the war " in s. 1 (2) of the Validation of War-time Leases Act, 1944, and (b) to the express provision in s. 1 (3) making the Act applicable to certain tenancies which were not purely and simply tenancies for the duration of the war, the Act only applies to tenancies for the duration of the war without any qualification, unless the tenancy in question is within the express terms of sub-s. (3). I am unable to accept that view. I agree with Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., that there is nothing in principle or in the Act to compel us to refuse to apply the Act to a tenancy expressed to be for the duration of the war merely because in certain events the term thus created might come to an end on the occurrence of these events before the end of the war. I think the explanation of s. 1 (3) is that it was thought advisable to make it plain that the Act was to apply to these tenancies, notwithstanding that they might be described in one sense as a tenancy for some other period than the duration of the war. I do not think we should be justified in excluding from the ambit of the Act tenancies which are expressed to be for the duration of the war merely because that term was liable to be brought to an end by an event occurring before the end of the war.

The Act is silent on the subject as to when the term of ten years is to start, but it seems to me it must be intended to refer to the commencement of the term covered by the agreement for a tenancy during the duration of the war. In the present case it is plain from cl. 9 (iii) (C) that it is intended that the term created by the modified lease could commence on the scheme date, i.e., June 27, 1941. I also desire to express my concurrence with the observations which Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., has made on the inclusion of a provision in the order that the lease should be determinable in the events specified in cl. 3 of the scheme. As at present advised, I do not read the Act as affecting the provisions of the agreement further than is required to give effect to the provision of s. 1 thereof. For these reasons I agree that the appeal must be allowed.

ASQUITH, L.J.: I also agree. The difficult question is whether the Validation of War-time Leases Act, 1944, applies to these extended leases. On that point I have come to the same conclusion as my Lords. These leases seem to me to have been leases for the duration of the war within the precise definition of that term contained in s. 1 (2) (c). The main argument to the contrary was that a tenancy for the duration of the war within the meaning of that sub-section means, and means only, a tenancy terminated by the end of the war as therein defined and by no other event, and, therefore, excludes a tenancy terminated by the end of the war or the earlier occurrence of another named event. The answer to this seems to me to be that a tenancy otherwise complying with the definition of a tenancy for the duration of the war does not forfeit that character merely by reason of a proviso that it is to be defeasible before the end of the war on the earlier occurrence of certain named events. Nor, for the reasons given by my Lords, to which I have nothing to add, do I think that the presence of s. 1 (3) alters this conclusion. I agree with the order proposed.

Appeal allowed. Declaration in the terms of the judgment. Landlords to receive half the costs of the appeal. No order as to costs in lower court.

[House of Lords (Lord Porter, Lord Normand, Lord Morton of Henryton, Lord MacDermott and Lord Reid), October 14, 17, December 1, 1949.]

Company—Private company—Transmission of shares on death of member—Right of executors to be registered as members—Acquisition of shares by directors—Directors' right to refuse registration— Failure of directors to agree.

By art. 10 of a private company, incorporated under the Companies Act, 1929, a member of the company or other person entitled to transfer a share was not allowed to transfer it to a non-member (except as provided by art. 15) so long as any member or any person selected by the directors was willing to purchase it. By art. 11, except where the transfer was made under art. 15 : "the person proposing to transfer any shares (hereinafter called 'the proposing transferor') shall give notice in writing (hereinafter called a 'transfer notice') to the company that he desires to transfer the same. Such notice shall specify the sum he fixes as the fair value, and shall constitute the company his agent for the sale of the share to any member of the company, or person selected" by the directors (under art. 10) "at the price so fixed, or, at the option of the purchaser, at the fair value to be fixed by the auditor in accordance with these articles." By art. 12 : "If the company shall, within the space of twenty-eight days after being served with a transfer notice, find a member, or person selected as aforesaid, willing to purchase the share (hereinafter called 'the purchasing member') and shall give notice thereof to the proposing transferor, he shall be bound, upon payment of the fair value, to transfer the share to the purchasing member." Under art. 15 the proposing transferor could transfer the share to any person if the company had not, within twenty-eight days after being served with a transfer notice, found a member, or person selected by the directors, willing to purchase the shares. By art. 16 : "All shares comprised in a transfer notice shall, unless the directors think fit to offer them to any person selected as aforesaid, be first offered by the company to the directors themselves . . . and any shares not taken by the directors . . . shall then be offered to the other members . . . Where the shares comprised in a transfer notice stand in the name of a deceased member, the directors shall have three calendar months from the service of the transfer notice within which to determine whether they will themselves purchase them or not." Article 17 provided that the executors of a deceased shareholder should be the only persons recognised by the company as having any title to a share, and by art. 18 : "Any person becoming entitled to a share in consequence of the death . . . of a member shall, upon such evidence being produced as may from time to time be required by the directors, have the right, subject to the directors not exercising their powers as hereinbefore contained, to acquire said shares, either to be registered as a member in respect of the share or, instead of being registered himself, to make such transfer of the share as the deceased . . . person could have made ; but the directors shall, in either case, have the same right to decline or suspend registration as they would have had in the case of a transfer of the share by the deceased . . . person before the death . . ." By art. 20 : "It shall be in the absolute discretion of the directors to refuse to register any transfer of shares of which they do not approve."

Until his death on Oct. 28, 1945, the deceased was a director and the chairman of the company, his sons, W.S. and J.S., being the other directors. The whole of the share capital of the company, which consisted of two thousand £1 shares, was owned by the deceased, three hundred shares being registered in the name of J.S. and two hundred in the name of W.S., who held as trustees for their father. By a trust disposition and settlement, dated Mar. 21, 1945, the deceased conveyed to his executors his trust estate, including the two thousand shares. By a letter, dated Jan. 8, 1948, the executors applied to the company to be registered as members in respect of one thousand two hundred of the shares to which they had become entitled and which were registered in the name of the deceased, but the directors failed to agree to their application, W.S. being in favour of granting it, A while J.S. refused to do so and offered to purchase the shares. A petition by the executors for rectification of the register of members of the company was resisted by J.S. on the grounds (a) that, under art. 18, he had the right to purchase, and (b) that, under art. 20, the directors had the right to refuse to register a transfer of which they did not approve.

HELD: (i) the words, "subject to the directors not exercising their B powers as hereinbefore contained, to acquire said shares" in art. 18 did not confer on the directors any new right of acquisition, but merely referred back to their powers under the earlier articles, and, on the true construction of those articles, the right of acquisition conferred on the directors arose only when a transfer notice had been served on the company in accordance with the provisions of art. 11; such a notice could be presented only by a C voluntary transferor, and the provisions in respect of it were not applicable when the executors of a deceased member sought to be registered; as recognised by art. 17, the executors were already entitled to the shares when they applied for registration, and, as no transfer notice had been served in respect of the shares, but the executors had merely applied as the legal personal representatives of the deceased to have the shares registered in D their own name, they were entitled, under art. 18, to be registered as members of the company, subject to the provisions of art. 20.

(ii) the directors could exercise their right to decline registration under art. 20 only by passing a resolution to that effect; mere failure to pass a resolution was not a formal active exercise of the right to decline; and, therefore, as the right had not been exercised, the executors were entitled to be registered as members of the company.

APPEAL by the petitioners, the executors of a deceased shareholder, from an interlocutor of the Second Division of the Court of Session (LORD THOMSON G (Lord Justice-Clerk) and LORD STEVENSON; LORD MACKAY dissenting), dated July 15, 1948, dismissing their petition for rectification of the register of members of the respondent company.

By a trust disposition and settlement the deceased conveyed to his executors his trust estate including his shares in the company, and the executors applied to the company to be registered as members in respect of the shares. The two H directors of the company failed to agree in regard to the executors' application, one of them (William Shepherd, the minuter) being willing to grant it, while the other (the respondent, John Shepherd) objected to doing so and claimed that, under the company's articles, he was entitled to acquire the shares by purchase. The Second Division of the Court of Session held that the directors' right of acquisition under the company's articles extended to a transmission on death. The interlocutor of the Second Division was now reversed by the House of Lords, who held that the right of acquisition did not apply in the case of a transmission on death and that the directors' right to decline registration under arts. 18 and 20 of the company's articles had not been exercised, and, therefore, the executors were entitled to be registered. The facts and the relevant articles appear in the opinion of LORD PORTER.

James Walker, K.C., and H. R. Leslie, K.C. (both of the Scottish Bar), for the appellants.

L. Hill Watson, K.C., and L. H. Daiches (both of the Scottish Bar) for the A respondent, John Shepherd.

The House took time for consideration.

Dec. 1. The following opinions were read.

LORD PORTER: My Lords, this is an appeal against an interlocutor pronounced by the Second Division of the Court of Session by which the petition of the first appellant and one James Ogilvie for rectification of the register of B members of the respondent company was dismissed. The facts are not in dispute and the circumstances under which the petition was launched are as follows. The respondent company is a private company incorporated under the Companies Act, 1929, of which William Shepherd, senior, now deceased, was director and chairman until his death on Oct. 28, 1945. He left a trust disposition and settlement, dated Mar. 21, 1945, of which the petitioners were the sole trustees C and the executors nominated therein and acting thereunder. The surviving directors are William Shepherd, junior, and John Shepherd, his brother. William Shepherd is a nominal respondent, but, as a minuter, supports the appellants in this matter and John Shepherd is the respondent who alone resists the appellants' claim and is referred to hereafter as the respondent. When he died, William Shepherd, senior, owned two thousand ordinary shares of D £1 each in the company, which was the whole of the share capital thereof, and by the trust disposition and settlement conveyed to the appellants his trust estate including these two thousand shares, which were included in the inventory of the deceased's moveable estate of which the petitioners were duly confirmed as the executors-nominate of the deceased. After the interlocutor of the Court of Session, one of the executors, James Ogilvie, E retired, and it was arranged that the second appellant [Miss Elizabeth Shepherd] would be assumed as a trustee and executor of the trust disposition and settlement in his room and place. Thereupon a deed of assumption assuming the second appellant as a trustee and executor was given effect to, and no objection has been taken by the respondent to the substitution of her name for that of the retiring executor and trustee. By letter, dated Jan. 8, 1948, the then F executors and trustees applied to the company to be registered as members in respect of one thousand two hundred out of the two thousand shares to which they had become entitled and which were registered in the name of the deceased, William Shepherd. Three hundred of the remaining eight hundred shares were registered in the name of John Shepherd, and two hundred in the name of William Shepherd, junior, but the petition states that they were held by each G of them as trustees for their father, William. The petition asks for no relief in respect of these shares. There remained a further three hundred shares which the trustees proposed to transfer to William Shepherd, junior, but this portion of their application has not been included in the petition and no question arises with regard to it in the present appeal.

The letter of Jan. 8 is in the following terms: H

"Messrs. W. &. J. Shepherd (Bookbinders), Ltd.,
Broughton Market,
Edinburgh 3.

Dear Sirs,

Mr. William Shepherd's Exy.

On behalf of the trustees of the late Mr. William Shepherd the confirmation in whose favour has already been registered in your books, we now apply to have certain of the deceased's shares registered as follows, viz., six hundred shares in name of Mr. James Ogilvie and Mr. Geo. Moodie ; and six hundred shares in name of Mr. Geo. Moodie and Mr. James Ogilvie. At the same time the trustees propose to transfer three hundred shares to Mr. William Shepherd, who is a director and a shareholder of the company, and we shall be glad to have your confirmation that on a proper stamped transfer being submitted to you, it will be registered accordingly. Failing our hearing from you within seven days from this date to the effect that you will agree to and carry out the proposals mentioned above, appropriate court proceedings will be taken without further notice.

Yours faithfully,
Keir, Moodie & Co."

It will be observed that the application made is to have six hundred of the shares registered in the names of James Ogilvie as the first holder and George Moodie as the second, and the other six hundred in the name of George Moodie as the first holder and James Ogilvie as the second. As their Lordships understand, no contention is now raised that the trustees are not entitled to have the shares registered in this form if they are entitled to have them registered in their names at all, and the right claimed has some support from the decision in Burns v. Siemens Brothers Dynamo Works (1). When this application was made the only two directors were those mentioned above, and the letter was answered by one dated Jan 26, 1948, and signed by the two directors. Its terms are as follows :

" Messrs. Keir, Moodie & Co., S.S.C.,
1, Leopold Place,
Edinburgh.

Dear Sirs,

Mr. Moodie.

The directors of the above company held a meeting on Jan. 23, 1948, to discuss a letter received from Mr. Moodie when he proposed to register one thousand two hundred shares in the name of the trustees and to transfer three hundred shares to Mr. William Shepherd who is a director and shareholder of the company. He also stated that if proposals were not agreed to, appropriate court proceedings will be taken within seven days. The directors failed to agree to the proposals—Mr. William Shepherd being in favour of the proposals, and Mr. John Shepherd being against the proposals, and offering to purchase a number of the shares.

Yours faithfully,
Director J. Shepherd.
Director W. Shepherd."

It is apparent that, as a result of the failure of the directors to agree, there was no definite refusal to register the shares in the name of the trustees and the question for your Lordships' decision is whether in these circumstances the company is entitled to refuse to register the shares as requested.

The answer to this difficult question must depend on the provisions of the articles of association of the respondent company. The material articles are those numbered 10 to 20 inclusive, and take the following form :

" 10. A share may be transferred by a member or other person entitled to transfer to any member selected by the transferor ; and save as provided by cl. 15 hereof no share shall be transferred to a person who is not a member so long as any member, or any person selected by the directors as one whom it is desirable in the interests of the company to admit to membership, is willing to purchase the same at the fair value. 11. Except where the transfer is made pursuant to cl. 15 hereof, the person proposing to transfer any shares (hereinafter called 'the proposing transferor') shall give notice in writing (hereinafter called a 'transfer notice') to the company that he desires to transfer the same. Such notice shall specify the sum he fixes as the fair value, and shall constitute the company his agent for the sale of the share to any member of the company, or person selected as aforesaid, at the price so fixed, or, at the option of the purchaser, at the fair value to be fixed by the auditor in accordance with these articles. A transfer notice may include several shares, and in such case shall operate as if it were a separate notice in respect of each. A transfer notice shall not be revocable except with the sanction of the directors. 12. If the company shall, within the space of twenty-eight days after being served with a transfer notice, find a member, or person selected as aforesaid, willing to purchase the share (hereinafter called 'the purchasing member') and shall give notice thereof to the proposing transferor, he shall be bound, upon payment of the fair value, to transfer the share to the purchasing member. 13. In case any difference arises between the proposing transferor and the purchasing member as to the fair value of a share, the auditor shall, on the application of either party, certify in writing the sum which, in his opinion, is the fair value, and such sum shall be deemed to be the fair value, and in so certifying the auditor shall be considered to be acting as an expert, and not as an arbitrator, and accordingly the Arbitration (Scotland) Act, 1894, shall not apply. 14. If in any case the proposing transferor, after having become bound as aforesaid, makes default in transferring the share, the company may receive the purchase money, and shall thereupon cause the name of the purchasing member to be entered in the register as the holder of the share, and shall hold the purchase money in trust for the proposing transferor. The receipt of the company for the purchase money shall be a good discharge to the purchasing member, and after his name has been entered in the register in purported exercise of the aforesaid power, the validity of the proceedings shall not be questioned by any person. 15. If the company shall not, within the space of twenty-eight days after being served with a transfer notice, find a member, or person selected as aforesaid, willing to purchase the shares, and give notice in manner aforesaid, the proposing transferor shall at any time within three calendar months afterwards be at liberty, subject to cl. 20 hereof, to sell and transfer the shares (or those not placed) to any person and at any price. 16. All shares comprised in a transfer notice shall, unless the directors think fit to offer them to any person selected as aforesaid, be first offered by the company to the directors themselves, and so that in case of any difference between them as to the disposal or distribution of a share or shares, the mode of disposal or distribution shall be determined by lot, and any shares not taken by the directors, or some or one of them, shall then be offered to the other members in such order as shall be determined by lot. And in each case the person to whom the offer is made (whether a director or not) shall have the option of buying at the price fixed in the transfer notice, or, at his option, at the fair value, to be fixed by the auditor as aforesaid, such option to be declared in accepting the offer. Where the shares comprised in a transfer notice stand in the name of a deceased member, the directors shall have three calendar months from the service of the transfer notice within which to determine whether they will themselves purchase them or not. 17. The executors or administrators of a deceased sole holder of a share shall be the only persons recognised by the company as having any title to the share. In the case of a share registered in the names of two or more holders, the survivors or survivor, or the executors or administrators of the deceased survivor shall be the only persons recognised by the company as having any title to the share. 18. Any person becoming entitled to a share in consequence of the death or bankruptcy of a member shall, upon such evidence being produced as may from time to time be required by the directors, have the right, subject to > the directors not exercising their powers as hereinbefore contained, to acquire said shares, either to be registered as a member in respect of the share or, instead of being registered himself, to make such transfer of the share as the deceased or bankrupt person could have made ; but the directors shall, in either case, have the same right to decline or suspend registration as they would have had in the case of a transfer of the share by the deceased or bankrupt person before the death or bankruptcy. 19. A person becoming entitled to a share by reason of the death or bankruptcy of the holder shall be entitled to the same dividends and other pecuniary advantages to which he would be entitled if he were the registered holder of the share, except that where he becomes entitled thereto by reason of such death or bankruptcy he shall not, before being registered as a member in respect of the share, be entitled in respect of it to exercise any right conferred by membership in relation to meetings of the company. 20. It shall be in the absolute discretion of the directors to refuse to register any transfer of shares of which they do not approve."

Under these provisions the appellants maintain that they are entitled to be registered as executors unless the directors, acting as a board, refuse their consent; that, as the two directors are divided in opinion, they have not declined to effect the registration ; and that, therefore, the registration must take place. The respondent, John Shepherd, in answer, points to the provisions of art. 16, and contends that the appellants are not entitled to have the shares transferred into their name until the directors have had a period of three months in which to make up their minds whether the shares shall be transferred to them. He further claims that, as one of those directors, videlicet himself, has offered, in accordance with art. 16, within three calendar months from the service of the request for transfer to purchase one thousand two hundred shares, he is entitled to have these shares transferred to himself at such price as may be fixed by the auditor of the company ; that, accordingly, the appellants' application is premature ; and that they are not entitled to be registered in accordance with the terms of their application. The appellants, on their part, say that they are not applying that the shares should be transferred to anyone, that the shares have been transmitted to them as executors and trustees, that the only provision in the articles entitling the company to refuse to register the shares in their name is that contained in art. 20, and that that article can only be brought into effect by a resolution of the board.

Both parties rely on art. 18 as determining the relationship of the parties. If, say the appellants, that article be read without the words :

> " . . . subject to the directors not exercising their powers as hereinbefore contained, to acquire said shares . . . "

they (the appellants) would be entitled to demand either to be registered as members or to make such transfer of the shares as the deceased could have made, unless the directors, acting as a board, were to decline or suspend registration. The respondent, John Shepherd, relies on the words, the omission of which is suggested above, and to the final words of the article, and says that the directors are exercising their powers to acquire the shares given by the previous articles, and are entitled to decline registration of a transfer to the trustees and executors under the will of the deceased owner to the same extent as they would have been if he had attempted to transfer them in his lifetime. The article, he maintains, deals generally with the transfer or transmission of shares from one interest to another and is required in order to protect the shareholders in a family, or, indeed, in any private, company. This contention raises the question what their rights to acquire the shares under the previous articles are, and as to the meaning of the word " transfer " in art. 18. The appellants say that these powers apply only in the case of a transfer, properly so called, not to cases where the shares have been transmitted by course of law. It is with these contentions in mind that I have thought it necessary to set out the relevant articles in full in order to determine what the directors' powers of acquisition are and when they arise.

It will be observed that, except in the case of a transfer under art. 15 which has no application to the present case, a transfer as contemplated by the articles necessitates the giving of a transfer notice specifying the sum fixed by the transferor as the fair value of the shares, and that the right of the company to find a substitute only arises after such a transfer notice has been served. In particular, art. 16, which contains the provisions under which John Shepherd claims a right to purchase the shares and to have them transferred to him and registered in his name, has reference only to shares comprised in a transfer notice. Moreover, the relevant articles throughout speak of the person to whom the transfer is to be made as "the purchasing member," an expression inappropriate to the acquisition of shares by transmission. I conclude that the acquisition of the shares referred to in art. 18 does not include the case of transmission of the shares to the representatives of a deceased member and that "transfer" in that article is exclusive of such a transmission. Apart from and in addition to the matters already adverted to, this construction is, in my view, supported by the terms of art. 17 which treats the transmission of shares to an executor as standing on a different footing from the transfer of shares from one person to another by agreement, and, indeed, art. 18 itself makes the same distinction when it gives the representatives of a deceased member the alternative either to be registered or to transfer the shares devolving on him. Accordingly, in my opinion, the appellants' contention should prevail. Powers of restriction on the right of the transfer or transmission of shares from one person to another are a serious restriction on the rights of holders of shares in a company, even though that company be a private one. No doubt in such a case it may well be desirable for the directors to have control over the transfer of shares to outside persons, but that construction does not necessarily apply to the transmission of shares from a holder to his personal representatives, and, if it is desired to control such a transmission, it should be done in plain terms.

The respondent, John Shepherd, however, contended that under art. 20 the directors had an absolute discretion to refuse to register any transfer of shares of which they did not approve, and that, unless some such approval was given, the company was under no obligation to register them in the name of anyone of whom they did not approve. This argument, no doubt, would be effective if the directors had as a body disapproved of the transfer, but, inasmuch as one director alone disapproved, there cannot be said to have been any refusal by the board, and, in my view, the board and not the individual director must disapprove within the terms of the article. The mere failure to pass a resolution is not a formal active exercise of the right to decline, as Astbury, J., said ([1924] 1 Ch. 280) in Re Hackney Pavilion, Ltd. (2), and, in my view, a formal active exercise of the right of refusal to register is required before the company is authorised to refuse to register the shares in the names of those to whom they have been transmitted. I would allow the appeal and order the respondent, John Shepherd, to pay costs both here and in the Court of Session.

LORD NORMAND : My Lords, were it not that I find myself disagreeing from the conclusion reached by the majority of the Second Division of the Court of Session, I would have wished to add nothing to the opinion delivered by my noble and learned friend on the Woolsack. On the first point I need say little because I agree with the unanimous view of the learned judges of the Second Division. The right of executors to have the shares of their deceased author registered in their own names is, under arts. 18 and 20, subject to a discretionary veto by the directors. The veto must be actively exercised : see Re Hackney Pavilion, Ltd. (2). Here, however, there are only two directors and they are in disagreement, one of them being in favour of granting the appellants' application and the other against. The deadlock has prevented the exercise of the veto by the directors as a body and the claim of the appellants to be registered cannot be countered by invoking the discretionary veto.

The right of pre-emption is a heavy burden on the rights of shareholders, and though it is not doubtful that it may be created by implication as well as by the express terms of the articles, an inference from ambiguous data will no do. It must be a clear implication. Article 18 is the article which deals with the registration of shares transmitted on death to the personal representatives of a deceased shareholder and of shares transmitted by law to the trustee in sequestration of a bankrupt shareholder. It provides that, subject to the production of evidence of title :

> "Any person becoming entitled to a share in consequence of the death or bankruptcy of a member shall . . . have the right, subject to the directors not exercising their powers as hereinbefore contained, to acquire said shares, either to be registered as a member in respect of the share or, instead of being registered himself, to make such transfer of the share as the deceased or bankrupt person could have made . . ."

But, when the earlier articles are read, it is apparent that the rights of acquisition created by them become effectual when a transfer notice has been presented, in accordance with the provisions of art. 11, by the person proposing to transfer the shares. Article 11 requires that the notice shall specify the sum which the transferor fixes as the fair value, and shall constitute the company his agent for the sale of the share to any member of the company, or person selected, at the price so fixed, or, at the option of the purchaser, at the fair value to be fixed by the auditor in accordance with the articles. This is a notice which could be filled up and presented to the company only by a voluntary transferor, and the provisions in respect of it are not applicable when the executor of a deceased member or the trustee of a bankrupt member seeks to be registered. They do, however, apply if the executor or trustee, instead of asking for registration of his own name, decides to transfer the share to another person.

The articles are ill-expressed and obscure, and, if it was intended that the directors' right of pre-emption should operate in circumstances like the present, where there has been a transmission but as yet no transfer or proposed transfer, they have failed to give effect to that intention either expressly or by a reasonably clear implication. Since the respondent, John Shepherd, no longer insists in his objection to the registration of the shares in two blocks and to the order of the names proposed for registration, I think that the appellants are entitled to the relief craved, and I find it unnecessary to deal with the other questions which were debated. I would allow the appeal with costs against the respondent, John Shepherd.

Vide.

LORD MORTON OF HENRYTON : My Lords, the claim of the original executors was opposed by John Shepherd on two grounds. In the first place he relied on the words :

> ". . . subject to the directors not exercising their powers as hereinbefore contained, to acquire said shares . . ."

which appear in art. 18 of the company's articles of association. Secondly, he relied on the words, appearing in the same article :

> ". . . but the directors shall . . . have the same right to decline or suspend registration as they would have had in the case of a transfer of the share by the deceased or bankrupt person before the death or bankruptcy."

These words are linked up with art. 20 which provides :

> "It shall be in the absolute discretion of the directors to refuse to register any transfer of shares of which they do not approve."

In my view, the first objection fails because the words quoted do not confer any new right of acquisition on the directors, but merely refer back to their powers "as hereinbefore contained." It is, therefore, necessary to look to the earlier articles to see what powers of acquisition were thereby conferred on the directors. Under these articles, as I read them, no such powers arise unless and until a transfer notice has been served on the company, and no transfer notice has been served in respect of the one thousand two hundred shares now in question. The original executors simply applied to have these shares registered in their names as the legal personal representatives of the deceased, William Shepherd. The second objection also fails because there has been no decision by the directors to decline or suspend registration. One director was in favour of registration and the other was against it: see Re Hackney Pavilion, Ltd. (2). No question now arises in regard to the substitution of Miss Elizabeth Chisholm Shepherd for the original executor, James Ogilvie, and no objection is now raised to the request to have the one thousand two hundred shares in question registered in two blocks, the name of George Moodie being placed first in respect of one block and the name of Miss Shepherd being placed first in respect of the other block. I express no view whether the letter of Jan. 26, 1948, and that of Feb. 3, 1948 [containing an intimation by Mr. John Shepherd of his desire to acquire the shares] could in any event have been an effective exercise by Mr. John Shepherd of any powers of acquisition conferred on the directors by the articles. I have stated my reasons very briefly, as the points raised have already been so fully discussed by the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack. I concur in the motion proposed.

LORD MACDERMOTT: My Lords, I agree that this appeal should be allowed and only wish to add a brief statement of the reasoning which has led me to a different conclusion from that reached by the majority in the Second Division of the Court of Session. The right of the present appellants, as the persons entitled to the shareholding of the deceased, William Shepherd, in consequence of his death, to be registered as members of the respondent company in the manner sought by the prayer of their petition (as amended) was challenged on two grounds. Both of these were based on art. 18 of the articles of association. The first was that the directors of the company had, in exercise of the power in that behalf conferred by that article, declined to effect the desired registration. The second was that the right claimed was subject to the power of the directors to acquire the shares in question and that the respondent, John Shepherd, had taken the necessary steps to exercise that power.

The first of these contentions is, on the facts, untenable. The deceased, William Shepherd, was, until his death on Oct. 23, 1945, a director and also chairman of the company. Since then the only directors have been his sons, the respondents, John Shepherd and William Shepherd. They met to consider the claim for registration at a meeting held on Jan. 23, 1948, but disagreed regarding it. The deadlock thus caused has continued. It does not appear that any chairman of the board has been appointed since the death of William Shepherd, senior, and no question of a casting vote under the Companies Act, 1929, sched. I, table A, art. 81, arises. In these circumstances there has been no resolution or determination on the part of the directors. Their right to decline registration has, therefore, not been exercised.

The second contention is founded on that part of art. 18 which makes the appellants' right to registration in respect of the shares standing in the name of the deceased:

> "... subject to the directors not exercising their powers as hereinbefore contained, to acquire said shares ..."

In the Second Division the Lord Justice-Clerk (LORD THOMSON) and LORD STEVENSON took the view that, by implication, this power extended to a transmission on death so as to enable the directors to acquire shares held by a personal representative as such. LORD MACKAY, on the other hand, was of opinion that the power only arose in relation to a proposed transfer of shares. I think he was right. Whatever may be said of the drafting of these articles, their provisions on this matter are clear enough and leave, in my opinion, no room for implication. The powers of acquisition referred to in art. 18 are, expressly, those "hereinbefore contained." But the earlier articles give no power to the directors to acquire shares save where a "transfer notice" has been served, and art. 11 makes it plain that a transfer notice is, for the purposes of the articles, a notice in writing given to the company by a person proposing to transfer any shares that "he desires to transfer the same." The representatives of William Shepherd, deceased, have expressed no such desire in relation to the shares in question. All they want is registration and for that a notice of transfer would be not only unnecessary but quite inappropriate. On this short ground the right to acquire mentioned in art. 18 never arose and the second contention must, therefore, fail. Had that right accrued, the question whether John Shepherd did what was needed to exercise it would fall to be considered. That question, however, does not arise on the view I take and I express no opinion on it. I would, accordingly, hold in favour of the relief sought and reverse the interlocutor with costs against the respondent, John Shepherd, here and in the Second Division.

LORD REID: My Lords, the questions at issue in this appeal depend on the construction of certain of the articles of association of W. & J. Shepherd (Bookbinders), Ltd., which is a private company. These articles clearly provide that, if a member of the company or other person entitled to transfer a share wishes to transfer it to a non-member, that share must first be offered for sale to a person selected by the directors or to the directors and then to the other members of the company, and it is only in the event of none of these persons being willing to purchase that the transferor can transfer to another transferee. Article 11 requires that a person proposing to transfer a share shall give a transfer notice to the company specifying the sum which he fixes as the fair value and art. 16 makes provision for determining the order in which the share shall be offered to directors and members. A person who agrees to purchase under these provisions is entitled, instead of paying the price fixed by the transferor, to pay the value of the share as fixed by the auditor. I have said that these provisions apply where it is proposed to transfer a share to a non-member. It is not altogether clear what the position is when the proposed transferee is a member of the company. As it is not necessary to determine that question in this case, I express no opinion about it.

Article 18 makes special provision for transmission of a share on death or bankruptcy. Under it an executor has:

> "... the right, subject to the directors not exercising their powers as hereinbefore contained, to acquire said shares, either to be registered as a member in respect of the share or, instead of being registered himself, to make such transfer of the share as the deceased or bankrupt person could have made ..."

The first question for decision is whether this provision gives to the directors, or any of them, any right to acquire shares which belonged to a deceased member of the company when his executors do not seek to transfer the shares to another person but only seek to have their own names registered as members in respect of the shares. The earlier articles contain no provision for the acquisition by directors, or others, of shares which are not comprised in a transfer notice, and transfer notice is defined in art. 11 as the notice which the person proposing to transfer any shares shall give to the company stating that he desires to transfer the same. "Transfer," if the word is used in its ordinary sense, means a transfer from one person to another and implies that there must be both a transferor and a transferee. But where an executor is registered in respect of shares forming part of the deceased's estate, there is no transfer from one person to another. The executor, as is recognised by art. 17, is already entitled to the shares when he makes application for registration of his name. This distinction between transfer and transmission on death is well recognised in company law and I can find nothing in any of the articles which precede art. 18 to suggest that in these articles the word " transfer " is used in any but its ordinary sense. Therefore, if any directors have a right under this article to acquire shares forming part of the estate of a deceased member on the occasion of the executor seeking to have his own name registered as a member, that right cannot be by virtue of " any power as hereinbefore contained." It can only be found by implication from the terms of the articles of association as a whole and in particular from the terms of art. 18. This was recognised by the Lord Justice-Clerk (LORD THOMSON) and by LORD STEVENSON who concurred with him. The Lord Justice-Clerk founded on the general intendment of the articles and their main purpose to secure directors' control over the personnel of the shareholders. I do not think that this is a good ground of decision. Where there is in question a power which so severely limits a right of property as does a right of pre-emption, I would not be prepared to base its existence on implication except, perhaps, in a very clear case. I can see no foundation for any such implication here. There is nothing illogical or even unreasonable in drawing a distinction between a case where an executor seeks to have his own name registered and a case where an executor seeks to transfer shares to someone else. Indeed, it would be rather surprising in this case, where one shareholder held three quarters of the shares of the company, to find a power which enabled the other shareholders, on the death of the principal shareholder, to prevent his executors from ever acquiring voting rights by acquiring for themselves all the shares which were registered in the name of the deceased as soon as the executors sought to be registered as members of the company.

There was a further argument submitted for the respondent, John Shepherd, which I should notice. It was said that the grammatical structure of art. 18 made it necessary that the words :

> " . . . subject to the directors not exercising their powers as hereinbefore contained, to acquire said shares . . . " shall apply both to the right of the executor to be registered himself and to the right to transfer the shares. But a sentence, in the form that subject to a certain qualification a person shall have alternative rights, does not, in my view, necessarily mean that that qualification must apply equally to both alternative rights, and I attach little weight to this argument.

On the second question in the case I agree with your Lordships that directors can exercise their right to decline registration only by passing a resolution to that effect, and I, therefore, agree that this appeal must be allowed.

Appeal allowed. The respondent, John Shepherd, to pay the costs here and in the Court of Session.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., Cohen and Asquith, L.JJ), November 2, 3, December 2, 1949.]

Rent Restriction—Standard rent—Premises let at progressive rent—Rent payable on Sept. 1, 1939, and for five years thereafter less than two-thirds rateable value—Maximum rent more than two-thirds—Application of Rent Acts—Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920 (c. 17) (as amended by the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1939 (c. 71), sched. I), s. 12 (1) (a) ; s. 12 (7).

By s. 12 (1) (a) of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, as amended by the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1939, sched. I, it is provided : " The expression ' standard rent ' means the rent at which the dwelling-house was let on Sept. 1, 1939, or, where the dwelling-house was not let on that date, the rent at which it was last let before that date, or, in the case of a dwelling-house which was first let after the said Sept. 1, 1939, the rent at which it was first let : Provided that, in the case of any dwelling-house let at a progressive rent payable under a tenancy agreement or lease, the maximum rent payable under such tenancy agreement or lease shall be the standard rent ; and, where at the date by reference to which the standard rent is calculated, the rent was less than the rateable value the rateable value at that date shall be the standard rent." By s. 12 (7) it is provided : " Where the rent payable in respect of any tenancy of any dwelling-house is less than two-thirds of the rateable value thereof, this Act shall not apply to that rent or tenancy nor to any mortgage by the landlord from whom the tenancy is held of his interest in the dwelling-house, and this Act shall apply in respect of such dwelling-house as if no such tenancy existed or ever had existed."

The landlord of a dwelling-house to which the Rent Acts applied held the premises under a lease for a term of twenty-nine years from Sept. 29, 1936, at a progressive rent of £5 a year until Sept. 29, 1944, and £65 a year thereafter. On Sept. 1, 1939, the rateable value of the premises was £38 a year. On Nov. 14, 1947, the landlord granted to the tenant an underlease of the premises for the remainder of the term less three days at a rent of £225 a year. On an application by the tenant to determine the standard rent of the premises,

HELD : (i) the words " rent payable in respect of any tenancy " in s. 12 (7), meant the rent payable under the provisions of the tenancy in force on Sept. 1, 1939, and not the rent actually payable on that date ; on the true construction of the proviso to s. 12 (1) (a), read with the substantive provisions of that paragraph, where a dwelling-house was let at a progressive rent the rent at which it was let at Sept. 1, 1939, must be taken to be " the maximum rent payable under such tenancy agreement " ; and, therefore, the rent payable on Sept. 1, 1939, in respect of the tenancy in the present case must be taken to be £65 and so not less than two-thirds of the rateable value of the dwelling-house, with the result that s. 12 (7) did not exclude the operation of the Rent Acts and under s. 12 (1) (a) the standard rent was £65.

(ii) whether the word " where " in s. 12 (7) meant " in cases in which " or " if and so long as " (a construction to which the court inclined) the effect of the fact that the rent payable in respect of the tenancy on Sept. 1, 1939, was less than two-thirds of the rateable value was then to exclude the tenancy from the provisions of the Rent Acts, but when the rent rose to £65 the lease came within the provisions of s. 12 (1) (a) as a first letting after Sept. 1, 1939, and, again, the standard rent would be £65.

Appeal by the tenant from an order of His Honour Judge Sir Gerald Hargreaves made at West London County Court and dated July 6, 1949, fixing at £225 a year the standard rent of a dwelling-house to which the Rent Acts applied.

By a lease dated Sept. 14, 1937, the premises were let for a term of twenty-nine years from Sept. 29, 1936, at a progressive rent of £5 a year until Sept. 29, 1944, and £65 a year thereafter. On Nov. 14, 1947, the premises were sub-let to the tenant for the term of the headlease less three days at a rent of £225 a year. On an application by the tenant to fix the standard rent, the learned county court judge held that, since the rent on Sept. 1, 1939 (the material date for the purpose of determining the standard rent) was less than two-thirds the rateable value, the premises were excluded from the provisions of the Rent Restrictions Acts by s. 12 (7) of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, and must be regarded as being " first " let within the meaning of the Acts in 1947. The Court of Appeal now allowed the appeal and held that the standard rent was the maximum rent payable under the 1937 lease, viz., £65.

Dec. 2. COHEN, L.J., read the following judgment of the court. This appeal is from an order of His Honour Judge Sir Gerald Hargreaves made on the application of Mrs. Woozley, the tenant of certain premises known as 41, Hasker Street, Chelsea, for determination of the standard rent of those premises under s. 11 (1) of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1923. The landlord, Mrs. Woodall Smith, was herself entitled, as hereafter appears, to the benefit of a lease of the premises from the freeholder, Earl Cadogan. It is conceded that the premises were brought within the purview of the Rent Restrictions Acts by virtue of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1939. The standard rent has, therefore, to be determined in accordance with the terms of s. 12 (1) (a) of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, as amended by sched. I to the Act of 1939. The sub-section, as amended, is as follows :

> " The expression ' standard rent ' means the rent at which the dwelling-house was let on Sept. 1, 1939, or, where the dwelling-house was not let on that date, the rent at which it was last let before that date, or, in the case of a dwelling-house which was first let after the said Sept. 1, the rent at which it was first let : Provided that, in the case of any dwelling-house let at a progressive rent payable under a tenancy agreement or lease, the maximum rent payable under such tenancy agreement or lease shall be the standard rent ; and, where at the date by reference to which the standard rent is calculated, the rent was less than the rateable value the rateable value at that date shall be the standard rent."

The premises were the subject of a lease granted on Sept. 30, 1845, by the then Earl Cadogan to one George Todd for the term of ninety-nine years from Sept. 29, 1845. The term of this lease expired, therefore, on Sept. 29, 1944. It is, however, a curious feature of the case that the rent payable under the lease of 1845 is unknown, nor is it known who, at the date of the grant of the lease under which the landlord derives her title, namely, Sept. 14, 1937, was entitled to the unexpired residue of George Todd's term of ninety-nine years or who was then, in fact, in occupation of the premises. In the result, it has been agreed by the parties to the present litigation, both in the county court and in this court, that the lease of 1845 must be regarded as irrelevant, and that the premises must be treated as having been for the first time let as a dwelling-house by the lease of 1937. By this lease the present freeholder granted to a Mrs. Boyes a lease of twenty-nine years from Sept. 29, 1936. The rent payable under this lease was for the period from Sept. 29, 1936, to Sept. 29, 1944, that is, for the then unexpired residue of George Todd's term (if still subsisting) £5 per annum, and thereafter, for the remainder of the twenty-nine years, £65 per annum. It is conceded that £5 per annum is, and was at all material times, less than two-thirds of the rateable value of the premises. At some time prior to Nov. 14, 1947, the landlord acquired the interest of Mrs. Boyes under the 1937 lease and on Nov. 14, 1947, she, the landlord, granted to the tenant an under-lease of the premises for the term of the 1937 lease less three days at a rent of £225 per annum. On these facts the question is whether the standard rent is £65 per annum or, as the county court judge held, £225 per annum. No doubt, s. 12 (1) (a) of the Act of 1920, which deals with the ascertainment of the standard rent, and s. 12 (7), which excludes certain tenancies from the operation of the Act, and, therefore, inter alia, from that of s. 12 (1) (a) must, for the purpose of ascertaining the standard rent, be read together, i.e., each must be construed with due regard to the existence and terms of the other.

We will consider the two provisions in the order in which they appear in the Act. In the first two or three lines of s. 12 (1) (a), as amended, the words "was let on Sept. 1, 1939," clearly mean "was the subject-matter of a letting current on Sept. 1, 1939," not "was let under a contract made on that date." We do not think this is challenged. In any case it seems to be plain beyond argument. If so, the first question is: Were these premises the subject-matter of a letting in force on Sept. 1, 1939? On the face of this sub-section, read in vacuo, the answer must be "Yes." The second question, on the same basis, is: At what rent were they so let? This means not what rent was de facto being paid or could be exacted in the latter part of 1939, but what rent was provided for under the contract of letting current on Sept. 1 of that year. The answer is, therefore, not "at a rent of £5 a year," but "at a progressive rent, rising from £5 a year in the period up to Michaelmas, 1944, to £65 thereafter till 1965." No other answer would be true. If so, still confining ourselves within the frontiers of s. 12 (1) (a), and giving effect to the proviso, we must conclude that the standard rent is £65 and that the tenant wins.

On behalf of the landlord it is contended that one must now re-read s. 12 (1) (a) in the light of s. 12 (7). Section 12 (7) reads as follows:

> "Where the rent payable in respect of any tenancy of any dwelling-house is less than two-thirds of the rateable value thereof, this Act shall not apply to that rent or tenancy nor to any mortgage by the landlord from whom the tenancy is held of his interest in the dwelling-house, and this Act shall apply in respect of such dwelling-house as if no such tenancy existed or ever had existed."

The argument of counsel for the landlord based on this sub-section is that, at the material time, which he says is Sept. 1, 1939, the rent "payable in respect of the [material] tenancy" was £5 a year; that this was less than two-thirds of the rateable value; that this tenancy must, accordingly, by reason of s. 12 (7), be treated as non-existent and as never having existed; that, if so, s. 12 (1) (a) cannot begin to operate on it; and, finally, that s. 12 (1) (a), in the agreed absence of any evidence as to the rent payable under any tenancy created next before Sept. 1, 1939, designates as the tenancy determinative of the standard rent the tenancy created next after Sept. 1, 1939, viz., the sub-tenancy held by the tenant at £225 per annum.

In considering this argument and the effect of s. 12 (7) generally, certain terms occurring in the first two lines of the sub-section which are capable of more than one meaning call for elucidation : (i) The opening word " Where." Does this mean " in cases in which," a meaning which, as Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., pointed out during the argument, it is capable of bearing, or does it mean : " If and so long as," as suggested in a dictum of Lord Uthwatt ([1946] 2 All E.R. 657) in Stone (J. & F.) Lighting and Radio, Ltd. v. Levitt (1), or has it, perhaps, some yet other meaning ? That is the first problem of construction. (ii) The words " payable in respect of the tenancy." Do they mean, in the circumstances of the present case, so payable at the time when proceedings are taken, or payable at the time prescribed as relevant by s. 12 (1) (a) ? And what does " payable in respect of the tenancy " mean in the particular case of a tenancy at a " progressive rent " ? For in such a tenancy two or more rents are payable in successive periods in respect of the same tenancy, and the question is : Which is relevant for the purposes of s. 12 (7) ?

We will deal with these points in inverse order. The rent " payable in respect of the tenancy " in the case of a tenancy at a progressive rent cannot mean simply the rent payable at its inception. In such a case as the present, if the question were posed : What was the rent payable in respect of the tenancy which was in force on Sept. 1, 1939 ?, the answer " £5 a year " would, as indicated above, be misleading and, indeed, untrue. The consequences of this will be considered later. The question here is : Payable when ? More than one answer is possible. (i) If it means " payable at the time when application is made to the court," the issue is simplified, for at that time the rent, whether it be treated as £65 or £225 a year, unquestionably exceeded two-thirds of the rateable value ; the tenancy is not excluded by s. 12 (7) from the scope of the Act ; s. 12 (1) (a) applies to it, and the effect of its application, having regard to the proviso about progressive rents, is that the standard rent is £65. (ii) As against this, and I will assume without deciding that the first basis is wrong, it has been argued that " payable," whatever it may mean for other purposes, for example, for those of an application for possession, means, in a case brought to ascertain the standard rent, payable at the time or times laid down in the provisions of s. 12 (1) (a) which deal with that subject-matter, namely, prima facie Sept. 1, 1939; that on that date the rent exigible was £5 a year; and that, as £5 a year is less than two-thirds of £38 a year, the then rateable value, the material tenancy, that of 1937, is excluded by s. 12 (7) from the operation of s. 12 (1) (a) of the Act, and that the first tenancy which attracted its operation was the sub-tenancy of £225. The answer to this contention has been anticipated when we were dealing with s. 12 (1) (a). The word " payable " is followed by the words " in respect of any tenancy." This means in the case of a tenancy current on Sept. 1, 1939; not the rent payable in the latter part of 1939 ; but the rent payable under the provisions of the tenancy in force on Sept. 1, 1939, which provisions provide for a progressive rent rising from £5 to £65. Again, we are confronted with the question : Which of these figures is relevant for the purposes of applying s. 12 (7) ? It must be possible to say whether s. 12 (7) excludes a particular tenancy from the Act or not. Yet here are two (successive) rents both " payable in respect of the tenancy," and there is nothing within the four corners of s. 12 (7) to show which is relevant. If the £5 rent is relevant, the tenancy is excluded. If the later £65 rent is relevant, it is not excluded. The answer must be sought and can be arrived at by reading this sub-section together with s. 12 (1) (a) and its proviso. The proviso to s. 12 (1) (a), which we have already read, begins : " Provided that, in the case of any dwelling-house let at a progressive rent . . . the maximum rent payable under such tenancy . . . " We pause there. If the sentence had continued " shall be deemed to be the rent at which the house was let on Sept. 1, 1939," the case would have been completely plain, and £65 would have been, or been deemed to be, the standard rent. The proviso, in fact, does not continue in that way. It proceeds "shall be the standard rent," words which assume that s. 12 (7) had not excluded the tenancy in question from the ambit of the Acts and the operation of s. 12 (1) (a), because, if it had, no question of a standard rent could arise. That is the crux to which the case in this aspect of it narrows down.

Reading the two sub-sections together, and reading the proviso to s. 12 (1) (a) together with the substantive provisions of that paragraph, we feel little doubt as to the result. So read, the proviso, which is condensed, can, in our view, legitimately be construed as though it were expanded by the insertion of certain words drawn from the substantive part of s. 12 (1) (a). So expanded it would read as follows : "Provided that, in the case of any dwelling-house let at a progressive rent . . . the rent at which it was let on Sept. 1, 1939, shall be taken to be the maximum rent payable under such tenancy and the latter shall be the standard rent." This does not involve re-writing the provision in any pejorative sense of "re-writing." It merely involves making its implications explicit. We say this because : (a) By the substantive provision of s. 12 (1) (a) the rent at which the dwelling-house was let on Sept. 1, 1939, equals the standard rent. (b) By the proviso, in the case of a lease at a progressive rent, which is this case, the maximum rent under that lease equals the standard rent ; hence (c), since things which are equal to the same thing are equal to each other, the rent at which the dwelling-house was let on Sept. 1, 1939, is to be taken to be equal to the maximum rent payable under the lease, which equals £65, and so excludes the annihilating application of s. 12 (7).

We have still to deal with the meaning of the word "Where" at the beginning of s. 12 (7). If it means "in cases in which," the conclusions reached above stand, but the same conclusions, namely, that the standard rent is £65 can be reached if "where" means, as LORD UTHWATT, obiter, in the Stone Radio case (1) took it to mean, "if and so long as," a construction to which we incline. For, assuming the foregoing arguments are fallacious, assuming against the tenant that on Sept. 1, 1939, the rent payable in respect of the tenancy is £5 a year, and that, consequently, s. 12 (7) kills the lease of 1937, and that, so long as the rent remains £5 a year its lethal effect continues, yet, if "where" means "if and so long as," that lethal effect does not continue beyond Michaelmas, 1944, when the rent rises to £65. The tenancy then comes to life again, s. 12 (1) (a) has to be applied to it, and the result of its application is that, there having been on Sept. 1, 1939, no lease which the law would recognise and no intelligible evidence as to any letting next before Sept. 1, 1939, the first lease recognised by the law as existing after Sept. 1, 1939, is that which springs into life in September, 1944, and that was a lease at £65, which is, accordingly, on this basis, too, the standard rent. In other words, we construe s. 12 (7) as meaning that, whenever it is, in fact, found that, as an incident of the relationship of landlord and tenant as regards any premises, the rent payable by the tenant is below the level indicated, then for all the purposes of the Act that rent and relationship are to be excluded from consideration, that is, the premises are not to be treated as being "let as a dwelling." We see no necessity, however, for treating the exclusion as operative for any longer time than the period during which the conditions demanding it, in fact, exist. All roads, therefore, seem to lead to £65. We think the appeal should be allowed, and a refund ordered of all sums paid in excess of £65 a year.

Appeal allowed with costs here and below.

Re ISLE OF THANET ELECTRIC SUPPLY CO., LTD.

[Court of Appeal (Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., Asquith, L.J., and Wynn-Parry, J.), November 17, 18, 1949.]

Company—Winding-up—Rights of preference stockholders—Surplus assets—Effect of article defining rights—Onus of proof of right to participate.

In 1929 a company, which had been incorporated in 1896, adopted new articles of association which, by art. 3, defined the rights of shareholders as follows: "The issued preference shares shall confer on the holders the right to a fixed cumulative preferential dividend at the rate of £6 per cent. per annum upon the amounts for the time being paid up or credited as paid up thereon respectively in priority to the ordinary shares, and the right to participate pari passu with the ordinary shares in the surplus profits which in respect of any year it shall be determined to distribute remaining after paying or providing for the said preferential dividend and a dividend for such year at the rate of six per cent. per annum on the amounts for the time being paid up or credited as paid up on the ordinary shares, and the preference shares shall confer the right in a winding-up of the company to repayment of capital, together with arrears (if any), and whether earned or not of the preferential dividend to the date of the commencement of the winding-up in priority to the ordinary shares". The two classes of shares therein referred to were subsequently converted into stock. In July, 1946, the company went into voluntary liquidation, and at that date its issued capital consisted of £282,000 preference stock and £150,000 ordinary stock. Certain arrears of dividend on the preference stock were paid, and the capital on both the preference and the ordinary stock was repaid. As regards the surplus assets, Held: the onus lay on the preference stockholders to show that they were entitled to participate therein; art. 3 must be taken as being exhaustive in defining their rights; and, therefore, the onus had not been discharged.

Appeal by a holder of ordinary stock from an order of Roxburgh, J., dated February 21, 1949, on an application by way of originating summons.

Roxburgh, J., held that, on the voluntary liquidation of the Isle of Thanet Electric Supply Co., Ltd., the preference stockholders were entitled to participate with the ordinary stockholders in the surplus assets rateably according to the nominal amount of their holdings. Having regard to the decision of the majority of the House of Lords in Scottish Insurance Corpn., Ltd. v. Wilsons and Clyde Coal Co., Ltd. ([1949] 1 All E.R. 1068) in which their Lordships' opinions were given on May 6, 1949, an ordinary stockholder applied to Roxburgh, J., for leave to appeal out of time. Roxburgh, J., granted the application (ante, p. 316), and the Court of Appeal now allowed the appeal. The facts appear in the judgment of Wynn-Parry, J.

Christie, K.C., and Cecil Turner for a holder of ordinary stock.

Gray, K.C., and K. W. Mackinnon for a holder of preference stock.

J. A. Brightman for the liquidator.

SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R.: I will ask Wynn-Parry, J., to give the first judgment.

WYNN-PARRY, J.: This is an appeal from the judgment of Roxburgh, J., on an originating summons which raises the question how the surplus property of the company should be distributed as between the preference stockholders and the ordinary stockholders of the company in its liquidation.

The company was incorporated on Nov. 3, 1896, and went into voluntary liquidation on July 16, 1946, in view of the imminent transfer of its electricity undertaking (then its only activity) under the Margate, Broadstairs and District Electricity Act, 1937. At the date of the liquidation the issued capital of the company consisted of £282,000 of preference stock and £150,000 of ordinary stock. By a special resolution of the company passed on Mar. 13 and confirmed on Apr. 10, 1929, new articles of association were adopted. Those articles have remained in force ever since. Article 3 of those articles defined the rights of the two classes of shares which were subsequently converted into stock, and, so far as relevant, provided :

> " The issued preference shares shall confer on the holders the right to a fixed cumulative preferential dividend at the rate of £6 per cent. per annum upon the amounts for the time being paid up or credited as paid up thereon respectively in priority to the ordinary shares, and the right to participate pari passu with the ordinary shares in the surplus profits which in respect of any year it shall be determined to distribute remaining after paying or providing for the said preferential dividend and a dividend for such year at the rate of six per cent. per annum on the amounts for the time being paid up or credited as paid up on the ordinary shares, and the preference shares shall confer the right in a winding-up of the company to repayment of capital, together with arrears (if any), and whether earned or not of the preferential dividend to the date of the commencement of the winding-up in priority to the ordinary shares."

That is followed by a provision the like of which, in my experience, I have never seen :

> " In the event of capital being written off on a reduction of capital amounts paid or credited on the ordinary shares shall be written off before the amounts paid or credited on the preference shares."

I read that provision only to dispose of it, because, in my view, it has really no effect whatsoever on the present question.

Prior to the liquidation, certain arrears of preference dividend which had accumulated during the war period were, according to the evidence before us, paid off. Further, the capital on the preference stock and on the ordinary stock has been repaid to the respective holders thereof, and there remains a very substantial balance, as to the destination of which the question before us has arisen. ROXBURGH, J., felt himself bound by authority and, with a reluctance which appears on the face of his judgment, was constrained to make a declaration to the effect that the holders of the preference stock were entitled to participate in this sum with the holders of the ordinary stock rateably in proportion to the nominal amount of the stocks held by them respectively. The two authorities which the learned judge mentions in his judgment are Re Fraser and Chalmers, Ltd. (1) and Re John Dry Steam Tugs, Ltd. (2). He does not in terms refer to Re Metcalfe & Sons, Ltd. (3), but it is plain that he must have had that case in mind, for it is a judgment of the Court of Appeal, and, at the time when the present case was before him, it was good authority. In Re Metcalfe & Sons, Ltd. (3) the Court of Appeal, while accepting that each case must be regarded as one of construction turning on the terms of the particular document, approved the statement of ASTBURY, J., in Re Fraser and Chalmers, Ltd. (1), where he said that all shareholders are entitled to equal treatment unless and to the extent that their rights in this respect are modified by the contract under which they hold their shares. He proceeded on the view that that was the correct principle to apply when considering the construction of articles or resolutions dealing with the rights of classes of shareholders inter se. I think the effect of Re Metcalfe & Sons, Ltd. (3) can, stated shortly, be said to be that, in questions between preference shareholders and ordinary shareholders as to the right of the preference shareholders to share in what has been many times described as surplus assets, the onus of showing that the preference shareholders are not entitled to share in those surplus assets lies on the ordinary shareholders.

Since the matter was before ROXBURGH, J., the position has been materially altered by the decision of the House of Lords in Scottish Insurance Corpn., Ltd. v. Wilsons and Clyde Coal Co., Ltd. (4). For the purposes of the present case I do not think that it is necessary to embark on a detailed analysis of that case or the opinions of the members of the House of Lords who heard it, but, as appears from the headnote, the facts were that the colliery assets of a coal-mining company had been transferred to the National Coal Board under the Coal Industry Nationalisation Act, 1946, and in consequence it was the intention of the company to go into voluntary liquidation. Meanwhile, the company proposed to reduce its capital by returning their capital to the holders of the preference stock, which would be thereby extinguished. The reduction was opposed by certain preference stockholders on the ground, inter alia, that it deprived them of the right to participate in the liquidation and the division of the company's surplus assets. It was held by VISCOUNT MAUGHAM, LORD SIMONDS and LORD NORMAND, LORD MORTON OF HENRYTON dissenting, that the proposed reduction was not unfair or inequitable and should be confirmed, because even without it the preference stockholders would not have been entitled in a winding-up to share in the surplus assets or to receive more than a return of their paid up capital. Accordingly, they could not object to being paid, by means of the reduction, the amount which they would receive in the proposed liquidation. For reasons which I shall endeavour to show it appears to me that the effect of the decision of the majority in that case is not merely to remove the onus in cases such as this from the holders of ordinary shares, but to throw the onus on the holders of preference shares, and it is for the holders of preference shares to satisfy the court that, on the true construction of the particular document, they are entitled to share in the surplus assets. Perhaps the point emerges most clearly from the speech of LORD NORMAND, in which he quotes as follows ([1949] 1 All E.R. 1083) from the speech of VISCOUNT HALDANE, L.C., in Will v. United Lankat Plantations Co., Ltd. (5), where the Lord Chancellor said ([1914] A.C. 17):

> " ' Shares are not issued in the abstract and priorities then attached to them ; the issue of shares and the attachment of priorities proceed uno > flatu; and when you turn to the terms on which the shares are issued you expect to find all the rights as regards dividends specified in the terms of the issue.' With this opinion LORD LOREBURN and LORD ATKINSON agreed. My Lords, the ratio decidendi applies with equal force to priorities of participation in the company's property, and I see no ground on which it may be supposed that the declaration of rights as regards dividends is exhaustive but the declaration of rights as regards property is not exhaustive. There is as good reason and it is equally easy to define exhaustively the one set of rights as the other. In Re National Telephone Co. (6), SARGANT, J., said ([1914] 1 Ch. 774): '. . . it appears to me that the weight of authority is in favour of the view that, either with regard to dividend or with regard to the rights in a winding-up, the express gift or attachment of preferential rights to preference shares, on their creation, is, prima facie, a definition of the whole of their rights in that respect, and negatives any further or other right to which, but for the specified rights, they would have been entitled.' The decision of this house in Will's case (5) had not been pronounced when SARGANT, J., decided Re National Telephone Co. (6), and his opinion reflects his construction of the judgment of the Court of Appeal."

In my view, it follows from what I have read that LORD NORMAND took the view that the same principle applies to the construction of rights in a winding-up as applies to the construction of dividend rights and that he approved the extract from the judgment of SARGANT, J., in Re National Telephone Co. (6), which he cites. It, therefore, seems to me plain that he takes the view that the onus in such a case as this lies on the holders of preference shares. I think that the same view is, in effect, expressed both by VISCOUNT MAUGHAM and by LORD SIMONDS, the other members of the majority. VISCOUNT MAUGHAM says ([1949] 1 All E.R. 1074):

> "Much reliance is placed on behalf of the appellants on Re William Metcalfe & Sons, Ltd. (3). I must say that, in my opinion, that case was wrongly decided; and it should be noted that it is expressly stated that the bulk of the sum of £21,000 there in dispute was attributable to undistributed profits. It seems to me difficult to reconcile that case with the decision of this House in Will v. United Lankat Plantations Co., Ltd. (5), and impossible to reconcile it on sound grounds with the decision of Re Bridgewater Navigation Co. (7)."

It appears to me from that statement of VISCOUNT MAUGHAM that he could not reconcile the decision of Re Metcalfe & Sons, Ltd. (3) with the decision of the House of Lords in Will v. United Lankat Plantations Co., Ltd. (5) and that he was ranging himself on the same side as LORD NORMAND in taking the view that the onus in such cases is on the holders of preference shares. LORD SIMONDS, having discussed the relevant words in the relevant article in that case, says (ibid., 1079):

> "I do not ignore that in the same case [Will v. United Lankat Plantations Co., Ltd. (5)] in the Court of Appeal the distinction between dividend and capital was expressly made by both COZENS-HARDY, M.R., and FARWELL, L.J., and that in Re William Metcalfe & Sons, Ltd. (3), ROMER, L.J., re-asserted it. But I share the difficulty, which LORD KEITH has expressed in this case, in reconciling the reasoning that lies behind the judgments in Will's case (5) and Re William Metcalfe & Sons, Ltd. (3), respectively. In Collaroy Co., Ltd. v. Giffard (8) ASTBURY, J., after reviewing the authorities, including his own earlier decision in Re Fraser and Chalmers, Ltd. (1), said in regard to capital and dividend preference respectively ([1928] Ch. 155): 'But whether the considerations affecting them are "entirely different" is a question of some difficulty.' He approved the proposition there urged by the ordinary shareholders that a fixed return of > capital to shareholders in a winding-up is just as artificial as a provision for a fixed dividend, and that, if the latter is regarded as exhaustive, there is no prima facie reason why the former should not be similarly regarded."

It was urged on us that the true rule is to be found in the language of Lord Macnaghten in Birch v. Cropper (9). Counsel for the party who in effect represents the holders of preference stock read a passage from Lord Macnaghten's speech as follows (14 App. Cas. 543):

> "Every person who becomes a member of a company limited by shares of equal amount becomes entitled to a proportionate part in the capital of the company, and, unless it be otherwise provided by the regulations of the company, entitled, as a necessary consequence, to the same proportionate part in all the property of the company, including its uncalled capital. He is liable in respect of all moneys unpaid on his shares to pay up every call that is duly made upon him. But he does not by such payment acquire any further or other interest in the capital of the company. His share in the capital is just what it was before. His liability to the company is diminished by the amount paid. His contribution is merged in the common fund. And that is all."

The passage relied on proceeds over the next three pages of the report, ending with these words (ibid., 546):

> "There was an express bargain made as to their rights in respect of profits arising from the business of the company. But there was no bargain—no provision of any sort—affecting their rights as shareholders in the capital of the company."

So that, both at the beginning and at the end of the passage relied on, there is the vital qualification that the rule which was stated by Lord Macnaghten only applies if the articles are silent as to any right in the preference shareholders to participate in surplus assets.

That rule, it appears to me, is in no way impinged on by the later cases, and, in particular, by Scottish Insurance Corpn., Ltd. v. Wilsons and Clyde Coal Co., Ltd. (4). Indeed, in the latter case Lord Simonds brings the statement by Lord Macnaghten in Birch v. Cropper (9) into true perspective in the light of the subsequent authorities. He says ([1949] 1 All E.R. 1079):

> "Finally, on this part of the case I ought to deal with an observation made by Lord Macnaghten in Birch v. Cropper (9) on which counsel for the appellants relied. Lord Macnaghten said (14 App. Cas. 546): '. . . they [the preference shareholders] must be treated as having all the rights of shareholders, except so far as they renounced those rights on their admission to the company.' But, in my opinion, Lord Macnaghten can have meant nothing more than that the rights of the parties depended on the bargain that they had made and that the terms of the bargain must be ascertained by a consideration of the articles of association and any other relevant document, a task which I have endeavoured in this case to discharge. I cannot think that Lord Macnaghten intended to introduce some new principle of construction and to lay down that preference shareholders are entitled to share in surplus assets unless they expressly and specifically renounce that right."

Having regard to the view which I take of the opinions of the majority of the House of Lords in the Scottish Insurance Corpn. case (4), it appears to me to be unnecessary to embark on any review of the earlier authorities, all of which were considered in that case, and, in my judgment, the effect of the authorities as now in force is to establish the two principles for which counsel for the ordinary stockholder contended: first, that, in construing an article which deals with rights to share in profits, i.e., dividend rights and rights to share in the company's property in a liquidation, the same principle is applicable; and, secondly, that that principle is that, where the article sets out the rights attached to a class of shares to participate in profits while the company is a going concern, or to share in the property of the company in liquidation, prima facie the rights so set out are in each case exhaustive.

With these considerations in mind, I turn back to art. 3 of the articles of association in this case. As regards the rights as to profits, the whole of the distributable profits are expressly dealt with. They are to be applied, first, in paying to the holders of the preference stock "a fixed cumulative preferential dividend at the rate of six per cent. per annum on the amounts for the time being paid up or credited as paid up thereon respectively in priority to the ordinary shares"; secondly, in paying a non-cumulative dividend at the rate of six per cent. per annum, calculated on the same basis, to the holders of the ordinary shares; and the balance is then distributable between the two classes of shares pari passu. Nothing could be more plainly exhaustive than that language. Then, as regards the rights in a winding-up, the holders of the preference shares are stated to be entitled to certain payments in priority to the ordinary shares. Those payments are, first, repayment of the capital paid up on the preference stock, and, second, any arrears of dividend, whether earned or not. The question then is whether there is anything to suggest that the language regarding the rights of the holders of the preference stock in a winding-up is not exhaustive. I can find nothing. The onus now, as I have said, is, in my view, on the holders of the preference stock to show that the provision is not exhaustive, and, in my judgment, they have failed to discharge that onus.

There is present in this case a circumstance which, in my view, makes that conclusion a fortiori, namely, the express right conferred on the holders of the preference stock, while the company remains a going concern, to participate in the profits remaining after providing for the fixed non-cumulative dividend on the ordinary stock. A somewhat similar provision was contained in the articles of association which SARGANT, J., had to construe in Re National Telephone Co. (6). The relevant article (set out at [1914] 1 Ch. 758) was introduced by a resolution, which was as follows:

> "That the capital of the company be increased by the issue of 15,000 new shares of £10 each. That such shares be called second preference shares, and that the holders thereof (subject to the payment of the preferential dividend of the original preference shares) be entitled to a cumulative preferential dividend at the rate of six per cent. per annum. After the ordinary shares have received a dividend at the rate of six per cent. per annum out of the profits of each year, the second preference shares and the ordinary shares shall participate rateably, according to the amounts paid up thereon, in any surplus profits. The second preference shares shall not confer any right of voting at any general meeting of the company, and, in the event of the company being wound-up, the surplus assets thereof shall be applied in the first place in repaying to the holders of the original preference shares the full amount paid up thereon, and, subject thereto, in repaying to the holders of the second preference shares the full amount paid up thereon, in priority to any payment in respect of the ordinary shares of the company."

It will be seen that, in almost every material respect, art. 3 in this case is comparable with the provision which I have just read. On that SARGANT, J., says (ibid., 769):

> "The question upon that clause, as in the previous case, is whether there is an implied negativing of any right on the part of the holders of the second preference shares to receive more in the winding-up of the company than the repayment of the whole of their capital. In my opinion there is.

> I am speaking now, on first impression, on my own construction of these articles, apart from authority, which I shall allude to hereafter. In my judgment the fact that an express right was given, in respect of dividend, to receive more than the amount of the preferential dividends in certain events strengthens the inference that the silence as regards return of capital in a winding-up indicates that there was to be no return of capital beyond the return of the nominal amount of the capital of the shares. I should have felt disposed to come to that conclusion even without the assistance to be derived from a consideration of the terms of the rights to dividend, but with that assistance it seems to me that any business man reading that resolution would come to the conclusion that the holders of the second preference shares were not entitled on a winding-up to get more than their return of capital."

I accept entirely the proposition, as, indeed, one is directed to do throughout the authorities, that each case must, in the end, be a question of the construction of the particular document in question, and it can be but infrequently that, in the construction of a particular document, one obtains such almost direct aid as I obtain in this case from the remarks of SARGANT, J., which I have just quoted. In my opinion, they are good sense, and I would apply them in their full force to the art. 3 before the court in this case. It was urged on us that, in construing art. 3, we must have regard to the whole of the articles of association and to the surrounding circumstances. I accept that. It was urged on us that a relevant circumstance was that in this case the voting control rests in the hands of the holders of the preference stock, and from that it was sought to be argued that it is impossible to conclude that the holders of the preference stock, the controllers of the company, should have contemplated that, in a liquidation, they would get no more than any arrears of dividend on their preference stock, together with the capital thereon. I am unable to accept that argument. It involves speculation and, therefore, uncertainty. The bargain as regards rights of participation, whether in profits or assets, appears to me to be contained in art. 3. Nor can I find any context affecting the construction of that article to be derived from any other article in the articles of association. Finally, it was urged on us that we ought to have regard to the state of the law as it existed when the articles were adopted in 1929, and that the relevant art. 3 should be construed in the light of the law as then obtaining. There might—I say no more—perhaps have been some force in that argument had Re Metcalfe & Sons, Ltd. (3) been decided before the adoption of these articles; but the argument appears to me to be completely without weight when one considers what was the position of the law on this point in 1929. It is, I think, sufficient to say that there was then a conflict of judicial opinion on this point, which was only resolved, and then only for the time being, by the decision of the Court of Appeal in Re Metcalfe & Sons, Ltd. (3) in 1933. For these reasons I would allow this appeal.

ASQUITH, L.J.: I agree.

SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R.: I also agree. At the end of his judgment the learned judge stated his conclusion thus:

> "It is quite clear that if, on a fair construction of the article, I cannot find that the preference shareholders are excluded from participation in the surplus assets, then they are entitled to participate."

That conclusion was based on the decision of this court in Re Metcalfe & Sons, Ltd. (3), which governed this case when it was before ROXBURGH, J. Since then the law has been substantially affected by the decision of the House of Lords in Scottish Insurance Corpn., Ltd. v. Wilsons and Clyde Coal Co., Ltd. (4). In those circumstances, I shall not be thought disrespectful to the learned judge if I do not state at length the reasons for taking a view different from that which he reached. I agree with WYNN-PARRY, J., that, as a result of the Wilsons and Clyde case (4) the two propositions for which counsel for the ordinary stockholder contended should be now taken as established.

Out of respect, however, for the careful and forceful argument of counsel for the preference stockholder before us, I will state in a few sentences why I reach that conclusion. At the end of his speech dealing with this point in the Wilsons and Clyde case (4) LORD NORMAND said ([1949] 1 All E.R. 1084) :

> " It is, I think, not possible to distinguish Metcalfe's case (3) from the present case, and I have, therefore, come to the conclusion that it should be overruled and that the ratio of Will v. United Lankat Plantations Co., Ltd. (5), was correctly applied in Collaroy Co., Ltd. v. Giffard (8) and Re National Telephone Co. (6).

It is true, as counsel has pointed out, that the language of LORD NORMAND in this respect is, perhaps, somewhat less qualified than the language which fell from VISCOUNT MAUGHAM and LORD SIMONDS on the same matter. But the disapprobation which both VISCOUNT MAUGHAM and LORD SIMONDS expressed for Re Metcalfe & Sons, Ltd. (3) is found in a context in which reference was made to the fact that LORD KEITH, in the Court of Session, had found it impossible to reconcile Will v. United Lankat Plantations Co., Ltd. (5) and Metcalfe's case (3). It seems to me, therefore, that the result of the majority speeches is to treat as established, and as good law, the statement of SARGANT, J., in Re National Telephone Co. (6), which WYNN-PARRY, J., has read, and to do so notwithstanding any observations of LORD MACNAGHTEN in Birch v. Cropper (9), which must be construed as applicable only to the case where the articles are wholly silent as regards particular or specific rights.

I think that, during the sixty years which have passed since Birch v. Cropper (9) was before the House of Lords, the view of the courts may have undergone some change in regard to the relative rights of preference and ordinary shareholders—and to the disadvantage of the preference shareholders, whose position has, in that interval of time, become somewhat more approximated to the role which Sir Horace Davey attempted to assign to them, but which LORD MACNAGHTEN rejected in Birch v. Cropper (9), namely, that of debenture holders. In his dissenting opinion in the Wilsons and Clyde case (4), LORD MORTON OF HENRYTON, after citing a passage from LORD MACNAGHTEN'S speech in Birch v. Cropper (9), based this conclusion on it (ibid., 1086) :

> " Thus, in the present case the preference stockholders are entitled to share in the surplus assets with the ordinary stockholders in proportion to their respective holdings, unless the articles of the company otherwise provide."

But that view, and that interpretation of LORD MACNAGHTEN'S speech, were rejected by the majority of the House of Lords. It is the duty of the court to follow loyally the result, and not to seek by minute analysis to perceive fine distinctions between the opinions of the concurring Lords, more especially when the effect might be to produce a condition of perhaps inconvenient uncertainty.

I, therefore, on the point of law conclude that, after the Wilsons and Clyde case (4), the onus is, so to speak, on the preference stockholders. It is, of course, quite true that the matter in the last resort is one of the construction of the articles. For reasons which WYNN-PARRY, J., has already stated, and with which I agree, I think the onus has not been discharged. It is true that this case possesses, in some respects, notable features. For example, the preference shareholders have a majority of the voting powers, and they have, under the terms employed at the end of art. 3, a position in regard to reduction of capital which is (I agree with WYNN-PARRY, J.) unique in my experience, nor do I forget that they are given earlier in the article a right to participate with the ordinary shareholders in surplus profits. I cannot, however, come, on any of those matters, or on all of them together, to a conclusion which would discharge the onus placed on the preference stockholders, even if (without saying that it is right to do so) regard is had to the state of the law as it was thought to be when the article was first adopted. I think that there may be this difficulty too. Counsel for the preference stockholder before us said that one would expect to find some kind of parallelism between the rights inter se of the preference shareholders and the ordinary shareholders as to dividend and their rights inter se in a winding-up. Having regard to the nature of the right of participation, it would, I think, be difficult to reproduce a true parallel between the two classes in a winding-up, and still more difficult to read into the provisions of the article appropriate language to produce such a result. Even if one did, one would still be left with some anomaly having regard to the rights on a reduction of capital. I think, for these reasons, as well as those that have already been stated, that this appeal should be allowed, and that the appropriate declarations should be to the effect that the surplus assets are now distributable exclusively among the ordinary stockholders.

ANGLO-DANUBIAN TRANSPORT CO., LTD. v. MINISTRY OF FOOD.

[King's Bench Division (Devlin, J.), November 24, 25, 1949.]

Shipping—Charterparty—Delivery of cargo to safe berth—Nomination by charterer of discharge berth—Ship diverted to another berth—Consequent loss of freight—Right of shipowner to recover—Measure of damages.

A charterparty provided that the ship should take a cargo of potatoes from Rotterdam to a range of ports including London and there deliver it to the usual safe berth, as customary. The charterer nominated New Hibernia Wharf above London Bridge as the place of discharge, but, on the vessel's arrival there, the charterer gave orders for her to proceed to Hay's Dock, 260 yards down the river, and below London Bridge, where the cargo was discharged. The freight payable to the shipowners was 2*s.* 3*d.* per ton less at Hay's Dock than at New Hibernia Wharf.

Held : (i) when nominated by the charterer New Hibernia Wharf was to be treated as if written into the charterparty as the place of discharge, and it could not be altered subsequently by the charterer alone.

(ii) the breach of the charterparty by the charterer's failure to have the cargo discharged at New Hibernia Wharf was not waived by the action of the master in taking the ship to the new berth, nor by his action had he prejudiced the shipowner's claim for damages for the breach.

(iii) the shipowner was entitled to recover the additional freight of 2*s.* 3*d.* per ton.

Action for damages for breach of a charterparty and/or freight.

The Ministry of Food (the charterers) had nominated New Hibernia Wharf above London Bridge as the place of discharge of a ship which they had chartered from the plaintiffs, but on the ship's arrival off the wharf they ordered her to discharge instead at Hay's Dock down the river where the freight rate payable to shipowners was 2*s.* 3*d.* per ton less. They contended that they were entitled to nominate a new berth at any time before the ship began to discharge or before she became an arrived ship, and, alternatively, that, if the change of orders constituted a breach of the charterparty, such breach had been waived by the master on behalf of the shipowner. DEVLIN, J., gave judgment with costs for the plaintiffs on both points.

Michael Holman for the shipowners.
E. W. Roskill for the charterers.

DEVLIN, J. : The plaintiffs, the owners of a ship called the Shelley, are claiming £40 6*s.* 11*d.* from the Ministry of Food as the balance of freight which they say is due to them under a charterparty dated Apr. 15, 1948. On Apr. 23, 1948, the ship loaded a cargo of potatoes at Rotterdam, and, under the charterparty, she was required to take them to a range of ports which included London and there to deliver the cargo at " the usual safe berth, as customary, on being paid freight in cash . . . " That provision with regard to the usual safe berth implies that it is the charterers' right to nominate. Before the vessel left Rotterdam on Apr. 23, the charterers nominated New Hibernia Wharf, London, as being the place of discharge. The freight was to be paid in accordance with the Chamber of Shipping schedule rate, and that rate varies according to whether the place of discharge in the port of London is above or below London Bridge. It is obvious that, if a vessel is to go into the higher reaches of the river the journey will cost more, so some line of demarcation has to be drawn, and London Bridge is taken as the line. If the place of discharge is above London Bridge an extra sum of 2*s.* 3*d.* per ton is paid. New Hibernia Wharf is just above London Bridge, and so the nomination was a fortunate one for the shipowners, for they earned the extra 2*s.* 3*d.* with very little, if any, additional expenditure. The ship arrived in the river on Apr. 25, and when she got to New Hibernia Wharf she was given orders by the charterers to discharge instead at Hay's Dock which is about 260 yards down the river below London Bridge. She discharged there, and the matter in dispute is whether or not her owners are entitled to the 2*s.* 3*d.* per ton.

The first point counsel for the charterers has taken is that a charterer is not debarred from changing his mind after he has nominated the vessel's berth, but that he can nominate another berth at any time before the ship begins to discharge, or, at any rate, before she becomes an arrived ship. It is, clearly settled by the authorities that where there is an express reservation in the charterparty to the charterer to nominate the port or berth, that port or berth, when nominated, is to be treated as if it had been written into the charterparty. I have not been troubled in detail with the authorities that may cover the position where the right to nominate is implied rather than expressed, counsel for the charterers has conceded that there can be no difference, as clearly there cannot. That being so, the position seems to me to be that when the charterers nominated New Hibernia Wharf it was to be treated as if it was written into the charterparty as the place of discharge, and it follows from that that it cannot be altered by the charterers. To permit the charterers to alter it would be to permit a unilateral alteration of the contract. Accordingly, I think that point fails.

The next point made for the charterers is that, if there was a breach of the charterparty, it was waived by the master on behalf of the plaintiffs. That makes it necessary to determine what the material breach is. I think that the material breach is that the charterers failed or refused to discharge the vessel at New Hibernia Wharf. I think, in substance, that that is what did happen—that the change of orders, given in the circumstances in which it was given, carried with it the implication that the charterers were not going to discharge the ship at New Hibernia Wharf. In those circumstances, when one talks of waiving a breach, it is necessary to be a little more precise. What counsel for the charterers would have to establish in order to succeed would be that the master on behalf of the shipowners agreed to abandon their right to damages. Once I am satisfied that the breach occurred, unless the shipowners did something which amounted to an abandonment of their right to damages (and that could only be by agreement), they are entitled to pursue their right to damages. I dare say that, if the master had been a lawyer, he would have sent for the charter-party, and, after having read it carefully, would have discussed the legal position with Mr. Windle, the boatman who was selected to convey the message relating to the change in instructions, and would have told Mr. Windle expressly that he was reserving his right to damages. Whether Mr. Windle would have made very much of that, I gravely doubt. I have to be satisfied, since it is not suggested that the master expressly abandoned his right to damages, whether anything in his acts necessarily amounted to that, and I am clear that it did not. By taking what was in the circumstances the sensible course, if only to minimise the damages, of taking the vessel where the charterers wanted her to go and discharging, I do not think that he in any way prejudiced the position of the shipowners to claim damages for any breach there might have been. The damages clearly are the amount claimed, viz., the sum which the owners lost by reason of the fact that they discharged at Hay's Dock instead of above London Bridge. They lost a profitable rate and had to take instead a less profitable rate, and I do not think it is contested that that is the right measure of damages. It is not, therefore, necessary to deal with the point argued before me—which may very well be right—that the ship was entitled to be paid freight at the higher rate quite apart from her claim for damages inasmuch as she had arrived off New Hibernia Wharf and had done everything to make herself an arrived ship. There will be judgment for the shipowners for the sum claimed.

Re NEW ROCK COLLIERY CO., LTD. THE COMPANY v. MINISTRY OF FUEL AND POWER.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., Cohen and Asquith, L.JJ.), November 9, 10, December 2, 1949.]

Coal—Nationalisation of industry—Interim income—"Last complete accounting period"—Accounts of company made up quarterly, but embodied in annual account—Coal Industry Nationalisation Act, 1946 (c. 59), s. 22 (3) (c).

The Coal Industry Nationalisation Act, 1946, s. 22, which prescribes the method of satisfying the right of expropriated concerns to interim income pending satisfaction of compensation, provides by sub-s. 3 (c): "... a concern's or subsidiary's comparable ascertained revenue ... shall be taken to be ... the amount of its profits and gains ... computed on income tax principles ... for its last complete accounting period before July 1, 1946, ... (any such amount for any accounting period of more or less than twelve months being adjusted to a twelve months' equivalent thereof) ..."

From the date of the incorporation of a company in 1925 its accounts were made up quarterly for the periods ending on Mar. 31, June 30, Sept. 30 and Dec. 31, and a balance sheet was prepared at each of those dates. Each quarterly account was audited as soon as possible after the end of the quarter, and written up in the company's private ledger. The accounts presented to the shareholders of the company at the annual general meeting of the company were the four quarterly accounts combined into one account in respect of the year ending Sept. 30, and it was to the balance sheet made at Sept. 30 and presented at the annual general meeting that the auditor's certificate required under the Companies Acts was appended. These were the only accounts presented to the shareholders at the annual general meeting of the company. For the purposes of income tax the company always produced quarterly accounts until 1939, after which a single account covering one year was produced, but all supporting schedules of information were prepared on a quarterly basis.

HELD : on their true construction the words " last complete accounting period " in s. 22 (3) (c) meant the last period in respect of which the owner of the colliery concern in question chose to make up its accounts ; on the evidence it was clear that this company had as a matter of business practice for many years made up its accounts, in the true and proper sense of that term, quarterly ; and, therefore, for the purposes of the sub-section its profits and gains had to be ascertained for the quarter ending on June 30, 1946.

APPEAL by the Ministry of Fuel and Power from an order of VAISEY, J., dated Feb. 23, 1949, and reported [1949] 1 All E.R. 613. VAISEY, J., held that the " last complete accounting period " of the New Rock Colliery Co., Ltd., was the quarter ending June 30, 1946. The Court of Appeal now dismissed the appeal. The facts appear in the judgment of SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R., and are summarised in the headnote.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 2. The following judgments were read.

SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R. : The question raised in this appeal is the short question of the effect of the Coal Industry Nationalisation Act, 1946, s. 22, and, particularly, of the phrase in sub-s. (3) (c) of that section " its last complete accounting period " on the respondent company. The purpose of the section is to provide for payment to colliery concerns (of which the respondent company is one) in respect of their interests transferred under the Act (in this case its whole business and undertaking) income payments for the two years next following the vesting date, namely, July 1, 1946. The payment so to be made for each year is by s. 22 (3) (a) of the Act specified as " one half of the comparable ascertained revenue " of the concern. Paragraph (c) of the sub-section, on which the whole matter turns, prescribes the way in which the comparable ascertained revenue is to be determined. The paragraph is in the following terms:

> " for the purposes of para. (a) of this sub-section a concern's or subsidiary's comparable ascertained revenue attributable to activities mentioned in that paragraph shall be taken to be either (as the concern or subsidiary may elect in accordance with regulations) the amount of its profits and gains so attributable, computed on income tax principles subject to such adaptations as may be prescribed, for its last complete accounting period before July 1, 1946, or the average of the amounts of its profits and gains so attributable and computed for its two complete accounting periods last before July 1 in the years 1944 and 1945 respectively (any such amount for any accounting period of more or less than twelve months being adjusted to a twelve months' equivalent thereof) . . . "

It will be observed that a choice of two alternatives is given by the paragraph. In the present case, the company chose the first alternative, and they have claimed to have the relevant calculation made by reference to the quarterly period to June 30, 1946, as the last complete period prior to July 1, 1946, in respect of which, in accordance with the company's regular business practice for very many years, revenue or profit and loss accounts were, in fact, made up and examined and verified by its auditors. The appellants, the Ministry of Fuel and Power, contend, on the other hand, that, since this quarterly accounting was done merely for the internal convenience of the company and the information of its directors and was not undertaken pursuant to any statutory or other obligation imposed on the company and also was not laid before its members in general meeting, the quarterly period in question cannot properly be regarded as the company's " last . . . accounting period " within the meaning of the section, but that, by the phrase quoted, Parliament must have intended to refer (so far as relevant to the present case) to the last period for which the company's accounts, in the ordinary business acceptation of the term, were prepared, that is, the yearly period to Sept. 30, 1945, for which the company's annual accounts were made up for presentation to the company's annual general meeting pursuant to its obligation under the Companies Act, 1929, s. 123. On the facts of the case as they have turned out, the latter view, if correct, will produce results very much less advantageous to the company than the former.

As will have appeared, the whole question turns on the proper interpretation to be given to the few words " its last complete accounting period." No further instruction is given in the definition section or elsewhere in the Act as to the meaning of the phrase, nor does it appear to have any special or established significance. It is, therefore, necessary to apply to the words, as ordinary English words, the ordinary principles of construction adopted in the courts and to ask and answer the question : What, on the facts of the case as proved by properly admissible evidence, was the last accounting period of this company ? I have posed the question in this form since it is, I think, particularly important in this case to bear in mind that the function of the court is in general to confine itself to the particular subject-matter presented to it and not (save to the extent necessary for the determination of the case before it) to lay down general principles for application to other cases and other circumstances. In the present case, the evidence before the court—and the only evidence—consists of two affidavits sworn on the company's behalf, one by a Mr. Thomas, a partner in the firm who have acted for many years as the company's auditors, and the other by the company's secretary, together with a letter written—no doubt, for the purposes of the action—to Mr. Thomas' firm by His Majesty's Inspector of Taxes in November, 1948. No books or accounts of the company have been in evidence before the court, nor have its memorandum and articles of association been exhibited. It was stated and agreed by counsel (though not proved) that the company had only two shareholders at all material times who were also its directors.

The relevant facts as to the company's practice in regard to its accounts are stated in the first five sub-paragraphs of para. 6 of Mr. Thomas' affidavit. All these sub-paragraphs are important for present purposes, but it will be sufficient in this judgment to read only sub-paras. (1), (3) and (5) :

> " (1) Since the incorporation of the company on Sept. 17, 1925, its accounts have always been made up and produced quarterly for the periods ending on Mar. 31, June 30, Sept. 30 and Dec. 31, and a balance sheet was prepared at each of those dates . . . (3) Each quarterly account has been audited as soon as possible after the end of the quarter, and written up in the company's private ledger. For the purposes of the said quarterly accounts royalties, which were in fact payable for the half years ending June 30 and Dec. 31, were estimated for the quarters ending Mar. 31 and Sept. 30 . . . (5) The accounts presented to the shareholders of the company at the annual general meeting of the company were the four quarterly accounts combined into one account in respect of the year ending Sept. 30. It was to the balance sheet made at Sept. 30 and presented at the annual general meeting that the auditor's certificate required under the Companies Acts was appended. These were the only accounts presented to the shareholders at the annual general meeting of the company."

In his letter, to which I have earlier referred, the inspector of taxes stated :

> " As far back as I can trace this company always produced for purposes of arriving at its taxation liabilities, quarterly accounts (including detailed balance sheets) up to and including the income tax year 1938-39. For that year you forwarded as usual four quarterly accounts ended Dec. 31, 1937."

Then, after referring to a recorded note in his possession of a conversation with Mr. Thomas when the latter " explained to me that the company had always made up its accounts quarterly," the inspector ended his letter as follows :

> " Since that time (i.e., for the year to Sept. 30, 1938, and following years) a single account covering one year has been produced to me. It seems quite clear, however, that the company has still continued to prepare its accounts quarterly. All supporting schedules of information produced to me have invariably been prepared on a quarterly basis."

Finally, Mr. Caines, the company's secretary, in his affidavit states that, prior to the transfer of its business under the Act of 1946, the company made half-yearly returns made up to June 30 and Dec. 31 to the Somerset District Colliery Owners Association for the purpose of district wages ascertainment and also made annual returns to the Board of Trade (afterwards the Ministry of Fuel and Power) made up to Dec. 31, and that in each case the returns were " an aggregation " of the figures in the appropriate quarterly accounts. As previously appears, the company's financial year at all material times ended on Sept. 30.

On this evidence it is, in my judgment, clear beyond reasonable doubt that this company has as a matter of business practice for very many years made up its accounts, in the true and proper sense of that term, quarterly. No doubt, having regard to the various returns it had to make for income tax and other purposes, it was convenient so to do, so that on these occasions it had only to make the appropriate compilations or aggregations. In any event, it is quite plain that the professional inspection and verification of the company's books was undertaken quarterly and that no separate audit was made, for example, for the purposes of the annual accounts to be laid before the general meeting or for income tax purposes. It is true that the auditors' certificate pursuant to the Companies Act was annexed only to the annual accounts, but I cannot see that for present purposes that fact can be of material assistance. The terms of the certificate could not be said to suggest that the information given to the auditors had been given otherwise than in the course of taking the quarterly accounts. In these circumstances, counsel for the company suggested that, whatever might be, or have been, the position on other dates, the last complete accounting period prior to July 1, 1946, was, undoubtedly, the quarterly period which ended on June 30, 1946, so that, if the company's financial year was also an accounting period, nevertheless the quarter to June 30, 1946, was later in date than the year to Sept. 30, 1945.

I agree with Vaisey, J.'s conclusion that the quarter to June 30, 1946, was the company's last complete accounting period before July 1, 1946. I do not, however, think it right or satisfactory to decide the present case solely on the narrow ground suggested by counsel for the company. Though it is true that the company's financial year is not, as it were, directly in competition with the quarterly period to June 30, 1946, as it would have been had the financial year also ended on June 30, nevertheless, if (as the Ministry of Fuel and Power have contended) the section, on its true interpretation, must be taken in the case of this company to point to an annual accounting period, then the year to Sept. 30, 1945, was the last such period, and ought prima facie to take precedence for present purposes over the quarterly period to June 30, and, in deference to the argument put before us, if both the financial year and the quarters can properly be called accounting periods it is, I think, proper to state my conclusion why the period, which, in this case, I think to be the relevant period, qualifies as such—that is, whether it does so by virtue only of chronology or because of its characteristics other than those of date. I turn, therefore, to the language of the paragraph in the sub-section. No assistance, to my mind, can be derived from the word "complete." It was suggested on the Ministry's part that the quarterly accounts should be regarded as, at most, "interim" accounts and, therefore, not "complete" within the meaning of the paragraph, but I cannot accept the suggestion. The adjective "complete" is related to the noun "period," and must, therefore, in my judgment, mean not broken or unfinished. A significance by way of contrast to "interim" would only be possible if the word had been used to qualify, not the period, but the accounts.

The main burden of the Ministry's case hinged on the word "accounting," and it was urged that the use of this word necessarily imported the notion of an obligation—statutory or contractual—to account to someone. In the case of a partnership (which the Act must clearly be taken to have contemplated), the "accounting" would be by the partners to each other under the common provision to that effect found in articles of partnership, but, in the case of a company subject to the Companies Act the obvious obligation (it is said) is that imposed by statute—the obligation to account once, at least, in every year to the shareholders in general meeting. Alternatively, it was argued—particularly in the light of the immediately preceding reference to "income tax principles"—that the duty to account contemplated was the duty in respect of income tax, with the same practical result, namely, that the company's yearly accounting period must alone have been intended. I am unable to accept either of these contentions. It is to be observed that the language of the paragraph appears to contemplate the making of a new account rather than a reference to an already existing account. The comparable ascertained revenue is (in the present case) to be taken to be "the amount of its profits and gains . . . computed on income tax principles subject to such adaptations as may be prescribed . . ." It follows, in my judgment, that there is a distinction between the principles on which the account is to be taken (which may be modified by statutory instrument), and the period in respect of which such account will be made up. The principles on which the account is to be taken cannot, to my mind, be governed or affected by the period which they cover. No doubt, the existing accounts, already verified, will in practice form the basis of the computation which the paragraph requires, but it does not, to my mind, follow that the period to be selected for the purposes specified by the paragraph should be determined by reference to the purposes for which periodical accounts have been, in fact, made up.

Much reliance was placed by the Ministry on the judgment of Lord Greene, M.R., in Jenkins Productions, Ltd. v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (1). I agree with VAISEY, J., that the Jenkins case (1) was decided on a statute wholly different in its language from that which we have to construe, and I confess that, for my part, I derive little assistance towards the solution of the present problem from the Jenkins decision (1). The question in that case was whether the appellant company in fact "made up" accounts for a twelve-monthly period within the meaning of the Finance Act, 1939 (imposing excess profits tax). It is true that in that case it was proved that the appellant company in fact regularly caused accounts of its business transactions to be prepared and audited for six-monthly periods, and that the annual accounts laid before the shareholders in general meeting were a compilation or aggregation of the two relevant half-yearly accounts. The real question, therefore, was not what was the company's "accounting period," but (though it might well be said to have "made up" accounts for periods of six months) whether, nevertheless, it could truly be said that it in fact "made up" accounts for periods of twelve months. To this question the court gave an affirmative answer, but, in my judgment, the answer neither involved any denial that the company also "made up" six-monthly accounts nor suggested any answer to the question (which was quite irrelevant for the decision, and was not raised or argued in the case): What was the company's "last accounting period"? The learned Master of the Rolls, however, having stated his answer to the question posed on the lines indicated above, proceeded to add ([1944] 1 All E.R. 612):

> "Here you have a company which in fact did prepare two different sets of accounts; one a six-monthly account prepared for the convenience of the directors; the other a twelve-monthly account prepared for the information of the shareholders. That twelve-monthly account is one which has certain characteristics. First of all, it is to be submitted to the shareholders, who are entitled to approve or disapprove it. Therefore, in that sense, it is a final account in a way in which the accounts produced to the directors for the six months were not final accounts at all. Secondly, the accounts so submitted to the shareholders were submitted in pursuance of the statutory obligation to submit accounts. It seems to me, bearing those two considerations in mind, that the yearly accounts are primarily the more important of the two sets of accounts which this company in fact got out. Applying the language of this section to that state of affairs, which of these two sets of accounts is properly to be described as 'the accounts of the trade or business'? Surely, there can only be one answer to that question. The accounts are the important final accounts. It seems to me that these words have to be construed in the light of the well-known practice of companies to have a financial period. A company's financial period is commonly twelve months; and accounts are got out in reference to that financial period. When the paragraph speaks of the accounts being 'made up,' it surely must mean the accounts which are the accounts for the purposes of the company's financial unit of time."

It is on this passage that the Ministry most strongly rely, and most particularly on the last sentence that I have quoted. Having regard to the answer which the Master of the Rolls had already given to the question raised in the case, the passage quoted must, in my judgment, be regarded as "obiter"—though none the less deserving of great weight. The Master of the Rolls was, as I follow his judgment, finding in the circumstances to which, in the passage quoted, he refers, corroboration for his view that the appellant company in a real sense of the term in fact "made up" its accounts for twelve-monthly periods. Counsel for the company has criticised the reference to the power of the shareholders to "approve or disapprove" the accounts laid before them, and he has pointed out that disapproval would not, in fact, invalidate the accounts or disqualify them as "the company's accounts." For present purposes, however, I do not think such criticism assists the present problem one way or another. I am ready to assume that in the present case the company can properly be said to have "made up" its accounts when the necessary aggregation or compilation was made for the purpose of the annual general meeting, as I am also strongly inclined to think that it can be said to have "made them up" half-yearly for the purpose of wages ascertainment and annually to Dec. 31 for the purpose of A tendering returns to the Board of Trade or the Ministry of Fuel and Power. Whatever may have been the company's "financial unit of time" generally or for particular purposes, the question in this appeal remains: What was its last complete accounting period before July 1, 1946?

I can well understand that, in other cases and on other facts, where a company or other "colliery concern" was shown to have "accounted" both annually B and in respect of shorter periods, it might be held that the concern had two (or more) accounting periods, and that for the purposes of s. 22 of the Act of 1946 the "last complete accounting period" before the vesting date was that period (twelve-monthly or other) which, in fact, last ended before that date, or (because two such periods were directly in competition for qualification under sub-s. (3) (c) or otherwise) that the accounts taken in respect of the shorter period ought to C be regarded as subsidiary in character so that the twelve-monthly period ought to be accorded primacy. But on the facts of the present case, as I have attempted to show, the facts proved in evidence seem to me clearly to establish the truth of Mr. Thomas' statement to the inspector of taxes—"the company had always made up its accounts quarterly."

I ought also to refer to the Ministry's argument based on the second alternative D offered to the colliery concern by the relevant paragraph. If the view of the learned judge is correct, then it is pointed out that, had the company chosen the second alternative, the figures would have been calculated on the somewhat artificial basis of two quarterly accounts separated by a gap of nine months. This is undoubtedly true, but it is not, to my mind, sufficient to compel us to give to the phrase "last accounting period" a strained or special significance. E
The statutes which were subject to consideration in the Jenkins case (1) show, at least, that, if Parliament had desired or intended in the case of limited companies or otherwise to give a preference to twelve-monthly periods of accounting, there were available precedents in the Finance Acts for doing so. The choice was made of what appears to be a novel phrase "last accounting period," and, if the purpose of the section is considered, there are at least reasonable grounds for the choice. F
By s. 19 of the Act the undertakings of the colliery concerns had become vested in the State, but it was apparent that the fixing of the global amount of capital compensation, and (still more) its apportionment among the various participants, would take a considerable time. It was, therefore, decided to provide, in addition to the capital compensation, for payment of a further sum by way of compensation for the loss of revenue experienced G during the two years following the vesting date, at a rate (speaking broadly) of fifty per cent. of the income which the concerns were, by the effect of the Act, prevented from earning. In such circumstances it is, at least, not surprising that, for the purpose of calculating the income compensation, the period taken should be that which ended as near as possible to the vesting date, for the figures for that period might fairly be supposed to have indicated, as nearly as H practicable, what the fortunes of the concerns would have been, apart from nationalisation. And if, in any case, as a result of temporary changes, this latest period might operate unfairly on a concern, it was given the option of taking the average of the corresponding periods next before July 1, 1944, and July 1, 1945. I should add that, in any event, the second alternative has not been expressed so as to cover all possible cases, for if a concern, the accounting period for which had at all times been admittedly yearly, had chosen to alter the date to which the (annual) accounts were made up, it might well have happened that there was no complete accounting period after July 1, 1944, and before July 1, 1945, so that in such a case the second alternative would not be available at all.

I have left until last the effect of the final parenthesis in the paragraph—"(any such amount for any accounting period of more or less than twelve months being adjusted to a twelve months' equivalent thereof)"—which VAISEY, J., regarded as decisive. I am myself disposed to place less emphasis on these words than did the learned judge, for it is, I think, true to say that even if, in the case of the ordinary trading company, the period indicated is the normal "financial unity" of twelve months, sensible effect can be given to the parenthesis which, on this view, would cover the case where at the material date the company had changed its accounting year so that its last accounting period was, in fact, a period of less or more than twelve months. Nevertheless, I agree with the learned judge in thinking that the parenthesis more naturally supports the view of the company than that of the Ministry. As counsel for the Ministry have rightly emphasised, the colliery concerns affected might well be, not only limited companies, but partnerships or businesses carried on by individuals, and in the latter instances, whatever might have been their practice as regards income tax, their "accounting periods" might have been some periods other than yearly, for example, under partnership articles the duty of accounting is not uncommonly imposed half-yearly. Bearing such cases in mind, it seems to me that Parliament chose a form of words of universal application and intended to cover each and every case in accordance with the facts proved as to its particular established business practice.

Having regard to the importance of the case, and out of respect for the arguments submitted to us, I have dealt at length with the various points submitted for our consideration, but, in the result, I find myself in agreement with the conclusion of VAISEY, J., as expressed by him at the end of his judgment ([1949] 1 All E.R. 615):

> "It cannot be disputed on the evidence that the company did account quarterly. There is no evidence that the combined account was anything but the most formal combination of the four preceding quarterly accounts. Here we have a company which, with no ulterior object in view, but merely as a matter of the legitimate arrangement of its own private affairs, has for years made up its accounts, had them audited, and entered them in its ledger, on a quarterly basis."

For these reasons I think the appeal should be dismissed.

COHEN, L.J.: I am of the same opinion. As the Master of the Rolls has said, the question before us is the short one of the meaning of the expression "its last complete accounting period before July 1, 1946," in the Coal Industry Nationalisation Act, 1946, s. 22 (3) (c). VAISEY, J., has held that so far as the New Rock Colliery Co., Ltd., is concerned, it is the quarterly period ending on June 30, 1946. He has based his conclusion largely on the words "(any such amount for any accounting period of more or less than twelve months being adjusted to a twelve months' equivalent thereof)" at the end of para. (c). I do not myself attach the same importance as he did to those words, as I think they might have been inserted to cover the contingency, for instance, of a company having altered the date of its financial year in the year preceding July 1, 1946, and thus having made up its accounts on that occasion only for a period of more or less than twelve months. None the less, for the reasons I will state, I think VAISEY, J., came to the right conclusion on the evidence before the court.

What grounds did counsel for the Ministry put forward to induce us to reach a different conclusion? His first and main contention was that the expression "its last accounting period" connoted that the company had accounts made up for the purpose of enabling it to account to someone whom I will refer to for the time being as "X." I am unable to accept this argument. In the first place, I do not think that the construction suggested by counsel accords with the natural meaning of the words used in the section. In the second place, who is "X"? Counsel first suggested that "X" is the company in general meeting, but the owner of a colliery concern may be an individual, and counsel was unable to make any suggestion as to who would, in that event, be the understudy for the role of "X." Alternatively, he suggested that "X" might be the Inland Revenue Commissioners to whom every trader, individual, partnership or limited company, has to make a return, but the difficulty arises that under the relevant section (s. 34 of the Finance Act, 1926) the accounting period for income tax purposes would necessarily be twelve months and it would be impossible, therefore, to attribute any meaning to the concluding words of s. 22 (3) (c). I think counsel for the company was right when he said that the expression "its last complete accounting period," on the natural construction of the words, meant only the last period in respect of which the owner of the colliery concern chose to make up its accounts—in other words, to borrow the phrase used by Lord Greene, M.R., in the Jenkins Productions, Ltd. case (1), "the period which the company chooses as its 'financial unit of time.'" This is, in each case, a question of fact. In the case of a partnership, it may well be that normally the financial unit of time will be the period fixed by the articles of partnership as the period to be covered by each partnership account. In the case of an individual it may well be that the only traceable financial unit of time will be the year selected as the basis of the income tax assessment. In the case of a company, bearing in mind the relevant provisions of the Companies Acts and the common form articles (see, for example, Palmer's Company Precedents, 15th ed., vol. 1, p. 728), it may well be that normally the financial unit of time will be twelve months, that being the usual period covered by the accounts laid before the annual general meeting, but it must be remembered that the Act does not require the company to present its accounts to a general meeting only once a year. There is nothing in s. 123 of the Act of 1929, or in the corresponding section of the Companies Act, 1948 (s. 148), preventing the company presenting accounts half-yearly or more often to a general meeting. Nor can I see anything to prevent a company selecting any period it chooses as its financial unit of time on the basis of which accounts are prepared for other purposes.

In the present case, on the evidence before him, I think Vaisey, J., was compelled to conclude that the company's financial unit of time was the quarter; that, therefore, its profits and gains had to be ascertained for the last complete quarter before July 1, 1946, namely, that ending on June 30, 1946; and that the fact that, for the various purposes to which the Master of the Rolls referred, including the preparation of an account covering a twelve months' period for presentation to the annual general meeting, two or more quarterly accounts were aggregated was nihil ad rem, and did not prevent the quarterly period being the last complete accounting period before July 1, 1946, of this company. For these reasons I agree the appeal should be dismissed.

KITCHEN'S TRUSTEE v. MADDERS AND ANOTHER.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., Cohen and Asquith, L.JJ.), November 23, 24, 25, 1949.]

Bankruptcy—Set off—Set off of amount of damages recovered from bankrupt for fraud against claim by trustee for rent—Rent accrued before and after bankruptcy—Bankruptcy Act, 1914 (c. 59), s. 31.

Rent Restriction—Part of dwelling-house used for business purposes—Boarding house—Tenant living on premises—Business not incompatible with residence as tenant—Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1939 (c. 71), s. 3 (3).

The plaintiff, trustee in the bankruptcy of Mrs. K., sued for five quarters of rent due under a lease, the first two quarters having accrued before the date of the bankruptcy, viz., Dec. 9, 1947, and the last three after that date. In April, 1947, the bankrupt sold to the defendants the goodwill and contents of a private hotel for £5,000 and in May granted them a lease of the premises for seven years at £500 a year, the premises being described as the "R. Private Hotel" and the defendants covenanting "not to use the demised premises for any purpose other than that of the business or trade of a hotel proprietor or boarding-house keeper or in any manner inconsistent with such user . . ." The defendants paid £2,000 down and gave a bill of sale on the furniture for the balance of £3,000. On going into possession the defendants found that the bankrupt had previously mortgaged the premises to a building society and had made the lease without first obtaining the consent of the society as required by the mortgage deed. The defendants thereupon began proceedings against the bankrupt for fraud, and, in default of defence, judgment was given in their favour, the damages being assessed at £5,560. In August, 1948, the plaintiff obtained a stay of that action, which was later removed on an undertaking by the defendants not to prove in the bankruptcy the amount due under the judgment. The building society then commenced proceedings in the Chancery Division for foreclosure, but subsequently they amended their pleadings and asked for possession, striking out all other clauses in the originating summons. The defendants, in their defence to a claim for rent, pleaded that they were entitled to set off so much of the judgment debt as might be required to extinguish the claim, and also that, in the events which had happened, their liability for rent was, not to the plaintiff, but to the building society. Alternatively, the defendants contended that they were only liable for the standard rent payable under the Rent Restrictions Acts, 1920 to 1939, because the premises, having been let as a dwelling-house on Sept. 1, 1939, and being rated at £72 a year, were controlled under those Acts.

HELD : (i) by the undertaking not to prove in the bankruptcy the amount of the judgment debt the defendants in effect agreed not to treat that debt as a provable debt, and since it was not provable it could not be the subject of a set off under the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 31.

(ii) as to the last three quarters rent accruing after the bankruptcy there was no mutuality, and, therefore, there could be no set off.

Lawrence v. Hayes ([1927] 2 K.B. 111) and Stoddart v. Union Trust, Ltd. ([1912] 1 K.B. 181), distinguished.

(iii) the building society as mortgagees could only recover against the defendants for mesne profits, which depended on the unlawful withholding of possession, and until the mortgagees began their action for possession the bankrupt, as mortgagor, was entitled to possession, and as between the bankrupt and the defendants, the defendants were entitled to be in possession.

(iv) on the facts the defendants conducted a boarding-house in, and also occupied as their home, premises which had been let in 1939 as a dwelling-house and were assessed at a rateable value within the Rent Restrictions Acts, 1920 to 1939 ; the nature of the business carried on was not incompatible with the residence of the defendants on the premises as tenants, and the premises came within the provisions of s. 3 (3) of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1939, so that the defendants were liable only for the standard rent and not for the rent payable under the lease granted by the bankrupt.

Appeal of the defendants from a decision of Harman, J., dated May 12, 1949, (p. 54 ante), rejecting the defendants' claim to set off damages awarded to them against the bankrupt for fraud in an action by the trustee in bankruptcy to recover £625 arrears of rent.

By a lease dated May, 1947, the bankrupt, Hilda Kitchen, let to the defendants, the Roslyn Private Hotel, Blackpool, for seven years at a rent of £500 a year. In the previous April the defendants had purchased from Hilda Kitchen the contents of the hotel and the goodwill for £5,000, and it was not until they had paid her £2,000 in cash and given a bill of sale on the furniture that they were informed that she had previously mortgaged the premises to a building society and under the mortgage deed she was not empowered to grant a lease without the society's consent, which had not been given in respect of the lease granted to the defendants. On Aug. 11, 1947, the defendants issued a writ against Hilda Kitchen claiming damages for fraud. Hilda Kitchen became bankrupt on Dec. 9, 1947, at which date two quarters' rent was due under the lease. Judgment against the bankrupt was given in the defendants' action on Jan. 2, 1948, and later the damages were assessed at £5,560. A stay was obtained by the receiver, but it was subsequently removed on the defendants' undertaking not to claim in the bankruptcy. The trustee in the bankruptcy having begun the present action to recover two instalments of rent under the lease which had accrued due before the date of the bankruptcy and three instalments which had accrued thereafter, the defendants sought to set off the amount of the damages awarded to them in their action for fraud against the amount of rent claimed.

The Court of Appeal now allowed an application by the defendants to be allowed to tender new evidence to show that the premises were within the Rent Restrictions Acts, 1920 to 1939, and to amend the defence accordingly, and held that the premises were within the Rent Restrictions Acts. The court affirmed the decision of HARMAN, J., on the main issue, but allowed the appeal as to quantum so far as it was affected by their decision under the Rent Acts, and ordered that the defendants should have one half of their costs of the appeal. The facts are summarised in the headnote.

Argument in support of an application by the defendants to call further evidence having been submitted,

Nov. 24. SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R. : The defendants have asked for leave to adduce further evidence, and, as a necessary corollary, for leave to amend the pleadings by raising a new point by way of defence. [HIS LORDSHIP stated the facts, held that, despite reasonable efforts, the new evidence was not available at the trial of the action, and continued]. There is one further matter to which I need allude, and that is whether on the facts it can be said that the defendants at the material date were occupying these premises as a dwelling-house. Put more precisely, were the premises let as a dwelling-house at the material date ? It is significant that in 1932 the premises were described as " all that messuage or dwelling-house known as Roslyn." It does not appear that the premises were then described, at any rate, as a boarding-house. However that may be, when the lease to the present defendants was entered into the premises were described thus : " All that the premises known as the Roslyn Private Hotel." I assume, and, no doubt, it is the fact, that the defendants acquired these premises for, and ran them as, a boarding-house. I have already referred to the evidence in the affidavit which states, among other things, that the neighbourhood consists mainly of residential small hotels and boarding-houses. The lease of 1947 contained the following covenant by the lessee (and it is on this that the main point turns) :

> " Not to use the demised premises nor allow them to be used for any purpose other than that of the business or trade of a hotel proprietor or boarding-house keeper or in any manner inconsistent with such user without the consent in writing of the landlord first had and obtained."

I am going to assume that on the evidence in the affidavit there is no doubt that the defendants in fact lived on these premises and have used the premises as their home ever since they acquired the lease. That, of course, leaves the question whether, having regard to the facts, they can say that the premises were let as a dwelling-house ? On that point counsel for the defendants has referred us to two cases, Epsom Grand Stand Association v. Clarke (1) and Vickery v. Martin (2). The latter case alone will suffice for the present purpose. I should state that under the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, s. 12 (2), it is laid down that premises do not cease to be within the Act by reason of the fact that they are in part used for business purposes, and, among other things, Vickery's case decided that that provision means what it says and that one is not concerned to see how substantial the part is that is used for business purposes. It must, of course, still be true to say that it is a dwelling-house—that it is the home of the tenant claiming the protection of the Act—because, as has been many times stated, one of the main objects of the Act is to protect persons who are tenants from being evicted from their homes. In the course of his judgment in Vickery v. Martin LORD GREENE, M.R., said ([1944] 2 All E.R. 168) :

> " He [the county court judge] said that the parties intended that the house should be used as a boarding-house. That certainly does not bring the landlord home, or anywhere near home, because the user as a boarding-house is not inconsistent with the house being a dwelling-house within the meaning of the Rent Restrictions Acts."

Counsel for the defendants, in referring to that passage, had, I think, in mind the language of this covenant, a covenant against user for any purpose " otherwise than that of the . . . trade of a hotel proprietor or boarding-house keeper or in any manner inconsistent with such user . . . " The point can be put thus. On the facts, assuming that the defendants lived and had their home on the premises, but at the same time ran there a boarding-house in the ordinary acceptation of the word, was that a breach of the covenant ? Though I am not necessarily excluding further evidence or further argument, on the matter as it now stands it seems to me that it is at least reasonably probable that it would be held that this was not a breach of covenant, and that, as such user was contemplated by the lease, the defendants can fairly say that these premises were let as a dwelling-house at the material date. Other matters of fact may have to be investigated, but, assuming that point in the defendants' favour, as I do, it is, at the least, reasonably probable that the conclusion of the court will be that the amount claimable for rent would be limited to the £85 suggested in the amended defence. For these reasons I think, in this very exceptional case and on its special and peculiar circumstances, that the court should exercise its discretion, and, with the object of doing justice between these parties, admit this evidence and allow the defence to be amended.

Argument on the appeal was then heard.

Nov. 25. SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R. : I will ask COHEN, L.J., to deliver the first judgment.

COHEN, L.J. : In this case the plaintiff, a trustee of the property of a bankrupt, Mrs. Hilda Kitchen, sues the defendants, Mr. and Mrs. Madders, for five quarters of rent due under an agreement of lease of May 9, 1947. The first two quarters accrued due before the commencement of Mrs. Kitchen's bankruptcy and the last three fell due after that date. There was no dispute about the liability for the rent, but the defendants originally set up two defences, and it was on those two defences that the matter came before HARMAN, J. There has since been added, pursuant to the leave of this court, a third defence, to which I will refer in due course.

The first defence was that of a set off. The defendants claimed a set off of so much of a judgment debt for over £5,000 as might be required. The second defence was that the liability for rent in the events which had happened was, not a liability to the trustee in bankruptcy, but one to a company to whom the bankrupt had mortgaged the premises. There was also a somewhat faint suggestion of a defence on the lines of Ex parte James (3) that this was not a case which the court ought to allow its official, the trustee in bankruptcy, to pursue. The first defence arose in these circumstances. The defendants had taken the lease in question as part of a larger transaction into which they were induced to enter by certain fraudulent misrepresentations of the bankrupt. In fairness to the bankrupt, I should add that it appears she was prosecuted for the fraudulent misrepresentation, but the criminal proceedings failed. However, the lease arose out of an oral agreement under which the defendants agreed to purchase from the bankrupt for the sum of £5,000 the goodwill of the Roslyn Private Hotel, together with the fixtures and fittings contained therein, and also to take the lease. The defendants paid £2,000 in cash to the bankrupt and gave a bill of sale for the remaining £3,000. On Aug. 11, 1947, they commenced proceedings against the bankrupt claiming cancellation of the bill and damages by reason of the alleged fraud. On Jan. 21, 1948, they obtained judgment on motion for judgment in default of defence for damages which were ultimately assessed at the sum of £5,562 11*s.* 5*d.* It is that sum, or rather the appropriate part of it, that the defendants seek to set off against the trustee. So far as the first two quarters rent, which accrued due before the commencement of the bankruptcy, are concerned, counsel for the plaintiff admits that, if it were not for an undertaking, given in the circumstances to which I will refer in a moment, the defendants would have a right of set off under the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 31. That section, as far as material, provides :

> " Where there have been mutual credits, mutual debts or other mutual dealings, between a debtor against whom a receiving order shall be made under this Act and any other person proving or claiming to prove a debt under the receiving order, an account shall be taken of what is due from the one party to the other in respect of such mutual dealings, and the sum due from the one party shall be set off against any sum due from the other party, and the balance of the account, and no more, shall be claimed or paid on either side respectively . . ."

Counsel for the plaintiff admitted that he could not dispute that the frauds alleged by the defendants against the bankrupt were so linked with contract that the right of set off would arise. He said that the undertaking given to the court as a condition of obtaining a removal of the stay in the King's Bench action prevented the set off arising.

The circumstances in which that undertaking was given were as follows. The judgment which I have already mentioned having been recovered, and Mrs. Kitchen having been made bankrupt, on Aug. 13, the trustee moved for a stay. That matter came before the court in due course and a stay was granted temporarily. When the matter came before the court on Aug. 31, it was stood over until the first available day in the autumn sittings, the stay being continued upon the applicant's undertaking that, if he pursued proceedings under R.S.C., Ord. 14, in the action with which we are now concerned, he would not make the summons returnable before Oct. 20, 1948. That order having been made, the matter came again before SLADE, J., on Oct. 15, and on that occasion, the plaintiffs by their counsel—that is, the defendants in this action—undertaking not to prove their claim—the subject-matter of the King's Bench proceedings—in bankruptcy, no order was made except that the stay was removed. That was the undertaking which was given, and it was the condition under which the stay was removed, and the defendants were enabled to quantify the judgment in the King's Bench proceedings.

Counsel for the defendants says that the undertaking was limited to using the King's Bench judgment as a weapon of offence. It debarred him, so he says, from lodging a proof, but it did not debar him from using it as a weapon of defence, namely, by way of set off. That set off, he says, accrued when the writ was issued in the Chancery proceedings on Aug. 19, 1948, and was not affected by the undertaking. On any other view, it was argued, the removal of the stay would be valueless since he could not prove his debt, and, as the debt arose, not out of pure tort, but out of fraud connected with the contract, the claim would be barred when the debtor got her discharge. He relied in support of his argument on some observations of LORD ESHER, M.R., in Sovereign Life Assurance Co. v. Dodd (4) ([1892] 2 Q.B.D. 578) :

> " What is the result of a plea of set off ? It is not a counter-claim or a cross-action, but a plea in bar ; and therefore, in cases where the plea > is made out, although it may be true that when the action was brought the defendant was a debtor of the plaintiff, yet, the plaintiff being the defendant's debtor to the same amount, the plaintiff's claim is barred. Bankruptcy, therefore, makes no difference to the right of set off."

Counsel for the plaintiff says, however, that this is based on a complete misconception of the situation. The damages recovered were damages for fraud, and on the basis of the undertaking given this would not be a provable debt. He referred us to the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 30, which makes it clear that unliquidated damages arising otherwise than by reason of contract or breach of trust are not provable in bankruptcy. He says that what the defendants were getting out of the removal of the stay was that, by the undertaking that their debt would not be treated as a provable debt, they were procuring recognition of the claim as one in pure fraud which, when quantified, would leave them free to take whatever proceedings they might think appropriate, including, if they thought fit, steps to make the defendant bankrupt, or, alternatively, if she got her discharge, they could seek to recover the debt from the bankrupt. HARMAN, J., considered and dealt with this point as follows (ante, p. 57) :

> "As to the instalments before the bankruptcy, counsel for the trustee, as I have said, was driven to rely on the undertaking. The right of set off in bankruptcy is the creature of statute and arises under the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 31, under the terms of which the persons between whom there must be mutual dealings are the debtor, on the one side, and any other person proving or claiming to prove a debt under the receiving order, on the other. The present defendants, having regard to their undertaking, cannot either prove or claim to prove a debt under the receiving order, and therefore, they do not come within s. 31. To that argument I see no answer, and, therefore, I am of opinion that there is no right of set off either for the pre-bankruptcy or the post-bankruptcy amount of rent."

I respectfully agree with the conclusion to which HARMAN, J., came. The real meaning of the undertaking is, I think, that the damages were not to be treated as a provable debt. If the defendants were now allowed to set off this debt, or part of it, against the claim for rent, the defendants would be getting by a back door what they had undertaken not to take out of the front door. It is wrong, I think, to say that set off is a mere matter of defence on the facts of this case. If we were to take the opposite view, the effect would be that the asset of the rent would be taken out of the estate for the exclusive benefit of the defendants who could remain in possession for the whole term without contributing one penny to the estate. I think that when the defendants undertook not to prove this debt they were, in effect, agreeing that the debt should not be treated as a provable debt, and, if it were not a provable debt, it clearly could not be the subject of set off under s. 31.

As to the last three quarters' rent which accrued due after the commencement of the bankruptcy, there was, I think, no mutuality, and, therefore, there could be no set off. I agree with the reasons given by HARMAN, J., in his conclusion on this point. He referred to the decision in Alloway v. Steere (5), the headnote of which is set out in his judgment. He pointed out that it was exactly the converse of the present case, and I accept his view. It seems to me to justify the conclusion to which he came. I ought, however, perhaps to refer shortly to the two cases on which counsel for the defendants relied. The first of them was Lawrence v. Hayes (6). In that case the headnote is ([1927] 2 K.B. 111) as follows :

> "The owner of a business sold it to the defendant on terms of payment by instalments, and then assigned the benefit of the agreement to the plaintiff. Before notice of assignment was given to the defendant, the latter obtained judgment for a sum of money against the assignor as damages for > breach of warranty on the above sale. In an action by the plaintiff, as assignee, against the defendant for payment of instalments due under the assigned agreement, the defendant claimed to set off the amount of the judgment. The plaintiff contended that the defendant's right to damages in respect of the breach of warranty had merged in the judgment, and that the latter could not be set off against his claim :—Held, that the set off was valid."

That case, as it seems to me, is a long way from the point with which we are dealing. In the first place, that was a matter of contract and did not turn on the terms of a lease, which is something separate from contract, and the whole matter was so plainly linked that I do not think there is any doubt that there was a right of set off. Moreover, it is to be observed, as counsel for the plaintiff pointed out, that that was a case in which the complications of bankruptcy did not arise, and the court was not concerned with the terms of the Bankruptcy Act, s. 31. The other case which, as counsel for the defendants frankly admitted, was apparently more in direct relation with what we are dealing with, was Stoddart v. Union Trust, Ltd. (7), where the question of fraud did arise. The headnote is as follows ([1912] 1 K.B. 181) :

> " The defendants entered into a contract for the purchase of a newspaper for a sum of £1,000, of which £200 was paid on the completion of the contract, and the balance of £800 was to be payable by certain instalments. The defendants were induced to enter into the contract by fraudulent misrepresentations made to them by the vendor. The vendor for valuable consideration assigned the balance of the purchase-money by deed absolutely to the plaintiff, and notice in writing of that assignment was given to the defendants. The plaintiff at the time of that assignment had no notice of the fraud on the part of the vendor. In an action by the plaintiff against the defendants for the debt of £800 so assigned, the defendants pleaded, by way of defence, in substance, that they were induced to enter into the contract for the purchase of the newspaper by the fraud of the vendor, and that by reason thereof they had sustained damage exceeding £800, and no money was due from them at the date of the assignment to the plaintiff, and, in the event of their being held liable to pay the sum claimed by the plaintiff, they counter-claimed against the vendor damages for fraud to an equal amount. The defendants were not in a position, and did not claim, to rescind the contract for the purchase of the newspaper. At the trial the jury found that the defendants had been induced to enter into the contract for purchase of the newspaper by the fraud of the vendor, and had thereby sustained damage to the amount of £800. The judge on those findings gave judgment for the defendants on the plaintiff's claim and judgment for the defendants against the vendor for £800 damages upon the counter-claim, but stayed execution on the latter judgment."

This court, however, held :

> " upon the above-mentioned facts, that the defendants could not set up the claim to £800 damages for the fraud of the vendor by way of defence against the claim of the plaintiff, and that the plaintiff was entitled to judgment against the defendants for £800."

However, here, too, no question of bankruptcy was involved, and I do not base my conclusion on anything to be found in either case. Here we are considering instalments of rent which accrued due for the first time after the commencement of the bankruptcy. We are considering, therefore, debts which were never due to the bankrupt but which become due to the trustee. It seems to me in those circumstances impossible to say that there is such mutuality between the claim for rent due to the trustee and the claim for fraudulent misrepresentation against the bankrupt as to found a right to set off within s. 31 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914. For these reasons I think Harman, J., was right when he rejected the defence based on set off.

The next defence to which I have to refer is the defence based on the mortgage by the bankrupt to the Provincial Building Society. That was a legal charge under which the mortgagor was entitled to remain in possession until certain events occurred (among others, committing an act of bankruptcy), and he attorned tenant to the society at a yearly rental of a peppercorn, the society having the right to take possession on one week's notice to quit given to the mortgagor. I should add that under cl. 10 of the deed the mortgagor was not without the previous consent in writing of the society to exercise any of the powers of leasing conferred on a mortgagor by s. 99 of the Law of Property Act, 1925. In the result, therefore, as between the mortgagor and the mortgagee, Mrs. Kitchen had no right to grant to the defendants the lease which she did grant in 1947. The defence based on that document is that the right of the mortgagor to receive rent had determined. The argument of counsel for the defendants on that point is very clearly stated by Harman, J., ante, p. 57 ([1949] 1 Ch. 594):

> "Mr. Browne cited s. 98 of the Law of Property Act, 1925, which provides: 'A mortgagor for the time being entitled to the possession or receipt of the rents and profits of any land, as to which the mortgagee has not given notice of his intention to take possession or to enter in the receipt of the rents and profits thereof, may sue for such possession or for the recovery of such rents or profits,' and he contended that the trustee, although claiming through the mortgagor, is not entitled to sue, because in fact notice has been given by the mortgagee (the building society) of intention to take possession. In support of that contention he cited the old case of Moss v. Gallimore and Another (8), which is still good law and appears in Smith's Leading Cases, and the sidenote to which is: 'A mortgagee, after giving notice to the tenant in possession under a lease prior to the mortgage, is entitled to the rent in arrear at the time of the notice, as well as to what accrues afterwards and he may distrain for it after such notice . . .' Therefore, it was contended, the building society, if it gave effective notice, could give a good receipt for the accruing rent, so that it follows that the tenants are in peril in that way of having to pay the rent twice."

When the matter was before Harman, J., the argument that the mortgagees could sue the defendants for rent derived some support from the judgment of Vaisey, J., in Dudley and District Benefit Building Society v. Emerson (9). That decision was reversed by the Court of Appeal. It is now clear, I think, that, if the mortgagees could recover anything against the defendants, it could be only as mesne profits. As Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., pointed out in the course of the argument, the right to mesne profits depends on unlawful withholding of possession. Until the mortgagees commenced proceedings against the trustee and the defendants on Oct. 25, 1948, the mortgagor was entitled to possession. As between the defendants and the mortgagor, the defendants were entitled to be in possession. The defendants, therefore, were not wrongfully withholding possession from anyone. All the rent which is here sued for accrued due before Oct. 25, 1948, and for this reason, it seems to me, this point really has no substance. Indeed counsel for the defendants admitted that the decision of this court in Dudley and District Benefit Building Society v. Emerson (9) made it very difficult to sustain the argument which he advanced with great force in the court below, and which Harman, J., recognised as a difficult point as the authorities then stood. If the true effect of the undertaking given by the defendants in the King's Bench action be as I have stated, there can be nothing dishonourable in the action of the trustee in commencing the present proceedings. I need say nothing about the defence based on Ex parte James (3).

That being so, it appears that on the pleadings as they were in the court below the defendants failed completely in their defences, and the plaintiff was entitled to the judgment which he recovered before HARMAN, J. For the reasons SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R., gave yesterday we have allowed the pleadings to be amended and have allowed the defendants to set up an alternative defence based on the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Acts, 1920 to 1939. It is common ground between the parties that the rateable value of the property comprised in the lease on Apr. 1, 1939, was £72 per annum, and it is not disputed that, if the house was let as a dwelling-house at that date, it was then within the Rent Restrictions Acts. It has been proved in evidence before us that it was at that date let as a dwelling-house and occupied as a dwelling-house at a rent of £140 per annum. The question, however, remains whether the defendants had a lease which permitted user as a dwelling-house. SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R., referred to the relevant clauses of the lease when giving judgment on the question whether the amendment should be allowed, because plainly the amendment and further evidence could not be allowed unless, if allowed, it would be either conclusive or raise a very strong prima facie case. SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R., gave our reasons for coming to the conclusion that, if the evidence established the facts that were alleged, there would be raised a strong prima facie case that at all material times this house was let on terms which permitted user as a private dwelling. I do not propose to repeat what he then said. I would add that the evidence which has since been given seems to me strongly to reinforce the conclusions which he then stated. It appears that the dwelling-house now in question was a ten-bedroom house. The defendants lived there with their two children throughout. One room was reserved for the exclusive use of the family, being occupied at all times by the children, and during the season by the parents also, and, in addition to this bedroom in the attic, there was also reserved for the use of the family a sitting room on the ground floor. It seems to me that those facts reinforce the conclusion that SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R., came to and that there is nothing in the terms of the lease which can prevent us holding that at the material time this house was a dwelling-house within the meaning of the Rent Restrictions Acts, 1920 to 1939. The result is that the rent was payable only at the rate of £140 per annum instead of at the rate of £500 per annum. On that basis counsel for the defendants claims that the sum recoverable, instead of being £625, should be £85. In making that calculation, however, he went too far, because he tried to set off the £90 which his clients had overpaid for the quarter's rent which they had paid in advance, not only against the first two quarters' rent, as to which it was clearly a proper subject-matter of set off, but also to the extent of £20 against the rental accrued due after the commencement of this action. For the reasons I have already given I do not think the set off can be applied as regards the last three quarters' rent. In my view, therefore, the proper sum for which judgment should be entered for the plaintiff is £105. For these reasons I think the appeal should be allowed and judgment entered for the sum which I have stated.

ASQUITH, L.J.: I agree, and would only add that there is a decision of the Court of Appeal of Northern Ireland which seems very closely in point, Burns v. Radcliffe (10). In that case, as in this, there was a lease of hotel premises to the defendant, and the defendant resided on the premises. In that case, as in this, it was a term of the lease that the defendants should use the premises for the purposes of a temperance hotel only. Yet the court held, and the Irish Court of Appeal upheld it, that the Rent Restrictions Acts applied and protected the lessee from proceedings for possession. MOORE, L.J., said ([1923], 2 I.R. 162):

> "... where the nature of the business is not incompatible with the residence of the tenant, if, as in this case, it would almost require it, I can see no reason for holding that the whole premises were not her dwelling-house."

That decision supports the conclusions at which my Lord has arrived, with which I agree.

SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R. : I am entirely of the same opinion.

Appeal allowed. Defendants to receive one-half of their costs of the appeal.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Roxburgh, J.), November 17, 25, 1949.]

Lease — Assignment — Withholding of consent — Reasonableness — Prevention of creation of statutory tenancy—Tenant in possession at date of assignment.

ACTION for possession of premises which the tenant had assigned without having obtained the landlord's consent.

By an agreement, dated Mar. 1, 1946, the landlord let to the tenant a flat to which the Rent Restrictions Acts applied for a term of three years expiring on Feb. 28, 1949, the tenant covenanting, inter alia, not to assign the premises without first obtaining the written consent of the landlord "which consent shall not be unreasonably withheld." On Dec. 16, 1948, the tenant applied to the landlord for a licence to assign, but this was refused on the ground that, as the lease only had a few weeks to run before expiry, an assignment would in all probability result in the creation of a statutory tenancy. On Jan. 24, 1949, the tenant assigned the residue of the term and went out of occupation of the premises. The landlord claimed possession.

ROXBURGH, J., in a considered judgment, held (i) the fact that in the present case the residue of the term was to be measured in weeks and not, as in Swanson v. Forton ([1949] 1 All E.R. 135) in days, did not make the refusal of the landlord to consent to the assignment unreasonable ; (ii) whether or not the tenant was in occupation when he assigned was immaterial, and, therefore, the landlord was entitled to possession.

Insurance—Marine insurance—Constructive total loss—Statutory definition—Exclusion of common law—Partial loss—Termination of risk—Abandonment of voyage—Amount of indemnity—Marine Insurance Act, 1906 (c. 41), s. 60 (1) (2) ; s. 69 (3) ; s. 78 (4).

While a trawler was being towed to a dry dock for refitting in January, 1942, she was stranded on a rock, was heavily pounded by the seas, and suffered severe damage. The owner gave notice of abandonment under the insurance policy covering her and, after the vessel had been salvaged by the Admiralty, refused to have her put in dry dock for survey and ascertainment of damage, and he did not contest salvage proceedings after which the vessel was sold under an order of the court for £685 which was accepted as her value after the damage. She had been insured for £9,000, but in an action by the owner on the policy evidence was given for the underwriters that her true value before the damage was £2,000 and it was found as a fact that the cost of repairs of damage due to stranding would have been £4,620. It was also found as a fact that the owner at all material times would have been unlikely to obtain a licence to repair the vessel or to place her in dry dock within a reasonable time, and not in any case before 1947.

HELD : (i) the fact that the owner would have been unlikely at all material times to obtain a licence to repair the vessel or to place her in dry dock within a reasonable time did not justify a claim for constructive total loss because, even if it would have done so at common law, such a common law rule would have been inconsistent with the comprehensive definition of " constructive total loss " in the Marine Insurance Act, 1906, s. 60, and so, by s. 91 (2) of the Act, would no longer apply.

Dictum of LORD PORTER in Robertson v. Nomikos ([1939] 2 All E.R. 734), applied.

(ii) with regard to partial loss, the risk ended when the ship was abandoned by the owner in circumstances which made it clear that he did not intend to pursue the voyage to its destination, and, therefore, under s. 69 (3) he was entitled to be indemnified for the reasonable depreciation arising from the unrepaired damage not exceeding the reasonable cost of repairing such damage.

(iii) by refusing to have a survey in dry dock the owner was not in breach of any duty laid on him by s. 78 (4) of the Act, which requires an assured to take all reasonable measures to avert or minimise a loss, because such a survey would not have averted or minimised the loss but would merely have ascertained its extent.

(iv) the reasonable depreciation of the vessel arising from the unrepaired damage should be estimated, not by deducting the true damaged value of £685 from the true undamaged value of £2,000, but by deducting from the conventional value of £9,000 in the insurance policy either the true damaged value of £685 or a figure bearing the same proportion to the £9,000 as the true damaged value bore to the true undamaged value, and, as the cost of the repair of damage due to the stranding, assessed (on the evidence) at £4,620, was less than either of these figures, the owner was entitled to be indemnified in that sum under s. 69 (3).

Action on a Lloyd's policy of marine insurance claiming that a vessel was a constructive total loss, or, alternatively, had sustained particular average damage amounting to not less than £9,000. A

The plaintiff was the executor of his wife who had owned a steam trawler named the Elswick. The defendant was one of the underwriters of a policy of marine insurance on the vessel. The Elswick was built in 1906 and she was laid up from November, 1936, to January, 1942, when she required substantial refitting. The plaintiff obtained a licence for sufficient repairs to make her B seaworthy to be towed from the Tyne to Peterhead, where arrangements had been made for the main repairs and the necessary licence had been promised. The voyage to Peterhead commenced on Jan. 10, 1942, and on Jan. 20 the vessel grounded on the Horseback rock and received a heavy pounding. On Feb. 4, the plaintiff decided to abandon the ship to underwriters and on Feb. 9 he gave a notice of abandonment, which was not accepted, but he was placed C in the same position as if he had issued a writ. Thereafter he stood on his notice of abandonment and refused to interest himself in the vessel or to have her put in dry dock so that she could be surveyed and he never had her examined. An official of the Ministry of Transport who examined her came to the conclusion that her repair was "not an economical proposition." She was also examined by surveyors on behalf of the underwriters. On June 12, 1942, D the Admiralty Salvage Department floated the vessel off and beached her in Peterhead Harbour. On July 10, 1943, they began a salvage action in the Court of Session against the plaintiff, who did not contest it, and on Nov. 28, 1943, they were awarded £500 or one third of the £1,500 which they claimed to be the value of the vessel. The ship was sold by auction by order of the court and realised £685. The buyers were unable to obtain a licence to repair the vessel E and subsequently removed her to a beach three miles south of Peterhead. The vessel had been insured while laid up for £2,000. On Dec. 11, 1941, the plaintiff took out an all risks policy on the vessel for the voyage to Peterhead in which the vessel was valued at £8,000, increased on Jan. 16, 1942, to £9,000.

The plaintiff's claim for constructive total loss was based on the ground that at all material times he would have been unlikely to obtain a licence to repair F the vessel or to place her in dry dock within a reasonable time. It was conceded that the claim was not tenable under any of the heads specified in the Marine Insurance Act, 1906, s. 60, but it was contended that it was justified at common law, was not inconsistent with any of the provisions of s. 60, and, accordingly, was valid by virtue of s. 91 (2), which preserved the application of the rules of the common law save in so far as they were inconsistent with the express provisions G of the Act. On the claim for a partial loss, the defendant contended that the vessel had never arrived at her destination and that the sale under an order of the court had been a sale during the risk. It was also contended that, if the claim for partial loss were admitted, that loss should be the difference between the value of the vessel in her damaged condition, taken by both sides at £685, and her true undamaged value put at £2,000, or that the loss should be arrived at H by deducting from the conventional value of £9,000 a proportion of that £9,000 equal to the proportion borne by the damaged value of £685 to the true undamaged value, £2,000. The plaintiff contended that the loss was the difference between the conventional value, £9,000, and the damaged value, £685.

Devlin, J., gave judgment for the defendant on the claim for constructive total loss and for the plaintiff on the claim for a partial loss, awarding £4,620, as the cost of repairs.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 29. DEVLIN, J., read a judgment in which he stated the facts, found that the plaintiff at all material times would have been unlikely to obtain a licence to repair the vessel or to place her in dry dock within a reasonable time, and continued : I have heard an interesting argument on the common law principle governing constructive total loss, but it would be idle for me to express any opinion on it unless I first determine that I can look outside the Marine Insurance Act, 1906. I have to consider whether on its true construction the Act expressly provides that s. 60 is a complete definition of constructive total loss. If it does, then any addition to the definition or alteration of it would be inconsistent with its completeness, and so would not be admissible under s. 91 (2). Section 56 (1) provides :

> " . . . Any loss other than a total loss, as hereinafter defined, is a partial loss."

That seems, as LORD PORTER pointed out in Robertson v. Nomikos (1) ([1939] 2 All E.R. 734) to mean that the definition of constructive total loss in s. 60 must be complete. If any loss outside s. 57 (which defines actual total loss) and s. 60 were to be held to be a total loss, it could not be a partial loss, as that would be inconsistent with the express provision of s. 56. I see no answer to this argument except possibly that it puts too literal a construction on the words of s. 56. That makes it material to consider whether such a construction is out of harmony with the object of s. 60, as shown in its marginal note, and with the general purpose of the Act. The marginal note is " Constructive total loss defined." This is in keeping with the words of s. 56 " total loss, as hereinafter defined " and shows that s. 60 is intended to contain a definition. I have used the words " complete definition," as LORD PORTER did, as a convenient and expressive term. I dare say it is not meticulously accurate, for, strictly speaking, a definition must be complete, else it is not a definition at all. The question really is whether s. 60 is a definition section, defining constructive total loss as a whole, and not merely categories of it, or whether, as counsel for the plaintiff in terms argued, all it does is to lay down the main characteristics of a constructive total loss. This argument gives no weight to the word " defined," both in s. 56 and in the marginal note to s. 60. I think that that word shows conclusively that s. 60 is intended to define a constructive total loss, which is the same as saying that s. 60 circumscribes completely the conception of constructive total loss. As to the general purpose of the Act, it is described in its title as a codifying Act, and it would, I think, be surprising if its framers had not included in it a comprehensive definition of constructive total loss, or that, if they had intended only to define categories, they would not have made their intention clear.

I have arrived at my conclusion without relying on the authority of the dictum by LORD PORTER to that effect in Robertson v. Nomikos (1), to which I have referred. I have approached the matter in this way because counsel for the plaintiff may be right in saying that it is obiter dictum. The conclusion I have reached is greatly strengthened by the high persuasive authority of such a dictum. This appears to be the only place in the authorities in which the point has been considered. Counsel for the plaintiff claimed that in 1913 PICKFORD, J., in Polurrian Steamship Co. v. Young (2) (109 L.T. 903) had, in effect, treated s. 60 as incomplete by adding the qualification " within a reasonable time " to the provision about recovery of the ship or goods in sub-s. (2) (i). It seems to be clear from the passage referred to that PICKFORD, J., was doing no more than to give the provision what he thought was its right construction. The sub-section is silent as to whether the deprivation of possession has to be perpetual or not, and so is open to either construction. Even if the right construction of the language, taken by itself, is that the deprivation of possession is to be perpetual, it is clear that the Act does not textually cover the point, and accordingly there would be a lacuna which the common law could fill without inconsistency with any express provision. I hold, therefore, that the claim for constructive total loss based on this ground is bad in law.

[HIS LORDSHIP dealt with the claim for constructive total loss on two further alternative grounds, viz., that the trawler was abandoned because her actual total loss appeared unavoidable (s. 60 (1)) and that the cost of repairing the damage would have exceeded the value of the ship when repaired (s. 60 (2) (ii)), rejected them on the facts, and continued :] I turn now to consider the alternative claim for a partial loss. In the early stages of his argument on this point, counsel for the defendant submitted that the case did not fall within any of the provisions of the Act. The only relevant provision is s. 69 (3), which provides :

> " Where the ship has not been repaired, and has not been sold in her damaged state during the risk, the assured is entitled to be indemnified for the reasonable depreciation arising from the unrepaired damage, but not exceeding the reasonable cost of repairing such damage, computed as above."

Counsel for the defendant submitted that, as the ship had never arrived at her destination at Peterhead the period of risk was never terminated, with the result that the sale under the order of the court in 1944 was a sale during the risk. In the course of this argument I put forward as a possible view that the risk terminated when the ship was abandoned by the plaintiff in circumstances and in language which made it clear that he did not intend to pursue the voyage to its destination. Neither side expressly accepted this view, but likewise neither actively dissented from it, and both sides addressed me on the assumption that the case fell within s. 69 (3). I think that assumption is correct : see ARNOULD ON MARINE INSURANCE, 12th ed., vol. 1, p. 703, s. 504.

Although it is not the logical starting point under s. 69 (3) I think it is convenient in the circumstances of this case that I should begin by computing the reasonable cost of repairing the stranding damage. Before I come to the figures I must deal with come preliminary matters. It is common ground that any accurate estimate of the extent of the damage could not be obtained without a survey of the ship in dry dock, which was never done. The underwriters contend that it was the plaintiff's duty under s. 78 (4) to cause such a survey to be made, and that, he being in breach of his duty, the claim cannot be sustained. Section 78 (4) requires an assured to take such measures as may be reasonable for the purpose of averting or minimising a loss. A survey in dry dock in the circumstances of this case would not avert or minimise the loss, but would merely ascertain its extent. Its cost would, I think, be part of the cost incurred by the plaintiff in proving his claim. In so far as the burden of proof lies on him, it may be foolish of him to dispense with the survey, but that is another matter. I do not think he is in breach of any duty under s. 78 (4). [After examining the question whether dry dock facilities would have been available, HIS LORDSHIP continued :] It is true that without the survey, the extent of the damage cannot be exactly ascertained, and must be a matter of conjecture or of inference. Whether this state of affairs is the plaintiff's misfortune or his fault, the burden of proof is, I think, the same. He has not to establish with certainty that any item of damage occurred. He has to satisfy me that on balance of probability it did. The plaintiff's figures were taken as the cost of repairs in 1946, and I was invited by the defendant to deduct the appropriate percentage so as to reduce them to a 1942 basis. I think this contention is unsound. In estimating the cost of repair for the purpose of a partial loss, I think that the court has to get as near as possible to the actual figure which would have been expended had she been repaired, and, if it be proved to my satisfaction, as it is, that she could not have been repaired earlier than the early part of 1947, I think I ought to take the figures appropriate to that time. [His Lordship examined the evidence of the cost of repairs of damage due to the stranding and assessed it at £4,620.]

I must now return to s. 69 (3) of the Act. Under its provisions I have first to ascertain the reasonable depreciation arising from the unrepaired damage. That requires a comparison between the value of the vessel immediately before the damage and the value in her damaged condition. The value in her damaged condition is taken by both sides to be £685. There is a dispute about the ascertainment of her undamaged value, both on the law and on the facts. Counsel for the defendant contended that the value to be ascertained for this purpose is her true value, which he put at £2,000, and not her conventional value of £9,000. On this contention the plaintiff's claim would be limited to £1,315. Alternatively, he contended that the extent to which the ship had depreciated in value should be ascertained by a comparison between her true undamaged value and her true damaged value. This would show that she had depreciated in value by approximately two-thirds. This proportion should then be applied to her conventional value, thus arriving at a figure (subject, of course, to the overriding maximum of the cost of repairs) of about £6,000. This method of ascertaining the extent of the depreciation where there is a valued policy is that which is specifically prescribed by s. 71 (3) in the case of damaged goods.

I do not accept the first of these contentions. Section 27 (3) provides that the value fixed by the policy is conclusive of the insurable value of the subject intended to be insured, whether the loss be total or partial. Consequently, I think that, unless the defendant's alternative contention is right, the effect of s. 69 (3) is that the true damaged value must be subtracted from the conventional undamaged value. This is, indeed, what was contended on behalf of the plaintiff. It produces a figure of over £8,000. It is unnecessary for me to decide whether this contention of the plaintiff is to be preferred to the alternative contention of the defendant, for both methods produce a figure higher than that which I have taken as the cost of repairs and there is no doubt that the latter figure is overriding. This makes it likewise unnecessary that I should for the purposes of this judgment find any figure for the true undamaged value of the ship, but, as it is a question of fact, I think it desirable that I should express, so far as I can, the view that I have formed about it. It is best approached by endeavouring to put a figure on the market value in 1942 of the trawler, if she had been in good condition, and then by deducting from it the probable cost of her refitting.

[His Lordship took the market value of the vessel in 1942 at £9,000 or £10,000 and assessed the cost of refitment at about £3,000. He assessed the salvage charges claimed at £300, based on a value of £685, for which the vessel was sold, instead of the £500 based on a value of £1,500, awarded to the Admiralty; held that the plaintiff was entitled to recover £4,920 under the policy; and gave judgment for the appropriate proportion of the amount subscribed by the defendant of the £9,000 insured.]

Prize Law—Condemnation—Ships scuttled in land-locked bay of enemy island—Subsequent capture of island—Ships formally seized in prize six years after capture of island.

Prize Law—Condemnation—Ship taken out of harbour when capture of harbour imminent, and scuttled in deep water about a mile and a half from shore—Formally seized as prize six years after capture of harbour.

On Apr. 12, 1941, three Italian vessels lying in a land-locked bay of Dahlak Island, about fifty miles east of Massawa, were scuttled on the order of the Italian naval authorities at Massawa. Towards the end of April, 1941, the island was captured by British naval forces. On Feb. 6, 1947, the three vessels, and also a fourth vessel which was sunk in the bay in an air attack on Apr. 7, 1941, were formally seized in prize by a British naval officer. Each of the vessels was partly above water, one being on her side, while the other three had their masts showing.

HELD : it could make no difference in principle whether the harbour was protected by natural features, as in this case, or artifically protected, as in the case of the port of Tripoli, and, therefore, applying the principle in The Bellaman ([1948] 2 All E.R. 679), the vessels must be regarded as having been seized when the island was captured in 1941, and were condemnable as good and lawful prize.

On Apr. 4, 1941, when the capture of Massawa by British forces was imminent, an Italian vessel lying in the harbour was taken out to sea, on the order of the Italian naval authorities, and scuttled in deep water, about a mile and a half from an island at the southern end of the harbour. On Apr. 8, 1941, Massawa was captured by the British, and on Feb. 4, 1947, the vessel was formally seized in prize by a British naval officer.

HELD : as the vessel was taken out of the harbour to be scuttled because the capture of the harbour was imminent, (a) she should be regarded as having been captured when the harbour was captured, and (b) at the material time, i.e., when the harbour was captured, she was captured as a ship, and not as a piece of wreckage at the bottom of the sea, and, therefore, she was condemnable.

ACTION IN PRIZE.

The Crown sought condemnation of six Italian ships, the Guiseppe Mazzini, the Nazario Sauro, the Urania, the Prometeo, the Riva Ligure and the Antonia C., on the grounds that they were, at the date of seizure, the property of an enemy. The Guiseppe Mazzini was sunk in a land-locked bay, called Ghubbet Mus Nefit, off the island of Dahlak, in the Red Sea some fifty miles east of Massawa, in an air attack on Apr. 7, 1941. The Nazario Sauro, the Urania and the Prometeo were scuttled in the same bay on Apr. 12, 1941, by order of the senior Italian naval officer present in Massawa at that time. On Apr. 27, 1941, the island of Nocra, at the mouth of the bay, surrendered to British naval forces and Dahlak was captured at the same time. On Feb. 6, 1947, the wrecks of the four ships were formally seized in prize by a British naval officer. The Prometeo was lying on her side, while the other three ships had their masts showing. The Riva Ligure was scuttled close to the shore in Harkiko Bay, south of Massawa Harbour, on Apr. 5, 1941, by order of the senior Italian naval officer in Massawa, which was captured by British forces on Apr. 8, 1941. The Riva Ligure was partly submerged when she was formally seized in prize by a British naval officer on Feb. 4, 1947. The Antonia C. was taken out to sea on Apr. 4, 1941, at the order of the senior Italian naval officer in Massawa, when the capture of the port was imminent, and scuttled in deep water about one and half miles to the south of Sheikh Said Island, in Harkiko Bay. She was formally seized in prize by a British naval officer on Feb. 4, 1947, but she was wholly under water at the time.

The formal affidavits of seizure of the six ships were made on Mar. 19 and 20, 1947, and the writs in prize were issued on Mar. 29, 1947, in the case of the first three, and on Oct. 17, 1947, in the case of the last three. By the terms of the Italian armistice, which was signed on Sept. 3, 1943, the right to capture Italian merchant vessels was precluded, but not the right to render effectual in the Prize Court captures made before the armistice. It was contended by the Crown that the principle in The Bellaman (1) applied, and that the first four ships were seized when the islands of Nocra and Dahlak were captured in April, 1941, and the last two when Massawa was captured on Apr. 8, 1941. Appearances were entered on behalf of the respective Italian owners of the ships, but they decided not to proceed with their claims.

Article 76 of the Treaty of Peace with Italy which was signed on Feb. 10, 1947, and came into force on Sept. 15, 1947, provides : " 1. Italy waives all claims of any description against the Allied and Associated Powers on behalf of the Italian government or Italian nationals arising directly out of the war or out of actions taken because of the existence of a state of war in Europe after Sept. 1, 1939, whether or not the Allied or Associated Power was at war with Italy at the time, including the following : (a) claims for losses or damages sustained as a consequence of acts of forces or authorities of Allied or Associated Powers ; (b) claims arising from the presence, operations or actions of forces or authorities of Allied or Associated Powers in Italian territory ; (c) claims with respect to the decrees or orders of Prize Courts of Allied or Associated Powers, Italy agreeing to accept as valid and binding all decrees and orders of such Prize Courts on or after Sept. 1, 1939, concerning Italian ships or Italian goods or the payment of costs ; (d) claims arising out of the exercise or purported exercise of belligerent rights. 2. The provisions of this article shall bar, completely and finally, all claims of the nature referred to herein, which will be henceforward extinguished, whoever may be the parties in interest . . . 5. The waiver of claims by Italy under para. 1 of this article includes any claims arising out of actions taken by any of the Allied and Associated Powers with respect to Italian ships between Sept. 1, 1939, and the coming into force of the present treaty . . . " It is provided by the Treaties of Peace (Italy, Rumania, Bulgaria, Hungary and Finland) Act, 1947, and the Treaty of Peace (Italy) Order, 1948, that, inter alia, art. 76 shall be and have effect as law.

In The Bellaman and The Agostino Bertani (1) the Crown sought condemnation of two Italian vessels which were lying aground in Tripoli Harbour, having been sunk by Allied action while the port was in enemy hands. The ships were not formally seized in prize until Feb. 3, 1947, although Tripoli was captured by British troops on Jan. 23, 1943, and the owners of the ships claimed to have the ships released to them. LORD MERRIMAN, P., held, in those cases (i) that the claims of the owners arose out of the " purported exercise of belligerent rights " within art. 76 of the Treaty of Peace with Italy, which operated to bar those claims ; and (ii) that the failure for four years to comply with the Naval Prize Act, 1864, s. 16 (which imposes a duty to deliver up every ship taken as a prize to the marshal of the court forthwith), did not rebut the presumption that the vessels were seized when Tripoli was captured, and they were, therefore, condemnable as good and lawful prize. It was now held by LORD MERRIMAN, P., that the principle in The Bellaman (1) applied, not only where the vessel sought to be condemned was in a port which had been captured, but also (a) where she was in a land-locked bay of an island which had been captured, and (b) where she was removed from a harbour, which was about to be captured, to be scuttled in deep water, and he made a decree of condemnation in regard to each of the six ships.

Quintin Hogg for the Crown.
The owners of the ships were not represented.

LORD MERRIMAN, P. : These six Italian ships require separate consideration, though I can group together the first four, the Giuseppe Mazzini, the Nazario Sauro, the Urania and the Prometeo, and deal with them by the same standard. They were in a land-locked bay, called Ghubbet Mus Nefit, of Dahlak Island, some fifty miles east of Massawa. This land-locked bay, which is a deep water bay, is protected at its mouth by a little island called Nocra Island, with access by a channel of which the shallowest markings are between four and five fathoms. It is now verified that all four ships were above water, or partly above water. One was lying on her side. She may have been actually submerged, but she was quite visible, and the others had only their masts showing. I have the detailed evidence of the capture of these islands in April, 1941, and it seems to be impossible to distinguish this case from that, e.g., of Tripoli Harbour, with which I have already dealt in The Bellaman and The Agostino Bertani (1). It does not seem to me that it can make any possible difference in principle whether the particular harbour is artifically protected from the sea and the weather, as in the case of Tripoli, or protected by natural features, as in the case of the harbour with which I am now dealing. These seem to be cases which are clearly covered by the decision in The Bellaman (1). The other two cases are rather different, and require separate consideration. The Riva Ligure was lying in a bay which could not by any possibility be described as a land-locked bay as it has a very wide open mouth. It is immediately to the south of Massawa Harbour proper, but part of it, so to speak, shades off into Massawa Harbour. The Riva Ligure was lying in this bay at a spot which is not identified otherwise than by the fact that she was only partly submerged, so that, in view of the sound readings on the chart, she must have been very close inshore. I think that she is covered by other cases [The Moncalieri, The XXIII Marzo, The Alberto Treves (2)] with which I have had to deal in connection with Massawa Harbour as being, on any reasonable interpretation, within the limits of the harbour and, therefore, I think there is no doubt that, when Massawa Harbour and the surrounding territory were captured, this ship should also be taken to have been captured.

The Antonia C. is in a category by itself and really comes within the cautionary reservation which I made in deciding The Bellaman (1), where I said ([1948] 2 All E.R. 683) :

> " I am not called on to consider any question concerning the limits of the port, for both vessels were clearly within the narrowest possible limits which could be drawn. Nor need I consider whether vessels lying in deep water, or hulks sunk to block the harbour entrance, can fairly be reckoned as vessels captured with the port. Such questions can be dealt with when they arise."

I think that that question now arises. The Antonia C., according to the evidence of a local pilot, who actually conveyed the orders for the operation from the Italian officer in command and himself witnessed the operation, was taken out a mile and a half or thereabouts into deep water in Harkiko Bay, to the southward of a little island called Sheikh Said Island, on which the southernmost of the two lights of Massawa Harbour is situated, and scuttled in deep water.

Two points arise : (i) whether the place itself can be said to be within the limits of the harbour, and (ii) whether the vessel is still a vessel which can fairly be said to be the subject of prize. I will deal with the last point first. This is not like the case of the Alberoni with which I dealt at the time when other cases came on in connection with Massawa Harbour. The Alberoni was a vessel which had been blown up by an internal explosion in 1938 and had been left in peacetime at the bottom of the sea, not thought worth salving, and I adjourned that case for some evidence that there was anything which could be called a ship at all. In this case I think it is clear that the Antonia C. was scuttled as a ship, and scuttled because the port was about to be captured by British forces. I have no doubt, therefore, that at the material time (i.e., on Apr. 8, 1941, when the port was captured), if she could fairly be said to be within the port, she was captured as a ship and not as a piece of wreckage at the bottom of the sea.

Was she captured with the port ? This is one of those cases which is clearly a question of degree, and I am bound to say that I think it is on the border line, but counsel has convinced me that I can fairly say, in view of the circumstances to which I have alluded, namely, that she was taken where she was and scuttled because we were about to capture the harbour, that this vessel should be taken to have been captured when the harbour itself was captured. That being so, I am prepared to condemn her, but I do wish to emphasise that progress from one degree to the next must not be taken as likely to proceed indefinitely without check.

Decree of condemnation in regard to each of the six ships.

Income Tax—Profits of trade—Deductions—Fruit grower and fruit salesman——Growing cherries bought with freehold—Admissibility of deduction of apportioned cost of cherries—Income Tax Act, 1918 (c. 40), sched. D, Cases I and II, r. 3 (f).

Excess Profits Tax—Profits of trade—Deductions—Fruit grower and fruit salesman—Growing cherries bought with freehold—Admissibility of deduction of apportioned cost of cherries.

The taxpayer, who was a fruit grower and salesman, bought freehold land, comprising, inter alia, a cherry orchard, for £5,500. The sale was expressed as " inclusive of this year's fruit crop " and the taxpayer had valued the cherries on the trees at £2,500. The cherries were subsequently sold by the taxpayer for £2,903 and, in computing his profits of trade for assessment to income tax and excess profits tax, he sought to deduct the £2,500 as representing the cost to him of the fruit.

HELD : (i) cherries growing on trees were fructus naturales and not fructus industriales, and, therefore, formed part of the land.

(ii) in either case, the purchase of the growing crop was part of a transaction for the purchase of a capital asset—the land and the trees—and, therefore, the price paid for the crop was not a sum which could be deducted in computing the amount of profits or gains to be charged to tax.

APPEALS by the taxpayer from a decision of CROOM-JOHNSON, J., dated Jan. 18, 1949, allowing an appeal by the Crown against a decision of the Special Commissioners who held that a growing crop of cherries included in the purchase by the taxpayer of certain land was to be regarded as fructus industriales, and that, even if that were not so and the cherries formed part of the freehold, the taxpayer bought two things, the land and the cherries, and, in computing his profits and gains for the purpose of his assessment to income tax and excess profits tax, he was entitled to deduct the amount he had paid for the cherries as distinct from that which he had paid for the land. CROOM-JOHNSON, J., held that the taxpayer was not entitled to deduct any part of the purchase price.

The first appeal was against an income tax assessment, the other two appeals were against assessment to excess profits tax. The point in all three cases was the same and judgment, which was delivered in relation to the second appeal, applied to the three appeals. The Court of Appeal upheld the decision of the learned judge, and dismissed the appeals. The facts appear in the judgment of SINGLETON, L.J.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 24. TUCKER, L.J. : I will ask SINGLETON, L.J., to deliver the first judgment.

SINGLETON, L.J.: The taxpayer, Mr. Arthur William Pilcher, was a fruit grower and fruit salesman. On May 1, 1942, he attended a sale by auction of a property known as Chekes Court, Tonge, and he bought Lot 2 for the sum of £5,500. He signed the contract and paid the deposit. The particulars show Lot 2 as > "The celebrated cherry orchard known as The King's Orchard together with other orchards, arable land and marshland situated abutting the road from Tonge Church, opposite Chekes Court, and adjoining the last lot on the south-west side, and comprising about seventeen acres of prolific cherry orchards, four acres of standard apples, seven acres of arable and 13½ acres of pasture and marshland, in all forty-one acres, one rood, thirty-six perches (more or less) . . . The cherries are in their prime and crop exceptionally well even in unfavourable years . . . The varieties include about fourteen acres cherries: Early River, Governor Wood, Circassian, Frogmore, Roundel, Waterloo, Amber and Napoleon, interplanted with a few bush plums."

Vacant possession was to be given on completion, and the sale was, as the particulars show, "inclusive of this year's fruit crop." The date of completion was June 12, 1942, and the conveyance of that date shows that the property was conveyed to the taxpayer for the sum of £5,500 paid by him. He also paid to the vendor, under the conditions of sale, the sum of £194 10*s.* 3*d.*, the usual valuation payable by an incoming tenant for unexhausted manurial values and the like, which included the value of work done in the orchard, namely, spraying and artificial manures. In accordance with custom, the taxpayer was allowed to enter on the land as soon as he had paid his deposit. He had a man in the orchard to scare birds, he began to pick the cherries on May 25, and finished picking in about six weeks. From this it would appear that none of the cherries was ready for picking for more than three weeks after the date of the sale by auction, and some of them were not picked until the first week in July. There were, as the particulars show, a number of different varieties. He sold the cherries for £2,903, and that sum was duly brought into his profit and loss account as a trading receipt. He claims to set against that a sum of £2,500 which, he says, was the amount paid by him for the cherries, and included in the sum of £5,500. In the profit and loss account as delivered there appears as a debit the sum of £2,694 10*s.* 3*d.* being the amount of £2,500 and the further sum of £194 10*s.* 3*d.*, as to which last-mentioned item there was no dispute.

The facts on which the taxpayer bases his claim appear sufficiently from the facts as found in paras. 2 and 3 of the stated Case. Paragraph 2 says:

> "The respondent [taxpayer] has been engaged in trade as a fruit grower and fruit salesman for upwards of thirty years, and, inter alia, has been accustomed to buying fruit on trees for the purpose of selling it after it had been picked. In April, 1942, he learnt that a property known as Chekes Court, Tonge, was to be sold by auction on May 1, 1942. He was interested in purchasing part of this property known as the King's Orchard. There is attached hereto marked 'A' a copy of the auction particulars wherein the King's Orchard was shown as part of Lot 2. The particulars stated that Lot 2 was to be sold with vacant possession on completion and inclusive of the year's fruit crop. The fruit trees in the orchard comprised seventeen acres of cherry trees and four acres of apples out of a total acreage in Lot 2 of about forty-one acres, the remainder comprising pasture and marshland."

Paragraph 3 states:

> "The respondent visited the orchard on two occasions prior to the sale with a friend who was, like himself, well acquainted with the value of fruit, > but who has since died, and inspected the fruit trees carefully. He and the friend made a careful and detailed valuation of the cherries on the trees on the basis of their value to a purchaser in the respondent's position, i.e., of a person intending to pick them and sell them at a profit. The cherries were an exceptionally fine crop that year and nearly ripe for picking, and the valuation so arrived at was £2,500. He also valued the land at £3,210 on the following basis."

The paragraph goes on to say how he arrived at the total valuation of £5,710.

The submission made before the commissioners on behalf of the taxpayer is stated in para. 9 of the Case in this way :

> "It was contended on behalf of the [taxpayer] that in computing his profits he was entitled to charge the sum of £2,500 being the purchase price of the cherries sold for £2,903, which sum had been brought into credit as a trading receipt. It was contended that such cherries in the state of maturity at which they were at the date of the sale did not form part of the land bought, being fructus industriales and not fructus naturales. Even however if that were not so and if the cherries did form part of the land he was entitled, on making up his accounts upon proper commercial principles, to charge the sum of £2,500 as their cost."

The contention on behalf of the Crown may be stated as appearing in para. 10 of the Case in this way :

> "(1) the cherries were fructus naturales, and were not chattels, but formed part of the land," and (3) "the respondent in buying Lot 2 had bought land inclusive of cherries and the purchase was a single operation resulting in the acquisition of a single capital asset."

The decision of the Special Commissioners was in favour of the taxpayer. It is expressed in para. 11 of the Case as follows :

> "The respondent is a fruit grower and dealer in fruit. In the period under appeal he sold certain cherries for £2,903. That sum has to come as a credit into his profit and loss account as a trader. We have to decide what can be set against that sum as the cost of the cherries, which were acquired in the same period. It was argued by the Crown that he was not entitled to set anything against the price he obtained except the sum of £194 10*s*. 3*d*. which he has to pay to the vendor by way of tenant right, and that he was not entitled to set off any part of the £5,500 paid for the orchard because that was the purchase price of the freehold of which the cherries formed a part, the purchase of the freehold being a capital transaction. The argument has the merit of simplicity but in our view it fails. In the first place we are not satisfied on the authorities quoted that the cherries growing on the trees in the present case were part of the freehold. We hold that they were fructus industriales and accordingly did not form part of the freehold. Even, however, if we are wrong upon this and the cherries did form part of the freehold, this does not, in our judgment, conclude the matter. What we have to decide is the correct accountancy principles to be applied in computing the profits of the respondent's trade, and we hold that under such principles the respondent was entitled to set against the sale price of the cherries that part of the £5,500 which was paid for them when they were in ripe condition. We are satisfied, on the evidence, that the respondent bid for two things, the land and the ripe cherries. We consider that this is borne out by the words in the auction particulars 'inclusive of this year's fruit crop.' These words make it plain that the vendor was selling prime cherries as well as land. The respondent for his part would not have bid > nearly as much as he did for the orchard if there had been no ripe fruit on the trees. We accordingly hold that the respondent is entitled to set against the sale price of the cherries some part of the £5,500 which he paid. It is not easy to determine what price was paid for the cherries, since an inclusive price was paid for them and for the land; but the respondent's evidence, which has not been seriously challenged, was that he was ready to pay £5,710, of which £2,500 was for the cherries. In the event he paid £5,500. We hold that the respondent is entitled to deduct as the cost price of the cherries a sum equal to 5500/5710 of £2,500 and we leave the figures of the assessment to be agreed on this basis."

On the facts, there was no evidence to show that there were any ripe cherries on the trees on May 1, the date of the sale by auction. Indeed, picking did not commence until more than three weeks later. The commissioners' finding may be summarised in this way. They held (i) that the cherries growing on the trees were fructus industriales; (ii) that the taxpayer bid for two things, the land and the cherries, and that, on correct accountancy principles, he was entitled to deduct the amount he had paid for the cherries as distinct from that which he had paid for the land. CROOM-JOHNSON, J., allowed the appeal against the decision of the Special Commissioners, and held that the taxpayer was not entitled to deduct any part of the purchase price.

The appeal, which was argued before us, was in reference to the assessment to excess profits tax for a period from Apr. 1 to Sept. 26, 1942. For this purpose, profits are to be computed on income tax principles in an endeavour to ascertain the profits or gains arising or accruing from the trade which was being carried on by the taxpayer. We were referred in particular to r. 3 (f) of the Rules Applicable to Cases I and II of sched. D of the Income Tax Act, 1918. Counsel for the taxpayer submitted that the taxpayer was carrying on two businesses—one, that of a fruit grower, and the other, that of a fruit salesman, and that in the one he was entitled to deduct the cost of growing, while in the other he was entitled to deduct the cost of buying cherries for sale, and the commissioners had found that the cost of buying these cherries was around £2,500. Consequently, he claimed that the taxpayer was entitled to deduct the amount so found. He relied on the finding of the commissioners at the beginning of para. 2 of the Case Stated:

> "The respondent has been engaged in trade as a fruit grower and fruit salesman for upwards of thirty years, and, inter alia, has been accustomed to buying fruit on trees for the purposes of selling it after it had been picked."

The obstacles in the way of this submission are twofold: (a) The taxpayer was not carrying on two businesses. There were, perhaps, two aspects of one business. He rendered one profit and loss account. If he had had two businesses, he could have claimed a separate assessment, and r. 13 might have been brought into play. If that had been done, the result might well have been that he as the grower (the buyer of the freehold) would have had to show the cherries as sold to himself as the salesman. (b) There was no separate purchase of the cherries as such. The freehold was acquired for the sum of £5,500. There were cherry trees on the land, and some cherries were showing signs of ripening, though none of them was ripe at the date of the sale by auction.

A number of authorities was cited to us, but it is unnecessary to refer to more than two of them. The first is Usher's Wiltshire Brewery, Ltd. v. Bruce (1) and, in particular, the words of LORD PARKER ([1915] A.C. 458):

> "The expression 'balance of profits and gains' implies, as has often been pointed out, something in the nature of a credit and debit account, in which the receipts appear on the one side and the costs and expenditure necessary > for earning these receipts appear on the other side. Indeed, without such account it would be impossible to ascertain whether there were really any profits on which the tax could be assessed. But the rule proceeds to provide that the duty 'shall be assessed, charged, and paid without other deductions than is hereinafter allowed.'"

The other authority is Hughes v. British Burmah Petroleum Co., Ltd. (2). In A that case Finlay, J., said (17 Tax Cas. 295) :

> "There is no doubt about the law on this matter. The difficulty, of course, is to apply it to the varying facts of different cases."

Then the learned judge dealt, quite shortly and most usefully, with a number of authorities beginning with Coltness Iron Co. v. Black (3) and ending with B British Insulated and Helsby Cables v. Atherton (4). After citing the words of Lord Cave ([1926] A.C. 213) in the latter case, Finlay, J., said (17 Tax Cas. 296) :

> "Various tests have been proposed ; that [the test laid down by Lord Cave] is the latest and the most authoritative. But whatever test exactly C one applies, one always, I think, has to get back to this—one has to look at the facts and say : Was this a capital expenditure ? Was it an expenditure which resulted in the addition of an asset to the business which was to be used for the working of that business, or was it in truth simply a revenue expenditure—that is to say, an expenditure to buy stock to be turned over in the business ?" D

It is true to say that, if arrangements of a different kind had been made, the taxpayer might have been in a better position. If he had bought the growing cherries first and acquired the freehold later, he might not have had so great a liability to tax. The question, however, is not how he arrived at the value of that for which he decided to bid, nor is it what he thought he was buying. As E counsel for the Crown submitted : "Whatever he went to buy, or thought he was buying, is immaterial." Regard must be had to the contract, to the conditions, and to the conveyance. When that is done, it is clear that the taxpayer was acquiring a capital asset. On the lot which he acquired there were cherry trees, and there were some cherries on those trees. The purchaser, in those circumstances, cannot be heard to say afterwards : "I paid £2,500 for F the cherries and £3,000 for the land." That was not the transaction between the parties, nor was it the bargain. If it had been the bargain, the vendor might have become subject to tax on the £2,500 as part of his profits as grower. No doubt, he was advised as to the position, and he determined to sell, and sold, the freehold before the cherries were ripe. I am wholly satisfied that it would be wrong to go behind the documents in this case, otherwise there would be no finality. However one looks at it, the £5,500 can only be regarded as payment G by way of capital, and no part of it can be deducted to arrive at the profits or gains of the taxpayer.

On the argument of counsel for the taxpayer, it was immaterial whether the cherries growing on the trees were to be regarded as fructus industriales, as the commissioners found, or as fructus naturales. Counsel relied on the finding that the cherries were fructus industriales, coupled with the further finding that H the taxpayer had paid the sum of £2,500, or thereabouts, for them. This, he submitted, was an end of the case, and the finding of the commissioners ought to be restored. The submission was based on the right at common law to emblements in certain cases. In Halsbury, Hailsham Edn., vol. 1, p. 401, para. 675, it is put in this way :

> "The right to 'emblements' is a right given to one who has an estate > of uncertain duration, which is unexpectedly determined without any fault on his part, to take the crops growing upon the land when his estate determined. Emblements extend only to such produce as grows by the industry and manurance of man, and to one crop only of that produce ; and are confined to a crop of that species only which ordinarily repays the labour by which it is produced within the year in which that labour is bestowed. Hops, however, fall within the doctrine of emblements."

It is right to say that the crop was cultivated to the extent of manuring and spraying the trees, but no case can be found in which fruit growing on trees has been held to be fructus industriales. The most useful authority on the point is probably Graves v. Weld (5) where it was recognised, both in argument and in the judgment of Denman, C.J., that fruit trees did not come within the designation. The Chief Justice, quoting the observations of Lord Coke (Co. Litt. 55a) said (5 B. & Ad. 119) :

> " . . . ' the reason of this is, for that the estate of the lessee is uncertaine, and, therefore, lest the ground should be unmanured, which should be hurtful to the commonwealth, he shall reap the crop which he sowed in peace, albeit the lessor doth determine his will before it be ripe. And so it is if he set rootes or sow hempe or flax, or any other annual profit, if after the same be planted, the lessor oust the lessee ; or if the lessee dieth, yet he or his executors shall have that yeare's crop. But if he plant young fruit trees, or young oaks, ashes, elms, &c., or sow the ground with acornes, &c., there the lessor may put him out notwithstanding, because they will yield no present annuall profit '."

In Evans v. Roberts (6) Bayley, J. (5 B. & C. 835), says :

> " In Tidd's Practice, p. 1039, it is laid down that under a fieri facias the sheriff may sell fructus industriales, as corn growing, which goes to the executor, or fixtures which may be removed by the tenant ; but not furnaces or apples upon trees, which belong to the freehold, and go to the heir."

It is sufficient for this purpose to repeat that no case can be found in which fruit growing on trees has been treated as fructus industriales.

Counsel for the taxpayer referred to the definition of " goods " in the Sale of Goods Act, 1893. Section 62 provides :

> " ' Goods ' include all chattels personal other than things in action and money, and in Scotland all corporeal moveables except money. The term includes emblements, industrial growing crops, and things attached to or forming part of the land which are agreed to be severed before sale or under the contract of sale."

He recognised, I think, that the facts of a case such as this present difficulties as to when the property in the fruit passed. The short answer to the point under the Sale of Goods Act is that the Act has no application to a sale of land, which this was. I find myself unable to agree with counsel's submission, or with the finding of the commissioners, having regard to the authorities which were cited to us. In my opinion, the judgment of Croom-Johnson, J., was right, and this appeal should be dismissed.

JENKINS, L.J. : I agree. It is a well settled principle that outlay on the purchase of an income-bearing asset is in the nature of capital outlay, and no part of the capital so laid out can, for income tax purposes, be set off as expenditure against income accruing from the asset in question. This principle holds good even in the case of a wasting asset, such as a coal mine, the income from which is literally produced by the consumption of the capital asset itself. A fortiori does it apply in the case of a capital asset such as an orchard of fruit trees which, subject to periodical replacement of casualties among the trees and the usual attention in the form of pruning, spraying, manuring, and so on, constitutes what may be described as a permanent source of income. The learned judge cited some of the leading cases by which this principle has been established. I need not refer to them again, as the validity of the principle, which applies A equally to excess profits tax as to income tax, is not challenged. The question at issue is simply whether it is excluded by the special circumstances of the present case. The Special Commissioners held in effect that the principle was excluded in the present case on two grounds. First, they held that the cherries were fructus industriales as opposed to fructus naturales. As to that finding, in my judgment, it is clearly wrong in law. When the authorities are looked B into (and Singleton, L.J., has referred to some of them), it is abundantly plain that fruit growing on trees has never been regarded as fructus industriales. A clear contrast has always been drawn between those crops which, broadly speaking, are produced in the year by the labour of the year, and crops such as fruit growing on trees, where the productive act is the planting of the trees, and where the fruit is produced by the trees year after year, primarily as the C result of that initial productive act.

There is one other authority, in addition to those mentioned by Singleton, L.J., to which I should like to refer, namely, Latham v. Atwood (7). The question there concerned hops, and the court held (Cro. Car. 515)

> " . . . that they are like emblements, which shall go to the husband or D executor of the tenant for life, and not to him in remainder ; and are not to be compared to apples or nuts, which grow of themselves. Wherefore adjudged for the plaintiff."

That was a clear statement, in effect, that apples or nuts were not to be considered as fructus industriales. The case of hops, which in Latham v. Atwood (7) were held to be fructus industriales—and one may add the case of teazles which arose E in Kingsbury v. Collins & Elmes (8) referred to in Graves v. Weld (5) (5 B. & Ad. 120)—are, if anything, in the nature of extension of the general rule due to the fact that, although the cultivation or growing of the crop is not confined to the year—for example, hops grow from permanent roots—yet so much of the growth and so much of the attention takes place year by year that apparently it was thought right to treat them as fructus industriales. In my judgment, therefore, F this first ground on which the Special Commissioners have found in favour of the taxpayer can be shortly dismissed by saying that clearly, on the authorities, the cherries in the present case were not fructus industriales.

The matter does not rest there, for, even if the cherries were fructus industriales, it by no means follows that the consequence adduced by the commissioners would have flowed from that circumstance. The distinction, G as I understand it, between fructus naturales and fructus industriales is one which arises, or used to arise, between the executor and the heir, between the life tenant and the remainderman, and between the agricultural tenant and his landlord. Under the old law when a man died intestate his freeholds went to his heir and his personalty went to his executor. In such a case, where he had planted an annual crop it was considered that, inasmuch as he was prevented from recouping H himself for his toil by the accident of death, justice demanded that the fruits of his labour and of his sowing should go to the executor and not to the heir. Similarly, as between tenant for life and remainderman, it was held that the tenant for life's estate should profit by the labour and manurance of the last year. Again, where agricultural tenancies are concerned, independently of any statutory regulation, it was obviously right and proper that the outgoing tenant should take his last crop, but it by no means follows that the distinction has the same materiality as between vendor and purchaser. When the owner in fee simple of a farm in hand sells for a like estate to a purchaser the common practice, of course, is for the contract to contain special provisions in regard to such things as growing crops, and, generally, they are either expressly reserved to the vendor with a right to gather them or the purchaser is required to take and pay for the crop when ripe at a valuation. Where, however, the contract is silent as to such matters, and there is simply an out and out sale of a farm in hand from an absolute owner to a purchaser, then, I apprehend, the crops in the ground, whether they be fructus industriales or fructus naturales, pass with the land in the ordinary way. It is, however, unnecessary to deal further with that aspect of the matter, for, in my judgment, this part of the case is shortly answered by saying that these cherries were fructus naturales.

The second ground on which the Special Commissioners found in favour of the taxpayer was that he bid for two things, first, the cherries, and, secondly, the land. In my judgment, there was no evidence on which the Special Commissioners could come to any such conclusion. The most the evidence showed was that the taxpayer, in consultation with a friend with whom he inspected the property before the sale, decided in his own mind that at the auction he would be prepared to go to £5,700, of which he regarded £2,500 as representing the price or value of the cherries and the balance as representing the price or value of the remainder of the property. That was no more than his own calculation by which he arrived at the price he was prepared to pay. In the result, he did not have to go to the full price of £5,700 which he had in mind as he succeeded in buying at the auction for only £5,500. That was not bidding for two different things. It was bidding for one thing on a calculation made by the purchaser for his own information as to the worth of what he would get if he bought it. What he did was to bid one entire price for the entire lot including the land, the trees, and the fruit on the trees. Moreover, he could not have bid for or purchased the property on any other terms under the particulars and conditions of sale governing the auction. What he was entitled to bid for was Lot 2 as a whole, and he bid for it as a whole and got it, and he paid for it as a whole. I think the express inclusion of "this year's fruit crop" in the conditions of sale was a matter the effect of which was misapprehended by the Special Commissioners. They seem to have regarded these words as suggesting that "this year's fruit crop" was a separate item of sale. In my judgment, that is wrong. I think the express inclusion of "this year's fruit crop" only meant that the vendor was not to be entitled, as he otherwise would have been entitled, to pick, in the ordinary course of husbandry, say, fruit which might become ripe between the date of the contract and the date of completion. It did not make the fruit a separate subject of sale at all. It merely precluded the vendor from exercising that ordinary right. So far from suggesting that the fruit was a separate subject of sale, it seems to me that the express provision to the effect that "this year's fruit crop" was to be included emphasised the fact that the fruit was being sold and would be bought as a part of the land. Accordingly, in my judgment, the Special Commissioners erred on both these grounds and came to a wrong conclusion.

In the argument before us, counsel for the taxpayer developed a third ground on which he sought to support the Special Commissioners' decision, and that was this. Pointing to the facts as found in the Case Stated, he said that the taxpayer was carrying on two businesses, the one being that of a fruit grower and the other that of a fruit salesman and dealer. He said the acquistion of the cherries was a transaction carried out by the taxpayer in his capacity as a salesman or dealer, and not in his capacity as a grower. The short answer to that submission is that there was no evidence to support it. The Special Commissioners never found that he was carrying on two separate businesses. Their finding clearly is to the effect that he was carrying on one business with two aspects, that of growing and that of selling and dealing. His business, no doubt, included providing himself with fruit by means of purchasing it as well as by means of growing it, but it was not two businesses. It was one business. Even, however, if it were right to say that the taxpayer was carrying on two businesses, I do not think the consequences claimed by counsel would have ensued at all. It is clear that, for income tax purposes, a man cannot treat himself as carrying on two businesses and divide one entire transaction, such as the purchase of Lot 2 in the present case, into two transactions, and say : "I bought part of this in my capacity as a person carrying on one business, and the other part in my capacity as a person carrying on another business." The assumption, if made, must be carried, in my judgment, to its logical conclusion. If that were done, the position would be this. The grower would have acquired the cherries as part of a capital asset. That is admitted. When the cherries were ripe and were picked, he himself would have to be regarded as selling them to the dealer or salesman. So far as tax was concerned, the grower would be entitled to be allowed no more in the shape of expenditure in respect of the cherries than the £194 10*s.* 3*d.* for tillage, and so forth, which is admittedly a proper expense. No doubt, the dealer or salesman would be able to deduct the price he paid to the grower as an expense of his trade, but the tax would have been paid on the basis here claimed as tax in respect of the business of the grower. Accordingly, in my judgment, counsel's contention about there being two businesses fails. It was an ingenious attempt to make bricks without straw, and to construct a position for which there was no foundation in the actual facts as stated by the Special Commissioners.

At first sight this case seemed to me, and I think also to my brethren, as, in a sense, a hard one, because it looked as if the taxpayer had blundered by carrying out the transaction in the least advantageous way to himself from the tax point of view when he might easily have done what would have been in substance the same thing in a different way by buying the cherries separately from the land simply by a modification in the form of the transaction, but, on further consideration, that first impression does not seem to me to be justified. One has to remember that this transaction concerned not merely the taxpayer, but also the vendor of the orchard. The taxpayer was able to buy the orchard complete with the cherries from the vendor, and according to his own calculation, the amount of the purchase price represented by the value of the cherries was £2,500. It by no means follows that, if he had been minded to buy the cherries from the vendor apart from the land, as a separate transaction, the vendor would have been willing to sell them to him for £2,500, or some such price. The difference is obviously a material one from the vendor's point of view, because, dealing with the matter as he did, he was selling a capital asset, and the resulting capital receipt prima facie would attract no tax. If he had sold the cherries separately in the way of trade, he would at once have created an income receipt on which prima facie tax would have been exigible. Therefore, the alteration in the form of the bargain required to make it more favourable to the taxpayer from the tax point of view would have involved an alteration, not merely of form, but of substance, owing to its adverse effect on the tax situation of the vendor, and it cannot be assumed that the bargain thus altered would have been one to which the taxpayer would have received the vendor's agreement. Therefore, in my judgment, this is a case in which it cannot justifiably be said that there is anything unreasonable in making the liability to tax depend on the actual transaction as actually carried out, and on the bargain as it in fact stood between the vendor and the taxpayer. For these reasons, I agree that the learned judge was right in reversing the decision of the Special Commissioners, and that the appeal fails and should be dismissed.

TUCKER, L.J. : In my view, this appeal fails, for two reasons which I can state in a very few words. The foundation of the argument of counsel for the taxpayer was that the taxpayer carried on two businesses, the business of fruit grower and salesman and the business of fruit dealer. He conceded that, if the taxpayer's business was simply that of a fruit grower, his case would fail, as this clearly would have been the purchase of a capital income-bearing asset. The answer to this contention is that there is no such finding in the Case. There is no sign of such a point ever having been taken before the Special Commissioners, or, for that matter, before CROOM-JOHNSON, J. So, in my view, the very foundation of counsel's argument has no substance in it. I think the case is on all fours with the decision in Kauri Timber Co. v. Commissioner of Taxes (9). Our attention was drawn to a passage from the judgment of LORD SHAW therein where, after referring to the objects of the company in its memorandum, he added ([1913] A.C. 755) :

> "It is apparent from this description that, so far as the company was concerned, it is a mistake to treat it as if its objects were merely the carrying on of a timber merchant's business."

In the present case, I express no opinion—it is not necessary to do so—as to what the position might have been had the taxpayer been a dealer in fruit and nothing else. Different considerations possibly would have arisen in such circumstances, but that is not this case. The argument addressed to us by counsel with regard to fructus industriales and the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, similarly fails, for it presupposes that there was, in fact, a separate sale of the fruit from the land. In my view, there was no such thing. It is clear on the documents that this was simply a sale and conveyance of land which carried with it the fruit trees and the fruit on the trees. I am in complete agreement with what has been said by my brethren with regard to the point as to fructus industriales and fructus naturales. It is far too late to argue now that cherry trees are fructus industriales. For these reasons, and for the reasons given by my brethren, I agree that these three appeals fail, because they are all governed by the point with which we have been dealing.

Appeals dismissed with costs.

SOLLE v. BUTCHER.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Bucknill, Denning and Jenkins, L.JJ.), October 24, 25, 26, November 25, 1949.]

Rent Restriction—Standard rent—Change of identity of dwelling-house—Reconstruction of war damaged dwelling-house—Question of fact whether premises so altered as to become a new dwelling—Garage not previously forming part of the demise included in the letting—Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920 (c. 17), s. 1 (1); s. 12 (1) (a).

Mistake—Mistake of fact—Mistake whether a dwelling-house had been so substantially altered as to become a new and separate dwelling under the Rent Restrictions Acts—Estoppel.

In 1947 the landlord acquired a long lease of a war-damaged house which in 1939 had been let in flats subject to the Rent Restrictions Acts. The landlord carried out repairs and alterations to the house, in the course of which he re-constructed the flat the subject of the present proceedings. The alterations left the outside and cubic capacity of the house and of the flat in question unchanged, the only substantial change made to the flat being the removal of inner walls so as to subtract from a bedroom a space which was then incorporated into the dining-room. During the course of the work the parties discussed whether the flat when rebuilt A would be subject to the standard rent fixed by the 1939 letting, and they came to the conclusion that it would not, the tenant expressing that opinion. The standard rent of the flat in 1939 was £140 a year, and if the reconstructed flat were the same dwelling it would have been possible to increase the rent in respect of expenditure on improvements, in accordance with s. 2 (1) of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest B (Restrictions) Act, 1920, as amended by the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1939, sched. I, to approximately £250, by serving the necessary notices of increase. On Sept. 29, 1947, on completion of the work, the landlord let the flat, including a garage which had not formed part of the 1939 demise, to the tenant on a lease for seven years at a rent of £250 a year, but, being under the impression that the rent C fixed by the 1939 letting had no application to the re-constructed flat, he served no notice of increase. The tenant paid rent at £250 a year for some time and then took proceedings in the county court for a declaration that the standard rent of the flat was £140 a year and that he was entitled to recover from the landlord the amount overpaid since the commencement of the tenancy. The landlord contended that the alterations were such that D the flat had become a new and separate dwelling by reason of change of identity, but the county court judge found as a fact that the flat was not a new and separate dwelling. The landlord further contended that the lease should be rescinded as it had been entered into under a mutual mistake of fact.

Held: (i) the structural alterations and improvements were not such E as to destroy the identity of the flat as let in 1939, and the inclusion of the garage had no material effect on its identity.

Langford Property Co., Ltd. v. Batten ([1949] 2 All E.R. 422), applied.

(ii) (Jenkins, L.J. dissentiente) on the evidence, the parties had addressed their minds to the material issue of identity of the new flat, and their mistake or common misapprehension as to whether the flat had been so F altered as to destroy its identity was a mistake of fact, and the landlord was entitled to have the lease set aside in equity on such terms as the court thought fit.

Cooper v. Phibbs (1867) (L.R. 2 H.L. 149), applied.

Observations of Atkin, L.J., in Phillips v. Barnett ([1922] 1 K.B. 227) and of Lord Campbell, L.C., in Wilde v. Gibson, (1843), 1 H.L. Cas. 605, G explained.

Angel v. Jay ([1911] 1 K.B. 666), criticised by Denning, L.J.

Per Jenkins, L.J.: "The parties knew all the material facts bearing on the effect of the Rent Restrictions Acts on a lease of those premises, but they materially misapprehended the effect which in that state of facts those Acts would have on such a lease. That is a mistake of law of a kind H which, so far as I am aware, has never yet been held to afford good ground for rescission. Any misrepresentation shown to have been made by the tenant must be taken to have been an innocent misrepresentation, and it has been repeatedly held that an innocent misrepresentation affords no sufficient ground for rescission after completion, and there is authority for the view that this applies to a lease no less than to a conveyance: see Angel v. Jay (supra) and cases there cited. The effect of the imperative terms of s. 1 (1) of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, is not only that the excess of the contractual rent over the permitted rent is irrecoverable even if the parties have expressly agreed that it should be recoverable notwithstanding the Act, but also that the excess is irrecoverable even if the parties, whether through total ignorance of the legislation, or through misapprehension of its effect, believed that the full contractual rent would be, and intended that it should be, legally recoverable.

(iii) the tenant was not estopped by conduct from asserting that the control by virtue of the pre-war letting relieved him from his obligation to pay the landlord £250 a year as reserved by the lease, for no rule of estoppel could oust the jurisdiction of the court to decide whether the rent claimed in respect of a dwelling-house infringed the provisions of the Rent Restrictions Act.

APPEAL by the landlord from an order of His Honour JUDGE SIR GERALD HURST, K.C., made at Bromley County Court on May 11, 1949, declaring E that the standard rent of Flat No. 1, Maywood House, Beckenham, was £140 per annum, and that the tenant was entitled to recover under the Rent Restrictions Acts from the landlord £137 10*s*., rent overpaid. The county court judge dismissed the landlord's counter-claim for rescission of the lease on the ground of mutual mistake of fact, holding that the mistake, which was whether or not the property was within the Rent Restrictions Acts, was one of law and not F of fact. The landlord appealed against the order for repayment of £137 10*s*. and against the dismissal of his claim for rescission of the lease, and the Court of Appeal (JENKINS, L.J., dissentiente) allowed the appeal, ordering rescission of the lease on terms and reversing the order for repayment of £137 10*s*.

Levy, K.C., and Alan Campbell for the landlord. G

J. Comyn for the tenant.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 25. The following judgments were read.

BUCKNILL, L.J. : This is an appeal from a judgment of His Honour JUDGE SIR GERALD HURST, K.C., in favour of the tenant, the plaintiff, Godfrey Frank Solle. The judge decided that the standard rent of Flat No. 1, Maywood H House, Beckenham, of which the tenant was in occupation, and the defendant, Charles Butcher, was the landlord, was £140 per annum. The judge also decided that the tenant was entitled to recover the sum of £137 10*s*., in respect of overpayments in rent for the flat, from the landlord.

The issues in the case and points raised thereon are set out in the pleadings. According to the particulars of claim Flat No. 1 was let to one, Howard Taylor, at a yearly rental of £140 by a tenancy agreement dated July 22, 1938, and made between Howard Taylor, as tenant, and Florence Burnell, as landlord. Then it was alleged that the same premises were let to the present tenant by the present landlord from Sept. 29, 1947, for a term of seven years at a yearly rental of £250. It was alleged that the standard rent of the flat was £140, and that the tenant had paid to the landlord £137 10*s.* as rent in excess of that standard rent. The landlord alleged that Maywood House had been severely damaged by enemy action during the 1939-1945 war, and rendered uninhabitable, and that during the years 1946-47 was re-built and/or re-constructed, repaired, altered and improved by the landlord in accordance with plans, the contents of which were well known to the tenant. Then the landlord alleged that he granted the lease to the tenant on the oral assurance made by him that the rent of £250 was in no way controlled by any pre-war damage letting of Maywood House. He denied that the premises were controlled by virtue of any pre-war damage letting, but in the alternative contended, inter alia, that the tenant was estopped by his conduct from asserting that any such control relieved him of his personal obligation to pay the rent of £250. By way of counter-claim the landlord asserted that the lease was entered into in circumstances amounting to a mutual mistake of both the tenant and landlord, and asked for rescission of the lease.

The material facts were as follows. The tenant, who is a surveyor, became a partner with the landlord in a business as estate agents in 1947, and about that time introduced the landlord to the representative of the head lessor of Maywood House. That house, which was built originally as a private house, had been converted into five flats in 1931. In 1939 the five flats were let for a gross annual rental of £625 per annum, the flat which is the subject of this action being let to Mr. Taylor for three years at a rent of £140. In consequence of a land-mine exploding near the house considerable damage was done to it, and in 1947 it was unoccupied. In that year the landlord took a long lease of the house with the intention of repairing the war damage and doing substantial alterations to the flats. There was a good deal of dispute between the tenant and the landlord as to what part the tenant took in connection with this scheme of the landlord. The learned judge said in his judgment that he in general preferred the landlord's evidence to the tenant's evidence, and I have taken as proved the landlord's version of these disputed facts except where the judge has found in favour of the tenant. The landlord said in his evidence that he discussed with the tenant the rents to be charged for the flats when re-constructed, and he also discussed with the tenant the pre-war lettings of the flat as set out in a document supplied by the previous owners of the house which contained the statement as to the lease of the flat to Mr. Taylor for £140. The landlord, who was managing director of a limited company carrying on business as builders under the style of C. F. Butcher & Co., Ltd., who were engaged on the work, discussed with the tenant the repairs and alterations to be done to the building and to this flat, and the tenant said he would obtain legal advice whether the flat would be outside the Rent Restrictions Acts as regards the standard rent because of the improvements which the landlord proposed to make. The landlord said he relied on the tenant on this subject of rents, and that the tenant raised the question with him as to the standard rent and said: "Be careful because it may be within the Rent Acts." Later, the tenant produced an opinion from counsel on the point, and read it to the landlord. This opinion was not produced in court. It is clear, however, from the evidence of the landlord that he and the tenant were both satisfied that the previous rent of £140 per year did not apply as the standard rent. The landlord also said that because he was satisfied on this point he did not take any action to calculate the permitted increases to the standard rent which he would be entitled to make under s. 2 (a) of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, as amended by sched. I to the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1939, in respect of the work which he proposed to do to the flat.

Dealing now with the work done to the house, it appears from the landlord's evidence that he spent £6,420 for repair of war damage. This damage appears to have been mainly to the outer walls of one side of the house, and on some of the interior party walls. As regards the alterations made to this flat itself they consisted mainly of the cutting away of two broken walls which formed the south end of the main bedroom and the north end of the living room. These walls having been cut away, the weight of the structure overhead was taken by A steel joists, and further to compensate for the removal of the walls some underpinning was done in the cellar beneath them. Between these two walls in the original plan of the flat there was a small space which contained a cupboard and another transverse brick wall, and this brick wall was also removed. The net result of that work, which was difficult and expensive, was to subtract from the south end of the main bedroom a space which was then incorporated into B the dining room so as to form part of a dining recess at the north end of the living room, a space which was further increased by incorporation of the space previously occupied by the passage and the cupboard. That was the only substantial alteration made to the flat. Some wooden partitions were put into another bedroom to make a small box-room, and two cupboards were put into a third bedroom. Electric fires were put in three or four places, and the hot water C system of the whole building was improved.

On the first issue whether this was the same building after these alterations had been made, I find a statement in Megarry on the Rent Acts, 4th ed., at p. 27, which appears to me to sum up correctly the various decisions on the point. The statement refers to a general principle that, if a house within the Acts is subjected to such substantial structural alteration that it becomes a D new and separate dwelling-house in fact by reason of change of identity, the new premises shed all the attributes of the old. On this issue the learned judge in his judgment said :

> "The defendant's [the landlord's] case is that the flat was gravely injured in 1940, and has since been so restored, altered and re-constructed as to E destroy the identity of the dwelling-house. This is a question of fact. The alterations leave the outside and the cubic capacity of the house unchanged. They are not such as to increase the lettings or to accommodate more people. The boxroom is of slight importance. If the house had been damaged by enemy action the tenant would have claimed that the flat was still the same : Ellis & Sons Amalgamated Properties, Ltd. v. Sisman (1). F These alterations fall short of satisfying the test. The plans almost speak for themselves. The only changes in structure are (a) boxroom (a mere utilization of space) ; (b) two cupboards ; (c) fireplaces ; (d) transfer of recess from bedroom into dining room—simply a question of moving the partition—not fundamental—very minor. Landlord claims he spent £1,200. It is clear he spent about £1,000 on minor alterations and on G substantial decorations and amenities. It still remains the identical dwelling-house although decorated and beautified. Therefore, £140 is the standard rent."

Counsel on behalf of the landlord argued that the judge misdirected himself in at least two important particulars : First, Ellis & Sons Amalgamated Properties, Ltd. v. Sisman (1) had no bearing on the present point. That case H dealt with the right of the tenant of a house demolished by enemy action to claim his rights as a tenant of any building on the land unless those rights had been terminated by notice. The second alleged misdirection was in saying that the expensive and difficult task of removing brick walls and making the dining recess was simply a question of moving the partition. Although there is force in these contentions of counsel, the ultimate question which this court has to decide is whether the work done, which I have mentioned, was of such a nature as to come within the general principle to which I have referred. It seems to me that in all essential respects this flat was the same as the flat which was let to Mr. Taylor in 1937.

There is, however, one other point to which I must refer, and that is the question of the garage. There is a room in the north-west corner of the flat, part of the main building and next to the maids' room. This room formed a garage at the time when Mr. Taylor took the flat, but his lease makes no mention of any garage. It appears from the evidence of Mr. Burnell and also of Mrs. Burnell, who granted the lease to Mr. Taylor, that it had been the practice for years to include the right to use the garage by the tenant of the flat. Mr. Burnell in his evidence said :

> " I think Taylor had a car. Not certain whether he used the garage, but could have used it if he wanted it. Five garages and each tenant also held a garage, although garage not mentioned in their agreements. The garage went with the flat."

In the lease granted to the tenant by the landlord there is a special demise of the garage apportioned to the flat. It was argued by counsel for the landlord that the fact that the tenant had this demise of the garage tended to strengthen his argument that the property demised to the tenant was substantially different from the property demised to Taylor. The point was taken before the county court judge who dealt with it in this way :

> " The fact that the letting of the flat in 1939 did not, at any rate, in terms include the garage is immaterial if the identity of the flat is essentially unchanged. It may well be that the garage did not form part of the original letting. It was not proved to my satisfaction that it was included. It is left as an open matter."

It seems to me that on this point about the garage this court must follow the decision of the Court of Appeal in Langford Property Co., Ltd. v. Batten (2). In that case a flat which came within the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1939, was let at £135 per annum in 1939, and a garage in the vicinity of the flat was let to a different tenant at 5*s.* per week. In 1946 the flat and the garage were let by a single lease at a rent of £175 per annum. In proceedings to determine the standard rent of the premises it was held that the garage fell to be treated as part of the dwelling-house, and, accordingly, the standard rent of the dwelling-house, including the flat and garage, was £135 per annum. On this point, while recognising that this court was bound by the decision of the Court of Appeal in Langford Property Co., Ltd. v. Batten (2), counsel for the landlord relied on a passage of TUCKER, L.J., in Hemns v. Wheeler (3), where the same point was dealt with as arose in the Langford Property case (2). TUCKER, L.J., said ([1948] 2 K.B. 67) :

> " The dwelling-house remains the same, and it is, in my view, erroneous to say that this dwelling-house was not let in August, 1914, merely because a piece of land has been added. Looked at in this way, Vaughan v. Shaw (4), and R. & P. Properties, Ltd. v. Baldwin (5), cited by Mr. Blundell do not, I think, really afford us any assistance. For these reasons I think that this appeal fails ; but, in so deciding, I desire to make it plain that I am not saying that the addition of a piece of land in connection with structural alterations and improvements is not a relevant matter to be taken into consideration, as I think it was by the county court judge in the present case, on the issue of fact as to the identity of the dwelling-house."

It seems to me that on the particular facts of this case the demise of this garage had no material effect on the identity of the flat. In my judgment, therefore, the learned judge was right in his conclusion that the standard rent of this house is £140 per annum, plus such additions to the rent as the landlord is entitled to make under the Rent Acts in respect of alterations and improvements thereto.

I will now deal with another question, namely, whether in all the circumstances this court should order a rescission of the contract on the ground of mutual mistake of fact. The importance of this point to the parties is very considerable. The lease in question is for seven years from Sept. 29, 1947, and, if the rent is to be solely the standard rent of £140, then the landlord will be debarred from recovering as rent those increases of rent permitted to him under s. 7 (4) of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1938—increases which the landlord asserted would bring the legally permissible rent up to £250. It is doubtless for this reason that the judge started his judgment by saying that he felt great sympathy with the landlord. He said :

> "I am satisfied that £250 is a fair and proper economic rent and that there are no merits in the case."

The judge, however, dismissed the landlord's claim for rescission of the contract for the following reasons. He found there was

> "no mistake of fact, possibly a mistake of law in that both parties for some obscure reason imagined that the Rent Acts did not apply. I do not think they ever addressed their minds to the material issue of identity."

As regards the first point, I think, with due respect to the learned judge, that the evidence strongly points to the fact that both tenant and landlord addressed their minds to the material issue of identity. It is true that the judge accepted the evidence of the tenant that he discovered in 1947 that the flat had previously been let in May, 1939, at a monthly rent of £11 13*s*. A receipt for rent for that amount by a fortunate accident came into his hands. But, assuming that the tenant did not know and had not troubled to inquire what the previous rent was, it seems to me that all the evidence tends to show that he knew that the flat had been previously let, and he must surely be taken to have known that the previous rent was prima facie the standard rent for a flat which, even when improved, was rated at £52 per annum, unless, indeed, it had been so altered as substantially to lose its identity. In addition to the evidence given by the landlord on the point to which I have already referred, there is strong evidence as to the tenant's knowledge which was given by the tenant himself. Thus, on Mar. 5, 1947, the tenant sent the drawings in connection with the proposed development of Maywood House to a firm for the purpose of obtaining a mortgage, and the plans, as the judge said, almost speak for themselves as showing that no substantial change to this flat was being contemplated such as would in substance make a new flat. The tenant in his evidence said that he questioned the landlord about the rents before the building was complete, pointing out that he and the landlord must have regard to the Rent Acts in relation to the plans, and that the landlord said he would take counsel's opinion on the point. He said that the question whether the rent of the flat was controlled by pre-damage rents never arose, and he and the landlord had no discussions whether it was controlled. He admitted reading to the landlord part of an opinion of counsel, but said it was not to show that the flat was not controlled by the pre-war rent, but was merely to show that regard must be had to the rent of the whole house before conversion. He said that he read this part of the opinion to show that it was not safe to assume that there was no standard rent. The tenant admitted that he told the landlord that his opinion was that the landlord could charge £250 rent and that there was no previous control. He frankly admitted that he was "taking advantage of our mistake to get the flat at £140 for seven years." It seems to me that a good deal of the tenant's evidence is inconsistent with the landlord's evidence, which the judge has said he accepted in preference to the tenant's. In addition to the evidence of the landlord and all the probabilities that the tenant knew what the pre-war rent was, there was the evidence of Mr. Barnard, the valuation officer of the Beckenham Borough Council. He said that he visited Maywood House in September, 1947, when the work was nearing completion, in order to make a new valuation. He saw the tenant and told him the pre-war assessment for this flat was £45, and he proposed to increase it to £52. He also said that he asked the tenant if he had considered that the building was controlled and that the tenant had said " No." The evidence establishes, to my mind, beyond any doubt that before the rent of £250 was fixed both the tenant and the landlord knew that the flat had been previously let for £140 per annum, but thought that there was no previous controlled rent by reason of the alterations made in 1947 and 1948 to the flat. I, therefore, do not agree with the view taken by the judge that the parties never addressed their minds to the issue of identity. It seems to me that the reason why they thought that the Rent Acts did not apply (as the judge said in his judgment) was, not obscure, but patent on the evidence, namely, that they made a mistake and thought the work done made such a substantial alteration as to make it in effect a different flat.

The second question then arises for decision : Was this mistake a question of fact or a question of law ? In my opinion, it was a question of fact, and the principle applies to this case which was laid down by LORD WESTBURY in his speech in Cooper v. Phibbs (6), where he said (L.R. 2 H.L. 170) :

> " . . . if parties contract under a mutual mistake and misapprehension as to their relative and respective rights, the result is, that that agreement is liable to be set aside as having proceeded upon a common mistake."

I agree with the opinion expressed by the learned judge in his judgment that it was a question of fact whether the flat had been so restored, altered and re-constructed as to destroy its identity. The point was discussed in Mitchell v. Barnes (7), a recent case in the Court of Appeal. That was an appeal from a decision of the judge as to the standard rent of certain premises, and one of the points taken by the plaintiff landlord was similar to the point in this case, namely, that the re-construction of the premises had altered their identity. The appeal was dismissed on the ground that there was evidence on which the trial judge could come to his conclusion. DENNING, L.J., in the course of his judgment, said ([1949] 2 All E.R. 721) :

> " If there was a substantial structural alteration so that the old dwelling-house changed its identity and two new dwelling-houses were in fact created, then, when the old dwelling-house ceased to exist, its standard rent would have fallen with it. On this point the county court judge went to see the premises himself . . . He found that there was no change of identity. The question of change of identity is primarily an inference to be drawn by the county court judge. If he has directed himself properly—as in this case he did—we can only interfere if it is quite plain that he has come to the wrong conclusion. It would be clearly unjust if a landlord, by making one or two comparatively small alterations—putting in a window, or a door, or a sink —could thereby get rid of the standard rent altogether. On the other hand, if he does a great deal of structural work he ought to be able to charge a new rent. It is a question of degree, and one primarily for the county court judge. It seems to me that in this case we cannot say he was so clearly wrong that we can interfere."

Phillips v. Barnett (8) was cited to us as authority for the proposition that the issue of change of identity was a matter of law and not of fact. In that case the defendant was the owner of three adjoining houses, which were each let at a different rent. When the houses became vacant, the defendant threw the three houses together and converted them into a factory and then let the premises to the plaintiffs, and the question was raised whether the factory was a different thing from the three houses of which it was comprised. The Divisional Court held that it was, and this decision was affirmed in the Court of Appeal. Bankes, L.J., in the course of his judgment, said ([1922] 1 K.B. 225) :

> " . . . the rights of the parties depend on the true inference to be drawn from the facts. The county court judge has not drawn the inference which alone could support his judgment and in my opinion there was no evidence from which he could have drawn that inference."

I think these words clearly indicate that Bankes, L.J., considered it to be a question of fact. Atkin, L.J., in the course of his judgment, said (ibid., 227) :

> " It is said that this question whether the original houses have lost their identity is a question of fact which must have been answered by the county court judge in favour of the appellants. In my opinion the question involves matter of law. As matter of law the only inference that can properly be drawn from the facts is that this building first came into existence when it was let to the appellants and is not identical with the houses . . . "

These words seem to me to mean no more than this, that it is a matter of law whether on the evidence only one inference can properly be drawn from the facts. In other words, it is a matter of law whether there is any evidence to support the particular inference of fact. That is, I think, well established. But in this case before us the material facts were such that an inference of fact might be drawn either way, namely, that there had been a change of identity or that there had not been a change of identity. Thus, in a case tried in the county court where the claim is based on negligence, if the facts were such that a judge could properly hold that there was negligence that is a finding of fact, and I apprehend that no appeal would lie to the Court of Appeal. In my opinion, therefore, there was a mutual mistake of fact on a matter of fundamental importance, namely, as to the identity of the flat with the dwelling-house previously let at a standard rent of £140 per annum, and that the principle laid down in Cooper v. Phibbs (6) applies.

There are two other points taken by counsel for the landlord with which I must deal. One was that the tenant made a misrepresentation of fact, namely, that, because of the re-construction, the rent was not controlled. The learned judge made no specific finding on that issue, but as I read the notes of his judgment I think that he intended to find there was no misrepresentation of fact by the tenant, because he said :

> " I find there was no mistake of fact . . . I do not think they ever addressed their minds to the material issue of identity."

I have already dealt with that last sentence of the note. In the absence of any specific finding by the judge, I am not satisfied that the tenant made any specific misrepresentation of fact to the landlord such as would entitle the landlord to rescind the contract.

The other point was that the tenant was personally estopped by conduct from asserting that the control by virtue of the pre-war letting relieved him from his personal obligation to pay the landlord £250 per annum as reserved by the lease. The question of estoppel in cases arising under the Rent Acts was recently considered by the Court of Appeal in Welch v. Nagy (9). The essential facts in that case were that the defendant had agreed to take a dwelling-house furnished.

The rateable value of the house was such as to bring it within the Rent Restrictions Acts. In an action by the landlord for a declaration that the letting was a furnished one the defendant tenant sought to establish that he had bought the furniture in the house from his previous landlord, and that he had described the house as "furnished" by inadvertence. The landlord asserted that the defendant was estopped from proof of these facts. On appeal the Court of Appeal held that the rule of estoppel could not oust the jurisdiction of the court to decide whether the letting was within or without the purview of the Rent Acts. ASQUITH, L.J., in the course of his judgment on this point, said (ante pp. 873, 874):

> "The Rent Restrictions Acts compel the courts to treat an unfurnished lease of a dwelling-house within the statutory limits of rateable value in a certain way. They are not to permit more than the standard rent and permitted increases to be charged, nor (except under certain conditions laid down in the Acts) have they jurisdiction to make orders for possession. The court must take these points even if the parties do not raise them, as they go to jurisdiction. The court's power, on the other hand, to make orders for possession in the case of leases of 'substantially' furnished houses is left unfettered by the Rent Restrictions Acts. In my view, the parties cannot, by describing (whether by accident or design) what is, in fact, an unfurnished tenancy as a furnished or substantially furnished one, alter the fact that the furniture is actually the tenant's and that such a tenancy cannot be a furnished or substantially furnished one. To treat the tenant as estopped from denying that the tenancy is furnished when it is, in fact, unfurnished is to confer on the courts by the act of one of the parties a jurisdiction (namely, an untrammelled power to make orders for possession of premises in fact unfurnished) which Parliament has said the court shall not have . . . Just as, in general, parties are not competent to contract out of the protection of the said Acts (see Barton v. Fincham (10), and Brown v. Draper (11)), where the true facts attract that protection, so here the tenant cannot, in my view, be estopped from proving the true facts where those facts attract that protection."

It seems to me that the same principle would apply in this case and that no rule of estoppel can oust the court from its jurisdiction to decide whether the rent claimed in respect of any dwelling-house infringes the provisions of s. 1 of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, which declares that:

> "Subject to the provisions of this Act, where the rent of any dwelling-house to which this Act applies . . . is . . . increased, then, if the increased rent . . . exceeds by more than the amount permitted under this Act the standard rent . . . the amount of such excess shall, notwithstanding any agreement to the contrary, be irrecoverable from the tenant . . ."

Section 14 enacts:

> "(1) Where any sum has . . . been paid on account of any rent . . . which is by virtue of this Act . . . irrecoverable by the landlord . . . the sum so paid shall be recoverable from the landlord . . . by the tenant . . ."

To apply the rule of estoppel in the present case would, to my mind, defeat these essential provisions of the Act. In my judgment, therefore, the tenant made out his case as regards the standard rent. On the other hand, the landlord established his point that the lease should be rescinded on the ground of mutual mistake, on a suitable undertaking being given by him as regards a new lease to the tenant.

Since writing this judgment, I have read the judgments of DENNING and JENKINS, L.JJ. Subject to agreement by counsel on the point, I agree with the terms proposed by DENNING, L.J., on which the present lease should be set aside.

DENNING, L.J. : The first question is: What is the rent which may lawfully be charged for this flat and garage ? The judge has, I think, misdirected himself in several respects, so it is open to this court to review his findings : British Launderers Research Association v. Central Middlesex Assessment Committee & Hendon Rating Authority (12). On this review I think that the structural alterations and improvements were not such as to destroy the identity of the original flat. The landlord was entitled, therefore, to increase the rent by eight per cent of their cost, but was not able on this account to charge a new rent unrestricted by the Rent Acts.

The inclusion in the lease of a garage, which had previously not formed part of the demise, gives rise to difficult questions. Even when taken together with the structural alterations, the addition of the garage does not change the identity of the flat. The standard rent, therefore, remains at £140 : Hemns v. Wheeler (3); Langford Property Co., Ltd. v. Batten (2). It does not follow, however, that the tenant gets the benefit of the garage for nothing. The landlord is probably entitled to increase the rent on account of it. Such an increase is justified by s. 2 (3) of the Act of 1920 as interpreted by this court in Seaford Court Estates, Ltd. v. Asher (13). Just as the landlord was entitled in that case to increase the rent because the tenant was relieved of the contingent burden of providing himself with hot water, if he wanted it, so here the tenant is relieved of the contingent burden of providing himself with a garage, if he wants one. I do not, however, pursue the point because it was not argued before us. It is said that, even allowing nothing for the garage, the permitted increases for structural alterations and improvements and increase of rates bring up the rent lawfully payable from £140 to £250. If, therefore, the landlord had served the prospective tenant with a proper notice of increase, the lease at £250 a year would have been valid. But he did not serve any notice at all because he thought that, owing to the improvements, the new rent was not restricted by the Acts. The tenant says that, there having been no notice, the landlord can only recover £140 a year for the seven years of the lease. So long as the lease stands the tenant's argument is unanswerable. The Acts prevent the landlord from recovering any more than the standard rent unless a notice of increase is given either to the sitting tenant or to a prospective tenant, and, although errors or omissions in a notice are not necessarily fatal, nevertheless there must be a notice, however informal. In this case the landlord conceded that no notice was served before the new lease was granted. It follows that the raising of the rent from £140 to £250 was invalid, and the landlord can do nothing now to repair the omission because no fresh notice of increase can be effective so long as the lease continues. The landlord tried to overcome this difficulty by saying that the tenant was estopped from saying that the rent of £250 was invalid, but, just as parties cannot contract out of the Acts, so they cannot defeat them by any estoppels.

In this plight the landlord seeks to set aside the lease. He says with truth that it is unfair that the tenant should have the benefit of the lease for the outstanding five years of the term at £140 a year when the proper rent is £250 a year. If he cannot give a notice of increase now, can he not avoid the lease ? The only ground on which he can avoid it is on the ground of mistake. It is quite plain that the parties were under a mistake. They thought that the flat was not tied down to a controlled rent, whereas in fact it was. In order to see whether the lease can be avoided for this mistake it is necessary to remember that mistake is of two kinds : first, mistake which renders the contract void, that is, a nullity from the beginning, which is the kind of mistake which was dealt with by the courts of common law, and, secondly, mistake which renders the contract not void, but voidable, that is, liable to be set aside on such terms as the court thinks fit, which is the kind of mistake which was dealt with by the courts of equity. Much of the difficulty which has attended this subject has arisen because, before the fusion of law and equity, the courts of common law, in order to do justice in the case in hand, extended this doctrine of mistake beyond its proper limits and held contracts to be void which were really only voidable, a process which was capable of being attended with much injustice to third persons who had bought goods or otherwise committed themselves on the faith that there was a contract. Since the fusion of law and equity there is no reason to continue this process, and it will be found that only those contracts are now held void where the mistake was such as to prevent the formation of any contract at all.

Let me first consider mistakes which render a contract a nullity. All previous decisions on this subject must now be read in the light of Bell v. Lever Bros., Ltd. (14). The correct interpretation of that case, to my mind, is that once a contract has been made, that is to say, once the parties, whatever their inmost states of mind, have to all outward appearances agreed with sufficient certainty in the same terms on the same subject-matter, then the contract is good unless and until it is set aside for breach of some condition expressed or implied in it, or for fraud, or on some equitable ground. Neither party can rely on his own mistake to say it was a nullity from the beginning, no matter that it was a mistake which to his mind was fundamental, and no matter that the other party knew he was under a mistake. A fortiori if the other party did not know of the mistake, but shared it. The cases where goods have perished at the time of sale, or belong to the buyer, are not really contracts which are void for mistake, but are void by reason of an implied condition to that effect, and even cases like Smith v. Hughes (15) turn at law on whether there was a contractual condition or not. So far as cases later than Bell v. Lever Bros., Ltd. (14) are concerned, I do not think that Sowler v. Potter (16) can stand with King's Norton Metal Co., Ltd. v. Edridge, Merrett & Co., Ltd. (17), which shows that the doctrine of French law as enunciated by POTHIER is no part of English law. Nor do I think that the contract in Nicholson and Venn v. Smith Marriott (18) was void from the beginning. Applying these principles it is clear that here there was a contract. The parties agreed in the same terms on the same subject-matter. It is true that the landlord was under a mistake which was to him fundamental. He would not for one moment have considered letting the flat for seven years if it meant that he could only charge £140 a year for it. He made the fundamental mistake of believing that the rent he could charge was not limited to a controlled rent, but, whether it was his own mistake or a mistake common to both him and the tenant, it is not a ground for saying that the lease was from the beginning a nullity. Any other view would lead to remarkable results, for it would mean that in the many cases where the parties mistakenly think the house is outside the Rent Acts when it is really within them, the tenancy would be a nullity, and the tenant would have to go, with the result that tenants would not dare to seek to have their rents reduced to the permitted amounts lest they should be turned out.

Let me next consider mistakes which render a contract voidable, that is, liable to be set aside on some equitable ground. While presupposing that a contract was good at law, or at any rate not void, the court of equity would often relieve a party from the consequences of his own mistake, so long as it could do so without injustice to third parties. The court had power to set aside the contract whenever it was of opinion that it was unconscientious for the other party to avail himself of the legal advantage which he had obtained: Torrance v. Bolton (19). This branch of equity has shown a progressive development. It is now clear that a contract will be set aside if the mistake of the one party has been induced by a material misrepresentation of the other, even though it was not fraudulent or fundamental, or if one party, knowing that the other is mistaken about the terms of an offer, or the identity of the person by whom it is made, lets him remain under his delusion and conclude a contract on the mistaken terms instead of pointing out the mistake, which is, I venture to think, the ground on which the defendant in Smith v. Hughes (15) would be exempted nowadays, and on which, according to BLACKBURN, J.'s view of the facts (1 Q.B.D. 355), the contract in Lindsay v. Cundy (20) was voidable and not void, A and on which the lease in Sowler v. Potter (16) was, in my opinion, voidable and not void. A contract is also liable in equity to be set aside if the parties were under a common misapprehension either as to facts or as to their relative and respective rights, provided that the misapprehension was fundamental and that the party seeking to set it aside was not himself at fault. That principle was first applied to private rights as long ago as 1730 in Lansdown v. Lansdown (21). B

There were four brothers and the second and third of them died. The eldest brother entered on the lands of the deceased brothers, but the younger brother claimed them. So the two rival brothers consulted a friend who was a local schoolmaster. The friend looked up a book which he then had with him called the Clerk's Remembrancer and gave it as his opinion that the lands belonged to the youngest brother. He recommended the two of them to take further C advice which at first they intended to do, but they did not do so, and acting on the friend's opinion the eldest brother agreed to divide the estate with the youngest brother and executed deeds and bonds giving effect to the agreement. Lord Chancellor KING declared that the documents were obtained by a mistake and through a misrepresentation of the law by the friend, and ordered them to be given up to be cancelled. He pointed out that the maxim ignorantia juris non D excusat only means that ignorance cannot be pleaded in excuse of crimes. Eighteen years later in the time of LORD HARDWICKE, L.C., the same principle was applied in Bingham v. Bingham (22). If and in so far as those cases were compromises of disputed rights, they have been subjected to justifiable criticism, but in cases where there is no element of compromise, but only of mistaken rights, the House of Lords in 1867 in the great case of Cooper v. Phibbs (6) affirmed the E doctrine there acted on as perfectly correct doctrine. In that case an uncle had told his nephew, not intending to misrepresent anything but being in fact in error, that he (the uncle) was entitled to a fishery, and the nephew, after the uncle's death, acting in the belief of the truth of what the uncle had told him, entered into an agreement to rent the fishery from the uncle's daughters, whereas it actually belonged to the nephew himself. The mistake there as to the title F to the fishery did not render the tenancy agreement a nullity. If it had done so, the contract would have been void at law from the beginning and equity would have had to follow the law. There would have been no contract to set aside and no terms to impose. The House of Lords, however, held that the mistake was only such as to make it voidable, or, in LORD WESTBURY's words (L.R. 2 H.L. 170) "liable to be set aside" on such terms as the court thought fit to impose, G and it was so set aside.

The principle so established by Cooper v. Phibbs (6) has been repeatedly acted on: see, for instance, Earl Beauchamp v. Winn (23) (L.R. 6 H.L. 234); Huddersfield Banking Co., Ltd. v. Lister (Henry) & Son, Ltd. (24). It is in no way impaired by Bell v. Lever Bros., Ltd. (14) which was treated in the House of Lords as a case at law depending on whether the contract was a nullity H or not. If it had been considered on equitable grounds, the result might have been different. In any case the principle of Cooper v. Phibbs (6) has been fully restored by Norwich Union Fire Insurance Society v. Price, Ltd. (25). Applying the principle in the present case, the facts are that the tenant was a surveyor who was employed by the landlord, not only to arrange finance for the purchase of the building and to negotiate with the rating authorities as to the new rateable values, but also to let the flats. He was the agent for letting and he clearly formed the view that the building was not controlled. He told the valuation officer so. He advised the landlord what were the rents which could be charged. He read to the landlord an opinion of counsel relating to the matter and told the landlord that, in his opinion, he could charge £250 and that there was no previous control. He said that the flats came outside the Rent Acts and that the landlord was "clear." The landlord relied on what the tenant told him and authorised the tenant to let at the rentals which he had suggested. The tenant not only let the four other flats to other people for a long period of years at the new rentals, but also he took one himself for seven years at £250 a year. Now he turns round and says, quite unashamedly, that he wants to take advantage of the mistake to get the flat at £140 a year for seven years instead of the £250 a year, which is not only the rent he agreed to pay but is also the fair and economic rent, and it is also the rent permitted by the Acts on compliance with the necessary formalities. If the rules of equity have become so rigid that they cannot remedy such an injustice, it is time we had new rules invented, but, in my view, the established rules are amply sufficient for this case. On the landlord's evidence, which the judge preferred, I should have thought there was a good deal to be said for the view that the lease was induced by an innocent material misrepresentation by the tenant. It seems to me that the tenant was not merely expressing an opinion on the law. He was making an unambiguous statement as to private rights and a misrepresentation as to private rights is equivalent to a misrepresentation of fact for this purpose: MacKenzie v. Royal Bank of Canada (26). But it is unnecessary to come to a firm conclusion on this point, because, as BUCKNILL, L.J., has said, there was clearly a mutual mistake, or, as I would prefer to describe it, a common misapprehension, which was fundamental and in no way due to any fault of the landlord, and Cooper v. Phibbs (6) affords ample authority for saying that, by reason of the common misapprehension, this lease can be set aside on such terms as the court thinks fit. The fact that the lease has been executed is no bar to this relief. No distinction can in this respect be taken between rescission for innocent misrepresentation and rescission for common misapprehension, for many of the common misapprehensions are due to innocent misrepresentation, and Cooper v. Phibbs (6) shows that rescission is available even after an agreement of tenancy has been executed and partly performed. The observations in Seddon v. North Eastern Salt Co., Ltd. (27) have lost all authority since SCRUTTON, L.J., threw doubt on them in Lever Bros., Ltd. v. Bell ([1931] 1 K.B. 588) (14), and the Privy Council actually set aside an executed agreement in MacKenzie v. Royal Bank of Canada (26). If and in so far as Angel v. Jay (28), decided that an executed lease could not be rescinded for an innocent misrepresentation it was, in my opinion, a wrong decision. It would mean that innocent people would be deprived of their right of rescission before they had any opportunity of knowing they had it. I am aware that in Wilde v. Gibson (29), LORD CAMPBELL said that an executed conveyance could be set aside only on the ground of actual fraud, but this must be taken to be confined to misrepresentations as to defects of title on the conveyance of land. In the ordinary way, of course, rescission is only granted when the parties can be restored to substantially the same position as they were before the contract was made, but, as LORD BLACKBURN said (3 App. Cas. 1,278) in Erlanger v. New Sombrero Phosphate Co. (30):

> "... the practice has always been for a court of equity to give this relief whenever, by the exercise of its powers, it can do what is practically just, though it cannot restore the parties precisely to the state they were in before the contract."

That, indeed, was what was done in Cooper v. Phibbs (6). Terms were imposed so as to do what was practically just.

What terms then should be imposed here? If the lease were set aside without any terms being imposed, it would mean that the tenant would have to go out and would have to pay a reasonable sum for his use and occupation. That would, however, not be just to the tenant. It is similar to a case where a long lease is made at the full permitted rent in the common belief that notices of increase have previously been served, whereas in fact they have not. In Cooper v. Phibbs (6), as in this, when the lease is set aside, terms must be imposed so as to see that the tenant is not unjustly evicted. When SIR JOHN ROMILLY, M.R., was faced with a somewhat similar problem, he gave the tenant the option either to agree to pay the proper rent or to go out: see Garrard v. Frankel (31), and when BACON, V.-C., in Paget v. Marshall (32) had a like problem before him, he did the same, saying (28 Ch.D. 267) that > "... the object of the court is, as far as it can, to put the parties into the position in which they would have been in if the mistake had not happened."

If the mistake here had not happened a proper notice of increase would have been given and the lease would have been executed at the full permitted rent. I think this court should follow these examples and should impose terms which will enable the tenant to choose either to stay on at the proper rent or to go out.

The terms will be complicated by reason of the Rent Acts, but it is not beyond the wit of man to devise them. Subject to any observations which the parties may desire to make, the terms which I suggest are these: The lease should only be set aside if the landlord is prepared to give an undertaking that he will permit the tenant to be a licensee of the premises pending the grant of a new lease. Then, while the tenant is a licensee, the landlord will in law be in possession of the premises, and will be able to serve on the tenant, as prospective tenant, a notice under s. 7 (4) of the Act of 1938 increasing the rent to the full permitted amount. And the landlord must further be prepared to give an undertaking that he will serve such a notice within three weeks from the drawing up of the order, and that he will, if written request is made by the tenant within one month of the service of the notice, grant him a new lease at the full permitted amount of rent, not, however, exceeding £250 a year, for a term expiring on Sept. 29, 1954, subject in all other respects to the same covenants and conditions as in the rescinded lease. If there is any difference of opinion about the figures stated in the notice, that can, of course, be adjusted during the currency of the lease. If the tenant does not choose to accept the licence or the new lease, he must go out. He will not be entitled to the protection of the Rent Restrictions Acts because, the lease being set aside, there will be no initial contractual tenancy from which a statutory tenancy can spring.

In my opinion, therefore, the appeal should be allowed. The declaration that the standard rent of the flat is £140 per annum should stand. An order should be made on the counter-claim that, on the landlord giving the undertakings which I have mentioned, the lease be set aside. An account should be had to determine the sum payable for use and occupation. The tenant's claim for repayment of rent and for breach of covenant should be dismissed. In respect of the tenant's occupation during the rescinded lease and subsequent licence, he will be liable to pay a reasonable sum for use and occupation. That sum should, prima facie, be assessed at the full amount permitted by the Acts, not, however, exceeding £250 a year. Mesne profits as against a trespasser are assessed at the full amount permitted by the Acts, even though notices of increase have not been served, because that is the amount lost by the landlord. The same assessment should be made here because the sums payable for use and occupation are not rent, and the statutory provisions about notices of increase do not apply to them. All necessary credits must, of course, be given in respect of past payments, and so forth.

JENKINS, L.J.: There is no doubt that the lease of Dec. 1, 1947, under which the landlord demised to the tenant 1, Maywood House, Beckenham, for seven years from Sept. 29, 1947, at the yearly rent of £250, was executed on the assumption, common to both parties, that in the circumstances of the case the Rent Restrictions Acts would not operate to prevent the whole of the rent expressed to be reserved by the lease from being legally recoverable by the landlord from the tenant. There is, further, no doubt—indeed the tenant admitted in evidence—that in the course of the negotiations leading to the grant of the lease he himself expressed the opinion to the landlord that the landlord "could charge £250 and that there was no previous control." The point was material not only in relation to the letting to the tenant of 1, Maywood House, but also in relation to the four other flats in the building, in the arrangements for letting which the tenant was assisting the landlord in his capacity as a surveyor. So far as the letting to the tenant himself was concerned, his attitude at the date of the lease is probably best summed up by his own statement in evidence to the effect that he did not mind whether £250 was the controlled rent or not, but meant to pay it for seven years. At this time the landlord and the tenant were friends, and, indeed, partners in an estate agents' business styled "Godfrey & Charles." They were dealing on perfectly equal terms in the matter of the lease, the rent of £250 was a perfectly fair and reasonable rent, and the tenant was well content with his bargain. Relations between the parties later deteriorated, and the tenant finally brought in the Bromley County Court the proceedings leading to the present appeal in which he has contended (successfully before the learned county court judge) that the standard rent of the premises under the Rent Restrictions Acts is £140, being the rent at which the corresponding flat then known as No. 2 was let (but without the garage) to a Mr. Howard Taylor for three years from July 1, 1938, and, accordingly, that, as no permitted increase has been made in that standard rent in accordance with the procedure laid down by the Acts, the rent recoverable by the landlord under the lease of Dec. 1, 1947, is limited to £140 per annum and the landlord is liable to repay to the tenant the rent he has so far paid in excess of that figure.

The learned county court judge, while deciding in favour of the tenant, expressed great sympathy for the landlord. That sympathy I confess I fully share, the tenant's case being as completely devoid of merit as any case could well be. Moreover, if the landlord had appreciated the possibility of such a claim while the lease was in negotiation he could have defeated it in advance by serving a notice of increase under s. 7 (4) of the Act of 1938, which, by taking due credit for the landlord's expenditure on the premises and the increase in rates, could have brought the standard rent of £140, if applicable, up to, or substantially up to, a permitted total of £250 per annum, that is to say, the rent actually expressed to be reserved by the lease. However, the landlord did not take that step, and the position, accordingly, is that if £140 per annum is indeed the standard rent of the premises then, inasmuch as no permitted increase has in fact been made in accordance with the Acts, by the express terms of s. 1 of the Act of 1920, the amount (i.e., £110 per annum) of the excess of the agreed rent of £250 over the standard rent of £140 is "notwithstanding any agreement to the contrary . . . irrecoverable from the tenant." Moreover, as the landlord has missed his opportunity under s. 7 (4) of the Act of 1938, he cannot, if the lease stands, serve any effective notice of increase until the expiration of the seven years term, as, under the provisions of s. 3 (1) of the Act of 1920, he can only effect an increase of rent in respect of a period during which he would but for the Act be entitled to obtain possession. The consequence to the landlord must, therefore, be to tie him for seven years from Sept. 29, 1947, to a tenant from whom he can recover only a grossly uneconomic rent, in the teeth of a fair and reasonable bargain freely made. No useful purpose will be served by further comment on the tenant's conduct. Section 1 of the Act of 1920 is expressly made to operate "notwithstanding any agreement to the contrary" and if he can reconcile it with his conscience in the circumstances I have briefly stated to go back on his bargain with the landlord in the matter of rent, he is doing no more than the statute invites him to do.

The only relevant questions for the court are : (i) Whether on the facts of the case the tenant is right in law in his contention that the standard rent of the premises is £140 per annum, and (ii) If so, whether the landlord can save himself from the disastrous consequences I have already mentioned by making out a case for rescission of the lease or, alternatively, for holding the tenant estopped from claiming the benefit of the Acts. The question as to the standard rent of the demised premises turns on the nature, extent and effect of the alterations and improvements made by the landlord before the letting to the tenant, the inclusion in the tenant's lease of the garage which was not included in Mr. Howard Taylor's lease being taken into account as well as the physical alterations and improvements made in and to the subject-matter of the demise. The duty of the learned county court judge as regards this issue was to consider the nature, extent and effect of these alterations and improvements and ask himself whether, having regard to their nature, extent and effect, the premises let to the tenant in 1947 at the rent of £250 per annum constituted substantially the same dwelling-house as the premises let to Mr. Howard Taylor in 1938 at the rent of £140 per annum. An affirmative answer to this question must lead to the conclusion as a matter of law that the standard rent of the premises let to the tenant is £140, while a negative answer would mean that the premises let to the tenant constituted for the purposes of the Acts a new dwelling-house to which no existing standard rent applied, with the result that the landlord was free under the Acts to charge the rent of £250 per annum expressed to be reserved by the lease, which would itself constitute the standard rent for the purposes of future control.

Given the application of the correct test, which I have endeavoured to state in the form of the question posed above, the result of its application depends essentially on matters of fact and degree on which the findings of the learned county court judge must not be disturbed unless there was no evidence on which he could reasonably come to his conclusion. Criticism of the learned county court judge's judgment on this issue was mainly directed to his reference to the case of Ellis v. Sisman (1). The relevant passage in the very short note of his judgment with which we have been provided is in these terms :

> " If the house had been damaged by enemy action, the tenant could have claimed that the flat was still the same (Ellis v. Sisman (1)). These alterations fall short of satisfying the test."

The reference to Ellis v. Sisman (1) was clearly inappropriate, as the point in that case was that a contractual tenant can, so long as his contract of tenancy remains in force, claim to be tenant of any building for the time being erected on the land comprised in his contract of tenancy, differing in this respect from a statutory tenant whose rights as such depend on the continued existence as such of the dwelling-house to which his statutory rights were attached. It was, therefore, contended for the landlord that the learned county court judge showed himself to have applied a wrong test, and if his reference to Ellis v. Sisman (1) really meant that in his view, because a contractual tenant of the flat for a term beginning on a date prior to the war damage and ending on a date after the re-construction could have claimed that he was still tenant of the re-constructed flat, therefore the flat as re-constructed is the same dwelling-house as the flat as it existed before the war damage for the purposes of standard rent, then I think he quite plainly misdirected himself. But looking at the note of the judgment as a whole I am not satisfied that the learned county court judge did really found himself on a wrong principle erroneously derived from Ellis v. Sisman (1). His reference to that case is certainly difficult to understand, but twice earlier in his judgment he refers to substantial identity as the test (once in relation to the inclusion of the garage and again in stating the tenant's contention) and his unfortunate reference to Ellis v. Sisman (1) was followed by a detailed consideration of the nature and extent of the alterations including the expense involved, with the ultimate conclusion that: "It still remains the identical dwelling-house although decorated and beautified." His detailed consideration of the work done was criticised on account of his description of the conversion of part of a bedroom into a dining recess communicating with the living room as: "Transfer of recess from bedroom into dining room—simply a question of moving the partition—not fundamental—very minor," when in fact it involved cutting through two main walls between the living room and the bedroom and the insertion of steel joists to take the weight formerly carried by those walls. I agree that the learned county court judge is not quite accurate here, but after all from the point of view of a tenant his description of the effect of this alteration is not wide of the mark, the effect on the identity and character of the flat being no different from what it would have been if the walls removed had in fact been mere partition walls. The fact that structural precautions were incidentally necessary to secure the safety of the building no doubt added to the expense of this alteration and was in that respect material, but I do not think it was otherwise important for the purpose of considering the effect of this particular alteration on the identity of the flat as a dwelling-house. I am, therefore, disposed to hold that the learned county court judge's judgment on this issue, read as a whole, discloses no such misdirection of himself as to justify the interference of this court on what was essentially a question of fact for him. But, be that as it may, having myself considered the nature, extent and effect of the alterations and improvements, including the matter of the garage, I am satisfied that the learned county court judge's conclusion was right, and, assuming the question to be open to this court, I would myself come to the same conclusion. As to the inclusion of the garage, this court is precluded by its decision in Langford Property Co., Ltd. v. Batten (2) from treating this as more than a circumstance to be taken into account in conjunction with the physical improvements and alterations in and to the premises, and so considered I cannot regard it as enough to turn the scale in the landlord's favour, particularly in view of the doubt as to the practice actually followed in regard to the user of the garage in Mr. Howard Taylor's time. I am, accordingly, of opinion that the learned county court judge's decision was right on the question of standard rent and, accordingly, that the tenant is entitled to hold his judgment unless the landlord's case for rescission of the lease or alternatively for holding the tenant as estopped from claiming the benefit of the Acts can be made out.

The landlord's claim for rescission is based on the alternative grounds of misrepresentation and mutual mistake. As to misrepresentation, it is important to observe that fraud is not alleged. Therefore, any misrepresentation shown to have been made by the tenant must be taken to have been an innocent misrepresentation. Moreover, the contract of which rescission is claimed is one which has been executed by the grant of a lease under seal. An executed contract will, no doubt, be set aside notwithstanding completion when it is shown to have been induced by fraudulent misrepresentation, but it has been repeatedly held that an innocent misrepresentation affords no sufficient ground for rescission after completion, and there is authority for the view that this applies to a lease no less than to a conveyance: see Angel v. Jay (28), and the cases there cited. I appreciate that, as DENNING, L.J., has pointed out, doubts have of comparatively recent years been expressed as to the validity of this principle, but, for my part, I am not prepared to hold that it is no longer to be regarded as the law, and, accepting it as I do, I think it suffices to dispose of the claim for rescission on the ground of misrepresentation in the present case. I should, however, add that the evidence in the case seems to me to disclose nothing amounting to a misrepresentation on the part of the tenant. The most that can be held against him is that he gave the landlord his opinion that the landlord "could charge £250 and that there was no previous control." According to the landlord the tenant said he (the landlord) "was clear" (i.e., clear of any previous control under the Rent Restrictions Acts), but I think this comes to the same thing. In either case the tenant was merely giving the landlord his view of the law. Fraud being neither charged nor proved, the tenant must be taken to have been expressing the opinion he genuinely held at that time. A

The expression of an opinion bona fide held on a question of law is not misrepresentation.

As regards the alternative ground of mutual mistake, it is pertinent to note the learned county court judge's finding of fact on this issue which appears in the note of his judgment in these terms :

> "I find there was no mistake of fact—possibly a mistake of law in that B > both parties for some obscure reason imagined that the Rent Acts did not apply. I don't think they ever addressed their minds to the material issue of identity."

This finding was subjected to considerable criticism in the course of the argument before us, but I think there was ample evidence to justify the learned county C court judge, preferring as he did the landlord's evidence to the tenant's, in concluding that before the grant of the lease was completed both parties knew all the material facts about Maywood House and the flats into which it had been divided. That is to say, they knew that in 1939 the building consisted of five separate flats separately let, they also knew the rents at which the flats were then let, and, in particular, that the rent of No. 1 (then known as No. 2) had been D £140. They also knew the nature and extent and effect on the lay-out and character of the flats of the alterations and improvements that had been made in conjunction with the restoration of the war damage ; and they also knew the rateable value of each flat. These were all the facts necessary to be known in order to form a conclusion on the question whether the flat proposed to be let to the tenant was, under the Acts, subject to a standard rent of £140 fixed by E reference to the pre-war letting of the corresponding flat to Mr. Howard Taylor. The mistake consisted simply in the drawing by the parties of an erroneous conclusion from these facts to the effect that the standard rent of £140 was no longer applicable on account of the alterations and improvements which had been made since Mr. Howard Taylor's time. The learned county court judge in the passage I have just quoted said that "both parties for some obscure reason F imagined that the Rent Acts did not apply," and that he did not think "they ever addressed their minds to the material question of identity." This was criticised as contrary to the evidence. I do not agree. I think the learned county court judge, who had himself formed a clear opinion to the effect that the re-constructed flat was in substance the same dwelling-house as the original flat, described the reason why the parties did not appreciate this and the G consequent continued application of the standard rent of £140 as "obscure," but accounted for it by concluding that the parties formed the view that the alterations and improvements prevented the old standard rent from applying without really directing their minds to the material question whether, notwithstanding all the alterations and improvements, the flat proposed to be let to the tenant was not, after all, substantially the same dwelling-house as the H flat formerly let to Mr. Howard Taylor. I see nothing in the evidence inconsistent with this explanation of the mistake, but, whether the parties failed to ask themselves the right question or, having asked it, answered it wrongly, I find it impossible to hold that a mutual mistake of the character here involved affords a good ground for rescission. The landlord meant to grant and the tenant meant to take a lease in the terms in which the lease was actually granted of the premises which the lease as granted actually comprised. They knew all the material facts bearing on the effect of the Rent Restrictions Acts on a lease of these premises, but they mutually misapprehended the effect which in that state of facts those Acts would have on such a lease. That is a mistake of law of a kind which, so far as I am aware, has never yet been held to afford good ground for rescission. It is a mistake, not as to the subject-matter, nature or purport of the contract entered into, nor as to any question of private right affecting the basis of the contract entered into: see Cooper v. Phibbs (6); but simply a mistake as to the effect of certain public statutes on the contract made, being in all respects precisely the contract the parties intended to make.

The mistaken conclusion to the effect that on the facts of the case (all relevant facts being known to both parties) the Rent Restrictions Acts did not have the effect of making £140 the standard rent of the flat in question was, as it seems to me, equally a mistake of law, whether it was due to a failure to appreciate and apply the test of identity, or proceeded from an application of that test, followed by an erroneous inference or opinion drawn from the facts to the effect that the flat in question was not in substance the same dwelling-house as the flat formerly let to Mr. Howard Taylor. The application of the test, if it was indeed applied, was merely a step in the reasoning leading from the facts to the conclusion of law. It is, moreover, to be noted that the provisions of s. 1 of the Act of 1920 are imperative and are expressly declared to be applicable notwithstanding any contract to the contrary. This must mean, I think, not only that the excess of the contractual rent over the permitted rent is irrecoverable, even if the parties expressly agreed that it should be recoverable notwithstanding the Act, but also that the excess is irrecoverable even if the parties, whether through total ignorance of the legislation, or though misapprehension of its effect, believed that the full contractual rent would be, and intended that it should be, legally recoverable. Further, I think that by necessary implication the effect of s. 1 must be, not merely to prevent the tenant from being liable to pay the excess, but to entitle him to hold the tenancy on payment of the permitted rent and no more: see Brakspear (W.H.) & Sons, Ltd. v. Barton (33) ([1924] 2 K.B. 96).

If the landlord could procure rescission of the tenancy merely by alleging and proving that he and the tenant entered into the tenancy under a mutual mistake to the effect that the Acts imposed no restriction on the rent which could legally be charged, the whole object of the Acts would, so far as I can see, be frustrated in such a case. That object is to fix maximum rents for dwelling-houses within the purview of the Acts and to ensure that tenants of such dwelling-houses shall be secure in their possession of them on paying no more than the maximum permitted rent even if they have in fact agreed to pay more. If when a tenant claims his rights under the Acts the landlord can say: "We neither of us knew the Acts applied," or "We both thought the Acts did not apply", and threaten rescission, the tenant must either risk rescission and consequent ejectment or else submit to pay whatever the landlord demands as consideration for renouncing his right to rescind. I see no distinction for this purpose between a letting at more than the permitted rent under a contract purporting to exclude the Acts, due perhaps to a mutual mistake to the effect that the Acts permitted "contracting out," and a letting in mutual ignorance of the existence of the Acts, or a letting under a mutual misapprehension as to the application and effect of the Acts in a particular case. In all these cases the Acts operate on the contract made notwithstanding the intention of the parties, and, accordingly, I fail to see how the existence of a mutual intention at the time of entering into the contract to the effect that the full contractual rent should be exigible, whether based on mutual ignorance of the Acts or of the prohibition against contracting out of the Acts, or on a mutual misapprehension as to the application or effect of the Acts in the particular case, can affect the validity of the contract when it is afterwards discovered that, contrary to the intention and belief of the parties at the time they made the contract, the rent legally recoverable is limited to a standard rent less in amount than the rent contractually reserved. It should further be noted that, if the landlord's contention is correct, the landlord's right to rescission would arise in such a case so soon as he discovered the mistake as to the effect of the Acts on the lease or tenancy granted. The tenant could thus be deprived of his bargain and turned out, even though he had never dreamed of claiming the benefit of the Acts and had no other intention than to pay the full contractual rent whether legally recoverable or not. This seems to me a curious result indeed. Yet the right to rescind, if it exists at all, must exist from the moment the contract is entered into, and cannot be made to depend ex post facto on the conduct of the tenant. For these reasons, I, for my part, find it impossible to hold that a case for rescission on the ground of mutual mistake is made out.

I have considered whether rescission might not be justified on the ground that the tenant stood in a fiduciary relationship to the landlord as his agent and adviser in the matter of the letting of the flats in Maywood House, and, consequently, must not be allowed to take advantage for his own benefit of the mistaken advice he gave the landlord even though given in good faith, but the case was never put in this way and I do not think the fiduciary relationship essential to relief on this ground can be made out on the evidence.

The contention to the effect that the tenant is estopped from claiming the benefit of the Rent Restrictions Acts can I think be disposed of on the short ground that, inasmuch as the tenant could have claimed the benefit of the Rent Acts even if he had expressly agreed not to do so, he cannot be precluded from claiming such benefit by words or conduct not amounting to an express promise not to do so but in effect implying such a promise. For these reasons, if the result rested with me, I should find myself reluctantly compelled to dismiss the appeal, but my brethren take a different view, and I may perhaps be allowed to add that my regret in differing from them is tempered by satisfaction that they have found it possible to arrive at a solution which accords with what I myself feel to be the merits of the case.

Appeal allowed with costs here and below. Judgment for the landlord on the claim for repayment of rent overpaid and on the counter-claim for rescission of the lease. Rescission ordered on terms that the tenant pays as a licensee a fair sum for use and occupation of the premises from the commencement of the rescinded lease until the date of judgment, credit being given for sums already paid as rent and account being taken of the effect of non-repair of the premises on the value of the use and occupation, the amount to be assessed by the registrar, the landlord to serve notice of increase of rent in respect of improvements within three weeks of the drawing up of the order of the Court of Appeal and to undertake to allow the tenant to occupy the premises as licensee pending the grant of a new lease, and, on written request made by the tenant, within one month of the serving of the notice of increase, to grant a new lease at the full permitted rent, but not exceeding £250 a year, for the same term and subject in all other respects to the same covenants and conditions as in the rescinded lease.
